In Matt. xxiii. 24, is another proverbial expression: "Ye strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel." Dr Adam Clarke has proved that there is an error of the press in the English translation, by which at has been substituted for out. The passage as it now stands, conveys no sense: it should be, "Ye strain out the gnat, and swallow down the camel." The allusion is to the custom which prevailed among both Gentiles and Jews, of straining the liquor which they drank, for the purpose of ejecting those insects which so swarm in some southern countries, and hence easily fall into wine-vessels. Some of the commentators have wished to get rid of the camel in this passage, from an idea that our Lord could not have united so huge an animal with so small an insect. They, therefore, propose to understand a larger species of fly. This conjectural emendation, however, cannot be admitted, as it is unsupported by the ancient versions. The expression must be taken hyperbolically. To make the antithesis as strong as may be, two things are selected as opposite as possible,—the smallest insect, and the largest animal. And this very antithesis was used by the Jewish and Greek writers, as appears from Wetstein. The expression has generally been understood by English readers as implying an effort to swallow, but rejecting something very small and inconsiderable, yet receiving without hesitation something much larger and more important; but the fact is, it alludes to a custom the Jews had of straining or filtering their wine, for fear of swallowing any forbidden insect. Now, as it would be ridiculous to strain liquor for the sake of clearing it from insects, and then eating the largest of those insects; so the conduct of those is not only ridiculous, but highly criminal, who are superstitiously anxious in avoiding small faults, yet scruple not to commit the greatest sins.

Camels are spoken of in Scripture,—

1. As an article of wealth and state. Gen. xii. 16, xxx. 43; 2 Kings viii. 9; 1 Chron. xxvii. 30; Ezra. ii. 67; Neh. vii. 69; Job i. 3.
2. As used for travelling. Gen. xxiv. 64, xxxi. 34; 1 Kings x. 2.
3. As an important means of traffic. Gen. xxxvii. 25; 1 Chron. xii. 40; Isa. xxx. 6.
4. As used in war. Judg. vi. 5; vii. 12; 1 Sam. xxx. 17; Jer. xlix. 29.
5. As a spoil in war. Judg. viii. 21; 1 Sam. xxvii. 9; 1 Chron. v. 21; Job i. 17; Jer. xlix. 32.
6. As sufferers in the plagues brought upon the brute creation for the sin of man. Exod. ix. 3; 1 Sam. xv. 3.
7. As furnishing an article of clothing. Matt. iii. 4; Zech. xiv. 15.
8. Connected with these animals, we have a pleasing instance of industry, humility, and courtesy in a young woman of rank and fortune. Rebekah was seen at the well, condescending, by personal labour, to supply the wants of the camels of Abraham's servant ; nor did her good disposition and good conduct go unrewarded ; those camels shortly after bore her into the Land of Promise, to become the wife of Abraham's son, and one in the line of mothers from whom He should descend in whom all the families of the earth were to be blessed. Gen. xxiv. 19-64.

9. The camel is prohibited for food, as unclean. Lev. xi. 14 ; Deut. xiv. 7.

10. Camels are prophetically and figuratively mentioned in the Old Testament. Isaiah (xxi. 7) predicts the march of Cyrus's army to the conquest and destruction of Babylon in the time of Belshazzar. The same prophet (xxx. 6) alludes to the folly and presumption of the Israelites, or Jews, or both, who, in the time of their trouble, carried treasures on camels into Egypt, to purchase the assistance of that people, and acknowledged not the Lord their God, who alone could save and deliver them. Isa. lx. 6, is part of a most sublime prediction, figurative of the purity and enlargement of the Church in the reign of the Messiah, when different nations shall, with alacrity and zeal, dedicate themselves and their substance to the service of God.

Jeremiah (xlix. 29, 32) predicts the confusion and ruin that should befall Kedar and Hazor, enemies of Israel, upon whom God would bring his judgments by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. The fulfilment of this prediction took place during the captivity of the Jews, and would tend greatly to encourage their hopes that the promises of their deliverance and return should also in due time be accomplished. Very similar is the prediction (Ezek. xxv. 5), that Rabbah, the chief city of Ammon, should be taken as a stable for camels by the Chaldeans.

CAMELEON, or CHAMELEON. In the English Bible, the chameleon is transformed into the mole, (Lev. xi. 30), an animal that has little pretension to be associated with reptiles of the lizard species. The Hebrew word, from a root which signifies to breathe, is peculiarly appropriate to this curious animal, which, according to vulgar opinion, is a "creature nourished by the wind and air."

The chameleon nearly resembles the crocodile in form, but differs widely in its size and appetites. Its head is about two inches long, and thence to the beginning of the tail four and a half ; the tail is five inches long, and the feet two and a half ; the thickness of the body varies at different times, for the animal possesses the power of blowing itself up and contracting itself at pleasure.

During his visit to the East, Le Bruyn purchased several chameleons, for the purpose of preserving them alive, and making observations on their nature and manners ; but the most interesting account of this curious animal is that furnished by the enterprising and lamented Belzoni, which we transcribe :—

"There are three species of chameleons, whose colours are peculiar to themselves ; for instance, the commonest sort are those which are generally green,—that is to say, the body all green, and when content, beautifully marked on each side regularly on the green with black and yellow, not in a confused manner, but as if drawn. This kind is in great plenty, and never have any other colour except a light green when they sleep, and when ill a very pale yellow. Out of near forty I had the first year when I was in Nubia, I had but one, and that a very small one, of the second sort, which had red marks. One chameleon lived with me eight months, and most of that time I had it fixed to the button of my coat ; it used to rest on my shoulder, or on my head. I have observed, when I have kept it shut up in a room for some time, that, on bringing it out in the air, it would begin drawing the air in ; and on putting it on some marjorum, it has had a wonderful effect on it immediately ; its colour became most brilliant. I believe it will puzzle a good many to say what cause it proceeds from. If they did not change when shut up in a house, but only on taking them into a garden, it might be supposed the change of the colours was in consequence of the smell of the plants ; but when in a house, if it is watched, it will [be seen to] change every ten minutes ; some moments a plain green, at others all its beautiful colours will come out, and when in a passion it becomes of a deep black, and will swell itself up like a balloon ; and, from being one of the most beautiful animals, it becomes one of the most ugly. It is true they are extremely fond of the fresh air ; and on taking them to a window where there is nothing to be seen, it is easy to observe the pleasure they certainly take in it ; they begin to gulp down the air, and their colour becomes brighter. I think it proceeds, in a great degree, from the temper they are in : a little thing will put them in a bad humour. If, in crossing a table, for instance, you stop them, and attempt to turn them another road, they will not stir, and are extremely obstinate : on opening the mouth at them, it will set them in a passion : they begin to arm themselves, by swelling and turning black, and will sometimes hiss a little, but not much. The third I brought from Jerusalem, was the most singular of all the chameleons I ever had : its temper, if it can be so called, was extremely sagacious and cunning. This one was not of the order of the green kind, but a disagreeable drab, and it never once varied in its colour in two months. On my arrival at Cairo, I used to let it crawl about the room, on the furniture. Sometimes it would get down, if it could, and hide itself away from me, but in a place where it could see me ; and sometimes, on my leaving the room, and on entering it, would draw itself so thin as to make itself nearly on a level with whatever it might be on, so that I might not see it. It had often deceived me so. One day, having missed it for some time, I concluded it was hid about the room ; after looking for it in vain, I thought it had got out of the room and made its escape. In the course of the evening, after the candle was lighted, I went to a basket that had got a handle across it : I saw my chameleon, but its colour entirely changed, and different to any I ever had seen before : the whole body, head and tail, a brown, with black spots, and beautiful deep orange-coloured spots round the black. I certainly was much gratified. On being disturbed, its colours vanished, unlike the others ; but after this I used to observe it the first thing in the morning, when it would have the same colours. Their chief food was flies. The fly does not die immediately on being swallowed ; for on taking the chameleon up in my hands, it was easy to feel the fly buzzing, chiefly on account of the air they draw in their inside. They swell much, and particularly when they want to fling themselves off a great height, by filling themselves up like a balloon. On falling, they get no hurt, except on the mouth, which they bruise a little, as that comes first to the ground. Sometimes they will not drink for three or four days, and when they begin, they are about half an hour drinking."

An Italian professor of natural history, who dissected two of these curious animals, is of opinion that the change of colour arises from the fact of their having four skins, extremely fine, whence arise the different colours. But their change of colour, by no means so marked or sudden as supposed, has nothing to do with the hue of the objects by which they are surrounded, but bears relation, physically, to the degree of light or obscurity to which they are exposed; morally, to the state of their own feelings, of fear or anger; and physiologically and directly, to the action of the lungs upon the circulating system.

CAMELS' HAIR, an article of clothing. John the Baptist was habited in raiment of camels' hair, and Chardin states, that such garments are worn by the modern dervises. There is a coarse cloth made of camels' hair in the East, which is used for manufacturing the coats of shepherds and camel-drivers, and also for the covering of tents. It was, doubtless, this coarse kind which was adopted by John. By this he was distinguished from those residents in royal palaces who wore soft raiment. Elijah is said in the English Bible to have been "a hairy man," (2 Kings i. 8); but it should be, "a man dressed in hair;" that is, camels' hair. In Zech. xiii. 4, "a rough garment,"—that is, a garment of a hairy manufacture—is characteristic of a prophet.

CAMERON, RICHARD. This eminent Covenanter, who fell a martyr to the cause of truth and righteousness, was born at Falkland, towards the close of the reign of Charles I. His father was a merchant, and in good worldly circumstances, and Richard received, accordingly, so liberal an education that he became a schoolmaster in his native town, acting, at the same time, as precentor to the curate of Falkland. It is probable that while holding this latter office, he chiefly attended the ministrations of the Episcopalian ministers; but he took occasion frequently to hear the gospel as preached by the "outed ministers," as they were called. The result was, that, in a short time, Richard Cameron became convinced of the unscriptural nature of Prelacy, left the ministry of the curates, and joined the Presbyterian party. He now resigned his situation in Falkland, and became chaplain or tutor in the family of Sir William Scott of Harden, in Roxburghshire. Here his principles were not long in being known, and he was dismissed from the family, though, at an after period, we find Sir William Scott and his lady among those who suffered persecution for non-conformity. After quitting the family of Harden, Cameron travelled southward, and became acquainted with the famous Mr John Welsh, grandson of John Welsh of Ayr, and great-grandson of John Knox. Mr Welsh had just before been compelled by his principles to resign his charge as minister of Irongray, in Dumfriesshire, and at the time when Cameron was introduced to him, he was wandering about the country, preaching to multitudes in the fields. Welsh and Cameron, though differing much in years, were kindred both in sentiment and disposition; and so deeply was Mr Welsh impressed with the piety and talents of his young friend, that he strongly urged upon him the duty of accepting a license to preach the gospel. Cameron was at first reluctant to undertake so responsible an office, but at length his scruples were overcome, and he was licensed by the outed ministers, Mr Welsh and Mr Semple, in the house of Henry Hall of Haughhead, in Teviotdale. Having thus become a licentiate of the Reformed Church of Scotland, Mr Cameron commenced his labours as a preacher of the gospel in the district of Annandale. It was not to be expected that so firm a supporter as he was of the true principles of the Reformation could refrain from opposing, to the uttermost, the sinful compliances of many in his time. Without hesitation he boldly inveighed against the Indulgence, and all who had accepted of it. To understand this part of the conduct of Cameron, which called forth the hostility of both the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, it will be necessary to advert for a little to the history of the period. There were three Acts of Indulgence passed, with the view of undermining the principles of the Reformation, and the Presbyterian Church. "The first was in consequence of a letter from the king to his council, dated 7th June 1669, purporting that, as by the act of council, and proclamation at Glasgow, in 1662, a number of ministers were at once turned out of their churches, and prevented from preaching the gospel, his majesty authorised the council to appoint so many of the outed ministers as had lived peaceably in the places where they had resided, to return and preach, and exercise the other functions of the ministry, in the parish churches they formerly occupied, provided they were vacant; and he allowed patrons to present to vacant churches such others as the council should approve of; and that such ministers as should take collation from the bishop of the diocese, and keep presbyteries and synods, should be warranted to lift their stipend as other ministers of the kingdom; but that such as were not, or should not be collated by the bishop, had no warrant to interfere with the local stipend, but only to possess the manse and glebe. That all who were restored should be enjoined to constitute and keep kirk-sessions, and presbyteries, and synods, as was done by all ministers before 1638; and that such as did not comply in this respect should be confined within the bounds of the parishes where they preached, until they gave assurance to keep presbyteries. That all who were allowed to preach should be strictly enjoined not to admit any of their neighbour or any other parishes into their communion, nor baptize their children, nor marry any of them, without permission of the minister of the parish to which they belonged, unless it be a vacant parish. That should it be found that the people of the neighbouring or other parishes resort to a different parish in this way, and desert their own, the minister who countenanced the same should be silenced for a longer or shorter period, according to the degree of the offence. That upon verified complaints of any seditious discourses or expressions in the pulpit, or elsewhere, uttered by any minister, they should be immediately turned out, and punished according to the degree of the offence. That such of the outed ministers as had behaved peaceably and were not re-entered, should have 400 merks yearly for their maintenance out of the vacant churches till they were provided with churches, and that such as should give assurance to live peaceably for the future, should have the same yearly maintenance.

"On the 27th of the following month (July), the council embodied the above letter into an act, and recalled several of the outed ministers to the exercise of their office, agreeably thereto. Another act was passed on the 2d September 1672, embodying the preceding one more fully, and containing the names of the ministers of the different dioceses who were indulged, and also the names of such preachers and outed ministers as were within their bounds. A second act was passed of the same date with the one last specified, premising, that 'It being necessary, for the better keeping of good order, that the rules following be observed by those ministers indulged by an act of the date of thir presents, and those indulged by former acts of council, therefore the lords of his majesty's privy council enjoin,—

"I. That they presume not to marry or baptize, except such as belong to the parish to which they are confined, or to the neighbouring parishes vacant, or wanting ministers for the time.

"II. That all ministers indulged in one and the same diocese, celebrate the communion upon one and the same Lord's day, and that they admit none to their communion belonging to other parishes without certificates from the ministers thereof.

"III. That they preach only in these kirks, and not in the churchyards, nor in any place else, under the pain to be reputed and punished as keepers of conventicles.

"IV. That they remain within, and depart not forth of the parish to which they are confined, without license from the bishop of the diocese only.

"V. That in the exercise of discipline, all such as were formerly referable to presbyteries continue still in the same manner; and where there is no presbyterial meeting, that these cases be referred to the presbytery of the next bounds.

"VI. That the ordinary dues payable to bursars, clerks of presbyteries and synods, be paid by the said ministers, as formerly. And that the said ministers may have competent time for transporting of their families, and disposing upon their goods, the said lords suspend their confinement for the space of three months, to the effect, in the meantime, they may go about their affairs, providing that, during the time of the foresaid suspension, they do keep and observe the rest of the orders and instructions foresaid, and other acts made anent outed ministers.'

"A third act was passed of the same date with the above two, bearing that, as by former acts of council, certain ministers outed since 1661 were confined in the manner expressed in these acts, there were remaining others not disposed of; and in order that these might not withdraw themselves from public worship in the parishes in which they might reside, nor ensnare others to do so by their example, warrant was granted to sheriffs and magistrates to call and convene before them all outed ministers since the year 1661, not previously disposed of, who might act in this manner; and in case of refusal to appear, to seize upon and imprison their persons within the space of a month after they should be so required; and in case any of these ministers should reside in the parishes where there are ministers indulged by the council, they should be allowed to preach in the kirks of these parishes where they reside, upon the invitation of the ministers therein confined and allowed, but not otherwise. And as certain of the outed ministers had taken it upon them to preach and exercise other functions of the ministerial office without any authority of government, such as was extended to the indulged, therefore sheriffs and magistrates were enjoined, each in their respective bounds, to search for, seize, and imprison their persons; acquaint the council with their names and places of imprisonment, in order that such measures might be adopted with them as the council should think fit; and the sheriffs were commanded to inquire how those ministers that were allowed to preach within their several jurisdictions obeyed the regulations that were enjoined upon them, and to report every six months respecting their diligence in executing the orders contained in the act of council, certifying that, if they, the sheriffs, should be remiss or negligent in the execution of their instructions, or fail to give in said account, they should be proceeded against according to their demerits.

"These three acts of 3d September 1672 comprise what is understood by the Second Indulgence. The Third Indulgence was procured nearly seven years after, through the influence of the Duke of Monmouth, and contained in a proclamation of date 29th June 1679. After a specious preamble, setting forth that, having passed so many acts in favour of the Protestant religion, against field conventicles, by which the people were withdrawn from public ordinances in such ways as exposed them to hear Jesuits, and other irregular preachers, and stirred up to rebellion, inconsistent with the Protestant religion and the monarchy, it had been thought fit to recommend the vigorous execution of all former laws and proclamations against such rendezvous of rebellion; therefore judges, magistrates, and officers of all ranks and degrees were commanded to apprehend, condemn, and punish, all who frequented such conventicles,—the ministers by death, and the hearers by fining and otherwise, and such as bear arms to be demeaned as traitors. The proclamation proceeds to mention, that being desirous to reclaim such as may have been misled by ignorance or blind zeal, and to convince others that too great severity is far from being the royal design, the execution of former laws and acts was suspended against such as frequent house conventicles in the low countries on the south side of the river Tay only, 'excepting always the town of Edinburgh, and two miles round about the same, with the lordships of Musselburgh and Dalkeith, the cities of St Andrews, Glasgow, and Stirling, and a mile about each of them, being fully resolved not to suffer the seat of our government nor our universities to be pestered with any irregularities whatever.' And, as a further evidence of protection to such as resolved to live peaceably, suspension was made, with certain exceptions, of all fines that had been imposed for attending field conventicles; ordaining that all who should be suffered to preach should have their names given in, and security found for their peaceable behaviour, only one preacher being allowed to a 'parish,' and none to be allowed who had appeared in rebellion, nor any who should be admitted by 'unconform' ministers. This proclamation was afterwards enlarged and explained by a letter, dated at Windsor Castle, the 11th of the following month, bearing that, 'Having resolved to make the favours designed by our late proclamation effectual, we hereby declare that we designed therein, that such as we allowed to preach thereby, we also allowed by the same proclamation to administer the sacraments, the one including the other. As also, that no fine imposed for any schismatical disorders (except treason) before inferior judicatories, and not yet transacted or compounded for, shall be uplifted, unless the parties so fined shall fall back into their old transgressions, by rebellion or field conventicles; the suspension mentioned in our proclamation being a sufficient discharge only in those cases. Ministers also now imprisoned, who were not in this rebellion [alluding to the battle of Bothwell Bridge] are to be set at liberty, without any other engagement but that they shall live peaceably, and not take up arms against us or our authority ; or find caution to answer when called by us or you ; and so we bid you farewell."

These were the Acts of Indulgence which the Presbyterians resisted, and denounced those who acceded to them as men who were ready to sacrifice hallowed principle on the shrine of expediency. Cameron had spoken in no measured terms against the indulged ministers, and he was, in consequence, called to account by a presbytery of the indulged at Dunscore, in Nithsdale, where he was threatened to be deprived of license. Here he was prevailed upon to give his promise that he should cease to speak so openly against the Indulgence, and the duty of separation from the indulged. No sooner had he given this promise than he became quite dispirited, and set out for Holland in 1678. On his arrival in Rotterdam, Cameron applied himself with the most devoted ardour to the work of the ministry. In the meantime, the Covenanters in Scotland were subjected to the most severe persecutions, and, having been defeated at Bothwell Bridge, they were compelled to seek refuge in the mountains and caves of the earth. The Covenanters in Holland were strongly impressed with the thought that Cameron was admirably fitted to revive the drooping cause of the Covenanters in his native land. Having been ordained, accordingly, to the work of the ministry, he returned to Scotland in 1680. His efforts were now directed to rally the scattered remnant who adhered to the Covenant. His endeavours, however, were unsuccessful. At length, after several meetings between Cameron, Cargill, Douglas, and others, they drew up a declaration and testimony, which they published at the market-cross of Sanquhar, June 22, 1680, and which is commonly known by the name of the Sanquhar Declaration, by which they solemnly disowned Charles II., as having forfeited his title to the crown "by his perjury and breach of covenant both to God and his Kirk." The government instantly took steps for the capture of the leaders. A proclamation was issued, offering five thousand merks for apprehending Cameron. But, undismayed, he openly preached the gospel, and denounced, in the plainest language, the perjured and persecuting house of Stuart. The government troops now scoured the country in pursuit of Cameron and his party. At last, they were overtaken by the enemy in the neighbourhood of Airmoss, in the parish of Auchinleck, in Ayrshire. On the approach of the soldiers, the little band of Covenanters gathered around Cameron, who lifted up his eyes to heaven and thrice prayed aloud, "Lord, spare the green, and take the ripe." He then turned to his followers and said, "Come let us fight it out to the last ; for this is the day I have longed for, and the day that I have prayed for,—to die fighting against our Lord's avowed enemies ; this is the day that we will get the crown." The engagement commenced, and among the first who fell on that fatal day was Richard Cameron, having been shot dead on the spot where he stood, nor did Cameron fall alone. Eight others of his party were killed at the same time and buried in the same grave with him. Over the grave there was placed a large flat stone upon four pillars, which is commonly called Cameron's tomb. The utter desolation of the spot gives it a melancholy interest. "The world," says a recent writer, "viewed from Cameron's stone, seems a howling wilderness; and nothing fair is to be seen but that heaven above on which the hopes of the enthusiasts, withdrawn from all earthly objects, were so firmly fixed. The heath and long deer-grass bear no traces of the blood which must once have stained them; and all claims upon a sympathy with mere bodily suffering are gone and obliterated. Nothing but the sentiment remains, that here lie six [nine] men who were at least as much sinned against as sinning, and who unto pain and death proved themselves superior to the ordinary worldly considerations which are perpetually dragging their fellow-creatures down from romance into common-place, from generosity into selfishness, from the aspirations of their better nature into the struggles necessary for physical existence, from the sublime emotions of pure piety into the abject hopelessness of scepticism, or not less miserable misgivings of indifference." The occasion of Cameron's death was engraved round the sides in these words :—"Here lies the corpse of that famous and faithful preacher of the gospel, Richard Cameron, who with several others fell here, encountering with the bloody enemies of truth and godliness."

CAMERONIANS. See REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

CAMISARS, or CAMISARDS, French prophets or fanatics of the Cevennes, as they were sometimes called, arose in the latter part of the seventeenth century. M. Grégoire attributes their origin to a certain "school of the prophets" in Dauphine, conducted by a Calvinist named Du Serre. As he has not given his authority, we can only say, the thing is not incredible. The ebullitions of enthusiasm have often arisen in the temple of piety ; and when real Christians have met for devotion, the exterior signs of piety have sometimes deeply impressed and excited the imitation of persons who were strangers to the inward principle. Such have wrought themselves up to an exaggerated state of feeling, which they have in some cases mistaken for devotion, and in others for inspiration ; and even good and intelligent men have been sometimes drawn into the delusion, as appears to have been the case in the instructive and melancholy instance now before us.

These pretended prophets first appeared in Dauphine and Vivarais. In the year 1688, five or six hundred Protestants of both sexes gave themselves out to be prophets, and inspired of the Holy Ghost, and they soon amounted to many thousands. They had strange fits, which came upon them with tremblings and faintings, as in a swoon, which made them stretch out their arms and legs, and stagger several times before they dropped down. They struck themselves with their hands ; they fell on their backs, shut their eyes, and heaved their breasts. The symptoms answer exactly to those produced by inspiring nitrous oxyde, and were the fact then discovered, we should have been tempted to suspect imposture. They remained a while in trances, and coming out of them, declared that they saw the heavens open, the angels, paradise, and hell. Those who were just on the point of receiving the Spirit of prophecy dropped down, not only in the assemblies, but in the fields, and in their own houses, crying out, Mercy. The least of their assemblies made up four or five hundred, and some of them amounted to even three or four thousand. The hills rebounded with their loud cries for mercy, and with imprecations against the priests, the pope, and his Anti-christian dominion ; with predictions of the approaching fall of popery. All they said at these times was heard and received with reverence and awe.

In the year 1706, three or four of these prophets came over into England, and brought their prophetic spirit with them; which discovered itself in the same way, namely, by ecstasies, and agitations, and inspirations under them, as it had done in France: and they propagated the like spirit to others, so that before the year was out, there were two or three hundred of these prophets in and about London, of both sexes, and of all ages.

The great subject of their prediction was, the near approach of the kingdom of God, the happy times of the Church, and the millennial state. Their message was (and they were to proclaim it as heralds to every nation under heaven),—that the grand jubilee, “the acceptable year of the Lord,” the accomplishment of those numerous Scriptures concerning the new heavens and the new earth, the kingdom of the Messiah, the marriage of the Lamb, the first resurrection, or the new Jerusalem descending from above, was now even at the door; that this great operation was to be effected by spiritual arms only, proceeding from the mouths of those who should, by inspiration, or the mighty gift of the Spirit, be sent forth in great numbers to labour in the vineyard; that this mission of God’s servants should be witnessed to by signs and wonders from heaven, by a deluge of judgments on the wicked universally throughout the world,—as famine, pestilence, earthquakes, wars, &c.; that the exterminating angels should root out the tares, and there shall remain upon earth only good corn; and the works of men being thrown down, there shall be but one Lord, one faith, one heart, and one voice among mankind. And they declared that all the great things they had spoken of would be manifest over the whole earth within the term of three years.

These prophets also pretended to the gift of languages, of miracles, discerning the secrets of the heart; the power of conferring the same spirit on others by the laying on of hands, and the gift of healing. To prove that they were really inspired by the Holy Ghost, they alleged the complete joy and satisfaction they experienced, the spirit of prayer which was poured forth upon them, and the answer of their prayers by the Most High.

These pretensions, however, laid the foundation of their detection and complete overthrow. They went so far as to pretend to raise the dead, and fixed upon one of their own number for the experiment, who was to rise on a particular day.

CAMP, or ENCAMPMENT. The first account of a regular military encampment which we find in the Bible is in the second chapter of the Book of Numbers. This chapter may be entitled the order of the tribes in their tents. They had come out of Egypt in rank and file, but now they are arranged in four squadrons, three tribes in a squadron. The camp of the Hebrews in the wilderness, then, was in the form of a square, with the tabernacle, guarded by the Levites, in the centre. This quadrangular form of encampment is held in great repute among writers on military tactics; and it was frequently adopted in the warlike arrangements of the Greeks and Romans. The first post of honour in the Hebrew camp was occupied by the tribe of Judah, who encamped toward the rising sun, and in their marches led the van, not only because it was the most numerous tribe, but chiefly because from that tribe Christ was to come, who is the Lion of the tribe of Judah. When a regular census of the Israelites was taken, in the second year after their departure from the land of Egypt, it was found that the number of males from twenty years old and upwards, or, in other words, the number of men capable of bearing arms, was 603,550. The striking effect which so numerous an army marshalled in regular order was fitted to produce upon the mind of a spectator, an attentive reader may easily perceive in the case of Balaam the soothsayer, of whom it is said, Numb. xxiv. 2-6: “And Balaam lifted up his eyes, and he saw Israel abiding in his tents according to their tribes; and the spirit of God came upon him. And he took up his parable, and said, Balaam the son of Beor hath said, and the man whose eyes are open hath said: he hath said, which heard the words of God, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open: How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel! As the valleys are they spread forth, as the gardens by the river’s side, as the trees of lign aloes which the Lord hath planted, and as cedar trees beside the waters.” The form of the Hebrew encampments in Canaan appears not to have been of that regular, close, serrated description which they assumed in the wilderness. On the contrary, as far as can be conjectured from the occasional hints which are given in the Old Testament, they must have been open and unguarded on all sides. Thus when David went out to reconnoitre the camp of Saul, we are told, 1 Sam. xxvi. 5:—“And David arose, and came to the place where Saul had pitched: and David beheld the place where Saul lay, and Abner the son of Ner, the captain of his host: and Saul lay in the trench and the people pitched round about him.” This is precisely the form and arrangement of an Arab encampment, which is always circular where the nature of the locality permits, the chieftain being in the middle, and the troops at a respectful distance around him with their lances fixed in the ground, ready for action.

CAMPFIRE. Sir T. Browne supposes that the plant mentioned in the Canticles (i. 14, iv. 13), rendered kupros in the Septuagint, and cyprus in the Vulgate, is that described by Dioscorides and Pliny, which grows in Egypt, and near to Ascalon, producing an odorate bush of flowers, and yielding the celebrated Oleum cyprinum. This is one of the plants which is most grateful to the eye and the smell. The deep colour of its bark, the light green of its foliage, the softened mixture of white and yellow with which the flowers, collected into long clusters like the lilac, are coloured, and the red tint of the ramifications which support them, form an agreeable combination. The flowers, whose shades are so delicate, diffuse around the sweetest odours, and perfume the gardens and apartments which they embellish. The women take pleasure in decking themselves with these nosegays of beauty and clusters of fragrance. With the powder of the dried leaves, also, they give an orange tincture to their nails, to the inside of their hands, and to the soles of their feet. The expression, rendered “pare her nails” (Deut. xxi. 12), may perhaps rather mean “adorn her nails,” and may imply the antiquity of this practice. This is a universal custom in Egypt, and not to conform to it would be considered indecent. It seems to have been practised by the ancient Egyptians, for the nails of the mummies are most commonly of a reddish hue.

The camphire of Solomon was evidently a plant indigenous to Palestine, and is supposed to have been a species of Lawsonia, a genus of the class Octandria, order Monogynia, probably the Lawsonia inermis, or the Henna, or smooth Lawsonia of botanists. The "clusters of camphire" in the vineyard of Egedi refer to the yellowish-white flowers with their fine purplish stamina in the loose terminating bunches, which are of delightful odour, and much prized in modern as in ancient times. This plant is of the natural family, Solitariae. The Eastern flower is a very elegant plant, and highly prized in the countries where it abounds.

CAMP-MEETINGS, religious festivals held among the Methodists in some parts of England and the United States of America, and also among the Presbyterians in the back settlements of the latter country. In Kentucky, and some adjacent parts, not fewer than fifteen or twenty thousand people assemble on such occasions. They come in waggons or on horseback from distant districts, bring provisions with them, and erecting booths under the dense shade of the forests, they devote a whole week to the religious exercises of the period. They have prayer-meetings, &c., in separate tents, or in groups in the open air, morning and evening, and four sermons daily, two in the earlier, and two in the latter part of the day, while the festival lasts. The great day is the Sabbath, when the vast population of the more immediate neighbourhood assemble and swell the numbers, and the ordinance of the Lord's Supper is administered. According to the testimony of those who have been present, nothing can exceed the effect produced by the evening scene, when the otherwise impenetrable gloom of the woods is lighted up into one blaze by the numerous fires which are kindled and kept burning, and the sound of so many thousand voices, causing the immense groves to re-echo the praises of the Most High. The general order and propriety which prevail on such occasions evince the deep hold which religion has on the minds of those who thus meet for the purposes of spiritual edification and improvement. Dr Samuel Miller of Princeton, New Jersey, alleges that camp-meetings began in the Presbyterian Church; that they were first adopted from a kind of necessity in a country where houses for public worship were few, and of small size, and, of course, altogether insufficient for receiving the great crowds which collected on particular occasions, and who were in a state of mind which prompted them to remain a number of days at the place of meeting. In such circumstances, encamping in the open air seemed to be unavoidable. But what was begun from necessity was afterwards continued from choice. Camp-meetings were found to furnish admirable means for the propagation of strong excitement. The evils, however, to which they have given rise, has led to their discontinuance to a great extent.

CANA, a small town of Galilee, to distinguish it from another town of the same name, mentioned Josh. xiv. 28, belonging to the tribe of Asher, not far from the city of Sidon, and so situated much farther north than this Cana was. The village is pleasantly situated on an eminence facing the south-west, about six miles north-east of Nazareth. Among the ruins of the place are still to be seen large massy stone pots, of a kind similar to those which are spoken of in the account of our Lord's first miracle. "From their appearance," says Dr Clarke, "and the number of them, it was quite evident that a practice of keeping water in large stone pots, each holding from eighteen to twenty-seven gallons, was once common in the country." This village, now called Kefferkenna, was also the birthplace of Nathanael. It contains about three hundred inhabitants, who are chiefly of the Romanist communion.

CANAAN, the youngest son of Ham, and grandson of Noah. From him the accursed race of the Canaanites was descended. The curse is supposed by some to have been pronounced upon his posterity, because he participated in the sinful conduct of Ham, his father. Dr Candlish makes the following judicious remarks upon this curse:—"Canaan is judicially condemned, and sentenced to a degrading servitude: 'Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren.' This may be viewed partly as a retributive judgment pronounced on Ham, dooming him to suffer in the tenderest part, in those parental affections, which, in the case of his father, he himself had cruelly mocked and scorned. It may be viewed also as an intimation of what, in the ordinary course of nature, must be the consequence of such sin as Ham had committed, and of such an evil spirit as he had shown. Himself an apostate, his son and his seed are cursed. But in the midst of deserved wrath God remembers mercy; and, accordingly, the curse is here restricted to his seed in the line of Canaan. For there is no warrant for the liberty which some have taken, who have introduced into this prophecy the name of his father Ham, reading 'Ham the father of Canaan,' instead of simply 'Canaan.' Their reason for this seems to be, partly, that they think they see in history a wider fulfilment of the prediction than the limitation of it to the race of Canaan would indicate; and partly, also, that in the account given of the offence, the expression 'Ham the father of Canaan' occurs. Gen. ix. 22. In regard to this last reason, it is more likely that Ham is called the father of Canaan, from the very circumstance of his sin being avenged, and his seed cursed in the single line of Canaan; as in a subsequent passage (chap. x. 21) Shem is called 'the father of Eber's children,' because in that line he was to be blessed. And in regard to the other reason, founded on the apparent signs and tokens of the curse in the history of other nations sprung from the other children of Ham, it may be observed that the prophecy says nothing against their participation in their brother's doom, although it does not expressly foretell it; and further, that the posterity of Canaan, mixing themselves by dispersion and by colonization with the other descendants of Ham, may have carried with them, wherever they went, their liability to the curse, and may have involved in it the people among whom they happened to settle.

"At all events, the passage as it stands is clear and precise. Canaan specially and singly is cursed; and the curse pronounced against him is servitude or bondage; a double bondage, to both his father's brethren. This judgment is thrice specified; it forms, indeed, the melancholy burden of this brief prophetic song—the alternate line or response of every couplet. For the prophecy is in the form of a poem; and consists of three stanzas, in which the first line varies, while the last sadly reiterates the same solemn note of woe.

'Cursed be Canaan;

A servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren.

Blessed be Jehovah, the God of Shem;

And Canaan shall be his servant.

God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem;

And Canaan shall be his servant.'

"In the first of these couplets, or stanzas, or verses,

Canaan's doom is generally announced;—he is to be a 'servant of servants.' The expression is emphatical. He is to hold a position of peculiarly degrading subjection; hopeless and helpless. And it is subjection to both his brethren; not one only, but both of the races descending from the other sons of Noah, are to prevail over his posterity. So the doom is explained in the two following stanzas; in the first of which subjection to Shem is specified, and in the second, subjection to Japheth. In addition to the couplet which opens the poem, and is expressly designed for Canaan, it is deemed necessary in the two other couplets to repeat the sentence, in the way of contrast or antithesis to the blessings pronounced on the two brothers who had been found faithful.

"In this view, a special reason, or, at least, a special consideration of fitness or propriety, may be suggested, both for the selection of Canaan as the only one of Ham's seed who was cursed, and for the repetition of the curse twice over, in connection with the blessings which Shem and Japheth were severally to receive. It was Canaan, who, more than any other of Ham's descendants, was to come into contact with Shem and Japheth, and was to hinder and obstruct them in their enjoyment of the privileges implied in their respective benedictions. In the case of Shem, the blessing is indirect and reflex; but on that very account it is the more precious. 'Blessed be Jehovah, the God of Shem.' The prophetic father, beholding afar off the highly-favoured seed of his highly-honoured son, fixes his devout eye, not on their prosperous and happy state, but on the glory of that great and holy name, with whose honour their welfare is to be inseparably blended. What prerogative can equal that which this form of salutation implies? I hail as blessed,—not my son, but Him who condescends to be his God;—it is not 'blessed be Shem;' but 'blessed be Jehovah, the God of Shem.' Jehovah, the God of Shem, is the blessed One;—how blessed, then, he whose God Jehovah is! Blessed is that people whose God is the Lord. Evidently this blessing refers, in the first instance, to the line of Eber, who is singled out from all the other descendants of Shem (chap. x. 21); and ultimately to the family of Abraham, with whom the covenant was established. (Chap. xii.) It is the high distinction of Israel that is here foretold. Jehovah was to be blessed in them as his peculiar people,—the people dwelling in his good land, and under his gracious government.

"But when the time came for the fulfilment of this prediction; when the race of Shem, in the line of Eber, and the family of Abraham, were to inherit the blessing; when Israel was to possess the Lord's land and assume his position as the Lord's people,—who stood in the way? Who but Canaan, by whom the land was preoccupied?—for 'the Canaanites were in the land.'" The sons of Canaan were fathers of tribes who settled in Palestine and Syria after the confusion of Babel and the consequent dispersion of the nations.

CANAAN, LAND OF. See PALESTINE.

CANAANITES, the original inhabitants of Palestine. They were descended from Canaan the son of Ham, and are thus enumerated by Moses:—"And Canaan begat Sidon his firstborn, and Heth, and the Jebusite, and the Amorite, and the Girgashite, and the Hivite, and the Arkite, and the Sinite, and the Arvadite, and the Zemarite, and the Hamathite." Gen. x. 15-18. All these families were settled at first within the limits of Canaan, which in its original extent is described Gen. x. 19:—"And the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar, unto Gaza; as thou goest unto Sodom, and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Lasha." The Canaanites, however, in process of time spread beyond their original boundaries, for the sacred historian says, "And afterwards were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad." The firstborn son of Canaan appears to have been the founder of Sidon, one of the most ancient cities in the world, and long one of the wealthiest and the greatest of which Phœnicia could boast. The descendants of Heth or the Hittites, the second family of Canaan mentioned by Moses, were planted about Hebron, in the southern division of the country. Next to the Hittites, in the same tract of country, were planted the sons of Jebus. The capital city of their possessions was called Jebus, in honour of their venerable founder, a name which it afterwards exchanged for Jerusalem. The Amorites dwelt on the east side of Jordan, in the district afterwards occupied by Reuben and Gad. The Girgashites inhabited the country on the east side of the Lake of Tiberias, and the Hivites under Mount Libanus. It is doubtful where the Perizzites were located; perhaps they wandered over the hills and plains on both sides of the Jordan. The Canaanites dwelt in the midst of all, and were surrounded by the rest. Thus was Canaan occupied originally by seven different nations, distinguished from each other in all probability in manners, customs, and language. At what time those abominations were introduced which brought upon them the divine displeasure, it is impossible precisely to ascertain. In the days of Moses, however, they had become confirmed idolaters, and the command was given to the Israelites "to smite them and utterly destroy them." This command was fulfilled under Joshua. Multitudes of them were destroyed, and the rest fled, some into Africa, and others into Greece.

The following description may give some idea of the natural capabilities of Canaan:—"The aspect of the country is described as picturesque and beautiful, the surface being finely diversified by hill and dale. On the north, the lofty range of Lebanon raises its summits above the limit of perpetual snow; Carmel, Tabor, and Hermon, in the middle of the country, attain to a considerable elevation, and merit the title of mountains; and little hills abound on every side. The mountains are generally rocky, and frequently exhibit those romantic views which Alpine scenery alone supplies; while there are interspersed among them valleys and plains of every size and form. Some, like that of Esdraelon, are many miles in extent; others are only little dells embosomed in the hills. But though 'the everlasting hills,' that is, the permanent features of the country, continue the same as ever, the beauty of the scene is gone. The glory of Lebanon is departed—its cedars have vanished from the view; a few scattered clumps alone survive of all the forest that crowned its steep. 'It is ashamed, and hewn down; Sharon is like a wilderness; Bashan and Carmel shake off their fruits.' The little mounts are there; but they no longer rejoice in the green covering of the olive-leaf. The terrace-walk still tells of former industry and peace; but it no longer bears the luscious grape. The pomegranate and the fig are wild; there are no 'clusters in Eshcol,' no 'vineyards in Engedi;' 'the new wine mourneth, the vine languisheth, and all the merry-hearted do sigh.' Some of the valleys are still clothed with luxuriant pasture, and ornamented with a profusion of beautiful flowers, affording abundantly the appropriate food both of the cattle and of the bee, as in the days of old, when the promised possession was described by Jehovah as 'a land overflowing with milk and honey;' but the flocks and the herds are gone. The climate is healthy, and the soil is fertile: but the cities are 'waste, without inhabitant;' there is none to sow the good seed, producing 'some thirtyfold, some sixty, some an hundred;' the song of the reaper is hushed, and the merry shout of him that treadeth the grape can no longer be heard. Silence reigns amid the ruined walls, which once re-echoed the hum of bustling crowds; and desolation covers the plain where happy thousands rejoiced in the bounty of their God.

"Yet these are the favoured portions of the land; the greater part of it has fallen under a yet more grievous doom. Burning drought has drunk up the streams—'the heaven that is overhead is brass, the earth beneath is iron.' Ruins of cities meet the eye of the incredulous traveller, and speak of former plenty, in places where now there is nothing but a barren and arid waste. Capernaum is no longer a haven for ships—a wide field of unproductive sand now stretches itself between its deserted quays and the margin of the shrunken sea. Jordan no more 'overfloweth all his banks' in the time of harvest, and by his 'swellings' rouses the lion from his lair; the diminished stream scarce covers the bottom of its rocky channel. The mineral treasures of Canaan are no longer to be found,—all is desolation and barrenness."

It has been often alleged by the votaries of infidelity, as an argument against the truth of the Christian religion, that in the Old Testament Scriptures the Deity is represented as commanding the destruction of the Canaanites. On this subject the following brief remarks may be extracted from a masterly sermon by Dr Paley:—"In reading the Old Testament account concerning the Jewish wars and conquests in Canaan, and the terrible destruction brought upon the inhabitants thereof, we are always to remember, that we are reading the execution of a dreadful but just sentence pronounced by Jehovah against the intolerable and incorrigible crimes of these nations; that they were intended to be made an example to the whole world of God's avenging wrath against sins, which, if they had been suffered to continue, might have polluted the whole ancient world, and which could only be checked by the signal and public overthrow of nations notoriously addicted to them, and so addicted as even to have incorporated them into their religion and their public institutions; and that the Israelites were mere instruments in the hands of a righteous Providence for effecting the extirpation of a people of whom it was necessary to make a public example to the rest of mankind; that this extermination, which might have been accomplished by a pestilence, by fire, by earthquakes, was appointed to be done by the hands of the Israelites, as being the clearest and most intelligible method of displaying the power and the righteousness of the God of Israel,—his power over the pretended gods of other nations, and his righteous indignation against the crimes into which they had fallen."

CANDACE, a queen of Ethiopia, mentioned in Acts viii. 27. This, as we learn from Pliny, Dion Cassius, and Strabo, was a family name common to all the queens of Ethiopia—like Pharaoh in Egypt, or Cæsar at Rome. In the time of our Saviour, by Ethiopia was meant in a general sense, the countries south of Egypt, then but imperfectly known, of one of which Candace was queen. Some have supposed that she was converted by means of the eunuch who was baptized by Philip the deacon; but of this there is no satisfactory proof.

CANDLE. This word occurs in Job xviii. 6, and xxi. 17, and is better rendered on the margin "lamp." In the former of these passages, Bildad is describing the destruction of a family, and the desolation of the house: "The light shall be dark in his tabernacle, and his candle shall be put out with him." To put out the light is a Scripture expression for the act of destroying. Thus: "Moreover I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride, the sound of the millstones, and the light of the candle." Jer. xxv. 10. A burning lamp, on the contrary, is a symbol of prosperity. Job xxix. 3. Houses in the East were, from the earliest times, lighted up with lamps; and the importance attached to a lamp is evident from the language of the Psalmist when he says, "Thy Word is a light unto my feet, and a lamp unto my path."

CANDLESTICK. As lamps have been used in the East from the most ancient times, not candles, the word in Scripture usually translated candlestick, may rather be rendered lamp-stand. That which was used in the tabernacle was made of pure gold, upon a basis of the same metal, and had three branches on each side at equal distances. These branches were at equal distances, adorned with six flowers like lilies, with as many knobs, like apples, and little bowls placed alternately; and upon each of these branches there was a golden lamp, which was lighted every evening and extinguished every morning. Josephus says that three of them were kept lighted in the daytime. In the morning a priest put the lamps in order, with the golden snuffers made for that purpose. He then filled the lamps with the purest olive oil. The candlestick, with the articles belonging to it, weighed a talent, or one hundred and twenty-five pounds, and was made of pure gold, very beautifully wrought with buds and flowers and various ornaments. Josephus says that the Romans carried the golden candlestick, with the other furniture of the temple, in triumph to Rome, where they were lodged in the temple dedicated by Vespasian to Peace. In Rev. i. 12, John saw in a vision seven golden candlesticks. This symbol is explained in ver. 20, where we are told that the seven candlesticks are the seven churches, and represent the seven Christian churches of Asia Minor.

CANE. See CALAMUS.

CANKER. This word, better rendered by the word Gangrene, is one of the terminations of inflammation, when the part loses its vitality, and a separation takes place of the dead from the living portions. It occurs in 2 Tim. ii. 17,—"Their word will eat as doth a canker,"—where erroneous doctrine is declared to overspread and corrupt the soul. In the same way, it is said of the silver and gold of the covetous, in James v. 3, that "they are cankered;" that is, the covetous hoarding it up is attended with painful anxiety, and brings on a fearful curse both here and hereafter.

CANKER-WORM (ialek). Psal. cv. 34; Jer. li. 27, where it is rendered caterpillar; Joel i. 4, ii. 25; Nah. iii. 15, canker-worm. As it is frequently mentioned with the locust, it is thought by some to be a species of that insect. It certainly cannot be the canker-worm, as our version renders it; for in Nahum it is expressly said to have wings and to fly, to camp in the hedges by day, and commit its depredations in the night. But it may be, as the Septuagint renders it in five passages out of eight where it occurs, the bruchus, or "hedge chaffer." Nevertheless, the passage (Jer. li. 27) where the ialek is described as "rough,"—that is, with hair standing on end,—leads us very naturally to the rendering of our translators in that place, "the rough caterpillar," which, like other caterpillars, at a proper time, casts its exterior covering, and flies away in a winged state. Scheuchzer observes that we should not, perhaps, be far from the truth, if, with the ancient interpreters, we understood this ialek, after all, as a kind of locust; as some species of them have hair principally on the head, and others have prickly points standing out.

CANON, a rule or law. Hence the books of the Holy Scriptures, taken together, are called the Canon, as designed by God to be the rule of our faith and practice. The words Canonical and Inspired have now become almost synonymous. In the present article we design to make some remarks, 1. Upon the canon of the Old Testament; and 2. Upon the canon of the New. In reference to the ancient Scriptures, we avail ourselves of the following valuable observations by the Rev. Robert Simpson, of Kintore:—"A much higher antiquity has been assigned, by the consent of all competent judges, to the earlier books of the Hebrew Scriptures than can be justly claimed for any other authentic and intelligible written documents now in existence. Herodotus, the acknowledged and honoured father of Grecian history, was long posterior to Moses; and even Homer, the chief, if not the first, of the poets of Greece whose writings have come down to us, must yield the palm of precedence, by many centuries, to the illustrious lawgiver of the Hebrews. Any pretensions on the part of oriental works to a priority of date are wholly unsupported by satisfactory evidence; and in the opinion of those best qualified to decide the point, they are entirely without foundation, except on the credit of a notoriously fabulous and extravagant chronology.

"The subject-matter of the canonieal books of the Hebrews is familiar to every intelligent Christian. All, too, that is known authentically respecting the inspired penmen of these books may be found detailed in our best commentaries. But there are many remarkable and instructive facts connected with the canon of the Old Testament, particularly in reference to its history and arrangement, which are not so generally accessible to ordinary readers. To illustrate some of the most important of these will be the object of the following observations.

"By the express direction of Moses (Deut. xxxi.), the book of the law was deposited in the side, or rather by the side, of the ark of the covenant, there to remain as the infallible guide of the children of Israel in the worship of God and in the duties of life, and as a testimony against them if they should fail to walk according to its dictates. The two tables of the ten commandments were laid up within the ark; but the book of the law, it is thought, was placed in a small coffer which formed an appendage to it. That this annexed repository of the sacred writings of the Hebrews was removed on all occasions with the ark itself, and even carried out with it when borne in war before the armies of Israel, is highly probable. The safety of the one, however, amid all the perils to which it was exposed, clearly implies the preservation of the other, since nothing is recorded to the contrary. In this situation, it is believed that the autograph, or original manuscript of the Pentateuch, and along with it the other inspired books,* as they were successively committed to writing by the holy men raised up in different ages for that purpose, were preserved down to the building of the temple in the days of Solomon. The ark of the covenant was then placed in a condition of greater outward security within the most holy place (1 Kings viii.); and most probably the small coffer in question continued to be attached to it there as formerly, though it is often affirmed, but upon no certain grounds, that the book of the law henceforth lay in the treasury. There, too, the autographs or authenticated copies of the subsequent inspired writings were now likewise deposited, as they were from time to time indited or composed. But transcripts of all these records, more or less correct and complete, were in ordinary use, for the instruction of the people. (2 Chron. xvii.) The solemn public reading of the law every seventh year, while duly attended to, would obviously tend to preserve the book itself, as well as to diffuse the knowledge of its contents. Moses expressly enjoined (Deut. xvii.) that every king of Israel should write out a copy of the law, in order, doubtless, to impress upon his mind more distinctly its leading principles and various enactments; but the practice would also serve to multiply authentic manuscripts. And that great attention, besides, was paid to the multiplication of copies of different portions of the Sacred Scriptures, is manifest from an instance particularly mentioned (Prov. xxv.) to the honour of Hezekiah; and may it not be presumed that pious princes generally pursued the same commendable course?

"But during the reign of one or other of the wicked kings of Judah, most likely Manasseh, who profaned the temple by the introduction of heathen impieties within its hallowed precincts, it is supposed, with much probability, that the book of the law, and, no doubt, also the other sacred writings then existing, were removed from their appointed and appropriate situation. And they were thus removed, it is conjectured, by the hands of the priests, acting either of their own accord in the matter, or at the instigation of some friend to the cause of true religion, it might be the prophet Isaiah, and concealed in some obscure part of the temple, lest any attempt should have been made to destroy them, because of the testimony they bore against abounding iniquity. In this concealment they were at length lost sight of for a time, and almost forgotten amid the political troubles and religious declension of that turbulent and backsliding period. On the happy accession of Josiah, however, these invaluable records were unexpectedly discovered, it would seem, in some recess of the treasury. And the profound reverence with which that godly prince listened to the reading of the venerable original book of the law, and the surprise, mixed with alarm, he manifested on hearing some parts of its contents, perhaps the threatenings denounced against disobedience (Deut. xxviii.), with which he might have been but imperfectly, if at all, acquainted before, as well as the general interest displayed on the occasion, clearly show the high regard in which these ancient and inspired writings were still held among the Hebrews. Some, it is true, have expressed a doubt whether the manuscript here spoken of was in reality the autograph of the Hebrew lawgiver. In addition, however, to the argument obviously arising from the sensation produced by the event, since it is highly improbable that, after the recent labours of Hezekiah's transcribers, no copies of the law, more or less perfect, then existed, a strong confirmation of the other view is found in the peculiar terms in which the discovery was announced: 'Hilkiah the priest found a book of the law of the Lord, given by Moses,' or by the hand of Moses (2 Chron. xxxiv.). Now, though we often read of the law of Moses, and the book of Moses, this is the only place where the expression 'by the hand,' or 'in the hand,' occurs in the same relation to the other words with which it stands here connected. It is, besides, manifest from the whole scope of the passage, that some particular and distinguished manuscript was intended; for, although in our translation of the verse just quoted the indefinite article is used, the sense of the original is strictly definite. And to the opinion here supported, the assumed antiquity of the writing (nine hundred and fifty years) involves no objection, because, at this day, copies exist which are said to be of a greater age.

"This remarkable occurrence, under the divine blessing, led to a revival of religion, the salutary effects of which would not be soon obliterated. The captivity ensued almost immediately after, when it is supposed that the sacred records perished in their original form, that is, in the identical handwriting of their several authors. But we have the clearest proof that authentic copies were possessed by the Hebrews in their captive state. Daniel (chap. ix.) expressly quotes the law, and refers to the prophecies of Jeremiah. And as we are elsewhere informed (Ps. cxxxvii.), that their insulting oppressors required of the forlorn Israelites that they would sing the songs of Zion in the land of the stranger, though it is signified, at the same time, that they refused compliance with a demand so painful to their feelings, does not the fact of its having been made, attest the known existence of some interesting and affecting portions of their sacred poetry?

"The rebuilding of the temple after the Babylonish captivity formed an era in the history of the sacred books, as well as an epoch in the national annals of the Hebrews. About this eventful period Ezra, an honoured servant of God, and a distinguished ornament of the Old Testament church, became the zealous promoter of various measures which tended to preserve the Sacred Volume pure and entire, and to render its meaning more obvious. He is said to have collated or compared different copies of the Hebrew Scriptures, correcting the errors which had crept in through the negligence of transcribers, and to have collected the several portions or books, and disposed them according to a new and better arrangement. He is also thought to have added, or at least to have revised and sanctioned, those supplementary passages and incidental remarks, and made those verbal alterations, which, it is evident, could not have proceeded from the pen of the original authors. Of these we may just mention as instances, the account of the death of Moses given in the end of Deuteronomy, the observation in reference to a circumstance in Abraham's history, that 'the Canaanite was then in the land' (Gen. xii.), and the new names of some places inserted by way of explanation, as they were known long subsequently to the date of the writings in which they occur.

"It is further supposed that several important changes in the mode of writing the sacred books were introduced by Ezra. These, it is considered, were rendered necessary in consequence of the unavoidable neglect of the Hebrew tongue by his countrymen during the seventy years of their captivity. From that time it became, in many essential respects, a dead language. And it has been contended by some that this inspired reformer of the Old Testament canon first inserted the vowel points in the ordinary copies of the Scriptures, with the view of preventing the knowledge of the peculiar structure and pronunciation of Hebrew from being lost or corrupted; and the reason, say those who adopt this view, why these marks of sound, expressed after the oriental manner, were never admitted into the copies used in public worship, was, that no persons were allowed to conduct it who could not read properly without their aid. This, however, is a matter of very minor importance, about which various opinions are held by the learned. But it is more confidently alleged by many who have studied the subject much, that, as the Israelites who returned with Ezra into the land of their fathers had been educated among the Chaldeans, whose language, though intimately allied to the Hebrew, or rather only another dialect of the same tongue, was expressed by a different character; and as they were now more familiar with the alphabet of their late foreign masters than with that formerly used by their own ancestors, a change even of the letters was found to be expedient. While, therefore, the Hebrew Scriptures were most religiously preserved in all their purity and entireness, it is affirmed, with great apparent force of argument, that the Chaldee character was adopted, with Ezra's sanction, instead of the ancient Samaritan. And not only was the inspired text thus transferred without being altered in its sacred import, but it also henceforth became indispensable, for the sake of general edification, that in the stated public reading of the Scriptures the sense of the original should be rendered by the officiating teacher into what was now the vernacular of the great body of the people. (Nehem. viii.) Hence the origin of the Chaldee paraphrases; and considerable portions, moreover, of the books of Daniel and of Ezra, to say nothing of minuter instances, are written wholly in that tongue.

"The change of the alphabetic characters, which has just been adverted to, startling as it may appear at first sight, and strenuously as it has been denied by some, is far from being without example in the history of languages. A transition of a similar kind is going on at this moment in British India, where the extreme diversity in the mode of writing the letters found to exist in the various districts, has proved hitherto a great bar to communication and improvement. And we have a well-known instance of precisely the same species of change nearer home. For some time after printing was introduced into England, the old Saxon alphabet continued much in use; but has it not long since given almost exclusive place to the more clear and convenient form of the Roman character? And surely the change from the indistinct and perplexing black letter of our forefathers to the fair and beautiful modern type of our present Bibles, must be regarded, not as a source of error, but of greater accuracy.

"But there was yet another point in the settling of the Hebrew canon of inspired writings, which Ezra is believed to have fixed, assisted, as in other things, by his associates in that important work, among whom are usually numbered Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, namely, the classification and arrangement of the sacred books. The Old Testament Scriptures were divided, it is thought, by him and his coadjutors into those three great sections to which reference is made more or less explicitly in different parts of the New Testament; that is the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa or holy writings. The first of these sections contained the Pentateuch only, because it was held to be the basis of the whole Hebrew system of polity and religion. The second comprehended the principal historical books, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, called the former prophets, perhaps because revised, if not written, by men possessing the spirit of prophecy; and the strictly prophetical books, called the latter prophets, and also distinguished into the greater, namely, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, reckoned as three; and the twelve less or minor prophets, reckoned as one. And the third included all the remaining books, that is, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles, several of which books are of a devotional character, and their designation as a class no doubt originated in that fact; but as to the order in which they follow each other, no explanation can now be given, neither is it uniformly the same.

"Our Lord himself expressly mentions this division of the sacred books of the Old Testament; and the way in which he does it, exemplifies a peculiar practice in use among the Hebrews. They frequently designated particular books of their Scriptures from the word with which they respectively begin. And, for the same reason, the first book of any of the three great sections into which they were all arranged, sometimes stood for the whole class to which it belonged. Agreeably to this mode of quoting, our Saviour, after his resurrection, said (Luke xxiv.), 'These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the Law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me;' in which passage the Hagiographa is plainly indicated by the Psalms. And on the same principle, an apparent misquotation (Matt. xxvii. 9, 10) has been explained. The passage there referred to is not in Jeremiah, but in Zechariah. Since, however, the book of Jeremiah, according to the Talmudic arrangement, stands first in the section of the Prophets, it might represent in citations all the prophetical books. Again, that the writings bearing Samuel's name, though historical, were reckoned among the prophets, is manifest from the words of the Apostle Peter (Acts iii. 24.) Josephus also recognises the foregoing classification of the Hebrew Scriptures (against Apion); but says that the inspired books amounted to twenty-two only, according to the number of letters in the alphabet. But that statement, which has somewhat the appearance of a conceit, involves no inconsistency with the commonly received computation, because two books in our present reckoning of the Hebrew Bible were, in some instances, formerly considered as one.

"Of course, the order of succession among writings all inspired is not very material. The arrangement now observed in our English Bibles seems to be dictated chiefly by chronological sequence, as far as the historical books are concerned. But the book of Job, according to some authorities, ought to take precedence even of the Pentateuch, in point of date. And it has indeed much the air of the patriarchal times in sentiments as well as customs. With respect, however, to the minuter features of style and diction, a later period appears to be indicated.

"The Hebrew Scriptures were anciently divided into sections or lessons, of which there were fifty-four in the law of Moses. The division into chapters was unknown till a few centuries ago; but the subdivision into verses is of very old standing. If Ezra was not the author of this also, it was certainly introduced soon after his time, and most probably, for the sake of convenience, in rendering the Hebrew, clause by clause, into Chaldee. And each verse originally, it is thought, whether long or short, occupied a separate line on the entire breadth of the parchment; but this arrangement was afterwards changed."

The early Christian writers carefully examined the Jewish Scriptures, and have given distinct catalogues of these books, precisely the same as we now receive, and as they are still retained by the Jews. Melito, Bishop of Sardis, travelled in the second century into Palestine, on purpose to investigate the subject. His catalogue, which is preserved by Eusebius, contains the canonical books of the Old Testament, and no more. He names the several books, comprehending under the book of Ezra those of Nehemiah and Esther, to which they were commonly annexed, these three being by many accounted one book. In the Jewish list, the book of Nehemiah only was joined to Esther, as the book of Lamentations was also annexed to Jeremiah; but the book of Esther was never wanting in the canon of the Jews. Origen, in the third century, gives a catalogue of the Jewish Scriptures, and says that "the canonical books of Scripture contained in the Old Testament are twenty and two in number, which the Hebrews have left unto us, according to the number of letters which they have in their alphabet." Athanasius, also, in the fourth century, specifies the twenty-two books, and, naming them one after another in the same order in which they now stand, says that "they are received by the whole church." Hilary of Poitiers, and many writers in the same century, affirm that these books alone were received as canonical. This fact is confirmed by the Council of Laodicea, which met in the year 363, and gave a list of the twenty-two books, the same as have been received both by Jews and Christians. The whole of the early Christian writers, in short, were unanimous in acknowledging the Jewish Scriptures precisely as we now possess them. Catalogues of the books of the Old Testament have been given by Athanasius, by Cyril, by Augustine, by Jerome, by Rufinus, by the Council of Laodicea, and by the Council of Carthage. There is also a catalogue in the Talmud, and all these catalogues exactly correspond with our present canon of the Hebrew Bible. So much for the canonical authority of the Old Testament Scriptures.

In reference to the canon of the New Testament, it may be remarked, in the outset, that the volume which we now possess was written in different parts and on various occasions. The separate pieces as they appeared were received by the Christian churches of the time with the highest veneration, and copies of them were handed about from one church to another till each was in possession of the whole. Thus it happened that the separate books were held to be of full authority in the church some time before they were collected into a volume. "From the manner," says Mr Robert Haldane, "in which these Scriptures were at first circulated, some of their parts were necessarily longer of reaching certain places than others. These, of course, could not be received so soon into the canon as the rest. Owing to this circumstance, and to that of a few of the books being addressed to individual believers, or to their not having the name of their writers affixed, or the designation of apostle added, a doubt for a time existed among some respecting the genuineness of the epistle to the Hebrews, the epistle of James, the second epistle of Peter, the second and third epistles of John, the epistle of Jude, and the book of Revelation. These, however, though not universally, were generally acknowledged; while all the other books of the New Testament were without dispute received from the beginning. This discrimination proves the scrupulous care of the first churches on this highly important subject.

"At length these books, which had not been admitted at first, were, like the rest, universally received, not by the votes of a council, as is sometimes asserted, but after deliberate and free inquiry by many separate churches, under the superintending providence of God, in different parts of the world. It is, at the same time, a certain fact, that no other books, besides those which at present compose the volume of the New Testament, were admitted by the churches. Several apocryphal writings were published under the name of Jesus Christ and his apostles, which are mentioned by the writers of the first four centuries, most of which have perished, though some are still extant. Few or none of them were composed before the second century, and several of them were forged so late as the third century. But they were not acknowledged as authentic by the first Christians, and were rejected, by those who have noticed them, as spurious and heretical. Histories, too, as might have been expected, were written of the life of Christ, and one forgery was attempted of a letter said to be written by Jesus Christ himself to Abgarus, king of Edessa; but of the first, none were received as of any authority, and the last was universally rejected. 'Besides our Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles,' says Paley, 'no Christian history, claiming to be written by an apostle or apostolical man, is quoted within three hundred years after the birth of Christ, by any writer now extant or known; or, if quoted, is quoted with marks of censure and rejection.'

Though differing in many other points, the churches were agreed respecting the canonical Scriptures. By the concurrent testimony of all antiquity, both of friends and foes, they were received by Christians of different sects, and were constantly appealed to on all hands in the controversies that arose among them. Commentaries upon them were written at a very early period, and translations made into different languages. Formal catalogues of them were published, and they were attacked by the adversaries of Christianity, who not only did not question, but expressly admitted the facts they contained, and that they were the genuine productions of the persons whose names they bore. Thus the Scriptures were preserved from being in any respect corrupted or vitiated. The impossibility of this is thus forcibly stated by Dr Bogue:—"The corruption of the books of the New Testament has been conceived by some to be an easy and a probable thing. But if the subject be duly considered, the immense difficulty of it will be clearly seen. Take, for example, the epistle to the Romans. It was read to the church and received as divine. Every zealous Christian who could, would have a copy of it, and read it to his family. One would send a copy to his son at Corinth, another to his brother at Antioch, and a third to his father at Alexandria, who would all circulate them among the Christians in these cities, and send them to their friends in other countries. It would thus in a short time be in the possession of thousands.

"While the epistle was multiplying in the Christian churches, it would also be translated into different languages. A Latin copy would almost immediately appear; and it would soon be rendered into some of the Eastern tongues.

"These things would all be done by persons who held both the book and the writer in the highest veneration, as a teacher inspired by the Spirit of God. This veneration would make them consider it a crime to alter his sentiments or language; and produce the most anxious care to retain every iota of the apostle's writing, and preserve the epistle in its original purity.

"In addition to this evidence of authenticity, let it be considered that the epistle was received in the public worship of the churches, and was treasured up in the memory of the faithful. It was quoted by Christian writers in their treatises of devotion; it was used by the orthodox as evidence in their controversies with heretics, and heretics used it in their own defence; it was also made the text for commentaries by learned men both in the Greek and Roman churches. These all professed to venerate the book. How difficult, then, must it have been, nay, impossible, without immediate detection, to corrupt or interpolate the sacred writings."

The first formal catalogue of the books of the New Testament was drawn up by the Council of Laodicea, A.D. 364. But we have an uninterrupted series of testimonies in favour of the canonical books of the New Testament from the very days of the apostles. Thus we might cite the testimony of the apostolical fathers: Clement, who is mentioned by Paul as his fellow-labourer; Hermes, mentioned in Romans xvi. 14; and Polycarp, who was appointed by the apostles bishop of the Christian church at Smyrna. It was not during this period that we were likely to find very numerous and detailed references to the Christian Scriptures. A multitude of such references is the natural result of controversy respecting either the doctrine or the authority of the books in question. The purpose of the few writings of the apostolical fathers was not to illustrate the authenticity of the New Testament. This they regarded, doubtless, as very unnecessary for those to whom they immediately wrote, and could not foresee that it would be so valuable to future generations. Had their testimony on this subject been formal, express, and complete, what it gained in minuteness it would have lost in weight, unavoidably suggesting the suspicion that it was the work of a later hand. Their testimony is incidental, and therefore all the more to be depended on; and, to use the words of Dr Lardner,

"we have good reason to believe that they were some of those persons from whom succeeding writers received that full and satisfactory evidence which they appear to have had concerning the several books of the New Testament." Passing from the apostolic age, Lardner adduces more than a hundred authors who have given testimony, either direct or indirect, to the New Testament Scriptures. "No writings," as Augustine has well observed, "ever had a better testimony afforded them than those of the apostles and evangelists. Nor does it weaken the credit and authority of books received by the church of Christ from the beginning, that some other writings have been, without ground, and falsely, ascribed to the apostles. For the like has happened, for instance, to Hippocrates; but yet his genuine works are distinguished from others which have been published under his name. We know the writings of the apostles, as we know the works of Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Varro, and others, to be theirs, and as we know the writings of divine ecclesiastical authors; forasmuch as they have the testimony of contemporaries, and of those who have lived in succeeding times. I might, moreover, by way of illustration, produce for examples those now in hand. Suppose some one in time to come should deny those to be the works of Faustus, or these to be mine, how should he be satisfied but by the testimony of those of this time who knew both, and have transmitted their accounts to others? And shall not, then, the testimony of the churches and Christian brethren be valid here, especially when they are so numerous and so harmonious, and the tradition is with so much ease and certainty traced down from the apostles to our time? I say, shall any be so foolish and unreasonable as to deny or dispute the credibility of such a testimony to the Scriptures, which would be allowed in behalf of any writings whatever, whether heathen or ecclesiastical?"

From an early period, catalogues of the books of the New Testament were published both by individual fathers and by councils of the church. The first catalogue or enumeration, published about one hundred years after the death of the apostles, is that of Origen, which includes all the present canon except the epistles of James and Jude; but that these were omitted by accident, not design, is plain from other parts of his writings, where he acknowledges these epistles as part of the canon. The next catalogue is that of Eusebius, who lived about one hundred years after Origen. In this catalogue every book is mentioned which we now have in the canon, and no others. The same may be also said of the catalogue of Athanasius and that of Cyril, excepting that the latter omits the book of Revelation. The Council of Laodicea has made the same omission; but a few years later Epiphanius published his work on heresies, in which a catalogue is given including the book of Revelation. Jerome also, the translator of the Bible into Latin, furnishes us with a catalogue answering to the present canon. Rufinus, Augustine, and the Council of Carthage, have done the same. It may well be said, indeed, in the language of Paley, that "in the number, variety, and early date of our testimonies, we far exceed all other ancient books. For one which the most celebrated Greek or Roman writer can allege, we produce many." It may be remarked, that additional and confirmatory evidence in favour of the present canon might be derived from the fact that all these books were publicly read as Scripture in the Christian churches from a very early period; that they were translated into other languages so early, that the old Peschito or Syriac version of the New Testament is supposed by the learned to have been made before the close of the first century, and the old Italic, from which Jerome formed his edition of the Vulgate, if not in the first, at all events in the second century.

In reference to the whole canonical Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testaments, for whose authority we have the most satisfactory evidence, we may conclude in the words of Mr Haldane:—"Were there no other evidence of the truth of divine revelation than the existence of the Holy Scriptures, that alone would be conclusive. The Bible is not a book compiled by a single author, nor by many authors, acting in confederacy in the same age; in which case it would not be so wonderful to find a just and close connection in its several parts. It is the work of between thirty and forty writers, in very different conditions of life, from the throne and sceptre down to the lowest degree; and in very distant ages, during which the world must have put on an entirely new appearance, and men must have had different interests to pursue. This would have led a spirit of imposture to vary its schemes, and to adapt them to different stations in the world, and to different fashions and changes in every age. David wrote about four hundred years after Moses, and Isaiah about two hundred and fifty after David, and John about eight hundred years after Isaiah. Yet these authors, with all the other prophets and apostles, wrote in perfect harmony, confirming the authority of their predecessors, labouring to enforce their instructions, and denouncing the severest judgments on all who continued disobedient. Such entire agreement in propounding religious truths and principles, different from any before or since promulgated, except by those who have learned from them, establishes the divine mission of the writers of the Bible beyond dispute, proving that they all derived their wisdom from God, and spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. In all the works of God there is an analogy characteristic of his divine hand; and the variety and harmony that shine so conspicuously in the heavens and the earth are not farther removed from the suspicion of imposture than the unity that, in the midst of boundless variety, reigns in that book which reveals the plan of redemption. To forge the Bible is as impossible as to forge a world."

CANONICAL, that which is done in accordance with the Canons of the Church.

CANONICAL HOURS, are certain stated times of the day consigned, more especially by the Romish Church, to the offices of prayer and devotion; such are matins, lauds, &c. In England, the canonical hours are from eight to twelve in the forenoon; before or after which, marriage cannot be legally performed in any church.

CANONICAL LETTERS, in the ancient Church, were testimonials of the orthodox faith which the bishops and clergy sent each other to keep up the catholic communion, and distinguish orthodox Christians from heretics.

CANONICAL LIFE, the rule of living prescribed by the ancient clergy, who lived in community. The canonical life was a kind of medium between the monastic and clerical lives.

CANONICAL OBEDIENCE is that submission which, by the ecclesiastical laws of the Episcopal Church, the inferior clergy are to pay to their bishops, and the monks to their superiors.

CANONS, BOOK OF, ordinances prepared for Scotland by order of Charles I., and designed completely to subvert the constitution of the Scottish Church. They were confirmed under the Great Seal, by letters-patent, bearing date 23d May 1635. They declared the power of the king in all matters spiritual to be absolute and unlimited; and they pronounced sentence of excommunication against all who should declare the government of the Church by bishops and archbishops to be unscriptural and unlawful. They decreed that no General Assembly should be called but by the king; that no ecclesiastical business should be discussed, except in the Prelatic courts; that no private meetings—which were termed conventicles, and included presbyteries and kirk-sessions—should be held by the ministers for expounding the Scriptures; and that on no occasion, in public, should a minister engage in extemporary prayer. Such were some of the chief regulations of the Book of Canons, and it is not at all surprising that the Scottish people should have regarded it as directly Popish, and intended to prepare the way for the introduction of Popery itself.

CANTICLES. See SONG OF SOLOMON.

CAPERNAUM, a city frequently mentioned by the evangelists as having been much the place of the Saviour's residence during the period of his public ministry. It stood on the north-west coast of the Sea of Galilee, in the borders of Zebulun and Naphtali. Matt. iv. 13, 14.

Capernaum, which at one time was the metropolis of all Galilee, has long since sunk into insignificance. Its site is commonly identified with that of an extensive field of ruins, styled by the Arabs Tel-hûm, and situated on the northern plain, near where the Jordan enters the lake. Its ruins, which are overgrown with grass and bushes, extend for more than a mile along the shore, and command a beautiful view of the whole lake. "Nothing remains," says Elliot, "but piles of stones, over which later residents have raised their habitations; and these too have crumbled into decay. The only living creature we beheld was a solitary jackal." "I had now passed along the whole western shore of the lake," says Stephens; "and if this be not Capernaum, my horse's hoofs must have trampled upon the city of our Saviour's love, without my knowing where that city stood." Professor Robinson is of opinion that the proper site of Capernaum is not Tel-hûm, which is too distant from the shore, but more probably Khân Minizeh.

CAPHTOR, the name of an island or country whence sprang the people called in Scripture CAPHTORIMS. It is remarkable that the same people are also sometimes called Cherethims, Cherethites, and Philistines. Gen. x. 14; Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4; Amos ix. 7. The authors of the 'Universal History,' following Bochart, are of opinion that by Caphtor was meant Cappadocia; but Calmet, who has entered largely into this question, in a dissertation prefixed to the First Book of Samuel, endeavours to show that the ancient Caphtor was the Isle of Crete, and that the Philistines, the Caphtorims, or the Cherethims, who afterwards settled in Palestine, came from thence. Compare Ezek. xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5; 1 Sam. xxx. 14.

CAPPADOCIA, a province in Asia Minor, extending from Mount Taurus to the Euxine Sea.

From the feeble light of ancient history, we find that this country was a province of Lydia, in the reign of Crœsus, about 500 B.C. It continued a kingdom till about the birth of Christ, when it was conquered by the Romans, annexed to that empire, and its independence for ever extinguished. From the Roman emperors, Cappadocia passed into the hands of the Turks, and it now forms a portion of the pachalics of Konieh and Tarabozan, or Trebisonde. Christianity, however, was early planted here, and Peter wrote his First Epistle, amongst others, to the Christian converts in Cappadocia. See Acts ii. 9; 1 Pet. i. 1. The gospel long flourished in that country, and the existence of Christian churches is easily traced there till the ninth or tenth century.

CAPTIVES. The treatment of persons taken in war among ancient nations, throws great light upon many passages of Scripture. It is well explained by Professor Paxton. "The Eastern conqueror often stripped his unhappy captives naked, shaved their heads, and made them travel in that condition, exposed to the burning heat of a vertical sun by day, and the chilling cold of the night. Such barbarous treatment was, to modest women, the height of cruelty and indignity; especially to those who had been educated in softness and elegance,—who had figured in all the superfluities of ornamental dress, and whose faces had hardly ever been exposed to the sight of man. The Prophet Ezekiel (xvi. 37) mentions this as the hardest part of the sufferings in which female captives are involved: 'The Lord will discover thy nakedness.' The daughter of Zion had indulged in all the softness of Oriental luxury; but the offended Jehovah should cause her unrelenting enemies to drag her forth from her secret chambers into the view of an insolent soldiery; strip her of her ornaments, in which she so greatly delighted; take away her splendid and costly garments; discover her nakedness; and compel her to travel, in that miserable plight, to a far distant country, a helpless captive, the property of a cruel lord. Arrived in the land of their captivity, captives were often purchased at a very low price. The Prophet Joel complains of the contemptuous cheapness in which the people of Israel were held by those who made them captives: 'And they have cast lots for my people; and have given a boy for a harlot, and sold a girl for wine, that they might drink.' The custom of casting lots for the captives taken in war appears to have prevailed both among the Jews and the Greeks. The same allusion occurs in the prophecy of Obadiah: 'Strangers carried away captive his forces, and foreigners entered into his gates, and cast lots upon Jerusalem.'

"By an inhuman custom, which is still retained in the East, the eyes of captives taken in war were not seldom put out,—sometimes literally scooped or dug out of their sockets. This dreadful calamity Samson had to endure from the unrelenting vengeance of his enemies. In a posterior age, Zedekiah, the last king of Judah and Benjamin, after being compelled to behold the violent death of his sons and nobility, had his eyes put out, and was carried in chains to Babylon. The barbarous custom long survived the decline and fall of the Babylonian empire; for, by the testimony of Mr Maurice, in his 'History of Hindostan,' the captive princes of that country were often treated in this manner by their more fortunate rivals; a red-hot iron was passed over their eyes, which effectually deprived them of sight, and, at the same time, of their title and ability to reign. To the wretched state of such prisoners the Prophet Isaiah alludes, in a noble prediction, where he describes, in very glowing colours, the character and work of the promised Messiah: 'He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised,'—as captives too frequently were by the weight of their fetters.

"It seems to have been the practice of Eastern kings to command their captives taken in war, especially those that had, by the atrociousness of their crimes, or the stoutness of their resistance, greatly provoked their indignation, to lie down on the ground, and then put to death a certain part of them, which they measured with a line, or determined by lot. This custom was not, perhaps, commonly practised by the people of God in their wars with the nations around them; but one instance is recorded in the life of David, who inflicted this punishment on the Moabites: 'And he smote Moab, and measured them with a line, casting them down to the ground; even with two lines measured he to put to death, and with one full line to keep alive. And so the Moabites became David's servants, and brought gifts.' 2 Sam. viii. 2. But the most shocking punishment which the ingenious cruelty of a haughty and unfeeling conqueror ever inflicted on the miserable captive, was tying a dead body to him till he gradually pined and died. It is to this deplorable condition of a captive that the apostle refers in that pathetic exclamation, 'O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?' Who shall rescue me, miserable captive as I am, from this continual burden of sin which I carry about with me; and which is cumbersome and odious, as a dead carcase bound to a living body, to be dragged along with it wherever it goes?"

CAPUCHINS, monks of the order of St Francis, who derived their names from wearing a square capuche or cowl. This order commenced about 1528.

CAPUTIATI, a denomination which appeared in the twelfth century, so called from a singular kind of cap which distinguished their party. They wore upon their caps a leaden image of the Virgin Mary, and declared publicly that their purpose was to level all distinctions, to abrogate magistracy, and to remove all subordination among mankind, and to restore that primitive liberty,—that natural equality, which was the inestimable privilege of the first mortals.

CARAITES, or KARAITES, an ancient Jewish sect. The name signifies, "Textualists, or Scripturists," and was originally given to the school of Shammai, about thirty years or more before Christ, because they rejected "the traditions of the elders," as embraced by the school of Hillel and the Pharisees, and all the fanciful interpretations of the CABALA,—which see. They claim, however, a much higher antiquity, and produce a catalogue of doctors up to the time of Ezra.

The Rabbinites have been accustomed to call them Sadducees; but they believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures, the resurrection of the dead, and the final judgment. They believe that the Messiah is not yet come, and reject all calculations of the time of his appearance: yet they say, "it is proper that even every day they should receive their salvation by Messiah, the son of David." In the practice of their religion, they differ from the Rabbinites in the observance of the festivals, and keep the Sabbath with more strictness. They extend their prohibition of marriage to more degrees of affinity, and admit not of divorce on any slight or trivial grounds.

The sect of Caraites still exists, but their number is "very inconsiderable." They are found chiefly in the Crimea (where Dr Edward Clarke visited a settlement of them), Lithuania, and Persia; at Damascus, Constantinople, and Cairo. Their honesty in the Crimea is said to be proverbial; and Dr Clarke visited one of their rabbis, whom he pronounces to be "highly esteemed, and exceeding well informed."

CARAVAN, the name given to a company of travellers in the East. By means of caravans almost the whole trade of Asia is carried on, and therefore it may be useful to point out some particulars in reference to this mode of travelling. Dr Paxton, in his Illustrations of Scripture, thus describes it:—"In travelling through the desert, which is always performed in large bodies or caravans, it is a matter of prime importance to secure the services of a trusty guide. The individual to whom that responsible office is assigned, requires to be of a certain rank, as well as to possess a variety of the most important qualifications. He must be sheich or chief of some Arab tribe, who, with the assistance of his own people, may be able to defend his charge from the fierce marauders, who prowl about in quest of plunder; and, by his amicable relations and influence with neighbouring tribes, may secure a free passage through their territories. Moreover, as the life and property of the whole party are, in a manner, placed in his hands, it is essential that he should unite to those advantages of station, great personal experience, and accurate knowledge of the situation of the wells, by which the route is invariably directed to the best places for encamping, and obtaining the accommodation of shade for the men, and grass for the cattle,—the parts most dangerous from the moving sands,—the prognostics of the weather,—the approach and method of escaping the fatal effects of the hot winds,—and, in short, of every thing bearing upon the safety and progress of the caravan. It was these important services that Moses, on reaching the borders of the great Arabian desert, solicited his father-in-law, a pastoral chief of great substance and power in that region, to perform to the Israelites: and, while it must be obvious, on a moment's reflection, that the peculiar circumstances of that people did not relieve Moses from the necessity of employing the usual assistance of a guide, his anxiety to secure the company of Jethro in that capacity displayed the admirable judgment and prudence of the Hebrew leader; for, although the pillar of cloud by day, and of fire by night, regulated by divine authority their times of march and halting, and afforded them the invaluable benefit of shade and direction, it was left to themselves to negotiate with the native sheichs for a passage through their dominions,—as well as to provide wood for fuel, provender for the cattle, and water for all; and who so well fitted to be their guide in all arrangements of this nature, as a man whose family connection with Moses, whose extensive influence, and whose perfect knowledge of the secrets of the desert, afforded a pledge of fidelity and usefulness?"

"The arrangement of caravans, whether mercantile or religious, including frequently several thousand persons, has, from time immemorial, been made after the same order. Five superior officers, exclusive of the chief, are appointed to superintend the whole concern; whose names, the master of the march, the halt, the servants and cattle, and the luggage, sufficiently point out the nature of their respective duties. Each person, notwithstanding, is at liberty to choose his place in the company or division to which he wishes to attach himself; in taking which, of course, he is naturally influenced by friendship and acquaintance; but the moment that his choice is announced, the strict regulations of the caravan require that he keep within the range of his company during the whole of his journey. The first day of their setting out there is always a great deal of hurry and confusion; and the stage is as invariably a short one. The second day some regularity is insisted on; and every one is required, under severe penalties, to assume the place allotted to him. They commonly travel four abreast; and, besides the five general officers, there is a subordinate officer appointed to preside over each company, to take care that order is kept, and that the disorderly or the sick should receive due measure of attention. Each company is distinguished by an appropriate standard, which, at night, consists of long poles, surmounted by small eagles or beacons, formed of iron hoops, which are filled with combustible materials for light, to the number of ten or twelve to each company, and every one of a different figure and shape from another; so that every one knows, by looking at the standard by night or by day, whether he is in his right place. These standards are always carried in front of the company; and, at each encampment, they are fixed upright in the ground in such a manner, and at such distances, as to mark the ground each company is to occupy;—within the limits of which, every person is at liberty to occupy himself as he chooses,—to unload his camels, to give them provender, kindle his fire, prepare his own victuals, and enjoy his pipe or conversation, and repose at his pleasure.

“The march of the Israelites from Egypt was in like manner, after the immemorial arrangement of caravans, consigned to the management of five presiding officers, the chief burden of the movement devolving on Moses, who was called by God himself to be at the head of that difficult and laborious enterprise. Each tribe had its own distinguishing standard, and their time of marching and of halting was regulated by the rules which, it has already been stated, all parties of travellers have for centuries observed in summer. Accordingly it was in the evening, probably about seven or eight o’clock, which is the usual time of starting in the hot season, when they broke up their encampment at Pihahiroth, and entered, by the favour of their Almighty protector and guide, on their ever-memorable passage over the dry bed of the Red Sea.”

CARBONARI (literally, Charcoal-men), a modern politico-religious sect, lately sprung up in Italy, supposed to originate from the Freemasons, and, like them, meeting in secret societies, and observing certain mystical rites and signs. Like the Freemasons, they pretend to derive their first principles from the Scriptures, and to adopt the morality of the gospel and the symbols of Christianity; the which, however, they apply politically, and, it is said, seditiously. The cross, for instance, rendered sacred by the sufferings of our Divine Lord, they represent as the instrument to crucify those whom they designate as enemies and tyrants, against whom they vow eternal hatred; and they profess to reverence our Saviour “as the most deplorable, and the most illustrious victim of despotism.”

Before the counter-revolution in Naples, the nation had almost all become Carbonari; and the sect spread into Germany, Switzerland, and other countries; but they by no means ought to be considered as a religious denomination. When they grew numerous and powerful, another sect was formed to oppose and counteract them, who were called Calderari.

CARBUNCLE, a very elegant gem, the colour of which is a deep red, mingled with scarlet. It is commonly found in a pure and faultless state; and is of the same degree of hardness as the sapphire, which is second only to the diamond. It is naturally of an angular figure, and is found adhering by its base to a very heavy and ferruginous stone of the emery kind. Its common size is near a quarter of an inch in length, and two-thirds of that in diameter. In its thickest parts, when held up against the sun, it loses its deep tinge, and in colour resembles a burning charcoal; on which account the ancients gave it the name of anthrax. The fire produces no mutation in its colour. Hitherto it has been found only in the East Indies, and there but rarely.

The carbuncle was the third stone in the first row of precious stones composing the high priest’s breastplate. Exod. xxviii. 17. See BREASTPLATE.

CARCASE, the dead body of man or beast. The Mosaic law prohibited the touching of the carcase of an unclean animal (Lev. v. 2, xi. 8), and the person who transgressed this law was unclean until the evening. It was strictly ordered that the carcase should be burned; and to be deprived of burial was accounted a great calamity. Hence the judgment of the Lord against Jezebel: “And the carcase of Jezebel shall be as dung upon the face of the field in the portion of Jezreel; so that they shall not say, This is Jezebel.” 2 Kings ix. 37.

CARCHEMISH, the name of a town situated on the banks of the Euphrates, and belonging to the Assyrians, which Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt, took and fortified, 2 Chron. xxxv. 20. It was retaken by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and the garrison cut in pieces. The conquest of this city by the Egyptians is very strikingly foretold by Jeremiah (xli. 1–12.) It was probably the Circesium or Circussum of the Greeks.

CARDINAL, an eminent dignity in the Roman Church. It was also a name that was given to certain officers of the Emperor Theodosius, as to generals of armies; and to the præfecti in Asia and Africa, because they possessed the chief offices in the empire.

CARE, thought and concern about a thing. God’s providence towards his creatures, especially his people, is called his care for them. He considers their case, preserves their existence and powers, governs their acts, and promotes their welfare. Matt. vi. 26, 30; 1 Cor. ix. 9; 1 Pet. v. 7. Men’s care is either,—1. Lawful, consisting in a serious thought and earnest endeavour to please God, embracing his Son, obeying his law, turning from sin;—and to promote our neighbour’s temporal or spiritual advantage; and in a moderate endeavour to gain a competent portion of the good things of this life. 2 Cor. vii. 11, 12; Phil. ii. 20; 1 Pet. v. 7. 2. Sinful, in endeavouring to fulfil sinful lusts or pleasures; and in immoderate concern and endeavour to obtain carnal advantages: such care is forbidden. Matt. vi. 34; Phil. iv. 6. The cares of this world, that choke the Word of God, and render it unfruitful, are immoderate and anxious concern for earthly enjoyments, which prevents the Word from having a proper effect on our hearts. Matt. xiii. 22. To eat bread with care or carefulness, is to do it under pinching straits, and under apprehension of terrible judgments. Ezek. iv. 16; xii. 18, 19. We are not careful to answer thee in this matter;—we need give no answer in words, being ready to manifest our fixed resolution by the endurance of suffering. Dan. iii. 16.

CARMEL, a city in Judah where Nabal the Carmelite, Abigail's husband, dwelt. Josh. xv. 55; 1 Sam. xxv. 2, 3. The city is now in ruins, and bears the name of Khurmel. The ruins are of great extent; and the remains of several churches attest the flourishing condition of Carmel at a period considerably subsequent to the Christian era.

CARMEL, MOUNT, was also the name of a celebrated mountain in Palestine. Though spoken of in general as a single mountain, it ought rather to be considered as a mountainous region, the whole of which was known by the name of Carmel, while to one of the hills, more elevated than the rest, that name was usually applied by way of eminence.

The best description of Carmel is given by Sandys:—"Mount Carmel stretcheth from east to west, and hath his uttermost basis washed with the sea; steepest toward the north, and of different altitude; rich in olives and vines, when husbanded; and abounding with several sorts of fruits and herbs, both medicinal and fragrant, though now much overgrown with woods of sweet savour." A very picturesque account also occurs in the travels of Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne:—"In the cool of evening, we ascended Mount Carmel by a deep and rocky ravine a little way to the south. We conversed together on Elijah's wonderful answer to prayer obtained on this mountain, and felt that we could well spend the evening of the holy day in such a place. Having soon reached the summit, a considerable way above the Latin convent, we sat down at a point commanding a full view of the sea to the west and to the north. Near this must have been the spot where Elijah prayed when he went up to the top of Carmel, and cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees, and said to his servant, 'Go up now, look toward the sea. And he went up, and looked, and said, There is nothing.' And Elijah said, 'Go again, seven times.' 1 Kings xviii. 43. There we united in praying for abundance of rain to our own souls, our friends, and our people, and for the progress of our mission, which seemed for a time impeded. It was awfully solemn to kneel on the lonely top of Carmel. The sun was going down beyond the sea, the air was cool and delightfully pure; scarcely a breath of wind stirred the leaves, yet the fragrant shrubs diffused their pleasant odours on every side. A true Sabbath stillness rested on the sea, and on the hill. The sea washes the foot of the hill on each side, and stretches out full in front till lost in the distance. To the east and north-east lies that extension of the splendid Plain of Esdraelon which reaches to the white walls of Acre, and through which 'that ancient river, the River Kishon,' was winding its way to the sea, not far from the foot of Carmel. These are the waters that swept away the enemies of Deborah and Barak (Judg. v. 21), and that were made red by the blood of the prophets of Baal, after Elijah's miraculous sign of fire from heaven. To the south is seen the narrow plain between the mountains and the sea, which afterwards expands into the Plain of Sharon. And along the ridge of Mount Carmel itself is a range of eminences, extending many miles to the south-east, all of them presenting a surface of table-land on the top, sometimes bare and rocky, and sometimes covered with mountain shrubs. On some of these heights, the thousands of Israel assembled to meet Elijah, when he stood forth before them all and said, 'How long halt ye between two opinions?' and from this sea they carried up the water that drenched his altar; and here they fell on their faces and cried, 'Jehovah, he is the God; Jehovah, he is the God!' The view we obtained that evening on Mount Carmel can never be forgotten. No scene we had witnessed surpassed its magnificence, and the features of it are still as fresh in our memory as if we had gazed on it but yesterday. It was, moreover, a most instructive scene; we saw at once the solution of all our difficulties in regard to the scriptural references to this hill. Carmel is not remarkable for height, and is nowhere in Scripture celebrated for its loftiness. At the point overhanging the sea, we have seen that it is less than nine hundred feet high. To the south-east it rises to the height of twelve hundred feet, which is its greatest altitude. But then the range of hills runs nearly eight miles into the country, and was in former days fruitful to a proverb. Indeed, the name Carmel, signifying 'a fruitful field,' was given to it evidently for this reason. And when this vast extent of fruitful hills was covered over with vineyards, olive-groves, and orchards of figs and almond trees, not on the sides alone, but also along the table-land of its summit,—would not Carmel, worthy of the name, appear an immense hanging garden in the midst of the land? In the days of its pristine luxuriance, before the curse of God blasted its glory, 'the excellency of Carmel' (Isa. xxxv. 2), of which the prophet speaks, must have been truly wonderful! How easy at that time it would have been to hide in the top of Carmel (Amos ix. 3); for embowering vines and deep shady fig-trees would afford a covert for many a mile along the summit. And would not the beholder in other days at once understand the meaning of the beautiful description of the Church given in the Song, 'Thine head upon thee is like Carmel?' Cant. vii. 5. Would not the jewellery and ornaments, or perhaps the wreath of flowers, around the head of an Eastern bride, resemble the varied luxuriance of the gardens of Carmel seen from afar? There are at present in the convent garden on the hill a few vines that produce excellent grapes; but these are all that now remain to testify of the spot where Uzziah had his vine-dressers. 2 Chron. xxvi. 10. With the exception of these, which are not properly on the summit of the hill, we could not descry a single fruit-tree on the top of Carmel. A few verdant olive trees grow at the northern roots of the hill, and some extend a short way up the side; but the extensive summit, which was once like a garden, is covered, as far as our eye reached, with wild mountain shrubs and briery plants, all of stunted growth, except where the rock lay bare and without verdure under the scorching sun. The same God who said, 'Zion shall be ploughed like a field;' and, 'I will pour the stones of Samaria down into the valley,' said also, 'The top of Carmel shall wither' (Amos i. 2); and that word we saw before our eyes fulfilled to the letter."

CARMELITES, or WHITEFRIARS, one of the four tribes of mendicant or begging friars; so named from Mount Carmel, formerly inhabited by Elias, Elisha, and the children of the prophets, from whom this order pretends to descend in uninterrupted succession. These monks belong to the order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. Towards the end of the seventeenth century a keen and bitter controversy arose between the Carmelites and the Jesuits. Pamphlets, on both sides, issued from the press in great numbers, and couched in language of the most acrimonious character. Both parties appealed to Popes Innocent XI. and Innocent XII., and at length peace was restored between the combatants by an authoritative brief which was issued by the latter Pontiff, dated 20th November 1698. The order of Carmelites is generally supposed to have originated in the twelfth century under the patronage of Almeric, legate of the Holy See in the East, and patriarch of Antioch.

Some of this order have pretended that they were related to the Saviour and the Virgin Mary, who, they allege, wore the dress of the Carmelites. Others claim Pythagoras, the ancient Grecian philosopher, as one of their order. This order possesses a monastery situated on or near the spot at which Elijah offered up his sacrifice. 1 Kings xviii. 17. Mr Buckingham tells us that, when he visited it in 1816, it was nearly abandoned, a solitary monk having the charge of it, who resided in Caypha. This convent was erected in the seventeenth century on the ruins of the ancient one, and, when visited by Lamartine, it was surmounted by a large tri-colour flag, having been converted by the French into an hospital for the sick, during their campaign in Syria. It was afterwards destroyed in the war between the Sultan and the Pacha of Egypt, but it has since been partly rebuilt, and is inhabited by some friars of the Carmelite order, who are remarkably hospitable to strangers.

The habit of the Carmelites was at first white, and the cloak laced at the bottom with several lists; but Pope Honorius IV. commanded them to change it for that of the minims. Their scapulary is a small woollen habit, of a brown colour, thrown over their shoulders. They wear no linen shirts, but instead of them linsey-woolsey.

CARNAL, fleshly, sensual, sinful. Worldly enjoyments are carnal, because they only minister to the wants and desires of the animal part of man. Rom. xv. 27; 1 Cor. ix. 11. The ceremonial parts of the Mosaic dispensation were carnal; they related immediately to the bodies of men and beasts. Heb. vii. 16, ix. 10. The weapons of a Christian's warfare are not carnal; they are not of human origin, nor are they directed by human wisdom. 2 Cor. x. 4. Wicked or unconverted men are represented as under the domination of a "carnal mind," which is "enmity against God," and which must issue in death. Rom. viii. 6, 7. See AFFECTIONS.

CARNIVAL, a Roman festival. By Pope Gregory the Great, about A.D. 600, Ash Wednesday was made the beginning of the forty days' fast, and the day before was called Fast-Eve, because in the night of this day, at twelve o'clock, the fast began. This fast was preceded by a feast of three days, called the Carnival. This is the origin of the present carnival or Faschings, as it is called in the south of Germany, and which continues, in that country, from Twelfth Day to Ash Wednesday. The name carnival is derived from the Latin words carne and rale (according to Ducange, from the Latin denomination of the feast in the middle ages,—carne levamen), because at that time people took leave of flesh. Previously to the commencement of their long abstinence, men devoted themselves to enjoyment, particularly during the three last days of the carnival. The carnival is nothing but the Saturnalia of the Christian Romans, who could not forget their Pagan festivals. At least, it greatly resembles the Saturnalia, which were celebrated annually in December, with all kinds of mirth, pleasure, and freedom, in honour of Saturn, and the golden age, when he governed the world, and to preserve the remembrance of the liberty and equality of men in the youth of the world. In Rome, the carnival brought to view, in a lively manner, the old Saturnalia in a new form. During the last days of the carnival, and particularly during the day which preceded the long fast, mummeries, plays, tricks, and freedom of every kind abounded. From Italy, the modern Saturnalia passed to the other Christian countries of Europe.

The carnival is celebrated, in modern times, with the greatest show and spirit at Venice and Rome. In the former place it begins after Christmas. The diversions of it are shows, masquerades, the amusements of the place of St Mark, and sometimes, in case of the visits of great princes, a regatta, or boat race. After this, there was a second carnival at Venice, the Venetian mass, called also the festival of the Ascension, and the Brecentaur festival, because it commonly began on Ascension Day, and because the celebration of the marriage of the Doge with the Adriatic Sea was connected with it. It continued fourteen days. No character-masks were worn there, except Venetian dominos. The carnival at Rome continues but eight days, and is occupied mostly in masquerades and races. In recent times, the carnival has been celebrated again in Cologne, on the Rhine, under the direction of the committee of fools, to the great satisfaction of all who were present. In Spain, the carnival is called Carnestolendas.

CARLOSTADIANS, so called from Carolostadt, a colleague of Luther, who denied the real presence in the eucharist as taught by Luther, and raised a tumult at Wittenberg in his absence; on which account he was obliged to retire to Switzerland. Mosheim says he was a man of a warm enthusiastic temper, declaimed wildly against human learning, and countenanced some of the extravagancies of the German Anabaptists.

CARPENTER. The Hebrew word translated carpenter, is not confined to a workman in wood, but is applied to an artificer of any kind, whether in wood or metal. The work of the carpenter, in its modern sense, is seldom noticed in the Sacred Scriptures. The implements used in this trade, as axes, hammers, and saws, are treated of in this work under their separate heads. What progress the Hebrews had made in the art of carpentry, we are not specifically informed; but from the representations found on the Egyptian monuments, we may easily discern that they must have made considerable progress, particularly in those pieces of carpentry which are connected with the furniture of dwelling-houses. See HOUSES.

CARPOCRATIANS, a denomination which arose towards the middle of the second century; so called from Carpocrates, whose philosophical tenets agreed in general with those of the Egyptian Gnostics. He acknowledged the existence of a Supreme God, and of the Æons derived from him by successive generation. He maintained the eternity of matter, and the creation of the world from thence by angelic powers, as also the Divine origin of souls unhappily imprisoned in mortal bodies. He asserted that Jesus was born of Joseph and Mary, according to the ordinary course of nature, and was distinguished from the rest of mankind by nothing but his superior fortitude and greatness of soul. In short, his sentiments appear to have corresponded with those of the modern Humanitarians, with whom they seem also to have agreed in the doctrine of philosophical necessity; which, probably, gave rise to their being charged with maintaining the innocency of vice, as arising from passions implanted in our nature by the Creator. Irenæus charges them with reducing all the essentials of religion to two points, "faith and love," or charity; but do not the Scriptures assert the same? or what point of Christian morals is not herein included? They are also charged with licentiousness at their love-feasts, "putting out the candles," &c.; but this story has been too often repeated and refuted, to be now believed. Considering the ignorance of the times, there is more plausibility in the charge of their being superstitious and inclined to magic; but of this there is little proof. They are, however, certainly chargeable with erroneous doctrine, which probably led to some inconsistencies of practice, though by no means to the extent that their enemies pretended.

CART. A land carriage with two wheels, drawn commonly by horses, and used chiefly for conveying goods from one place to another. The Hebrew word agalak occurs in Gen. xlv. 19; 1 Sam. vi. 7, where it signifies an ordinary cart or waggon; and in Psal. xlv. 9, a war chariot. It was a cart on which the Philistines conveyed back the ark into the Land of Canaan. The carts still used, in the mountainous parts of Palestine, have low and circular wooden wheels, and awkward lumbering bodies. Carts appear to have been sometimes covered,—as was the case with those which were used by the Israelites for carrying parts of the sacred utensils. Numb. vii. 3. It was in some such covered cart that the ark was placed when the men of Beth-shemesh looked into it, and for which they were severely punished. 1 Sam. vi. 19. Scripture mentions a sort of cart used by the Jews for the purpose of threshing. They were supported on low thick wheels, bound with iron, which were rolled up and down on the sheaves to bruise them, and force out the corn. The Septuagint and Jerome represent these carts as furnished with saws, inasmuch that their surface was beset with teeth. David having taken Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites, ordered all the inhabitants to be crushed to pieces under such carts, moving on wheels set with iron teeth; and the King of Damascus is said to have treated the Israelites of the Land of Gilead in the same manner.

CARTHAGE, a celebrated city on the coast of Africa, a colony from Tyre. Ezekiel says, the Carthaginians traded to Tyre; but the Hebrew reads Tarshish, which rather signifies Tarsus in Cilicia, or Tartessus in Spain, formerly famous for trade. Carthago was destroyed by the Romans about 146 years B.C. See TARSHISH.

CASEMENT. This word, which occurs in Prov. vii. 6, and is rendered "lattice" in Judges v. 28, obviously refers to the open trellis-work placed before windows in oriental houses. The windows are usually very large, extending almost to the floor, and protected from the weather in winter by thin shutters. The large windows looking towards the street are often guarded in the East by a lattice-work, which is thrown open on occasions of public festivity. The windows are usually large, extending to the floor. The casement or lattice is very useful in warm countries, as through the apertures a current of cool air is allowed to pass.

CASIPHIA. Ezra says, that when returning to Judea, he sent to Iddo, who dwelt at Casiphia; perhaps Mount Caspius, near the Caspian Sea, between Media and Hyrcania, where were many captives. Ezra viii. 17.

CASLUHIM, a people mentioned in Gen. x. 14.; 1 Chron. i. 12. Moses says, in speaking of them, "Out of whom sprung the Philistines." They are mentioned along with the CAPHITORIM (which see). Gesenius says, they were a colony of the Egyptians, and Bochart styles them Colehians, a people who, by the Greek writers, are represented to be of Egyptian origin.

CASSIA. In Exod. xxx. 24, Cassia is prescribed as one of the ingredients for composing the holy anointing oil. It is the bark of a tree of the bay tribe, which now grows chiefly in the East Indies. This bark was well known to the ancients, and highly esteemed by them; but, since the use of cinnamon has been generally adopted, the cassia bark has fallen into disrepute, on account of its inferiority. It is thicker and more coarse than cinnamon, of weaker quality, and abounds more with a viscid mucilaginous matter. For many purposes, however, cassia, as being much less expensive, is substituted for cinnamon, but more particularly for the preparation of what is called oil of cinnamon. Cassia was one of the articles of merchandise in the markets of Tyre. Ezek. xxvii. 19. The cassia mentioned in Psal. xlv. 8, is thought to have been an extract, or essential oil, from the bark: "All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad." Brown says, that the fragrant cassia is used in Scripture to signify the savoury and beneficial graces of the Holy Ghost.

CAST, to throw away; also, when spoken of metals, to melt, make, or frame. Amaziah, king of Judah, caused the punishment of casting down from the top of a rock to be inflicted upon ten thousand of the Edomites whom he had taken in war. 2 Chron. xxv. 12.

CASTAWAY. Sometimes in the Grecian games the victory was doubtful, and various competitors claimed the prize. The candidates who were rejected on such occasions by the judge of the games, as not having fairly merited the prize, were called by the Greeks adokimoi, or disapproved, and which is rendered castaway in 1 Cor. ix. 27: "But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway;" that is, rejected by the great Judge of all.

CASTE, certain classes whose burdens and privileges are hereditary. The word is derived from the Portuguese casta, and was originally applied, by the conquerors of the East Indies, to the Indian families, whose occupations, customs, privileges, and duties are hereditary. This term has been sometimes applied to the hereditary classes in Europe; and we speak of the spirit or the prerogatives and usurpations of a caste, to express particularly that unnatural constitution of society, which makes distinction dependent on the accidents of birth or fortune. The division into castes among the people of the Old World comes to us from a period to which the light of history does not extend,—hence its origin cannot be clearly traced; but it is highly probable that, wherever it exists, it was originally grounded on a difference of descent, and in the modes of living, and that the separate castes were originally separate races of people. This institution is found among many nations.

Among the Hindus, mankind are said to be divided into four principal classes or castes. These are kept separate and distinct; and it may be interesting to notice the origin, as explained in the sacred books of the Hindus, of this strange distinction among various orders and classes of men. Dr Duff, in his 'India and India Missions,' gives the following detailed description of this point:—"By a species of emanation or successive eduction from the substance of his own body, Brahma gave origin to the human race, consisting originally of four distinct genera, classes, or castes. From his mouth, first of all, proceeded the Brahman caste; so designated after the name of the great progenitor, as being the highest and noblest in the scale of earthly existence,—the nearest in kindred and in likeness to Brahma himself,—his visible representatives in human form. At the same time, there flowed from his mouth, in finished and substantial form, the four Vedas, for the instruction of mankind in all needful knowledge. Of these the Brahmins were constituted the sole depositaries, the sole interpreters,—the sole teachers. To all the rest of their fellow-creatures they were to give out such portions and fragments, and in such manner and mode, as they might deem most expedient. Hence their emanation from the mouth of Brahma became an emblem of their future characteristic function or office, as the sole divinely appointed preceptors of the human race. From Brahma's arm, the protecting member of the body, next emanated the Kshattriya, or military caste; the source of emanation being emblematic of their future office; which is, to wield martial weapons for the defence of the rest of their fellows from internal violence, and external aggression. From Brahma's breast, the seat of life, originated the Vaishya, or caste of productive capitalists, whether pastoral, agricultural, or mercantile; the source of their origination being emblematic of their future function, which is, to raise or provide for themselves and the rest all the necessities, comforts, and luxuries which serve to support or exhilarate human life. From Brahma's foot, the member of inferiority and degradation, sprung the Shudra, or servile caste, placed on the base of society; the source of their production being emblematic of their future calling; which is, to perform for the other castes all manner of menial duties, either as serfs or manual cultivators of the soil, domestic attendants, artizans, and handicraftsmen of every respectable description.

"According to this rigid and unmodified account of the origin of man, it must at once appear that caste is not a civil but a sacred institution,—not an ordinance of human but of divine appointment. The distinction which it establishes between one family or tribe of man and another, is not of accident, but of essence,—not of arbitrary human will, but of eternal decree and necessity of nature. The difference which the various sources of derivation tend to originate and perpetuate, is not specific, but generic. It is a difference of kind as complete as if the races had sprung from absolutely different primeval stocks. Hence, according to the strict spirit of the system, a man of one genus or caste can no more be transformed into the member of another genus or caste,—whether from a higher to a lower, or from a lower to a higher,—no more than a lion can be changed into a mole, or a mole into a lion; a whale into a flying fish, or a flying fish into a whale; a banyan tree into a thorn, or a thorn into a banyan tree; a rose into a thistle, or a thistle into a rose. Each caste has, by divine ordination, its own peculiar laws and institutions, its own duties and professions, its own rites and customs, its own liberties and immunities. The violation of any fundamental principle, such as the eating of some strictly prohibited article of food, entails a forfeiture of caste, with all its rights and prerogatives. This implies something more than mere degradation from a higher to a lower order within the pale of caste. Should a Brahman, for instance, violate the rules of his caste, he has it not in his power to enfranchise himself in the special privileges of any of the three lower. No; he sinks beneath the platform of caste altogether,—he becomes an absolute outcast. His own genus is completely changed; and he cannot be transformed into any other existing genus. He must henceforward form a new genus of his own. Just as if we deprived the lion of his shaggy mane and brawny paws, and changed his carnivorous into a graminivorous propensity,—he would at once become an outcast from the present leonine genus, and incapable of being admitted into the genus of tigers, or bears, or any other; and if the mutilated transformed creature should perpetuate its kind, there would arise an entirely new genus of animals. Hence it follows, that beneath the fourth or lowest caste, there may be a class of beings belonging to no caste; as if realizing the words of the poet, "Beneath the lowest depth, a lower still,"—a class composed of outcasts from the four privileged orders,—the residuum of the refuse and offscourings of all the rest,—held in the utmost detestation and abhorrence,—compelled to resort to the least reputable and often to the most loathsome occupation, for subsistence,—doomed to be subjected to all the pains, and penalties, and indignities of excommunication and outlawry in this life, and to irreparable disadvantages as regards all preparation for the life to come.

"Such is the spirit of the original theory of caste, as unfolded and taught by divine authority."

CASTLE, a military fortress, generally built on an eminence. The Greek word rendered castle in Acts xxi. 34, refers to the quarters of the Roman soldiers in the Fortress Antonia, which was adjacent to the temple at Jerusalem, and commanded it. The castles of the sons of Ishmael, mentioned in Gen. xxv. 16, were watch-towers used by the shepherds for security against marauders.

CASTOR AND POLLUX, the Dioscuri of Greek mythology, which were considered as having the special province of succouring persons in danger of shipwreck. The vessel which carried Paul to Rome is said (Acts xxviii. 11) to have had the sign of Castor and Pollux. The sign was that from which the ship derived its name. It was a painting or bas-relief on the prow, of some god or hero. The poop bore the picture or image of some god, under whose protection the ship was supposed to be placed. Now, the Romans distinguished the tutelary god which was in the poop from the sign which was at the prow. Yet such was not the invariable custom; sometimes they were both of them the same. This was the case with the Alexandrian ship in which Paul sailed. In after times the images of the gods gave way to those of the saints.

CASUALTY, an event that is not foreseen or intended. See CONTINGENCY.

CASUIST, one that studies and settles cases of conscience. This was a favourite employment with theological writers in the middle ages. It is said that Escobar made a collection of the opinions of all the casuists before him. M. Le Feore, preceptor of Louis XIII., called the books of the casuists "the art of quibbling with God;" which does not seem far from truth, by reason of the multitude of distinctions and subtleties with which they abound. Mayer has published a library of casuists, containing an account of all the writers on cases of conscience, ranged under three heads; the first comprehending the Lutheran, the second the Calvinist, and the third the Romish casuists.

CASUISTRY (called by Kant the dialectics of conscience) is the doctrine and science of conscience and its cases, with the rules and principles of resolving the same; drawn partly from natural reason or equity, and partly from the authority of Scripture, the canon law, councils, fathers, &c. To casuistry belongs the decision of all difficulties arising about what a man may lawfully do or not do; what is sin or not sin; what things a man is obliged to do in order to discharge his duty, and what he may let alone without breach of it.

Some suppose that all books of casuistry are as useless as they are tiresome. One who is really anxious to do his duty must be very weak, it is said, if he can imagine that he has much occasion for them; and with regard to one who is negligent of it, the style of those writings is not such as is likely to awaken him to more attention. The frivolous accuracy which casuists attempt to introduce into subjects which do not admit of it, almost necessarily betrays them into dangerous errors, and, at the same time, renders their works dry and disagreeable, abounding in abstruse and metaphysical distinctions, but incapable of exciting in the heart any of those emotions which it is the principal use of books of morality to produce.

On the other hand, we think it may be observed, that, though these remarks may apply to some, they cannot apply to all books of casuistry. It must be acknowledged, that nice distinctions, metaphysical reasonings, and abstruse terms, cannot be of much service to the public, because there are so few who can enter into them; yet, when we consider how much light is thrown upon a subject by the force of good reasoning, by viewing a case in all its bearings, by properly considering all the objections that may be made to it, and by examining it in every point of view,—if we consider, also, how little some men are accustomed to think, and yet at the same time possess that tenderness of conscience which makes them fearful of doing wrong; we must conclude that such works as these, when properly executed, may certainly be of considerable advantage.

CATABAPTISTS (opposers of baptism, the Greek preposition, kata, being here used in the sense of against), either persons who oppose baptism as a rite altogether obsolete, or as applicable only to converts from another religion to Christianity. See BAPTISM.

CATACOMBS. See SEPULCHRE.

CATAPHRYGIAN HERESY, a name which was given to the system of opinions usually known by the name of Montanism, which arose in the second century, under the teaching of Montanus a Phrygian.

CATECHETICAL METHOD OF INSTRUCTION. This mode of imparting instruction by a train of interrogatories, or by question and answer, was first systematically adopted by Socrates, the distinguished Grecian philosopher. Professing to know nothing himself, he constantly challenged others as to what they professed to know. He put his questions to each person with whom he conversed, and having obtained an answer, he proceeded analytically to found on that another question, and so on until he had reduced the first proposition to some simple elements, clearly showing the truth or falsehood of the original assumption. Such was the experimental process on men's minds which Socrates invariably followed,—a process similar to that which the modern investigator performs on the subject which he examines. The catechetical method of teaching began very early to be adopted in the Christian Church; and no mode, indeed, is better fitted to train the youthful mind to clear, and accurate, and discriminating views of Divine truth. The Christian system is reduced by the catechist to its elementary principles; it is imparted piecemeal to the learner, and he gradually rises from the simpler to the higher and more abstruse points. Thus he is conducted along a chain, every link of which has been brought separately before his mind, and he comes at length to understand Christianity, both in its separate doctrines and as a regularly connected system. In his first outset, perhaps the pupil may seem, in learning the catechism, to be engaged in no higher operation than a mere exercise of memory, but as reason strengthens, the meaning of what he has committed to memory becomes apparent; the connection of its parts begins to strike upon his mind, and the unspeakable advantage is recognised by him of having his mind stored with a beautifully connected chain of valuable truths, forming in the aggregate, a system the most complete and satisfactory of Christian knowledge.

CATECHETICAL SCHOOLS, institutions for the elementary instruction of Christian teachers; of which there were many in the Eastern Church, from the second to the fifth century. They were different from catechumenical schools, which were attached to almost every Church, and which were intended only for the popular instruction of proselytes, and of the children of Christians; whereas the catechetical schools were intended to communicate a scientific knowledge of Christianity. The first and most renowned was established about the middle of the second century, for the Egyptian Church at Alexandria, on the model of the famous schools of Grecian learning in that place. (See ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL.) Teachers like Pantænus, Clement, and Origen, gave them splendour, and secured their permanence. They combined instruction in rhetoric and oratory, in classical Grecian literature, and the eclectic philosophy, with the principal branches of theological study,—exegesis, the doctrines of religion, and the traditions of the Church; distinguished the popular religious belief from the gnosis, or the thorough knowledge of religion; established Christian theology as a science: but by blending Greek speculations and Gnostic fantasies with the doctrines of the Church, by an allegorical interpretation of the Bible, and the assumption of a secret sense in the Scriptures, different from the literal, they contributed to the corruption of Christianity. The distraction of the Alexandrian

Church, by the Arian controversies, proved the destruction of the catechetical school of that place, about the middle of the fourth century. The catechetical school at Antioch appears not to have been a permanent institution, like the Alexandrian, but only to have been formed around distinguished teachers, when there happened to be any in the place. There were some distinguished teachers in Antioch about the year 220. We have no certain information, however, of the theological teachers in that place, such as Lucian, Diodorus of Tarsus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, until the latter part of the fourth century. These teachers were distinguished from the Alexandrian by more sober views of Christianity, by confining themselves to the literal interpretation of the Bible, by a cautious use of the types of the Old Testament, and by a bolder discussion of doctrines. The Nestorian and Eutychian controversies, in the fifth century, drew after them the ruin of the school at Antioch. Of a similar character was the catechetical school instituted at Edessa in the third century, and destroyed in 489, and the school afterwards established at Nisibis, by the Nestorians, in its stead; both of which were in Mesopotamia. To these catechetical schools succeeded, at a later date, the cathedral and monastic schools, especially among the Western Christians, who, as late as the sixth century, made use of the heathen schools, and had never established catechetical schools, even at Rome.

CATECHISM, a form of instruction by means of questions and answers. There have been various catechisms published by different authors, but many of them have been but ill suited to convey instruction to juvenile minds. Catechisms for children should be so framed as not to puzzle and confound, but to let the beams of Divine light into their minds by degrees. Dr Watts advises that different catechisms should be composed for different ages and capacities; the questions and answers should be short, plain and easy; scholastic terms and logical distinctions should be avoided; the most practical points of religion should be inserted; and one or more well-chosen texts of Scripture should be added to support almost every answer, and to prove the several parts of it. The Doctor has admirably exemplified his own rules in the catechism he has composed for children at three or four years of age; that for children at seven or eight; his 'Assembly's Catechism,' proper for youth at twelve or fourteen; his 'Preservative from the Sins and Follies of Childhood;' his 'Catechism of Scripture Names;' and his 'Historical Catechism.' There is no catechism, however, which can be used either in schools or families, that is at all comparable to the 'Assembly's Shorter Catechism' (which see). For adult classes, or as the subject of regular exposition by the minister of a congregation, the 'Assembly's Larger Catechism' is invaluable. One of the best expositions of the Shorter Catechism which we have seen is one entitled, 'A Concise System of Theology, on the basis of the Shorter Catechism,' by Alexander Smith Paterson. Its beautiful systematic arrangement, its accurate and condensed analysis, and the Scriptural correctness of its statements, render it a most useful manual of Divine truth.

CATECHISMS, ASSEMBLY'S LARGER AND SHORTER. At a very early period catechisms were framed by nearly all the Reformed Churches of Europe. The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in 1590, first directed their attention to the subject, and two years after, Mr John Craig, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, laid upon the table of the Assembly a catechism—a form of examination which was approved; and for a long period this excellent catechism continued to be in general use. It was not, indeed, until the meeting of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster in 1640, that the Larger and Shorter Catechisms were prepared. As to the particular circumstances attending the drawing up of the Catechisms, little is known, but it appears that, in 1647, the Assembly appointed committees for the purpose of preparing catechisms,—a larger, for pulpit exposition, as had been customary on the Continent; and a smaller, for the instruction of children. Dr Belfrage, the author of an excellent 'Practical Exposition of the Assembly's Shorter Catechism,' alleges Dr Arrowsmith to be the author of the first sketch of the Shorter Catechism. On this point, however, nothing approaching to certainty has been attained. After the Catechism had been finished, it was considered and approved by the Assembly in detached portions, and afterwards as a whole. Having been ratified by Parliament, it was laid before the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in July 1648. The deliverance of the Assembly is in these words:—"The General Assembly having seriously considered the Shorter Catechism agreed upon by the Assembly of Divines sitting at Westminster, with the assistance of Commissioners from this Kirk, do find, upon due examination thereof, that the said Catechism is agreeable to the Word of God, and in nothing contrary to the received doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of this Kirk; and, therefore, approve the said Shorter Catechism as a part of the intended uniformity, to be a directory for catechising such as are of weaker capacity." The year following, it was ratified by an act of the Scottish Parliament. And from that time down to the present day it has been in common use, not only among Presbyterians, but among various other bodies of Christians throughout the world. In the Reformed Protestant Churches of Holland the Shorter Catechism is divided into fifty-two sections, one of which is prescribed as the subject of discourse during the afternoon service every Lord's day, so that all the parts of the Catechism may be explained every year. The merits of the Shorter Catechism are universally acknowledged. "Few treatises," says Dr Brewster, "of any description, have undergone more frequent and thorough dissections in regard to its general structure and order,—its particular terms and statements,—its whole form and language. It has been analysed, examined, illustrated, applied in every conceivable way; and, in passing through all these various processes of decomposition and restoration, its substantial excellencies have not only suffered no diminution, but have been rendered more obvious and unquestionable than ever."

CATECHIST, one whose charge is to instruct by questions, or to question the uninstructed concerning religion. The catechists of the ancient Churches were usually ministers, and distinct from the bishops and presbyters; and had their catechumena, or auditories, apart. But they did not constitute any distinct order of the clergy, being chosen out of any order. The bishop himself sometimes performed the office; at other times, presbyters, readers, or deacons. It was his business to expose the folly of the Pagan superstition; to remove prejudices, and answer objections; to discourse on behalf of the Christian doctrines; and to give instruction to those who had not sufficient knowledge to qualify them for baptism. The office of catechist has often been conferred, in the Christian Church, upon plain unlettered Christians, for the purpose of authorizing them to conduct Divine worship in those districts of the country where a regular ministry could not be obtained. The catechist in such a case has uniformly been permitted to do the work of an evangelist, and, by plain and familiar expositions of Divine truth, to instruct the people to the best of his ability, and prepare them for a fuller and more systematic acquaintance with the Bible, by means of the services of a stated ordained pastor.

CATECHUMENS, the lowest order of Christians in the primitive Church. There were four orders of Catechumens:—1. Those taught privately, the exothoumenoi. 2. The audientes, those permitted to attend public preaching. 3. The genu-flectentes, those who in a kneeling posture received imposition of hands. 4. The competentes et electi, those who were immediate candidates for baptism. They were admitted to the state of catechumens in the fourth and fifth centuries, by imposition of hands and the sign of the cross. The children of believing parents were admitted catechumens as soon as ever they were capable of instruction; but at what age those born of heathen parents might be admitted is not so clear. As to the time of their continuance in this state, there was no general rule fixed about it; but the practice varied according to the difference of times and places, and the readiness and proficiency of the catechumens themselves.

The mode of admitting and training catechumens in the primitive Church is thus described by Dr Jamieson:—"The children of Christian parents, being already baptized in their infancy, were admitted to the rank of catechumens as soon as they were susceptible of religious instruction. But as a great proportion of the candidates for admission to the Church consisted, in the primitive ages, of converts from heathenism, that order was generally composed of persons of mature years, and the manner in which they were entered on its lists was as follows:—The moment that a heathen announced his resolution to abandon the religion of his fathers, and to embrace that of Jesus, he was introduced to the pastor of the place, who, having laid his hand upon his head, a ceremony of very frequent use in all the offices of the ancient Church, and prayed that he might become a partaker of the grace of the gospel, consigned him to the care of some missionaries, whose duty it was from time to time to wait upon him privately, and in his own house, to instruct him in the elementary principles of the Christian faith. At an appointed time, and when he had satisfied his private instructors of his capacity to profit by the services of the Church, he was permitted to come into the congregation, where he stood in a particular place appropriated to the hearers,—those who were admitted to hear the Scriptures read, and the plain and simple discourses on the fundamental articles of faith and points of duty,—which always formed the subject of the preliminary exhortations of the Church. If the proficiency and conduct of the catechumen during his continuance in his lower rank were approved of, he was, at a certain period, advanced to a higher order, which was privileged not only to be present at the reading of the Scriptures, and the delivery of the sermons, but also at the prayers, by which the first service was always concluded. After remaining the appointed time in this more advanced stage of his progress, he was successively privileged to be present at the public prayers of the Church, to hear the discourses addressed to the faithful on the higher and more abstruse doctrines of Christianity, and even to witness, at a humble distance, the dispensation of the Lord's Supper. He was then considered ripe for baptism, and immediately put on a new course of discipline, preparatory to partaking of the holy mysteries at the next celebration of the solemnity. Hitherto he had been trained, by a regular course of catechetical instructions in private, to a knowledge of the leading doctrines and duties of the gospel, and now he was subjected to frequent and minute examinations in public on every branch of his religious education. If approved, he was forthwith instructed in some of the sublimer points of Christianity, which had been hitherto withheld from him,—such as the doctrine of the Trinity, the union of the Divine and human natures in Christ, the influences of the Spirit, and the way in which a participation of the symbols of the Saviour's love gives spiritual nourishment to the soul. He was allowed to employ the Lord's Prayer,—the use of which was considered as the exclusive privilege of his adopted children; and was enjoined to commit to memory the Creed, as a formula which embodied, in a small compass, all the grand articles of revealed truth, which it had been the object of his protracted discipline to teach him. For twenty successive days he continued a course of partial fasting, during which he had daily interviews with his minister, who, in private, and secluded from the presence of every other observer, endeavoured, by serious discourse, to impress his mind with a sense of the important step he was about to take,—and more especially, prayed with him, in the usual solemn form, by imposition of hands, that he might be delivered from any evil spirit that had possession of his heart, and be enabled to consecrate himself a living sacrifice to God and the Saviour. Such was the discipline of the catechumens,—a discipline to which all ranks and descriptions of men, who were desirous of being admitted into the bosom of the Church, were, in primitive times, indiscriminately subjected. 'None,' to use the words of Lord King, 'were permitted to enjoy the privileges of the faithful till they had in a manner merited them,—which was, when they had, through a considerable time of trial, manifested the sincerity of their hearts by the sanctity and purity of their lives. When they had changed their manners, and rectified their former habits, then they were washed with the waters of baptism, and not before.'

The Council of Elvira decided that catechumens should be under instruction for a period of two years. For the private instruction of those candidates for baptism, a distinct office was instituted in the Church. At Carthage the duty was devolved, after a period of probation, on some individual who had distinguished himself among the church readers. At Alexandria, where it often happened that men of education applied for admission into the Church, able and learned laymen were selected as catechists.

CATERPILLAR (chasil). The word occurs Deut. xxviii. 38; Ps. lxxviii. 46; Isa. xxxiii. 4; 1 Kings viii. 37; 2 Chron. vi. 28; Joel i. 4, ii. 25. In the four last cited texts it is distinguished from the locust, properly so called; and in Joel i. 4, is mentioned as "eating up" what the other species had left, and therefore might be called the consumer, by way of eminence. But the ancient interpreters are far from being agreed what particular species it signifies. The Septuagint in Chronicles, and Aquila in Psalms, render it brouchos; so the Vulgate in Chronicles and Isaiah, and Jerome in Psalms, bruchus, the chafer, which is a great devourer of leaves. From the Syriac version, however, Michaelis is disposed to understand it as the Gryllotalpa vulgaris ("mole cricket"), which, in its grub state, is very destructive to corn and other vegetables, by feeding on their roots. (See CANKERWORM—LOCUST.) In zoology the name caterpillar is applied to all winged insects, when in their reptile or worm state.

CATHARI, or CATHARISTS (i. e. Puritans), a term applied, in different ages, to persons who distinguished themselves by aiming, or at least professing to aim, at greater purity than the mass of Christians around them. It was especially applied to the Paulicians of the seventh and various following centuries, by way of reproach. They were charged with the errors of the Manichæans, as were, generally, all who separated from the Church of Rome. Speaking of the Cathari of the twelfth century, the learned and excellent Mr Milner says:—"They were plain, unassuming, harmless, and industrious Christians, condemning, by their doctrine and manners, the whole apparatus of the reigning idolatry and superstition, placing true religion in the faith and love of Christ, and retaining a supreme regard for the Divine Word."

CATHEDRAL, the chief church of a diocese; a church wherein is a bishop's see. The word comes from kathedra, "chair." The name seems to have taken its rise from the manner of sitting in the ancient churches or assemblies of private Christians. In these the council,—i. e., the elders and priests,—were called presbyterium; at their head was the bishop, who held the place of chairman,—cathedralis or cathedraticus; and the presbyters, who sat on either side, were also called by the ancient fathers assessores episcoporum. The episcopal authority did not reside in the bishop alone, but in all the presbyters, whereof the bishop was president. A cathedral, therefore, originally was different from what it is now, the Christians, till the time of Constantine, having no liberty to build any temple. By their churches they only meant assemblies; and by cathedrals, nothing more than consistories.

CATHOLIC denotes anything that is universal or general. The rise of heresies induced the primitive Christian Church to assume to itself the appellation of Catholic, being a characteristic to distinguish itself from all sects, who, though they had party names, sometimes sheltered themselves under the name of Christians. The Romish Church now distinguishes itself by Catholic, in opposition to all who have separated from her communion, and whom she considers as heretics and schismatics, and herself alone as the true and Christian Church. In the strict sense of the word, there is no Catholic Church in being; that is, no universal Christian communion, in so far as the outward visible Church is concerned; but the term is strictly applicable to the true Church of Christ, which he hath purchased with his blood, and which includes all sincere believers, to whatever denomination of professing Christians they belong. This is what is meant by the Holy Catholic Church, which is spoken of in the Apostles' Creed.

CATHOLICISM, that liberality of sentiment which arises from an enlarged spirit of Christian philanthropy, and which, passing beyond the limits of a sect, embraces in its affectionate regards and good opinion all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. It is that noble disposition which tends to the broadest and most comprehensive views of Christianity, and of its interests in the world; and which prompts a man to sympathize with every portion of the true Church of Christ, whatever be its denomination or its incidental errors. It is opposed to sectarianism. The term is sometimes used improperly to denote the belief of the Church of Rome.

CATHOLIC or GENERAL EPISTLES. This name is usually applied to seven Epistles, following those of Paul, and bearing the names of James, Peter, Jude, and John. For many centuries they have been called Catholic Epistles, but it is somewhat doubtful on what grounds they have been so named. The term, at all events, is of great antiquity, for Eusebius uses it as a common appellation in the fourth century, and at that period the first Epistle of Peter, and the first Epistle of John, were alone universally received as canonical. The most probable reason for the seven Epistles being called Catholic, appears to us to be that they were not addressed, like Paul's Epistles, to one particular church, city, or individual, but the Christian church generally. This remark, however, is not strictly applicable to all the Epistles usually known by the name of Catholic, for the second and third Epistles of John were undoubtedly written to particular persons. The order in which these Epistles are placed varies in ancient authors, but this arrangement is of little or no importance. They are full of most valuable matter, both of a doctrinal and practical nature, and have ever been highly esteemed by the church of God.

CATTLE. The inhabitants of Palestine, from very early times, were chiefly employed in agriculture and the rearing of cattle. It was, to a great extent, a pasture land. Being a hilly country, and the valleys abounding in rich and fertile soil, the cattle of many parts of Judea were remarkable for their size, strength, and fatness. This was peculiarly the case with the bulls of Bashan, and the cattle on the mountains of Gilead and Carmel. The wealth of the early patriarchs chiefly consisted of cattle. Abraham and Lot seem to have been possessed of immense herds of cattle; and Jacob made a present to his brother Esau of five hundred and eighty head of cattle. Many of the most distinguished persons mentioned in the Old Testament followed the occupation of tending cattle. Moses was a shepherd; Shamgar was taken from his herd to be a judge in Israel, and Gideon from his threshing-floor. Saul and David were both raised from the humble occupation of a shepherd to the throne of Israel.

CAUL. This word occurs in Exod. xxix. 13; Lev. iii. 4, ix. 19, and is explained in the margin of our Bibles to mean the midriff or diaphragm, which separates the pulmonary from the abdominal region of the body. According to the Septuagint and Vulgate, it is to be understood as indicating the great lobe of the liver. In the description of the dress of the Hebrew ladies, given in Isa. iii., we find (ver. 18) mention made of cauls, or, as it is in the margin, net-works, which formed, probably, a portion of the head-dress. The hair being plaited into tresses, which hung down the back, the cauls are supposed to have been folds formed at little intervals by silk threads, with which small ornaments or coins of gold were ingeniously interwoven.

CAUSEWAY. The Hebrew word rendered cause way in 1 Chron. xxvi. 16, 18, means a high road or beaten way. It is probably to some such prepared way that reference is made in Isa. lxii. 10: "Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people." The streets in Asiatic cities are at present, for the most part, only from three to six feet broad. That many of them were formerly much wider, we learn from travellers. Thus, George Herbert tells us, speaking of Persia,— "The most part of the night we rode upon a paved causeway, broad enough for ten horses to go abreast, built by extraordinary labour and expense, over a part of a great desert." Paved streets are now very rarely found in the East, though Professor Jahn tells us that, in the time of Herod, they were by no means uncommon.

CAVES, or CAVERNS. Near the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, the mountains of Palestine form into stupendous and naked piles, abounding with caverns, some of which are so large, that it is said they might contain fifteen hundred men. This is the wilderness of En-ge-di, so celebrated in the early history of David. The place, says Volney, has been "a refuge for vagabonds in all ages." On the north-west of Jerusalem there are some very remarkable caverns, commonly called "The Sepulchres of the Kings." They are thus described by Mr Wylie:—"Their size and magnificence render them not unworthy of being the last earthly home of royalty. A path, cut in the rock, leads down into a large open court, the sides of which are very regularly hewn in the limestone rock. In this court, which is about forty paces square, heaps of sand and earth have accumulated. The west end (Maundrell says the south) is hewn smooth into the form of a portico, the entablature and cornices of which are of exquisite workmanship, being ornamented with flowers and fruit. On the left side of the portico is an entrance, leading into an ante-chamber, of twelve feet square, hewn also in the rock. The door is so obstructed with stones and rubbish, that the visitor can effect an entrance only on his hands and knees. 'But within,' says Maundrell, than whom no one has given a finer description of these interesting tombs, 'you arrive in a large fair room, about seven or eight yards square, cut out of the natural rock. Its sides and ceiling are so exactly square, and its angles so just, that no architect, with levels and plummets, could build a room more regular; and the whole is so firm and entire, that it may be called a chamber hollowed out of one piece of marble. From this room you pass into (I think) six more—one within another, all of the same fabric with the first. Of these the two innermost are deeper than the rest, having a second descent of about six or seven steps into them.'" Modern travellers in the Holy Land mention numerous and large caverns as abounding in the rocks, where robbers are wont to conceal themselves. Caverns have sometimes, among idolatrous nations, been occupied as places of worship, supposed from their gloomy aspect to be well suited for such a purpose. Ezekiel refers to a cavern of this kind, viii. 7-10.

CEASE. To cease from our own works, is to leave off obedience to our will as our rule; forbear resting on our own works as our righteousness before God, and depend on Jesus' fulfilment of the law in our stead, and obey the law as a rule, in the strength of his grace. Heb. iv. 10. He that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin;—he that is held in law as suffering with Christ, is freed from the guilt of sin; he that hath experienced the power of Christ's death on his conscience is ceased from the love and voluntary service of sin; he that has suffered cordially a violent death for Christ's sake, has entirely got rid of sin, his worst burden. 1 Pet. iv. 1. Without ceasing, frequently earnestly. 2 Tim. i. 3; 1 Thess. v. 17.

CEDAR TREE. The cedar is a large and noble evergreen tree. Its lofty height, and its far-extended branches, afford spacious shelter and shade. Ezek. xxxi. 3, 6, 8. The wood is very valuable, is of a reddish colour, of an aromatic smell, and reputed incorruptible. This is owing to its bitter taste, which the worms cannot endure; and to its resin, which preserves it from the injuries of the weather. The temple of Solomon, and his palace at Jerusalem, were built of cedar, and the latter was called "the house of the forest of Lebanon." The tree is much celebrated in Scripture. It is called "the glory of Lebanon." On that mountain it must in former times have flourished in great abundance. There are some cedars still growing there which are prodigiously large. But the travellers who have visited the place within these two or three centuries, and who describe trees of vast size, inform us that their number is diminished greatly; so that, as Isaiah (x. 19) says, "a child may number them." Maundrell measured one of the largest size, and found it to be twelve yards and six inches in girth, and yet sound, and thirty-seven yards in the spread of its boughs. Gabriel Sionita, a very learned Syrian Maronite, who assisted in editing the 'Paris Polyglot,' a man worthy of all credit, thus describes the cedars of Mount Lebanon, which he had examined on the spot:—"The cedar grows on the most elevated part of the mountain, is taller than the pine, and so thick that five men together could scarcely encompass one. It shoots out its branches at ten or twelve feet from the ground; they are large and distant from each other, and are perpetually green. The wood is of a brown colour very solid, and incorruptible if preserved from wet. The tree bears a small cone like that of the pine."

Among the first notices which we have of the cedar in Sacred Scripture, is that in which David, designing to build a temple to the Lord, says to Nathan the prophet, "See, now, I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains." In preparation for the great work in which David purposed to engage, we are informed that "Hiram sent cedar trees to David;" and, in 1 Chron. xxii. 4, it is said that "David prepared cedar trees in abundance." The cedar was often used for building houses; and Jeremiah (xxii. 14) says of Jehoiakim, that his house "is ceiled with cedar, and painted with vermilion." And not in Judea only, but in other countries also, the cedar was used in building. Thus Zephaniah (ii. 14), when speaking of the judgments which were to befall Nineveh, Gaza, and Askelon, says, "Desolation shall be in their thresholds: for He shall uncover the cedar work." This wood seems to have been anciently used, as at the present day, for making chests and wardrobes. Thus Ezekiel (xxvii. 24) remarks of the Tyrians, that their merchants dealt in "blue clothes, and broidered work, and in chests of rich apparel, bound with cords, and made of cedar, among their merchandise." It appears also to have been sometimes the material of which the masts of ships were constructed. Thus Ezekiel (xxvii. 5): "They have made all thy ship-boards of fir trees of

THE CEDARS OF LEBANON.

Senir: they have taken cedars from Lebanon to make masts for thee." So tall, strong, and majestic was the cedar, that it is sometimes introduced to heighten the sublime effect of Hebrew poetry. Hence the Psalmist employs the following language in describing the power of the Almighty, as manifested in a thunder-storm: "The voice of the Lord is upon the waters: the God of glory thundereth: the Lord is upon many waters. The voice of the Lord is powerful; the voice of the Lord is full of majesty. The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars; yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon. He maketh them also to skip like a calf; Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn." Psal. xxix. 3-6.

The cedar of Scripture is the Larix cedrus, or Pinus cedrus of modern botanists. This tree is mentioned upwards of fifty times in the Scriptures. Of recent travellers in Syria, Pliny Fisk may be selected as giving a careful account of the cedar trees in Lebanon at the present day. His description is as follows:—"Taking a guide, we set out for the cedars; in about two hours we came in sight of them, and in another hour reached them. Instead of being on the highest summit of Lebanon, as has sometimes been said, they are situated at the foot of a high mountain in what may be considered as the arena of a vast amphitheatre, opening to the west, with high mountains on the north, south, and east. The cedars stand on five or six gentle elevations, and occupy a spot of ground about three-fourths of a mile in circumference. I walked around it in fifteen minutes. We measured a number of the trees. The largest is upwards of forty feet in circumference. Six or eight others are also very large, several of them nearly the size of the largest. But each of these was manifestly two trees or more, which have grown together, and now form one. They generally separate a few feet from the ground into the original trees. The handsomest and tallest are those of two or three feet in diameter, the body straight, the branches almost horizontal, forming a beautiful cone, and casting a goodly shade. We measured the length of two by the shade, and found each about ninety feet. The largest are not so high, but some of the others, I think, are a little higher. They produce a conical fruit, in shape and size like that of the pine. I counted them, and made the whole number three hundred and eighty-nine. Mr King counted them, omitting the small saplings, and made the number three hundred and twenty-one. I know not why travellers and authors have so long and so generally given twenty-eight, twenty, fifteen, five, as the number of the cedars. It is true, that of those of superior size and antiquity, there are not a great number; but then there is a regular gradation in size, from the largest down to the merest sapling." Lord Lindsay also describes them in nearly similar terms:—"Several of the cedars, all growing promiscuously together, compose this beautiful grove. The younger are very numerous. The second-rate would form a noble wood of themselves, were even the patriarchal dynasty quite extinct. One of them, by no means the largest, measures nineteen feet and a quarter in circumference; and, in repeated instances, two, three, and four large trunks spring from a single root, but they have all a fresher appearance than the patriarchals, and straighter stems—straight as young palm trees. Of the giants, there are seven standing very near each other, all on the same hill; three more a little farther on, nearly in a line with them; and in a second walk of discovery, after my companions had lain down to rest, I had the pleasure of detecting two others low down on the northern edge of the grove. These are the trees (there can be none nobler) which Solomon spake of,—'from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall.'

On the bearing of these cedars on the fulfilment of prophecy, Mr Wylie thus speaks, in his 'Modern Judea Compared with Ancient Prophecy':—"The general condition of the mountain, but especially of its cedars, forms an interesting and striking illustration of the truth of prophecy. In the days of Solomon, these cedars flourished on Lebanon in mighty forests, and grew to an enormous bulk. A thousand generations rose and sank on the plains below; but these unrivalled productions of the vegetable world continued to flourish, and gave promise of a perpetuity almost equal to that of the mountain on which they grew. But against these 'trees of God' were the prophets commissioned to denounce the curse; and on them, at this day, has that curse taken effect. 'The high ones of stature,' said Isaiah (x. 33), addressing himself to Lebanon, 'shall be hewn down.' The same word which swept from the plains of Israel all their beauty—which laid her palaces prostrate in the dust—has smitten also the strength of her cedars; and all that remain at this day of the 'high ones of stature,' which once covered the mountain in magnificent forests, amount only to seven. The old cedars have been gradually decreasing during the past two centuries, till at last they have dwindled down to this insignificant number. There are numerous forests of young cedars on the mountain, but of these we do not speak. We confine our view to those against which the curse was denounced,—the 'high ones of stature.' Belloui, in 1550, counted twenty-eight. Rauwolf, twenty-five years after, found only twenty-four. Maundrell, who visited Lebanon in 1696, saw only sixteen. Burekhardt, in 1810, counted eleven or twelve. Richardson, in 1818, could discover only seven. Lord Lindsay, who visited Lebanon in 1837, confirms the account of Richardson,—'Of the giants,' says he, 'there are seven standing very near each other, all on the same hill.' He tells us, however, that he found other cedars of the same age, to the number of three or four, growing on another part of the hill. The words of the prophet are fulfilled. 'Lebanon is hewn down.' Isa. xxxiii. 9.

"The modern cedars are never allowed to attain any great size; the mountaineers, Elliot informs us, cut them down for 'the sake of their charcoal and tar.' The ancient inhabitants of Judea, as well as the surrounding nations, set a high value on the cedar, on the ground of its important use in architecture; and never could they have anticipated a time when the cedars of Lebanon would be devoted to so ignoble a purpose. Yet such is their fate in modern times,—to be cut down and burned into charcoal. 'Therefore shall the Lord, the Lord of hosts, send among his fat ones leanness; and under his glory he shall kindle a burning like the burning of a fire: and shall consume the glory of his forest.' Isa. x. 16, 18. 'Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars.' Zech. xi. 1.

"The prophet anticipates a time when the cedar should perish from the soil in which it had so long flourished, and the fir tree alone should survive to mourn the fall of its loftier brother: 'Howl, fir tree; for the cedar is fallen.' Zech. xi. 2. In striking accordance with this prediction is the remark of Elliot, who, overlooking the present dwarfish race of cedars, as unworthy of notice, says of Lebanon, 'Almost the only tree it nourishes is the fir.' 'The cedars that were once the glory of Lebanon have deserted it, and are replaced by the large umbrella-topped fir.'"

CEDRON. See KEDRON.

CEILING. In the houses of the fashionable and gay in Oriental countries, the upper part of the wall is adorned with the most ingenious wreathings and devices in stucco and fret-work. The ceiling is generally of wainscot, painted with great art, or else thrown into a variety of pannels, with gilded mouldings. In the days of Jeremiah the chambers seem to have been often ceiled with fragrant and costly wood, and painted with the richest colours. Hence he complains (xxii. 13, 14): "Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbour's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work; that saith, I will build me a wide house and large chambers and cutteth him out windows; and it is ceiled with cedar, and painted with vermilion."

CELESTINS, a religious order, so called from their founder, Peter de Meuron, afterwards raised to the pontificate under the name of Celestin V.

CELIBACY, the state of unmarried persons. Celibate, or celibacy, is a word chiefly used in speaking of the single life of the Popish clergy, or the obligations they are under to abstain from marriage. The Church of Rome imposes a universal celibacy on all her clergy, from the pope to the lowest deacon and subdeacon. The advocates for this usage pretend that a vow of perpetual celibacy was required in the ancient Church as a condition of ordination, even from the earliest apostolic age. But the contrary is evident from numerous examples of bishops and archbishops, who lived in a state of matrimony, without any prejudice to their ordination or their function. Neither our Lord nor his apostles laid the least restraint upon the marriage union,—on the contrary, the Scriptures speak of it as honourable in all, without the least restriction as to persons. Heb. xiii. 4; Matt. xix. 10, 12; 1 Cor. vii. 2, 9. Paul even assigns forbidding to marry as characteristic of the apostasy of the latter times. 1 Tim. iv. 3. The early fathers, without making any distinction between clergy and laity, asserted the lawfulness of the marriage of all Christians. Celibacy was considered a heresy in the times of Irenæus. The first ecclesiastical council that enjoined celibacy of the clergy was that of Eliberis in Spain, in the year 305. The council of Nocesarea, in 314, decreed that every priest who would marry should be degraded. The first council of Nice, which was held in 325, seem to have favoured celibacy, though they passed no decree on the subject. The progress of this heresy was gradual, but it was extensively injurious to morality. The first general prohibition of marriage to the clergy was issued by Pope Siricius in 385. This Papal decision was enforced with rigour, and confirmed by the sanctions of Innocent, Leo, and Gregory, as well as by various successive councils. Compulsory celibacy was unheard of in the Church for three hundred years, except as one of the abominations of Paganism or the dogmas of heresy. Superstitious zeal for a sanetimonious appearance in the clergy seems to have promoted it at first; and crafty policy, armed with power, no doubt rivetted this burden on the sacerdotal order in later periods of the Church. Pope Gregory VII. appears in this business to have had a view to separate the clergy as much as possible from all other interests, and to bring them into a total dependence upon his authority; to the end that all temporal power might, in a high degree, be subjugated to the Papal jurisdiction. Forbidding to marry, therefore, has evidently the mark of the beast upon it. See MARRIAGE.

CELLARS. The same Hebrew word which is rendered, in 1 Chron. xxvii. 28, cellars, is in another verse of the same chapter rendered treasures and store-houses; from which we may conclude, that subterranean vaults are to be understood in both cases, as stores of every kind, and even the richest treasures, were generally deposited under ground.

CELLITES, or "BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF ST ALEXIUS," pious Christians, who, in the early part of the fourteenth century, when the clergy were shamefully negligent in their religious duties, supplied their "lack of service" by visiting the sick and attending funerals. (See LOLLARDS.) They received the name of Cellites from the retired manner in which they lived in cells, and sequestered from the world, though they did not, like the monks, spend their time in idleness, but in the study of divine truth.

CEMETERY. See SEPULCHRE.

CENCHREA, a sea-port belonging to the city of Corinth, in the Archipelago. Though situated on the Saronic gulf, at the distance of nine miles from the city, it was nevertheless considered to be a part of its suburbs. When Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, there seems to have been a Christian church planted in it independent of that which existed in the city of Corinth, for in Rom. xvi. 1, he recommends to their Christian regard at Rome, Phœbe, a deaconess of the church which is in Cenchrea. The apostle embarked from this port on his voyage to Jerusalem, having his hair cut off at Cenchrea in compliance with a vow that he had made. Acts xviii. 18. It is now called Kenkri.

CENSER, a vessel used for burning incense or sacred perfumes, in certain parts of the Hebrew worship. In Lev. xvi. 12 it is thus referred to, "And he shall take a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small, and bring it within the vail." Burning perfumes is often resorted to in Eastern countries, as a mark of honour to a guest. In the Romish Church the censer is still used for burning incense as a part of their sacred ceremonies. The golden censer, the Jews inform us, was only used on the day of expiation, when the high-priest entered the holy of holies, and on other days they offered incense in a brass or copper censer. Incense, in Scripture language, signifies prayer, and this use of the censer by the high-priest has a reference to the mediatorial intercession of our Lord, which He is ever carrying forward in heaven, and by which we have access to God. Hence, in Rev. viii. 3, our blessed Lord is represented as standing at the altar, having a golden censer; referring to his discharge of the work of intercession. It is well worthy of being noticed, that the fire which was to consume the incense must be taken from the altar of burnt-offering; thus showing the intimate and necessary connection between the oblation and the intercession of Christ. His intercession is founded upon his atonement. "The manner of the service of this altar," says Dr Owen, "was briefly thus:—The high-priest, once a-year, namely, on the solemn day of expiation, took a golden censer from this altar: after which, going out of the sanctuary, he put fire into it, taken from the altar of burnt-offerings, without the tabernacle, in the court where the perpetual fire was preserved. Then returning into the holy place, he filled his hands with incense taken from this altar, the place of the residence of the spices; which incense he put upon the fire in the censer, and so entered the holy place with a cloud of the smoke thereof." (See INCENSE). In sacred Scripture there are two words rendered censer in our translation. One is used to denote the censers of Aaron and of Korah and his company. Calmet supposes that this may have properly belonged to the high-priest. The other, which was carried in the hand, may have been an inferior kind of censer, appropriate to the priests, and common to them all. A distinction of the same kind is found in the New Testament. Thus, the twenty-four elders (Rev. v. 8) had golden vials full of odours, but the angel (viii. 2) had a golden censer.

CENSURE, the act of judging and blaming others for their faults. Faithfulness in reproving another differs from censoriousness; the former arises from love to truth, and respect for the person,—the latter is a disposition that loves to find fault. However just censure may be where there is blame, yet a censorious spirit, or rash judging, must be avoided. It is usurping the authority and judgment of God. It is unjust, uncharitable, mischievous, productive of unhappiness to ourselves, and often the cause of disorder and confusion in society.

CENTURIES OF MAGDEBURG, the first comprehensive work of the Protestants on Church History, and so called because it was divided into centuries, each volume containing a hundred years, and was first written at Magdeburg. Matthias Flaccius, better known by the name of Flaccius Illyricus, formed the plan of it in 1552, in order to prove the agreement of the Lutheran doctrine with that of the primitive Christians, and the difference between the latter and that of the Roman Catholics. John Wigand, Matthew Judex, Basil Faber, Andrew Corvinus, and Thomas Holzner, were, after Flaccius, the chief writers and editors. Some Lutheran princes and noblemen patronized it, and many learned men assisted in the work, which was drawn from the original sources with great care and fidelity, compiled with sound judgment, and written in Latin. It was continued by the centuriatores, as the editors were called, only to the year 1300; and was published at Basle, 1559–74, in thirteen volumes, folio. A modern edition, by Baumgarten and Semler, but which reaches only to the year 500, appeared at Nuremberg, 1757–65, in six volumes, quarto. A good abridgment was prepared by Lucas Osiander; the Tübingen edition of which (1607–8) comprehends the period from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century. The Roman Catholics, finding themselves attacked in this alarming way, and confuted by matters of fact, Baronius wrote his Annals, in opposition to the Centuriæ. The mode of arranging Church history into centuries, first introduced by the Magdeburg centuriators, and followed since by Mosheim, is in many respects decidedly objectionable, as not only depriving the history of interest to the reader, but as preventing the writer from exhibiting the true concatenation of events, and their gradual rise out of, and bearing upon, one another. On this subject Dr Welsh very judiciously remarks:—"It is as if we were to study the geology of a country, not by examining continuously the natural position of the strata, but by determining the spaces for observation by concentric circles at the distance of mile-stones."

CENTURION, an officer commanding a hundred soldiers. Matt. viii. 5; Acts x. 1.

CEPHAS, a name given by our Lord to the Apostle Peter. It signifies, in Syriac, which was the vulgar language of the Jews at that time, a stone or rock; which is identical in meaning with the Greek petros. By this appellation our Lord probably intended to point out the firmness and constancy of his faith, and his vigorous activity in building up the church on the true, everlasting foundation,—“the living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God and precious,” as Peter himself describes it.

CERASTES. This, according to Bochart, is the arrow-snake (serpens jaculus), a serpent of the viper kind, which, lurking in the sand and wheel-tracks in the road, unexpectedly bites, not only the traveller, but the animal on which he rides. Dan is compared (Gen. xlix. 17) to a serpent of this kind, intimating that the Danites would be characterised more by artful cunning than by open bravery.

CERDONIANS, a sect which arose in the second century, founded by Cerdon, in the year 140 or 141, and came to Rome from Syria. His disciples espoused most of the opinions of Simon Magus and the Manichæans. They asserted two principles,—good and bad. The first they called the Father of Jesus Christ; the latter, the Creator of the world. They denied the incarnation and the resurrection, and rejected the books of the Old Testament.

CEREMONIAL LAW. See LAW.

CEREMONY, an assemblage of several actions, forms, and circumstances, serving to render a thing magnificent and solemn. Applied to religious observances, it signifies the external rites and manner wherein the ministers of religion perform their sacred functions. In 1646 M. Ponce published a history of ancient ceremonies, tracing the rise, growth, and introduction of each rite into the Church, and its gradual advancement to superstition. Many of them were borrowed from Judaism, but more from Paganism. Dr Middleton has given a fine discourse on the conformity between the Pagan and Popish ceremonies, which he exemplifies in the use of incense, holy water, lamps and candles before the shrines of saints, votive gifts round the shrines of the deceased, &c. In fact, the altars, images, crosses, processions, miracles, and legends; nay, even the very hierarchy, pontificate, religious orders, &c., of the present Romans, he shows, are all copied from their heathen ancestors. An ample and magnificent representation, in figures, of the religious ceremonies and customs of all nations in the world, designed by Picart, is added, with historical explanations, and many curious dissertations.

It has been a question, whether we ought to use such rites and ceremonies as are merely of human appointment. On the one side it has been observed, that the desire of reducing religious worship to the greatest possible simplicity, however rational it may appear in itself, and abstractedly considered, will be considerably moderated in such as bestow a moment's attention upon the imperfection and infirmities of human nature in its present state. Mankind, generally speaking, have too little elevation of mind to be much affected with those forms and methods of worship in which there is nothing striking to the outward senses. But to this the reply is plain,—That Christ alone is king in his Church; he hath instituted such ordinances and forms of worship as he hath judged fit and necessary; and to add to them seems, at least, to carry in it an imputation on his wisdom and authority, and hath this unanswerable objection to it, that it opens the door to a thousand innovations (as the history of the Church of Rome hath sufficiently shown), which are not only indifferent in themselves, but highly absurd, and extremely detrimental to religion. That the ceremonies were numerous under the Old Testament dispensation is no argument; for, we reply,—1. We respect Jewish ceremonies, because they were appointed of God; and we reject human ceremonies, because God hath not appointed them. 2. The Jewish ceremonies were established by the universal consent of the nation; human ceremonies are not so. 3. The former were fit and proper for the purposes for which they were appointed; but the latter are often the contrary. 4. The Institutor of the Jewish ceremonies provided for the expense of them; but no provision is made by God to support human ceremonies, or what he has not appointed.

CERINTHUS, one of the earliest heretics, by birth a Jew, who, after having studied philosophy in Egypt went into Asia Minor, where he disseminated his erroneous doctrines.

CERINTHIANS, the followers of Cerinthus, who maintained the heretical opinions of their leader. A brief sketch of the peculiar tenets held by these early heretics is thus given by Dr Neander, in his 'History of the Planting and Training of the Christian Church by the Apostles':—"The Judaizing Gnosis found its representative in Cerinthus, who forms the transition both from the common, stiff, carnal Judaism to Gnosticism, and from the common limited Jewish mode of thinking, which retained only the human in Christ, to the Gnostic which acknowledged only the Divine in him,—only the ideal Christ. He agreed also with the common Jewish view of the Messiah in this respect, that he considered Jesus as a mere man, that he denied the original indwelling of the Divine Being in him, and treated the entrance of the Divine into his life as something sudden, by which, at his solemn inauguration, he was made capable of discharging his calling as the Messiah. But Cerinthus differed from the common Jewish notions, that, in place of a peculiar inworking of the Divine power, by which the man Jesus was fitted for his Messianic office, he supposed a new animation by the highest Spirit emanating from God, and forming the connection between God and the Creation,—the Divine Logos. This Spirit, representing itself to sensible appearance under the form of a dove, as a usual symbol of the Divine Spirit, had settled upon him at his baptism; he had revealed through him the hidden Supreme God, the knowledge of whom among the Jews had been the privilege of only a small number of enlightened persons; through him he had performed miracles; but before the last sufferings of Jesus, he had withdrawn from him, and left him to himself. Cerinthus, in this manner, held no original and indissoluble unity between the Logos (the Messiah and Redeemer in a special sense) and the humanity of Jesus, but only a transient relation, a connection suddenly formed and as suddenly dissolved, and thus he granted only a very subordinate place to the purely human in Christ. According to this view, the man Jesus was only an accidental vehicle, of which the redeeming Spirit, the Logos, made use, in order to be able to reveal himself in humanity; could the Logos, without this medium, have made himself cognizable and perceptible to men, he would not have made use of such an organ as the man Jesus. From the same tendency, but more coarsely conceived, proceeded another view, according to which it was believed, that a revelation of the Logos might be made in humanity without any such mediation through a human being, which it was wished to supersede. In place of the real human appearance of Christ, only a semblance, a phantom, was substituted, in which the Logos was enshrined. Everything that came under the notice of the senses was explained as only a phantom, an optical illusion, of which the higher ethereal Being, who, from his nature, could not be perceptible to the senses, made use, that he might manifest himself to sensuous mortals. A theory which already had been used for the explanation of Theophanies and Angelophanies of the Old Testament, was applied by those who held these views to the appearance and life of Christ. At his transfiguration, said they, Christ manifested himself without that sensible appearance to his disciples, who were rendered for the time capable of beholding him in his true ethereal form."

CESAR, the name assumed by, or conferred upon, all the Roman emperors after Julius Cesar. In the New Testament, the reigning emperor is generally called Cesar, omitting any other name which might belong to him. Christ calls the Emperor Tiberius simply Cesar (Matt. xxii. 21); and Paul thus mentions Nero,—"I appeal to Cesar."

CESAREA, in Palestine, formerly called Strato's Tower, was situated on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean, and had a fine harbour. It is reckoned to be thirty-six miles south of Acre, thirty north of Jaffa, and eighty north-west of Jerusalem. Cesarea is frequently spoken of in the New Testament. It was here that Cornelius the centurion resided, who, with his whole family, were baptized by the Apostle Peter. Acts x. In this place Herod, for his pride, presumption, and cruelty, was cut off by the judgment of God. Acts xii. 23. Here the Apostle Paul was a prisoner during the space of two years, in the course of which a Christian church was planted in the city, which continued till the seventh century. When Cesarea is spoken of in the New Testament, without the addition of Philippi, this Cesarea is to be uniformly understood.

This port was called Sebastos; that is, Augustus. The city itself was made a colony by Vespasian, and is described on its medals as, COLONIA PRIMA FLAVIÆ AUGUSTÆ CESAREA,—Cesarca, the first colony of the Flavian (or Vespasian) family. Cesarea, or what remains of it, is now called Kasariah. "At the present moment," says Mr Buckingham, "the whole of the surrounding country is a sandy desert toward the land; the waves wash the ruins of the moles, the towers, and the part towards the sea; and not a creature resides within many miles of this silent desolation." Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian, was a native of this place.

CESAREA PHILIPPI, a city situated at the foot of Mount Panias, near the springs of the river Jordan. Mark viii. 27. This city, which was originally called Panias, is now called Banias, and supposed to be not only the Cesarea Philippi of the Romans, but identical with the Laish or Dan of the Jews. Eusebius and Jerome, however, assert that the two, far from being identical, were four miles asunder. The city was much enlarged and adorned by Philip the Tetrarch, and was named by him Cesarea, in honour of Tiberius, and Philippi, to distinguish it from Cesarea of Palestine. It was still farther improved by the liberality of King Agrippa. Baniās, when visited by Burckhardt, contained about 150 houses, inhabited chiefly by Turks, with a few Greeks and Druses. The neighbourhood is very beautiful, richly wooded, and abounding with game. The goddess Astarte was worshipped in this city, as appears from medals extant. After the time of Constantine the Great, the city became the seat of a bishop, under the patriarch of Antioch. It suffered much in the time of the crusades. The ruins of what is called the castle of Baniās, which seems to have been erected during the time of the crusades, are situated on the summit of the mountain, and exhibit a wall of ten feet thick, by which the fortress was surrounded. On the south of the village are the ruins of another strong castle, several of the towers of which are still standing.

CESTERTIANS, an order of monks, founded in the ninth century, by St Robert, abbot of Molême, but who, after some time, became so far relaxed in their discipline, that the founder himself forsook them, till ordered by the pope to return and resume his government.

CETUBIM. See HAGIOGRAPHIA.

CHAFF, the refuse of winnowed corn. The ungodly are represented as the chaff; a simile most forcible and appropriate. Whatever defence they may afford to the saints, who are the wheat, they are in themselves worthless and inconstant, easily driven about with false doctrines, and will ultimately be driven away by the blast of God's wrath. Psal. i. 4; Matt. iii. 12, &c. False doctrines are called chaff; they are unproductive, and cannot abide the trial of the Word and Spirit of God. Jer. xxiii. 28. It was the custom in the East, after winnowing the corn, to burn the chaff. To this practice, there is an obvious allusion in Isa. v. 24; Matt. iii. 12.

CHAIN. With chains idols were fixed in their shrines (Isa. xl. 19), and criminals in their prison or servitude. Jer. lii. 11; Acts xii. 6. Pride is a chain which keeps men under its power; and by a discovery of it in their conduct, they use it as if ornamental to them. Psal. lxxiii. 6. Chains of gold were worn as ornaments of the neck. Gen. xli. 42. God's law is a chain; it restrains from sinful liberty; is uneasy to corrupt men; and is a great ornament to the saints who obey it. Prov. x. 9. Chains are mentioned as part of the ornaments worn by Hebrew ladies in the time of Isaiah (iii. 19). These were twisted chains of gold, that were wound in large rows round the neck, and rested on the bosom. In Oriental countries, also, the high functionaries of State wore a chain of gold round their neck. This was one of the symbols of authority in the court of Pharaoh, as we find from Gen. xli. 42: "And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck." We find an incident of the same kind recorded in Dan. v. 29: "Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with scarlet, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and made a proclamation concerning him, that he should be the third ruler in the kingdom."

CHALCEDONY. It occurs in Rev. xxi. 19, as one of the precious stones which garnished the foundations of the wall of the New Jerusalem. It is a species of uncrystallized quartz, found of every shade of colour, and nearly allied to AGATE (which see). The stone is supposed to have derived its name from Chalcedon, a city opposite to Constantinople, where it was first discovered. Some suppose it to be the stone translated emerald in Exod. xxviii. 18.

CHALDEA, or BABYLONIA, the country lying on both sides of the Euphrates, of which Babylon was the capital; and extending southwards to the Persian Gulf, and northwards into Mesopotamia, at least as far as Ur, which is called Ur of the Chaldees. This country had also the name of Shinar. See BABYLON.

CHALDEANS, in a more extended sense, the inhabitants of Babylonia generally; but in a more correct and restricted sense, their priests and philosophers, who chiefly resided in that part of the country next to Arabia Deserta, and which was, therefore, called "the Land of the Chaldeans," or Chasdim, as it is in the Hebrew, and is said to have received its name from Chesed, the fourth son of Nahor. The Chaldeans (thus understood) were astronomers, astrologers, and soothsayers. They boast, like the Chinese, of their extraordinary antiquity and early science, pretending to carry back their astronomical observations, according to Cicero, four hundred and seventy thousand years; or, according to Epigenes, in Pliny, seven hundred and twenty thousand years; which, even supposing their years to be only months, extend much further back than the creation of our world; but no probable method of calculation will give them a higher antiquity than two thousand years before the Christian era, which was soon after the foundation of the Assyrian monarchy. These Chaldeans were not only astronomers and astrologers, but, in pursuance of the latter profession, were diviners and soothsayers, professing to predict events, to interpret dreams, and, in short, laying claim to all the science and learning of the East.

CHALDEAN PHILOSOPHY. The following rapid but faithful sketch of this ancient philosophy, is given by Dr Henry in his 'Epitome of the History of Philosophy,' translated from the French:—"There existed in Chaldea a sacerdotal corporation, the depository of science, like the Magi of Persia. A conflict arose between these two rival corporations, and, when Babylonia passed under the yoke of Persian dominion, the Magi oppressed the college of Chaldean priests, and probably attempted to destroy it. It survived, however, or, at least, relics of it subsisted a long time afterward, since we meet with them at the period of the conquests of Alexander. But these persecutions must have compelled the learned order in Chaldea to cover their doctrines more and more with the veil of mystery.

"God, the source of being; a primitive chaos, which was nothing but darkness and water; a humid matter containing monstrous animals; nature in this original state personified under the emblem of a woman named Omorca; God appearing in the bosom of chaos, dividing the body of the primordial woman, or nature, in order to form out of one half heaven, and out of the other half earth; producing the light which destroys the monsters, children of chaos; then causing the disorder of the elements represented by these monsters to give place to order and regularity; and, finally, from his own blood and that of inferior deities mixed with earth, creating the souls of men and animals, which are thus of divine origin, while the celestial and terrestrial bodies are formed from the substance of Omorca, or from the material substance; this whole assemblage of ideas, the basis of which is evidently in primitive tradition, bears no token of philosophical reflection." Such were the strange and confused notions of the ancient philosophers of Chaldea.

"But in another relation the doctrines of the Chaldeans reveal, in the midst of the sacerdotal corporation, a scientific direction which was peculiar to it. The observation of astronomical facts was connected in their minds with a theoretical idea, according to which the events of the lower or human world depended upon the motions of the superior or celestial world.

"The astrological philosophy of the Chaldeans is in contrast with the doctrines both of India and Persia. Brahminism, preoccupied almost exclusively with the idea of the infinite, fell into idealism. Persian Magism divided its meditations between the spiritual and the material world. The Chaldeans gave themselves up, above all, to the study of the material part of creation, and particularly to the phenomena of the heavens. In the two other philosophies, spirit was conceived as predominant over matter; an inverse predominance is perceptible in the Chaldee philosophy, which in this respect contained the elements of fatalism and materialism.

"There were in Chaldea various sects. There was also a conflict of doctrines, and, consequently, to some extent, a philosophical movement. But history has not preserved the records which would determine its nature and direction. We are therefore in almost total ignorance as to the real character of this philosophy."

CHALDEE LANGUAGE, a dialect of the ARAMEAN (which see), and acquired by the Jews during their captivity in Babylon. From this time, it gradually superseded the Hebrew as a spoken language, and became converted into the Syro-Chaldaic, which was spoken in Judea in the time of our Lord. The Targums and the Talmud of Babylon are in the older Chaldee; and a Syro-Chaldaic translation of the New Testament has been discovered to be still in existence. The Chaldee, being the spoken language of the Jews in Jerusalem and Judea in the time of our Lord, there are numerous Chaldee as well as Syriac words and phrases in the New Testament. This, indeed, may be considered as a proof of its genuineness and authenticity, for were it free from such idioms, "we might naturally conclude," to use the language of Michaelis, "that it was not written either by men of Galilee or Judea, and therefore was spurious; for, as certainly as the speech of Peter betrayed him to be a Galilean when Christ stood before the Jewish tribunal, so certainly must the written language of a man born, educated, and grown old in Galilee, discover marks of his native idiom, unless we assume the absurd hypothesis that God hath interposed a miracle, which would have deprived the New Testament of one of its strongest proofs of authenticity."

CHALDEE PARAPHRASE. See TARGUM.

CHALICE, the cup used to administer the wine in the sacrament, and by the Roman Catholics in the mass. The use of the chalice, or communicating in both kinds, is by the Church of Rome denied to the laity, who communicate only in one kind, the clergy alone being allowed the privilege of communicating in both kinds, in direct opposition to our Saviour's words,—"Drink ye all of it."

CHALMERS, THOMAS, D.D., LL.D. This distinguished divine and truly great man was born on the 17th of March 1780, at Easter Anstruther, a small town on the coast of Fife. His parents, who were in the middle rank of life, were remarkable for their piety and strict integrity, watching over their children's early training with the utmost anxiety and care. In even early boyhood Thomas seems to have given peculiar indications of intellectual superiority, and was noticed amongst all his playmates as a singularly generous, cheerful, and kind-hearted boy. Such was the rapidity of his progress at school, that at the early age of eleven, he was entered a student at the University of St Andrews. In the early part of his college course, he was, by his own account, indolent and careless, having no great taste for the acquisition of languages; but on reaching the mathematical class he speedily exhibited signs of decided genius. Throughout life, indeed, he was peculiarly attached to the study of the exact and experimental sciences. To these he was enthusiastically devoted, and in even the most abstruse and recondite departments of these sciences he was profoundly versed. This tendency of his mind developed itself very strongly in his college course. Both in the mathematical and natural philosophy classes he was regarded as a distinguished student. During his attendance at the theological classes, his mind was chiefly occupied with his favourite sciences; and, in consequence, his time was devoted to the study of secular, to the almost total neglect of sacred, science.

From the very early period at which young Chalmers had entered college, his curriculum, both literary and theological, was completed when he was only in his nineteenth year. On presenting himself, therefore, for licence, to the Presbytery of St Andrews, some difficulty was felt about the propriety of proceeding with his trials, the statutory age being twenty-one. On searching, however, among some old acts of Assembly, it was discovered that an exception was allowed to be made, in the case of what was quaintly termed, "a lad of pregnant parts." That such a description, if applicable to any man, was applicable to Chalmers, none could doubt; and, without further hesitation, he was licensed to preach the gospel in 1799. His first sermon he preached in an Independent chapel at Wigan, in Lancashire. In a short time he became assistant minister in the parish of Cavers, in Roxburghshire; and having been presented, by the United College of St Andrews, to the parish of Kilmany, in Fifeshire, he was ordained minister of that parish in 1803.

For several years did he continue to officiate as a minister of Christ, without any deep impression of the responsibility of his office. The peculiar duties of the pastoral office occupied, accordingly, with him a mere secondary place; and much of his time was spent in giving lectures on mathematics, chemistry, and botany, in St Andrews, Cupar, and other towns. Nay, so little did he think of the paramount and all-engrossing claims which the duties of the sacred ministry had upon him, that a short time after his appointment to the pastoral charge of Kilmany, he actually offered himself as a candidate for the professorship of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh, declaring, in a pamphlet which he published at the time, that "after the satisfactory discharge of his parish duties, a minister might enjoy five days in the week of uninterrupted leisure, for the prosecution of any science in which his taste might dispose him to engage." Such were the views which Dr Chalmers then held, of the duties of a minister of the Lord Jesus. What a contrast to the impressions of his after life!

Somewhere about the year 1809 he was requested to write the article "Christianity," for the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia," conducted by Dr, now Sir David Brewster. He was thus under the necessity of studying the evidences of Christianity with considerable minuteness and care. While thus engaged, he was led to peruse Wilberforce's "Practical View of Christianity;" and, by the blessing of God, his views of divine truth underwent a remarkable change. Providentially also, at this period, he was visited with severe personal affliction, in consequence of which he was laid aside for a time from duty, and left to solitude and reflection. With God's hand thus laid upon his body, and God's Spirit imparted to his soul, Chalmers became a new man in Christ Jesus. He came forth among his people no longer to proclaim simply the moralities, and decencies, and charities of life, but as a faithful ambassador of Christ, beseeching his parishioners, in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God. The change was apparent to all; and with that honesty and transparent candour, which were prominent features of his character, he confessed that he had been living and preaching hitherto in ignorance and error, and was resolved henceforth to know nothing among his people but Christ, and him crucified. Crowds now waited on his ministry, flocking from all the surrounding parishes, to listen to his faithful proclamation of the gospel of Christ. And it is not a little remarkable, that, although hitherto his ministry appeared to be without fruit, no sooner did he begin to feel the power of the truth on his own soul than his ministry was obviously blessed, and souls were, through his instrumentality, won to Christ. This was a striking testimony to the necessity of a converted ministry.

On any man saving grace effects a decided change; but in the case of Dr Chalmers, the change seems to have powerfully affected his intellectual no less than his moral and spiritual nature. He had been known, from early days, as a man of talent, but his mental character, sanctified by the illuminating power of the Spirit, assumed a grandeur and an effectiveness which had never been seen to be attached to it before. He was now the unwearied and pains-taking minister, the powerful advocate of missions to the heathen abroad, and the enthusiastic promoter of every good cause at home.

Such a man as Chalmers was not likely to remain long in so limited a sphere as Kilmany. In 1814, a vacancy having taken place in the Tron Church of Glasgow, he was solicited to accept of that important charge. This was the commencement of a new era in the life of this remarkable man. He was now about to occupy a most conspicuous position, not only in Glasgow, but in the Church at large. And the period at which he entered on his new charge, July 1815, was one of peculiar interest and importance. The wars arising out of the first French Revolution had come to a close, and peace was restored both to Britain and the Continental nations. Men's minds were quieted for a time, and they found leisure to devote themselves to home improvements. This was just the period when a master spirit like Chalmers was needed in such a town as Glasgow. Its population had far outgrown the means of spiritual instruction, and vast masses of its busy working population were living in habitual neglect of religious ordinances. No sooner had he been inducted, accordingly, into the Tron Church, than he set himself to devise means for raising the moral character and spiritual condition of the humbler classes in his extensive parish. His fame, as a preacher, spread far and wide. Eager crowds hung upon his lips from Sabbath to Sabbath; but his week-day ministrations from house to house were peculiarly acceptable and useful. He soon began to project extensive plans of social improvement. In 1817, he proposed, in a public sermon, the erection of twenty churches in Glasgow, with the view of, in some measure, overtaking its spiritual destitution. His views on pauperism had been published some years before, and now he longed for an opportunity of carrying out these views, and of thus exhibiting, by experiment, before the world, their practicability and soundness. This opportunity, in the providence of God, was at length afforded him. A new church, St John's, was built in the eastern part of Glasgow, and a parish attached to it. To this new sphere of operation, Dr Chalmers was transferred in 1819, and here he found a ready and congenial field for carrying on his long cherished plans of social regeneration. The population of the parish assigned him was upwards of 10,000, consisting chiefly of the humbler classes of society. To enable him to overtake this extensive charge, he summoned into operation a large and intelligent agency, dividing the parish into twenty-five sections, and placing a deacon over each of these sections, whose office it was to use all the means in his power for advancing the social comfort and the moral and spiritual well-being of the families under his charge. To meet the expenses of the economical management of the entire parish, the collections at the church door on Sabbath were in a short time found to be more than adequate, and the surplus was dedicated to educational and other parochial means of improvement. Day-schools were erected, Sabbath-evening schools were opened, throughout the whole parish. The deacons made themselves minutely acquainted with the situation, in all respects, of each individual family; and, besides, the elders visited the whole district once a month. And thus the parish of St John's was brought under so complete and effective an agency, that it exhibited the best, if not the only, instance in Scotland of a well-arranged and admirably working parochial machinery. The nature of the system is minutely developed in his "Christian and Civic Economy of Large Towns."

While in Glasgow, thus engaged in the management of a complicated parochial system, Dr Chalmers found time to prepare for the pulpit, and afterwards to publish, his well-known "Astronomical Discourses." This at once established his fame as a pulpit orator of the first order. These were followed by the "Tron Church Sermons," the "Commercial Discourses," and those preached in St John's, besides a number of valuable Introductory Essays prefixed to Collins' Edition of Select Religious Works.

In 1823, Dr Chalmers was invited to accept of the chair of moral philosophy in St Andrews. The loss of such a man was great to Glasgow, but the gain was probably much greater to the cause of Christ, and to the world. Hitherto moral science had been treated as altogether unconnected with the grand peculiar truths of the Bible. At the time when Dr Chalmers studied at college, he tells us "St Andrews was overrun with Moderatism, under the chilling influences of which we all inhaled, not a distaste only, but a positive contempt for all that is properly and peculiarly gospel, insomuch that our confidence was nearly as entire in the sufficiency of natural theology as in the sufficiency of natural science." When he returned, twenty-one years after the time to which that melancholy description refers, matters were somewhat changed, but still far from being in a state which was at all accordant with his own views and wishes. Moral philosophy in his hands became a preliminary part of theological science. His course was in reality a system of Christian ethics, to which he added a course of political economy. The result was, the students who came from distant parts of the country to wait upon his prelections imbibed, many of them, a regard for evangelical truth, and such clear views of the bearing and connection of its parts, that it is impossible to calculate the amount of beneficial influence which flowed from his labours. And not only by his public lectures, but by his private conferences with his students, did he effect much, under the blessing of God, in impressing their minds and hearts with a devoted attachment to the cause of Christ. Hence there are not a few who can trace back the first decided impulse of their minds in favour of the truth of God, to the public and private teaching of Dr Chalmers at St Andrews.

While thus peacefully prosecuting a highly useful career, this eminent man was summoned to occupy the chair of theology in the University of Edinburgh. This was a still higher and a still more extended sphere of usefulness, and, far from being inconsistent with, naturally followed up, the course of instruction he had pursued at St Andrews. Commencing with the actual state of man as a depraved and undone sinner, he brought out the principles of the scheme of redemption with a clearness and a power which at once convinced the mind and impressed the heart. Few men have been better fitted to train the ardent minds of young students to an accurate, logical, and, at the same time, heart-affecting, view of divine truth. His arguments were powerful, his reasoning was clear, but the enthusiasm with which he showed the bearing of truth upon the mind, and heart, and conscience of the human being, formed the charm of his theological teaching. The soul of the student responded to the mind of the teacher, and the consequence was, that the young men studying theology under his tuition became at once devoted to their professor, and warmly interested in that all-important department of knowledge. Thus were they trained, under the providence of God, for that eventful crisis in the history of the Church of Scotland which was now approaching.

For several years previous to the period at which we have now arrived in the life of Dr Chalmers, the Evangelical party had been increasing in strength, under the able leadership of Dr Andrew Thomson. Many a keen contest was maintained between them and their opponents, the Moderate party, both in the supreme and the inferior judicatories of the Church. And outside the Church, the public mind had been stirred to its very depths, first by the Apocrypha and then the Voluntary controversy. At length, in 1832, the subject of the calling of ministers was brought before the General Assembly, with the view of securing for the people the power of preventing the settlement of unacceptable ministers. The motion for a committee on the subject was refused by a majority of forty-two. The following year, Dr Chalmers moved what is called the Veto Law, which was lost by the small majority of twelve. The same motion was proposed anew in 1834, by Lord Moncrieff, and carried by a majority of forty-six. In the course of the same Assembly, the ministers of chapels of ease were admitted to the same constitutional privileges with parish ministers, in all that regarded spiritual matters. A standing committee also, on Church extension, was appointed, of which Dr Chalmers was nominated convener; and so successful was he in accomplishing the important objects of this committee, that in the course of five years he was able to report the erection of two hundred additional churches.

The veto became a law of the Church in 1835, and for some years seemed to work well. But at length the presentee of Lord Kinroull to the parish of Auchterarder was rejected by the presbytery, on the dissent of the people; and an action having been raised in the Court of Session, the presbytery was ordered to proceed with the settlement, under the authority of the civil courts. The General Assembly of 1838 having the Auchterarder case brought before them, while it admitted the authority of the civil courts in all things civil, maintained, in the strongest language, the independence of the Church in all things spiritual. The judgment of the Court of Session was affirmed by the House of Lords. It was now plain, that, in so far as the courts of law were concerned, not only was the veto law pronounced illegal, but the power of acting independently, in her strictly spiritual capacity, was denied to the Church. Only one step, therefore, remained for the Church, and that was, to make a distinct appeal to the government of the country, with the view of ascertaining whether such decisions of the law courts were to be understood as sanctioned. A solemn deed was accordingly drawn up by the General Assembly of 1842, embodying the claims of the Church, as warranted by the Word of God, as secured by the enactments of the State, and as enjoyed during the past periods of the Church's history; and along with these, a statement of the grievous encroachments which had been recently made by the courts of law, asking redress of the government, and solemnly declaring, that, be the consequences what they might, the Church could not depart from her claims, nor submit to the encroachments enumerated. A system of intrigues now commenced, with the design of prevailing upon the leaders of the independent party to quit the high ground which they had taken, in laying before the government the solemn deed now referred to. At no period of the life of Dr Chalmers did he exhibit more of that inflexible integrity and genuine nobleness of character which characterized the man. Matters were now evidently approaching a crisis. A convocation of ministers and elders understood to be favourable to the Church's claims was held for a series of days in Edinburgh, that they might confer together as to their future plans and prospects. It was at one of these meetings that Dr Chalmers developed his sagacious and far-seeing plan for the sustentation of a gospel ministry all over Scotland. Many of the brethren doubted, and some disbelieved, the practicability of the plan; but the event has proved the wisdom of its distinguished framer. In January 1843, the refusal of the government to interfere with the decisions of the law courts was received, and in March of the same year, the House of Commons refused to grant even a committee to consider the Church's claims. A disruption was now inevitable; and Dr Chalmers, strong in faith, went cheerfully forward with the arrangements necessary in view of that dilemma. The 18th of May arrived, and this noble-minded man was one of the first to go forth from the Establishment, and, in the firm maintenance of what he believed an important scriptural principle, to cast his worldly emoluments to the winds.

Dr Chalmers was elected the first moderator of the Free Church, and from that hour to his dying day, he devoted his whole energies to the advancement of its best interests. He was appointed Principal of the New College, and Primarius Professor of Divinity. As convener of the Sustentation Fund, he watched over that important scheme, which he himself had originated. During the four years which he lived after the Disruption, he saw the fund improve far beyond his most sanguine expectations. The Free Church had assumed the aspect of a settled institution. Upwards of seven hundred churches were built. Five hundred schools were in course of erection. Nearly a million and a half of money had been raised for the purposes of the Church.

The career of this great and good man was now near its close. He was summoned to give evidence before a committee of the House of Commons, on the subject of sites for churches. That evidence was full, clear, and distinct, as to the point in question, but more especially as to the principles of the Free Church, and, from the period at which it was given, may be regarded as his dying testimony to those great principles for which he had sacrificed so much. This happened early in May 1847. He reached home on Friday the 28th, in apparent good health and spirits. He spent the Sabbath with even more than his wonted calmness and devotional feeling. He retired to rest; but in the morning it was found that the spirit had fled, and Chalmers was now with God. It was indeed the fall of a standard-bearer in Israel. Not the Free Church only, but the whole Christian Church throughout the world, mourned his loss. He was the man of an age. Alongside the names of Luther, Calvin, and Knox, will henceforth be ranged the name of Thomas Chalmers.

Funeral sermons were preached from many pulpits on the occasion of his death. From one of these we extract the following reflections by one belonging to another section of the Church of Christ :—

“The thoughts which the withdrawal of such a man excites are necessarily, in the first instance, of a pensive, if not painful, cast. One cannot but feel how much has been thereby lost to the Church and to the world. The mind is led painfully to reflect how much less of moral power, and worth, and attractiveness, there is in the world, than but a few weeks ago it possessed. One feels sad to think, that when earth has so few lights illuminating its murky atmosphere, there is now one fewer than there was—and that a luminary which shone pre-eminently from the purity of its lustre. It is as if a prisoner, whilst gazing from the window of his cell on some narrow strip of sky, on which glittered a few friendly stars, beheld some envious vapours creep slowly along, quenching light after light, until they had spread a funeral pall over the entire range of his vision, and left him nothing to gaze on but vacancy and gloom.

“But to these succeed, in the mind of the Christian, thoughts of a more cheering character. He will presently remember with delight, that what is thus lost to earth, is gained to heaven. The light has but changed its place, not forfeited its radiance. The hand of death has not extinguished it, but has only carried it to another apartment, where it stands on a loftier pedestal, and diffuses a wider glory. ‘Heaven,’ as

Mr Hall finely expresses it, ‘is attracting to itself whatever is congenial to its nature, enriching itself by the spoils of earth, and collecting within its capacious bosom whatever is pure, permanent, and divine. Oh! that it may be given to us who remain behind, rightly to improve the lesson which is thus once more addressed to us, that, loosening ourselves from the ties which bind us to the world, we may aspire with a holier fervour, and ascend with a steadier flight, to that land of life where all that is truly good, and great, and lovely, shall at last be found.

“Nor let us forget that we have cause of devout thankfulness to God for his grace in having permitted this bright and shining light so long to tarry among us. Let us glorify the grace of God which was so conspicuously displayed in him. Let us rejoice in the great works he was honoured to accomplish, and the weighty lessons which his life unfolds. Let us hear him, though dead, yet speaking to us—no longer, it is true, with the eloquence of the living voice, but with the still more solemn and touching eloquence of his remembered excellences. Let us learn this at least from his example, how much one man may do by conscientiously, devotedly, and perseveringly consecrating his talents and energies to works of usefulness and virtue; and this, too, let us learn, that it is not genius, not intellect, not power, but love, and goodness, and piety, that constitute the chief glory and worth of man! Oh! ye men of literature and science—ye votaries of wisdom and benevolence—ye senators, and sages, and philosophers! would that we could gather you around the tomb of this man, in whose genius ye delighted, and to whose greatness ye did homage, and there persuade you to listen to the lesson that issues thence, enforced by the whole course of his life, and which proclaims to you that all your science, and all your philosophy, and all your philanthropy, apart from love to God, and faith in a crucified Redeemer, will prove but the idle day-dreams of a visionary enthusiasm, which shall melt, and perish, and be forgotten for ever.

“And was there not something in the manner of his death that speaks to every one a monitory lesson? Does not that sudden call—that unwitnessed translation by which he passed into the presence of the Judge—say loudly to all, ‘Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might?’ How suddenly, how unexpectedly, was he removed from earth! In the midst of his work—in apparently unbroken health—with all his powers, both of mind and body, entire—cut down in a moment, like some stately oak which at evening is seen casting its shadow afar across the sward, but when the morning dawns, is found dismantled of its foliage, and stretched upon the soil. What a call to earnestness, to diligence, to preparation, to prayer!”

The death of this illustrious man having occurred during the sitting of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, that body passed the following act regarding the event :—

“The General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland deem themselves called upon to record their deep sense of the magnitude of the loss which this Church, and not this Church only, but the Church of Christ, and the cause of true religion and philanthropy, have sustained, in the sudden and most striking dispensation of God’s providence, which has removed Dr Thomas Chalmers, Principal and Professor of Theology in the New College, from the service of the Church on earth, to the exercises of the sanctuary above. They are deeply grateful to the Author of every good and perfect gift for the extraordinary combination of gifts and graces with which He endowed their revered father, the unceasing and unwearied energy with which God enabled him to devote his great powers to the highest and noblest objects, and the large measure of success with which his labours, in many various departments of usefulness, were crowned. This Church must ever regard it as a signal token of the favour of the Head of the Church, and as a loud call to gratitude, humility, and activity, that she has so long enjoyed the services of this great man in preaching the gospel of the grace of God, in expounding the doctrines of the Christian revelation, in instructing candidates for the ministry, in developing and applying great principles fitted to promote the spiritual, moral, and social welfare of the world, and in enforcing all the lessons which he taught, both by his personal deportment and his public labours.

"They can never forget that this eminent servant of God guided and directed this Church in the eventful contest which preceded her Disruption from the ecclesiastical Establishment of Scotland, and, when that event became inevitable, devised and carried out those great measures which have chiefly contributed to promote her prosperity and efficiency; that he presided over the General Assembly by which her separation from the State was completed, and has ever since directed his great talents and unwearied energies to the promotion of her best and highest interests. And now that his Master has been pleased to remove him suddenly and unexpectedly, in the midst of his labours, and in the full vigour of his faculties, while his eye was not dim nor his natural force abated, the General Assembly would exhort and beseech all ministers, office-bearers, and members of this Church, to see to it that, while cherishing entire resignation to God's will, profound veneration for Dr Chalmers' memory, and heartfelt gratitude for his invaluable labours, they seek above all things to read the lessons which God by this solemn and striking dispensation is teaching, to cherish the feelings which it is fitted to call forth, and to be instant and zealous in discharging the duties which it is suited to enforce. They would exhort all to guard against either despising this chastening of the Lord, or fainting when thus rebuked of Him, and beseech all to labour and to pray that this painful and affecting visitation may not pass by unimproved, but that all men may be so exercised by it, that, through the blessing of Him who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, it may become instrumental in promoting extensively those high and holy objects to which the eminent endowments of their deceased father were consecrated, and which this Church feels herself solemnly bound to prosecute."

A biography of Dr Chalmers has been given to the world by his son-in-law, the Rev. Dr Hanna, and a more able, more faithful, and more deeply interesting biography does not exist in the English language. Suffice it to say, it is worthy of its subject.

CHAM, or HAM. See EGYPT.

CHAMBER, an apartment of a house. Some were inner chambers, to which one had to go through part of the house, and were more secret. 1 Kings xx. 30. Some were upper chambers, or garrets, where it seems they laid their dead, and where the Jews sometimes had idolatrous altars, and where the Christians, in the apostolic age, had often their meetings for worship. Acts ix. 37, xx. 8, i. 13; 2 Kings xxiii. 12. Some were for beds; others for entertaining guests, at the three solemn feasts, or on other occasions. Matt. ix. 15; 2 Kings vi. 12; Mark xiv. 14. God's chambers are clouds, where he lays up his treasures of rain, snow, hail, wind, and where he mysteriously displays his wisdom and power. Psal. civ. 3, 13. To apply ourselves to earnest prayer and supplication, and to depend on God's promises, perfections, and providence for special protection, is to enter into our chambers, that we may be safe, as the Hebrews were in their houses, from the destroying angel. Isa. xxvi. 20. The chambers of the south, are the constellations or clusters of stars belonging to the southern part of the firmament, which are often hid from us, and whose appearance is ordinarily attended with storms. Job ix. 9. Houses in the East have in general a court in the centre, with cloisters, and a gallery into which the chambers open, the apartments of the women being at the back, and only reached by passing through the others. Towards the street is a dead wall, with a porch, over which is a chamber, sometimes used as a lodging for guests, and sometimes as a store-room,—it being well suited for either of these purposes, by being connected with the rest of the house by a door in the gallery, and having a separate staircase opening into the porch. This is the "chamber on the wall," which the Shunammite prepared for the prophet Elisha. 2 Kings iv. 10. Many of the Oriental princes and nobles have a favourite upper chamber, to which they retire from the fatigues of State or the hurry of business. To such a retired apartment the Saviour and his disciples withdrew, to celebrate the passover before he suffered. The upper chamber is still the guest chamber, where entertainments are made. It was probably selected by the first Christians as the place for holding their assemblies for public worship, from being the most spacious, as well as the most retired apartment of the house.

CHAMBERLAIN. The Hebrew word sares is sometimes rendered chamberlain, and at other times eunuch. The term seems to be applied to officers confidentially employed about the person of the monarch.

CHAMOIS. The word occurs only in Deut. xiv. 5. It is a particular species, says Harris, of the goat kind, remarkably shy and sprightly. The Septuagint, Jerome, and Dr Geddes, render it the camelopard, but that animal is a native of the torrid zone and of Southern Africa. Gesenius defines it an animal of the deer or gazelle species. Whatever animal was intended by the Zemer, it must have been common to Syria. The animal now called chamois is the Antelope rupicapra, which inhabits the Alps and Apennines. It is a very lively, active, keen-eyed creature, which leaps from rock to rock with amazing alacrity. In Dr Kitto's very valuable and erudite Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, the chamois of the Bible is thought to correspond to the Krebsch or wild sheep of the Arabs, found in Sinai and in the rocky districts of Arabia Petrea.

CHAMPION. This word occurs in 1 Sam. xvii. 4, 23, to point out a man who challenges another in single combat. This was a not infrequent mode of deciding the issue of a national contest. Burckhardt informs us that the same practice still prevails among the modern Arabs.

CHANCEL, a particular part of the fabric of a church. It derives its name from the cancelli, or lattice-work partition, between the choir and the body of the church, so framed as to separate the one from the other, but not to intercept the sight. The chancel is the freehold of the rector, and part of his glebe, and therefore he ought to repair it; but if the rectory is inappropriate, then the impropiator must do it; and this he is enjoined to do, not only by the common-law, but by the canons of the church.

CHANCELLOR, a title of the Persian governor at Samaria, referred to in Ezra iv. 8, 9, 17.

CHANGE. Antichrist changes times and laws, when he alters the constitutions and laws of Christ's Church, and pretends to make things holy or profane as he pleases. Dan. vii. 25. Night is changed into day, when men can obtain no rest or sleep therein. Job xvii. 12. Changes and war against men, denote afflictive alterations of their circumstances. Job x. 17; Psal. lv. 19. Joshua the high priest's change of raiment, does not merely denote the putting on a suit of fine clothes instead of his filthy ones, but the removal of sin, through the imputation of our Saviour's finished obedience and suffering, and the qualifying of him to be a faithful high priest. Zech. iii. 4. The living at the last day are changed, when their bodies are rendered immortal. 1 Cor. xv. 51.

CHANT. This word occurs only in Amos vi. 5, where the passage, "That chant to the sound of the viol," may be rendered, "That sing to the sound of the harp." The margin of our version has quaver instead of chant. The Psalmist, in describing a musical procession, introduces the chanters or singers: "The singers went before, the players on instruments followed after; among them were the damsels playing with timbrels." Psal. lxxviii. 25. In the drawings on the Egyptian monuments, the singers are generally represented as marking time by clapping their hands. This fact serves to illustrate the many allusions made to this practice in Scripture, and shows the force and propriety of various passages which might at first seem incongruous and strange. That chanting was a prominent part of the temple service is evident from the taunting proposal made to the captives in Babylon, to sing to their idolatrous oppressors "one of the songs of Zion." "What must have been the effect produced," as has been well remarked, "when the whole congregation of Israel assembled together to keep the feasts of the Lord, when the courts of the temple re-echoed the voices of five hundred thousand worshippers! and the sound of the trumpets, cymbals, and harps, powerful and numerous as they were, formed but a feeble accompaniment to the united voice of the people of the Lord."

CHANTRY, a little chapel, or particular altar in a cathedral church, built and endowed for the maintenance of a priest to sing or chant masses for the purpose of buying the soul of the founder out of purgatory. From their chantings it was called a chantry, and the officiating priest was termed a chanter or soul's priest. Chantries came into use in England in the thirteenth century, when the absurd doctrine of purgatory was invented and propagated. Chantries were numerous in England before the Reformation; but in later times none could build these chantries without the express permission or licence of the sovereign.

CHAOS, according to the signification of the word, the vast void, or the confused mass of elements, from which, in the opinion of certain ancient philosophers, the world was formed. In latter times, the word is used to denote the unformed mass of primeval matter described in Gen. i. 2, which was reduced to order and beauty by the power of the Creator. The earth is said to have been "without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep." "We do not know," says Sharon Turner, "and we have no means of knowing, at what point of the ever-flowing eternity of that which is alone eternal—the Divine subsistence—the creation of our earth, or of any part of the universe, began, nor in what section of it we are living now. All that we can learn explicitly from revelation is, that nearly six thousand years have elapsed since our first parents began to be." And to the same purpose Dr Candlish remarks, in his 'Contributions towards the Exposition of the Book of Genesis:—"The essential facts, in this divine record, are,—the recent date assigned to the existence of man on the earth, the previous preparation of the earth for his habitation, the gradual nature of the work, and the distinction and succession of days during its progress. These are not, and cannot be, impugned by any scientific discoveries. What history of ages previous to that era this globe may have engraved in its rocky bosom, revealed or to be revealed, by the explosive force of its central fires, Scripture does not say. What countless generations of living monsters teemed in the chaotic waters, or brooded over the dark abyss, it is not within the scope of the inspiring Spirit to tell. There is room and space for whole volumes of such matter, before the Holy Ghost takes up the record. Nor is it necessary to suppose that all continuity of animal life which had sprung into being, in or out of the waters, was broken at the time when the earth was fashioned for man's abode. It is enough that then, first, the animals of sea, and air, and land, with which man was to be conversant, were created for his use,—the fish, the fowls, the beasts, which were to minister to his enjoyment and to own his dominion."

CHAPEL, a place of worship. It is generally supposed to be derived from Capella, which thus arose: In ancient times, it was customary for the kings of France to carry St Martin's Cope (Cappa) into the field with them; and, being regarded as a precious relic, it was kept in a tent where mass was said; and from this circumstance the place was called Capella, a chapel. The word gradually was applied to a place of divine worship of any kind.

There are various kinds of chapels in Britain:—
1. Domestic chapels, built by noblemen or gentlemen for private worship in their families. 2. Free chapels, such as are founded by kings of England. They are free from all Episcopal jurisdiction, and only to be visited by the founder and his successors, which is done by the lord chancellor; yet the king may license any subject to build and endow a chapel, and by letters-patent exempt it from the visitation of the ordinary. 3. Chapels in universities, belonging to particular universities. 4. Chapels of ease, built for the ease of one or more parishioners that dwell too far from the church, and are served by inferior curates, provided for at the charge of the rector, or of such as have benefit by it, as the composition or custom is. 5. Parochial chapels, which differ from parish churches only in name: they are generally small, and the inhabitants within the district few. If there be a presentation ad ecclesiam, instead of capellam, and an admission and institution upon it, it is no longer a chapel, but a church for themselves and families. 6. Chapels which adjoin to, and are part of the church; such were formerly built by honourable persons as burying places. 7. The places of worship used by the Methodists and Protestant Dissenters, otherwise denominated meeting-houses, are now almost universally called chapels. High-churchmen object strongly to the application of the word chapel to a place of worship used by dissenters, alleging that those alone are chapels which are properly endowed, and the minister authorised to perform all the offices of the church, including marriages, independently of the mother church. The congregations of dissenters are protected from molestation during divine worship in their chapels, by statute I. of William and Mary.

CHAPITERS, ornaments on the tops of pillars, walls, &c. Exod. xxxvi. 38; 1 Kings vii. 16. In the first of these passages we read of the chapiters being overlaid with gold; and in the second, of the chapiters on the top of the pillars being formed of "lily work." The form of the lotus or lily was the favourite ornament for the capitals of columns among the Egyptians.

CHAPLAIN, a person who performs divine service in a chapel, or is retained in the service of some family to perform divine service.

According to a statute of Henry VIII., the persons vested with the power of retaining chaplains, together with the number each is allowed to qualify, are as follow:—An archbishop, eight; a duke or bishop, six; marquis or earl, five; viscount, four; baron, knight of the garter, or lord chancellor, three; a duchess, marchioness, countess, baroness, the treasurer or comptroller of the king's house, clerk of the closet, the king's secretary, dean of the chapel, almoner, and master of the rolls, each of them two; chief-justice of the king's bench, and warden of the cinque ports, each one. All these chaplains may purchase a licence or dispensation, and take two benefices, with cure of souls. A chaplain must be retained by letters-testimonial under hand and seal, for it is not sufficient that he serve as chaplain in the family.

In England there are forty-eight chaplains to the sovereign, who wait four each month, preach in the chapel, read the service to the family, and to the sovereign in her private oratory, and say grace in the absence of the clerk of the closet. While in waiting, they have a table and attendance, but no salary. In Scotland the sovereign has six chaplains, with a salary of fifty pounds each; three of them having, in addition, the deanery of the chapel royal divided between them, making up a large sum given to each. Their only duty, at present, is to pray at the election of peers for Scotland to sit in parliament.

CHAPLET, a certain instrument of monkish piety, made use of by the Roman Catholics, Greeks, Armenians, and other Eastern communions. It is a string of beads, by which they measure or count the number of their prayers.

CHAPT. This word occurs only in Jer. xiv. 4, and refers to the cracking of the earth before the period of the autumnal rains usual in Eastern countries; but the prophet more especially alludes to a drought which was to take place in Judah.

CHAPTER, from the Latin caput (head), signifies a community of ecclesiastics belonging to a cathedral or collegiate church. The chief or head of the chapter is the dean. The body consists of canons or prebends. In England, as elsewhere, the deans and chapters had the right to choose the bishops; but Henry VIII. assumed this right as a prerogative of the Crown. The chapter has now no longer a place in the administration of the diocese during the life of the bishop, but succeeds to the whole Episcopal jurisdiction during the vacancy of the see.

CHAPTERS and VERSES. The division of the Holy Scriptures into chapters and verses, as we now have them, is of comparatively recent date. The Psalms, indeed were always divided as at present, for the Apostle Paul, in his sermon at Antioch in Pisidia, quotes the second Psalm. But the division of the rest of the Scripture is attributed by some to Stephen Langton, who was archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of King John and King Henry III., his son. The true author of this invention was Hugo de Sancto Caro, commonly called Hugo Cardinalis, who flourished about the middle of the 13th century. A detailed account of the manner in which Hugo was led to the adoption of the present mode of division is thus given by the learned Dr Prideaux:—"This Cardinal Hugo, who flourished about the year 1240, and died in the year 1262, had laboured much in the study of the Holy Scriptures, and made a comment upon the whole of them. The carrying on of this work administered to him the occasion of inventing the first Concordance that was made of the Holy Scriptures, that is, that of the vulgar Latin Bible. For, conceiving that such an index of all the words and phrases in the Holy Scriptures would be of great use for the attaining of a better understanding of them, he projected a scheme for the making of it, and forthwith set a great number of the monks of his order on the collecting of the words under their proper classes in every letter of the alphabet, in order to this design; and, by the help of so many hands, he soon brought it to what he intended. This work was afterwards much improved by those who followed him, especially by Arlottus Thuscus, and Conradus Halberstadius, the former a Franciscan, and the other a Dominican friar, who both lived about the end of the same century. But the whole end and aim of the work being for the easier finding of any word or passage in the Holy Scriptures, to make it answer this purpose, the Cardinal found it necessary, in the first place, to divide the books into sections, and the sections into under-divisions, that by these he might the better make the references, and the more exactly point out in the index where every word or passage might be found in the text. For till then every book of the Holy Scriptures in the vulgar Latin Bibles was without any division at all; and therefore, had the index referred only to the book, the whole book perchance must have been read over, ere that could be found which was sought for. But, by referring to it by this division and subdivision, it was immediately had at first sight. And these sections are the chapters which the Bible hath ever since been divided into. For, on the publishing of this Concordance, the usefulness of it being immediately discerned, all coveted to have it; and, for the sake of the use of it, all divided their Bibles in the same manner as Hugo had done. For the reference in the Concordance being made by these chapters and the subdivisions of them, unless their Bibles were so divided too, the Concordance would be of no use to them. And thus this division of the several books of the Bible into chapters had its original, which hath ever since been made use of in all places, and among all people, wherever the Bible itself is used in these Western parts of the world. But the subdivision of the chapters was not then by verses as now. Hugo's way of subdividing them was by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, placed in the margin at an equal distance from each other, according as the chapters were longer or shorter. In long chapters all these seven letters were used, in others fewer, according as the length which the chapters were of did require. For the subdivision of chapters by verses, which is now in all our Bibles, was not introduced into them till some ages after, and then it was from the Jews that the use hereof, as now among us, first had its original on this occasion: About the year 1430, there lived here among the Western Jews a famous rabbi, called by some Rabbi Mordecai Nathan, by others Rabbi Isaac Nathan, and by many by both these names, as if he were first called by one of them, and then by a change of it by the other. This rabbi being much conversant with the Christians, and having frequent disputes with their learned men about religion, he thereby came to the knowledge of the great use which they made of the Latin Concordance composed by Cardinal Hugo, and the benefit which they had thereby, in the ready finding of any place in the Scriptures that they had occasion to consult; which he was so much taken with, that he immediately set about the making of such a Concordance to the Hebrew Bible for the use of the Jews. He began this work in the year of our Lord 1438, and finished it in the year 1445, so that he was just seven years in the composing of it; and the first publishing of it happening about the time that printing was first invented, it hath since that time undergone several editions from the press. That which was printed at Basil by Buxtorf, the son, anno 1632, is the best of them; for Buxtorf, the father, had taken great pains about it, to make it more correct and complete, and Buxtorf, the son, added also his labours to those of his father for the perfecting of it, and published it with both their improvements in the year I have mentioned; and by reason of the advantages it hath received herefrom, it deservedly hath the reputation of being the perfectest and best book of its kind that is extant; and indeed is so useful for the understanding of the Hebrew Scriptures, that no one who employs his studies this way can well be without it, it being the best Dictionary, as well as the best Concordance to them. In the composing of this book, Rabbi Nathan finding it necessary to follow the same division of the Scriptures into chapters, which Hugo had made in them, it had the like effect as to the Hebrew Bibles that Hugo's had as to the Latin; that is, it caused the same division to be made in all the Hebrew Bibles, which were afterwards either written out or printed for common use: for this Concordance being found of excellent use among those for whom it was made, they were forced to comply with this division for the sake of having the benefit of it. For the references in Nathan's Concordance being every where by chapters according to Hugo's division, they could no otherwise have the benefit of finding in their Bibles the places referred to, than by dividing them into the same chapters also; and from hence the division of the scriptural books into chapters first came into the Hebrew Bibles. But Nathan, though he followed Hugo in the division of the scriptural books into chapters, yet did not so in the division of the chapters by the letters A, B, C, &c., in the margin, but refined upon him in this matter by introducing a better usage, that is, by using the division which was made by verses. This division, I have shown, was very ancient, but it was till now without any numbers put to the verses. This was first done by Rabbi Nathan, for the sake of his Concordance; for therein all his references being by the chapters and verses, as there was a necessity that those who used this Concordance should have their Bibles thus divided into chapters and verses also, so was it that both should be numbered in them. For it was by the numbers of the chapters and verses that they were to find the place sought for, in the same manner as is now practised in our English Concordances; as in Newman's, which is by much the best and perfectest of all that are extant. The numbering, therefore, of the verses in the chapters, and the quoting of the passages in every chapter by the verses, instead of doing it by letters at an equal distance in the margin, was Nathan's invention; in all things else he followed the pattern which Hugo had set him. But it is to be observed, that he did not number the verses any otherwise than by affixing the numerical letters in the margin at every fifth verse. And this hath been the usage of the Jews in all their Hebrew Bibles ever since, till of late Athias, a Jew of Amsterdam, in his two fair and correct editions of the Hebrew Bible, printed by him in that city, the first in the year 1661, and the other in the year 1667, hath varied herefrom in two particulars. For, 1st, He hath introduced into these editions the use of the Indian figures; and, 2dly, hath placed them at every verse where the numerical Hebrew letters are not; so that continuing the numerical Hebrew letters as formerly at every fifth verse, he had put the Indian figures at all the rest. Before this we were to number from every fifth verse to find any intermediate verse between that and the next fifth. Whether the Jews will follow this new way in their future editions, I know not; but this I know, that this second edition of Athias's Hebrew Bible is the most correct, as well as the most convenient and best fitted for use, of any that have been as yet set forth. After Rabbi Nathan had brought in this use of numbering the verses, and quoting by them what was in every chapter, this soon appeared to be a much better way than the quoting of what is in them by the letters A, B, C, &c., set in the margin. And, therefore, Vatablus having from this pattern published a Latin Bible, with the chapters so divided into verses, and the verses so numbered, this example hath been followed in all other editions that have been since set forth. And all that have published Concordances, as well as all other writers, have ever since that time quoted the Scriptures by the number of chapters and verses according to this division. So that, as the Jews borrowed the division of the books of the Holy Scriptures into chapters from the Christians, in like manner the Christians borrowed that of the chapters into verses from the Jews. And thus they have helped each other to make the present editions of the Bible much more convenient for common use than otherwise they would have been. And Robert Stephan, taking a hint from hence, made a like division of the chapters of the New Testament into verses also, and for the same reason as Rabbi Nathan had done so before him as to the Old Testament, that is, for the sake of a Concordance which he was then composing for the Greek Testament, and which was afterwards printed by Henry Stephan, his son, who gives this account hereof in his preface to that Concordance. Since that, this division of the Holy Scriptures by chapters and verses, and the quoting of all passages in them by the numbers of both, hath grown into use every where among us in these Western parts; so that not only all Latin Bibles, but all Greek Bibles also, and all others that have been printed in any of the modern languages, have followed this division; and the usefulness of it, from the first time it was introduced, reconciled all men thereto. And thus that division of the Holy Scriptures into chapters and verses, which is now every where in use, had its original."

CHARGE,—1. A sermon preached by the bishop to his clergy. 2. Also a sermon preached, or an address delivered, to a minister at his ordination.

CHARIOTS. From early times, chariots have been in use among oriental nations, both for conveyance and for war. The Egyptians have been always famed for the splendour of their chariots. Solomon is mentioned (Song iii. 9, 10) as having magnificent carriages of this kind. "King Solomon made himself a chariot of the wood of Lebanon. He made the pillars thereof of silver, the bottom thereof of gold, the covering of it of purple; the midst thereof being paved with love, for the daughters of Jerusalem." The Persians seem to have used chariots in their religious processions in worship of the sun; and Josiah is said (2 Kings xxiii. 11) to have burnt chariots of the sun. The warriors of primitive times were carried to the field in chariots drawn for the most part by two horses. The Egyptians seem to have used war chariots when pursuing the Israelites after they had left Egypt. "And he made ready his chariot, and took his people with him. And he took six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and captains over every one of them."—Exod. xiv. 6, 7. The Canaanites also had been obviously accustomed to this mode of warfare long before Joshua invaded their country. Thus:—"And the children of Joseph said, The hill is not enough for us: and all the Canaanites that dwell in the land of the valley have chariots of iron, both they who are of Bethshean and her towns, and they who are of the valley of Jezreel." Josh. xvii. 16. These chariots were very effective in war. Hence it is said,—"And the Lord was with Judah; and he drave out the inhabitants of the mountain, but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron." Judges i. 19. In the time of Joshua, the number of war chariots which the Canaanites possessed are described as "very many;" and in the time of the Judges, Jabin, king of Canaan, sent into the field nine hundred chariots of iron; and in a succeeding war the Philistines met the Israelites in battle with thirty thousand chariots. The war chariots are spoken of as "made of iron," probably because they were armed with sharp scythes, which were fastened to long axle-trees on both wheels. These being driven swiftly through a body of men, made great slaughter. There were other chariots, however, in which the princes and generals rode. It does not appear that the Hebrews ever used chariots in war, though Solomon had a considerable number; but no military expedition is recorded in which he used them. In the book of Maccabees mention is made of chariots armed with scythes, which the king of Syria led against the Jews. 2 Mac. xiii. 2.

CHARITY, one of the three grand Christian graces, consisting in the love of God and our neighbours, or the habit or disposition of loving God with all our heart, and our neighbour as ourselves. "Cha- rity," says an able writer, "consists not in speculative ideas of general benevolence floating in the head, and leaving the heart, as speculations often do, untouched and cold; neither is it confined to that indolent good-nature which makes us rest satisfied with being free from inveterate malice or ill-will to our fellow-creatures, without prompting us to be of service to any. True charity is an active principle. It is not properly a single virtue, but a disposition residing in the heart as a fountain; whence all the virtues of benignity, candour, forbearance, generosity, compassion, and liberality, flow as so many native streams. From general goodwill to all, it extends its influence particularly to those with whom we stand in nearest connection, and who are directly within the sphere of our good offices. From the country or community to which we belong, it descends to the smaller associations of neighbourhood, relations, and friends, and spreads itself over the whole circle of social and domestic life. I mean not that it imports a promiscuous, undistinguishing affection, which gives every man an equal title to our love. Charity, if we should endeavour to carry it so far, would be rendered an impracticable virtue, and would resolve itself into mere words, without affecting the heart. True charity attempts not to shut our eyes to the distinction between good and bad men, nor to warm our hearts equally to those who befriend and those who injure us. It reserves our esteem for good men, and our complacency for our friends. Towards our enemies it inspires forgiveness and humanity. It breathes universal candour and liberality of sentiment. It forms gentleness of temper, and dictates affability of manners. It prompts corresponding sympathies with them who rejoice and them who weep. It teaches us to slight and despise no man. Charity is the comforter of the afflicted,—the protector of the oppressed,—the reconciler of differences,—the intercessor for offenders. It is faithfulness in the friend, public spirit in the magistrate, equity and patience in the judge, moderation in the sovereign, and loyalty in the subject. In parents, it is care and attention; in children, it is reverence and submission. In a word, it is the soul of social life. It is the sun that enlivens and cheers the abodes of men; not a meteor which occasionally glares, but a luminary, which, in its orderly and regular course, dispenses a benignant influence."

CHARM, a kind of spell, supposed by the ignorant to have an irresistible influence, by means of the concurrence of some infernal power, both on the minds, lives, and properties of those whom it has for its object. "Certain vain ceremonies," says Dr Doddridge, "which are commonly called charms, and seem to have no efficacy at all for producing the effects proposed by them, are to be avoided; seeing if there be indeed any real efficacy in them, it is almost always probable they owe it to some bad cause; for one can hardly imagine that God should permit good angels in any extraordinary manner to interpose, or should immediately exert his own miraculous power on trifling occasions, and upon the performance of such idle tricks as are generally made the condition of receiving such benefits." See DIVINATION.

CHASIDIM, a modern Jewish sect, which arose about 1740. Its originator was Rabbi Israel Baal Shem, a Polish Jew. The Chasidim have separate synagogues, use the prayer-book of the Spanish Jews, which is more cabalistic, and have their own rabbis. They reverence the Talmud and the Solar more than the other Jews, and especially profess to strive after union with God as their great object. To effect this, they spend much time in contemplation; and in prayer they use the most extraordinary contortions and gestures, jumping, writhing, howling, and working themselves into a high state of excitement. Before their devotions, they indulge freely in the use of meat and even of ardent spirits, to promote cheerfulness, as they regard sorrow and anxiety as peculiar hindrances to the enjoyment of union with God. Their chief means of edification is spending the Sabbath-day with the Tsaddik. The chief entertainment is in the afternoon, at the meal which the Jews call the third meal, during which the Tsaddik extemporises a sort of moral-mystical-cabbalistical discourse, which his followers receive as the dictates of immediate inspiration. For the benefit of those who are too far removed to come on the Sabbath, the Tsaddik makes journeys through his district, when he lodges with some rich member of the sect, and is treated with all respect due to one who stands in immediate communication with Deity. He then imposes penances on those whose consciences are burdened with guilt, and dispenses amulets, and slips of parchment with cabbalistic sentences written on them, to those who wish exemption from sickness and danger, or protection against the assaults of evil spirits. Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne visited a synagogue of the Chasidim at Tarnapol. They thus describe the sacred dance in which the worshippers were engaged:—"At first they danced two and two, then three and four all joined hand in hand; they leaped also as well as danced, singing at the same time, and occasionally clapping hands, in a manner that reminded us of the Arab dance and song in the East. A few seemed quite in earnest, with a wild fanatical expression in their countenances, while others were light and merry." Dr Jost, a learned Jew, says that Chasidim is the religion of nine-tenths of the Jews in Galicia, South Hungary, West and South Russia, and Wallachia. It has also extended to the East, and has followers in Jerusalem and Saphet, and two synagogues in Constantinople.

CHASTEN (chastise, correct),—1. To strike or afflict one for his advantage and correction; and to refuse or despise chastisement or correction, is to undervalue it, and be not reformed by it. Jer. ii. 30, vii. 28; Heb. xii. 5. The overthrow of the Jewish nation by the Chaldeans, was the chastisement of a cruel one. It was very severe, and inflicted by cruel instruments. Jer. xxx. 14. 2. To punish in just wrath. Lev. xxvi. 28. Thus, the chastisement of our peace was laid on Christ; that punishment by the bearing of which our reconciliation with God is effected, was laid on him as our surety. Isa. liii. 5. To chasten one's self, is to be exercised before God in self-abasement, fasting, and prayer. Dan. x. 12. The Scriptures are for correction; by their powerful influence they pierce a man to the heart, and make him amend his evil courses. 2 Tim. iii. 16.

CHASTITY, purity from fleshly lust. In men it is termed continence. (See CONTINENCE.) There is a chastity of speech, behaviour, and imagination, as well as of body. Grove gives us the following rules for the conservation of chastity:—1. To keep ourselves fully employed in labours, either of the body or the mind. Idleness is frequently the introduction to sensuality. 2. To guard the senses, and avoid every thing which may be an incentive to lust. Does the free use of some meats and drinks make the body ungovernable? Does reading certain books debauch the imagination and inflame the passions? Do temptations often enter by the sight? Have public plays, dancings, effeminate music, idle songs, loose habits, and the like, the same effect? He who resolves upon chastity cannot be ignorant what his duty is in all these and such like cases. 3. To implore the Divine Spirit, which is a Spirit of purity; and by the utmost regard to his presence and operations, to endeavour to retain him with us.

CHAZINZARIANS, a sect which arose in Armenia in the seventh century. They are so called from the Armenian word chazus, which signifies a cross, because they were charged with adoring the cross.

CHEBAR, a river of Assyria, which falls into the Euphrates, in the upper part of Mesopotamia. Ezek. i. 1. It is supposed to be the Chaboras of the Greek geographers. In 1 Chron. v. 26 it is called Habor.

CHECKER-WORK, that in which the images of flowers, sprigs, leaves, and fruits, are curiously wrought together. 1 Kings vii. 17.

CHEDORLAOMER, king of the Elymæans, or Elamites,—supposed to be either the Persians or a people bordering on them,—was one of the four kings who confederated against the five kings of the Pentapolis of Sodom, who had revolted from his power, A.M. 2092. The name of this monarch is not found in profane history.

CHEEK. Smiting upon the cheek is often spoken of in Scripture as a grievous insult and injury. Thus, Job xvi. 10; Lam. iii. 30; Mic. v. 1; Luke vi. 29. Modern travellers bear witness to the accuracy of this description. In Persia, the salutation among intimate friends is made by inclining neck to neck, and then inclining cheek to cheek; which Mr Morier thinks is most likely the falling upon the neck and kissing, so frequently mentioned in Scripture, as in the conduct of Esau and Jacob, of Joseph to his brethren, and the father to his returning prodigal.

CHEESE. The art of making cheese was known among the Syrian shepherds from the remotest times. The mode practised in the East of converting milk into cheese is thus described by Professor Paxton:—"Instead of runnet, they turn the milk, especially in the summer season, with sour butter-milk, the flowers of the great-headed thistle, or wild artichoke; and, putting the curds afterwards into small baskets made with rushes, or with the dwarf palm, they bind them up close, and press them. The circumstance of curds or any liquid being put into baskets made of rushes, may appear incredible. They are, however, common in the East, and made of so close a texture as to be capable of containing the thinnest fluid. These cheeses are rarely above two or three pounds weight, and in shape and size resemble our penny loaves. Oriental cheeses are sometimes of so very soft a consistence, after they are pressed, and even when they are set upon the table, that they bear a very near resemblance to curds, or to coagulated milk, which forms a very considerable part of Eastern diet. But the ten cheeses which David carried to the camp of Saul seem to have been fully formed, pressed, and sufficiently dried to admit of their being removed from one place to another without the frames in which they were made. 1 Sam. xvii. 18. The word harouts, derived from a verb which signifies to cut off, frequently signifies a piece or lump of any thing. Thus, in Daniel (ix. 25), it means a ruin, or heap of ruins; in the Book of Job (xli. 30), a piece of rock or stone; and, in the Prophecies of Zechariah (ix. 3), a lump of native gold. Hence the phrase under consideration literally signifies ten lumps; and the word hahaleb is added to determine what they were,—ten lumps of milk; which can mean nothing else than ten cheeses; for what are these but lumps of coagulated milk? Our translators did not, as Harmer says, leave out the last word as unnecessary, but gave the genuine meaning of the whole phrase. This exposition is supported by the Septuagint, in which it is rendered, as explained by Hesychius, pieces of the tender cheese or curd. But neither the original term nor the exposition of these different authors determines whether the coagulated milk remained in the basket, or, although still new and fresh, had acquired such consistency as to admit of being carried to so great a distance without the frame. As we know, however, that the Eastern cheeses were pressed after they were bound up in the rush mould, it is more probable they were not in the state of soft curd, but of new cheese." In the East, cheese is very rarely made of camel's milk, but generally of the milk of cows, and sometimes of sheep and goats. It is seldom hard pressed, but, indeed, little better than curds. Hence, "Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled me like cheese?" Job x. 10.

CHEMARIM. These are described by South as "an order of superstitious priests appointed to minister in the service of Baal." Perhaps they received this name from being dressed in black robes. The word occurs only once in our translation of the Bible—"I will also stretch out mine hand upon Judah, and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and I will cut off the remnant of Baal from this place, and the name of the Chemarims with the priests." Zeph. i. 4. It occurs, however, in the Hebrew in other passages, as for example, 2 Kings xxiii. 5, and Hosea x. 5. In the latter passage it is used to denote the priests who were employed in the service of the golden calves at Dan and Bethel.

CHEMOSH, an idol of the Moabites, sometimes mistaken for Baal-peor. Hence the Moabites are termed in Numb. xxi. 29, "people of Chemosh." The word is derived from a root, which in Arabic signifies "to make haste;" and from this circumstance some have imagined that Chemosh is the same with the sun, whose motion is supposed to be so hasty and rapid; while others, from the near resemblance of the Hebrew Chamos with the word Comos have rather thought it to be Bacchus, the god of drunkenness; but in either acceptation it may be supposed to represent either Noah or Lot. But however important this god was to the people by whom he was worshipped, little or nothing is now known concerning him. All is vague and uncertain conjecture.

CHEREM (Heb.) the second sort of anathema among the Jews. The cherem is nowhere mentioned by Moses, nor does he inform us how it was distinguished from other vows. The species of cherem with which we are best acquainted, was that pronounced upon hostile cities, in consequence of which the inhabitants were put to death; the cattle also were slain, the gold, silver, and other metals were added to the treasure of the sanctuary, and the whole city consumed with fire, while a curse was pronounced upon any one who should attempt to rebuild it. Of this the history of Jericho affords a remarkable example. If an Israelitish city introduced the worship of strange gods, a cherem was to be pronounced upon it. Deut.

xiii. 16-18. Jephthah's dedication of his daughter is generally supposed to have been a cherem: but the word used in describing his vow (Judg. xi. 30, 39) is neder, not cherem. See ACCURSED—ANATHEMA—EX-COMMUNICATION.

CHERETHIM. Cherethim, or Cherethites, are denominations for the Philistines: "I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and will cut off the Cherethims, and destroy the remnant of the sea coast." Ezek. xxv. 16. Zephaniah (ii. 5), exclaiming against the Philistines, says: "Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea coast, the nation of the Cherethites."

The Chaldee Targum on the Second Book of Samuel terms the Cherethites and Pelethites the archers and slingers; and as the Hebrews were expert in the use of the bow and sling, it is not improbable that the royal body-guard were armed with them. Gesenius translates the words executioners and messengers, these functions being generally discharged in Eastern countries, at the present day, by the body-guard of the sovereign. Lewis, in his 'Antiquities of the Hebrew Republic,' observes, "The number of them may be conjectured from the targets and shields of gold which Solomon made, which were five hundred, and for the use of his guard. They were properly the king's domestics, and lay in a guard-chamber at the entrance of the palace, to be ready at the least notice, and on the most sudden occasions."

CHERITH, a brook beyond Jordan, which falls into that river a few miles below Bethshan. Here the Prophet Elijah concealed himself from the resentment of Ahab, and was miraculously fed by ravens. 1 Kings xvii. 2-6.

CHERUBIM. No point in the whole circle of Bible knowledge has given rise to more diversity of opinion than that which regards the nature and meaning of the cherubim. The real origin and import of the term is still disputed. It is evidently a symbolical creature, mentioned first as the guardian of Paradise after the expulsion of Adam—"So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life." Gen. iii. 24. The cherubim, however, are more frequently spoken of in connection with the presence and throne of God. Jehovah is described as he that dwelleth between the cherubim; and in the construction of the Holy of holies, Moses was commanded to make two cherubim of gold in the two ends of the mercy-seat. In the book of Revelation, the four living creatures which are supposed to be identical with the cherubim, are said to be in the midst of the throne and round about the throne. In one thing all writers are agreed, that the cherub is a compound animal, made up of a man, an ox, a lion, and an eagle. On this ground alone Hengstenberg argues that the symbol is of Egyptian origin, since only among the Egyptians, of all the people with whom the Israelites were connected, are compound animals found in history. Following out this notion, he endeavours to identify the cherubim with the Egyptian sphinxes. A general idea long prevailing, and revived by Elliot in his work on the Apocalypse, is, that the cherubim are angelic beings. Many German writers have regarded them as fabulous monsters. Various writers of eminence, among whom may be mentioned Philo, Grotius, Bochart, and Rosenmüller, view them as symbols of the Divine perfections. Mr Fairbairn, in his excellent work on the 'Typology of Scripture,' gives an interesting, and to our mind a highly satisfactory, explanation of this difficult subject, following chiefly the views of Baehr. "Now from the cherubim," says he, "being called emphatically the living ones, it may be certainly concluded, that the notion of life must lie at the foundation of the idea, and that we must conceive of them as beings possessing, in a peculiar sense, the properties of life. This is confirmed by the description given of them both in Ezekiel and Revelation, as being exercised in continual motion, (Ez. i. 44; Rev. iv. 8, 'and rest not day nor night;') for incessant motion, continual working or activity, is a manifestation of life; and where every thing is still and motionless, there is death. This fundamental idea of life in its highest sense, which is symbolized in the cherub, must receive its more exact determination from the several parts of which the cherub was composed. These being all creatures, creatures, too, existing in this lower world, the kind of life they personified must be the created, as contradistinguished from the creative, and that as connected with this lower region of existence; and the four living creatures themselves combining from the several departments of nature the most perfect forms of animated being, the life they together personified was life of the most complete and elevated kind—in the highest scale, as it were, of creaturely existence. They belong to those creatures of the visible world, which constitute the first in rank and importance of its three kingdoms—the kingdom of organic life; and in that kingdom again they belong to the highest class, to that which possesses warm blood, and with that the highest physical life; nay, in that highest class they are again the highest, so that an old Jewish proverb says, 'Four are the highest in the world—the lion among wild beasts, the ox among tame cattle, the eagle among birds, man among all (creatures); but God is supreme over all;' meaning, that in these four is concentrated the highest style of creature life, but that God himself is still infinitely exalted even above that; for all creature life springs out of him, he is the Lord of creation. But these four have their high place among the creatures of the visible world, by virtue of certain peculiarities and powers of life, through which they are at once distinguished from other creatures, and from one another; and since they are, on account of these properties, united with each other, to compose the cherub, which, as a combination of the highest properties of creature life, is the witness and manifestation of the divine life, they must also of necessity indicate, when viewed in reference to their individual properties, certain special outgoings of the life that is in God, or so many modifications of the divine life. The cherub, therefore, is not only a symbol, when viewed as a complex whole, but each of its component parts has also its symbolical meaning; and this must be separately investigated before we can obtain a clear and comprehensive view of the whole.

"1. The Ox was, among all nations of the ancient world, regarded as the symbol of creative or productive power. That this was also familiarly known to the Israelites, there is good ground for believing. Their language bears some not improbable traces of it. For not only does the Hebrew name of father (אב) bear a very close affinity to the Egyptian Apis, the symbol of the producing Osiris, but the name of the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, which is also the first numeral, and which in a manner gives rise to the whole alphabetical and numerical series, is the name for an ox. And the connection of this animal with husbandry, being that solely employed in remote antiquity for bringing into operation the productive powers of the earth, naturally led the Israelites, as well as all other nations, to use the ox as the proper emblem first of husbandry, which calls forth the prolific properties of the ground, and then of production or making generally. It is this which accounts for the likeness of the ox being so often taken, both in ancient and modern times, as the form under which idolatrous nations have sought to worship God as Creator. The history of the golden calf in the wilderness, and of the two images set up by Jeroboam, furnish too plain a proof that the Israelites were well acquainted with the import of that symbol; for it was the God whom Moses declared to them, the Creator of heaven and of earth, that they professed to worship by means of that image. And in explanation of its symbolical meaning, Abarbanel remarks, 'Therefore Jeroboam chose the appearance of an ox from the chariot of the cherubim, because it is the sign of abundance of corn, and blessing of the nations.' As one, then, of the component elements of the cherub, the ox was the sign or representation of the productive and generating power of Godhead.

"2. The Lion, sometimes called pre-eminently 'the beast,' has ever been regarded by men of all nations as the king of beasts. That it was so regarded by the ancient people of God, is evident from many notices of Scripture. He is there celebrated primarily for his fearful strength and resistless power, (Judges xiv. 18; Prov. xxx. 30; 2 Sam. i. 23; xvi. 10); and then, for what was its natural consequence, as an object of terror, (Hos. xi. 10; Amos iii. 8; 1 Chron. xii. 8, &c.) On account of these properties, which are possessed by no other animal in the same degree, he is frequently employed as an emblem of the invincible power of God, and that more especially as directed to the punishment, overthrow, and extirpation of the adversaries, (Isa. xxxi. 4; Jer. xxv. 37, 38; Hos. v. 14; xiii. 7, 8.) Amos compares the judgments of Heaven drawing near to their accomplishment, to the roaring of a lion for his prey, chap. iii. 4, 8; and these judgments themselves were sometimes literally executed by means of lions, (2 Kings xvii. 25, 26; 1 Chron. xiii. 24; xx. 35.) Power, therefore, as required both for ruling and for judgment, was considered the distinguishing peculiarity of the lion; and lions were hence placed both at the right and left of Solomon's throne, as symbols of kingly majesty, which unites the ruling and judging prerogatives. This also is what was doubtless signified by the lion in the cherub.

"3. The Eagle is among birds what the lion is among quadrupeds—he is the king of birds; not, however, for his greatness, but on account of his flight and sight. The property peculiar to birds above other creatures, of being able to raise themselves aloft toward the heavens, and move freely in boundless space, gave them a very important place in the symbolical rites of the ancients. They were on that account considered as the messengers and tongues of the gods, whose will and purposes they brought from heaven to earth. Hence arose the auspices; and hence also the custom, extending even to the present time, of giving wings to whatsoever was represented as heavenly and divine—for example, to angels, as divine messengers. For this reason, too, it is that the cherubim, wherever they are more than merely named, are described as having wings. Now, what is the property of birds at large is possessed in the highest degree by the eagle; no bird has such a power of flight, (Jer. iv. 13; xlix. 22), none can fly either so high or so far. The power of sight also belongs to the eagle, not only above all other birds, but above living creatures generally, insomuch that eagle-sighted has become quite proverbial. He perceives his prey from the loftiest elevation, where to human eye he is scarcely discernible; the ancients even believed that he could descry small fish in the sea, and look unmoved upon the sun. That respect was had also to this peculiarity of the eagle in the cherub, appears from the express mention that is made both in Ezekiel and the Apocalypse, of its being full of eyes all round, (Ez. x. 12; Rev. iv. 6, 8.) His extraordinary power of wing, which enables him to move with the utmost freedom and speed through the most extended space, rendered the eagle, as no other bird could be, a symbol of that property of God by which he is confined to no space, omnipresence; whilst the singular power of vision possessed by that king of birds represented the all-seeing eye of God,—the symbol thus uniting an image of omnipresence with that of omniscience, as these are most commonly united in Scripture, in the descriptions there given of Jehovah.

“4. Man has his high position above all other creatures of the visible world, not in consequence of his animal powers, whether more immediately connected with body or with soul; for in these he is surpassed by many of the inferior creation, and in particular by the ox in strength, by the lion in courage and formidableness, by the eagle in penetration and wideness of range. That which distinguishes him from all other beings in the animal creation, is the power of intelligence, the spirit which he alone possesses, and which, as being the light of Jehovah (Prov. xx. 27), renders him in a peculiar sense the image of God. This distinguishing property of man is what his place in the cherub, as related to the other component parts, was designed to bring out, and symbolized the intellectual power of God, his absolute spirituality. But as this, in reference to the creation, manifests itself as wise direction and arrangement, the position of man in the cherub must be regarded as pointing chiefly to the Divine wisdom.

“While thus, however, we have found in the four component parts of the cherub, references to the divine powers of life, it is still not by any means to be regarded as properly a symbol of divine attributes. Its essential character consists in its being a creature; it is the image of the creature in its highest stage, an ideal creature. The powers of life, which in the actual creation are distributed among the creatures of the first class, are collected and concentrated in it. All creation is a witness of the powers of life that are in God, and consequently the cherub, in which the highest powers of life appear as an individual property, by means of its four component parts, is a witness, in the highest sense, of the creative power which belongs to the invisible God—of the majesty, (or power to rule and judge,) the omnipresence and omniscience, and finally the absolute wisdom of God. As such a witness, it serves for the glorification and honour of God, nay, it is the personified living praise of God himself; and on this account the object of the ceaseless activity of the four living creatures in the Apocalypse is made to consist in the perpetual praise and adoration of God:

‘They rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come. And when those beasts (living creatures) give glory, and honour, and thanks to Him that sat on the throne, who liveth for ever and ever, the four and twenty elders fall down before Him that sat on the throne, and worship Him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are, and were created.’”

Applying the same view of the subject to the cherubim in Eden, Mr Fairbairn thus points out the place and bearing which they were intended to have in the early worship of God:—“Their occupation of Eden must have afforded a perpetual sign and witness of the absolute holiness of God, and that as oonnected with the everlasting life, of which the tree in the midst of the garden was the appropriate food. This life had become for the present a lost privilege and inheritance to man, because sin had entered and defiled his nature; and other instruments must take his place to keep up the testimony of God, which he was no longer fitted to maintain.

“But while in this respect the cherubim in Eden served to keep up the remembrance of man’s guilt, as opposed to the righteousness of God, the chief purpose of their appointment was evidently of a friendly nature—a sign and emblem of hope. They would not of themselves, perhaps, have been sufficient to awaken in the bosom of man the hope of immortality, yet, when that hope had been brought in by other means, as we have seen it was, they came to confirm and establish it. For why should the keeping of the tree of life have been committed to them? They were not its natural and proper guardians; neither was it planted to nourish the principle of an undying life in them; they were but temporary occupants of the region where it grew, and being ideal creatures, whatever they kept, must obviously have been kept for others, not for themselves. Their presence, therefore, round the tree of life, with visible manifestations of divine glory, bespoke a purpose of mercy toward the fallen. It told that the ground lost by the cunning of the tempter, was not finally abandoned to his power and malice, but was yet to be reoccupied by the beings for whom it was originally prepared; and that in the meantime, and as a sure pledge of the coming restoration, Heaven kept possession of it by means specially appointed for the purpose. Eden thus had the appearance of an abode, though for the present lost, yet reserved in safe and faithful keeping for its proper owners, against the time when they should be provided with a righteousness qualifying them for a return to its pure and blessed privileges; and there was set before the family of man a standing pledge, that the now forfeited condition of immortality would be restored.

“It would not be difficult, we conceive, for the first race of worshippers, with the aptness they possessed for symbolical instruction, to go a step farther than this, and derive one lesson more from the appearance of the cherubim in Eden. While these could not fail to be regarded as witnesses for God’s holiness, in opposition to man’s sin, and signs of God’s purpose to rescue from the power and malice of the tempter what had been lost, they would also very naturally suggest the thought, that the fulfilment of that purpose would even more than recover what was lost.

These ideal creatures, which were placed for a season in paradise in man's room, united in their compound structure powers and faculties superadditioned to those which were now possessed by man, or had ever been his—combining with man's intelligence the capacity for productive labour and usefulness peculiar to the ox, the might and dominion of the lion, the winged speed and far-seeing penetration of the eagle. The garden of God, and the tree of life, as emblems of hope to the church, being now in the keeping of creatures possessed of such a singular combination of qualities, was surely fitted to awaken the conviction, that a higher place and destiny was to be won for man in the new creation; and that when the lost inheritance should be recovered, and the restitution of all things should take place, the nature of man should be endowed with other gifts and faculties for the service of God, than it originally possessed. Eden not only was maintained in its primeval honour after the fall, but it seemed rather to have gained by that unhappy event; higher beings kept possession of its treasures, brighter manifestations of divine glory hung around its approach; clearly indicating to the eye of faith, that the tempter should be more than foiled, and that what tended in the first instance to defeat the purpose, and deface the blessed workmanship of God, should be ultimately overruled in his providence, for ennobling and beautifying this territory of creation."

CHERUBICAL HYMN, a hymn of great note in the ancient Christian Church, and still used in the communion service of the Church of England.

CHESTNUT TREE. This tree, which is mentioned only in Gen. xxx. 37, and Ezek. xxxi. 8, is by the Septuagint and Jerome rendered plane tree; and Drusius, Hiller, and most of the modern interpreters render it the same. The name is derived from a root which signifies nakedness; and it is often observed of the plane tree, that the bark peels off from the trunk, leaving it naked; which peculiarity may have been the occasion of its Hebrew name. The son of Sirach says, "I grew up as a plane tree by the water." Eccles. xxiv. 14. The Hebrew word translated in our Bibles "chestnut tree," is armon, which is the Oriental plane tree, or Platanus Orientalis of modern botanists. This is also the Dulb of the Arabians, and the Dulba of the Assyrians.

CHIDON, the threshing-floor where Uzzah was suddenly struck dead. 1 Chron. xiii. 9. In 2 Sam. vi. 6, it is called "Nachon's threshing-floor;" but we know not whether the names of Nachon and Chidon are those of men or of places.

CHILD, CHILDREN. As soon as a child is born in the East it is intrusted to a nurse; if it be a boy, the father appoints a steady man, from the age of two years, to be his keeper; if it be a female, it is committed to the care of a female nurse. The nurse sometimes continues to be attached to the family during her life. Thus, Rebecca's nurse continued with her till the day of her death; and it is said, "Here Deborah, Rebecca's nurse, died." Mothers were wont themselves to suckle their children, and so long as until they were from thirty to thirty-six months old. On the day that the child is to be weaned, the Orientals give an entertainment to their friends and relations; a custom which may be traced to a very remote antiquity, for we are told, Gen. xxi. 8, "Abraham made a great feast the same day that Isaac was weaned." It is a custom in many parts of the East to carry their children astride upon the back, with the arm round the body. At other times they are carried upon the shoulders. To both modes the prophet alludes, "Thus saith the Lord God, behold, I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the people: and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders." Isa. xlix. 22. Children are accustomed to stand in presence of their parents. Hence Rachel, in addressing her father, says, "Let it not displease my lord that I cannot rise up before thee." The sons of Jewish parents remained with the women until they had reached their fifth year, when they passed into the charge of the father, and were instructed in the arts of life and in religion. The daughters were early employed in useful occupations, such as gleanings, keeping sheep, drawing water, and various domestic pursuits. According to the Jewish law, children were the property of their parents, who sometimes sold them to pay their debts. It was a capital crime for a child to beat or to curse his father or mother.

The term children, in the language of the Hebrews, was frequently extended from the immediate to the remote descendants of a man. Thus the whole nation of the Edomites, who were sprung from Esau or Edom, are called "the children of Edom." And the word children is frequently used also in a figurative sense. Thus "the children of light," "children of darkness;" and in the New Testament believers are commonly described as the "children of God," or "children of the kingdom." It is expressly declared by our blessed Lord, that whosoever would desire to enter the kingdom of heaven must become as a little child. This doctrine Jesus frequently taught; and to check the worldly ambition which had begun to manifest itself in his disciples, he took a little child and set him in the midst, and said, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye cannot enter the kingdom of God." It is indispensable, then, that a man, if he would become a Christian, must, in the first instance, become a little child. He must unlearn what the world has taught him, and he must become a fool that he may become wise. His natural abilities may be strong, and his attainments extensive; but losing sight of these, if he would be a Christian, he must take his seat at the feet of Jesus, and learn of Him who is meek and lowly of heart. The whole family of God's people both on earth and in heaven are as little children, and whosoever has not the heart of a child is unconverted, unregenerate, and unsaved. The characteristic qualities of a child which chiefly belong to the Christian may be briefly noted:—

1. His father is the chief object of his love, his admiration, and imitation. There is no one in the wide world equal in his estimation to his father. The world may despise that father, but the child is not ashamed to acknowledge him; nay, he glories in him, he loves him with his whole soul, he admires him, he longs to be like him. He can conceive no higher object of ambition than to be equal to his father. And such is the disposition of the renewed soul. His heavenly Father becomes his all in all. God is now in all his thoughts, the centre-point of all his aims, and objects, and desires. He loves God, and how does he mourn that he loves him so coldly! He admires, he adores the righteous Jehovah; and he gives thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. He longs to be like God; to be holy as he is holy, to be perfect as his Father in heaven is perfect. His Father's word is truth itself. His Father's will is law. He strives to walk before God as a dear child.

And another characteristic of the child is,—

2. That while he feels his own helplessness, he expects every thing from his father. He never doubts for a moment that his father's wisdom can solve all difficulties and his father's power can overcome all hindrances. With the utmost confidence, therefore, he looks to his father to supply all his wants, to explain all that perplexes him, and to deliver him from all that threatens to injure him. And such is the confidence, the unhesitating dependence, which the believer is invited to repose in his heavenly Father.

And another characteristic of the little child is,—

3. That he believes whatever his father tells him. That his father can possibly deceive him is what in tender childhood he deems impossible. He puts implicit trust, therefore, in his father's statements. And such is the feeling with which the true child of God views his heavenly Father's word. It is to him the fountain of all truth. "O, how love I thy law," he is ready to exclaim; "it is my meditation all the day!" He searches the Scriptures to know his Father's will, and no sooner has he ascertained it than he hastens to obey it. Humble and teachable, the language of his heart often is, "Lord, show me thy ways, lead me in thy paths, teach me." And it is while in this attitude, exercising this childlike disposition, that he experiences the truth of Jehovah's promise, "They shall be all taught of God."

CHILD-BIRTH. In Oriental countries, child-birth is not an event of much difficulty; and mothers at such a season were originally the only assistants of their daughters, as any further aid was deemed unnecessary. Exod. i. 19. In cases of more than ordinary difficulty, those matrons who had acquired some celebrity for skill and expertness on occasions of this kind were invited in; and in this way there eventually rose into notice that class of women denominated midwives. These we find referred to in Exod. i. 19, in connection with a statement which is still known to be true in Oriental countries,—that the women suffer little in labour: "And the midwives said unto Pharaoh, Because the Hebrew women are not as the Egyptian women; for they are lively, and are delivered ere the midwives come in unto them." The child was no sooner born than it was washed in a bath, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling-clothes. Ezek. xvi. 4. If it be a male-child, a servant is straightway despatched to convey the glad tidings to the father; who, in token of his joy, bestows a gift upon the messenger. No such ceremony is observed on the birth of a daughter. This circumstance beautifully illustrates Jer. xx. 15: "Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father, saying, A man child is born unto thee; making him very glad." The exposing of children by their unnatural parents was not unfrequent in ancient times. To this fact, accordingly, as well as to the various processes followed at the birth of a child, Ezekiel (xvi. 3-5) alludes: "Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother an Hittite. And as for thy nativity, in the day thou wast born thy navel was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to supple thee; thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all. None eye pitied thee, to do any of these unto thee, to have compassion upon thee; but thou wast cast out in the open field, to the loathing of thy person, in the day that thou wast born." Hebrew women earnestly desired male children; probably from a hope that, in their case, the promise of the Messiah would be fulfilled. But even yet, in Eastern countries, the birth of a male-child is hailed by the parents and relatives as one of the most joyful events which could possibly happen; whereas the birth of a daughter is looked upon as a calamity, and tidings of it are listened to by the parent with feelings of bitter disappointment. It was the custom at a very ancient period, for the father, while music in the meanwhile was heard to sound, to clasp the new-born child to his bosom,—and by this ceremony was understood to declare it to be his own. Gen. i. 23; Job iii. 12; Psal. xxii. 10. This practice was imitated by those wives who adopted the children of their maids. Gen. xvi. 2, xxx. 3-5. The birth-day of a son, especially, was made a festival, and on each successive year was celebrated with renewed demonstrations of festivity and joy. Gen. xl. 20; Job i. 4; Matt. xiv. 6. The messenger who brought the news of the birth of a son was received with joy, and rewarded with presents. Job. iii. 3; Jer. xx. 15. This is the case at the present day in Persia.

CHILMAD, a city of Asia. Ezek. xxvii. 23. The precise locality of this place is unknown.

CHIMHAM,—1, a son of Barzillai, the Gileadite, and one who followed David to Jerusalem, after the war with Absalom; and who was enriched by David, in consideration of his father Barzillai, whose generous assistance he had experienced. 2 Sam. xix. 37, 38. 2. A place near Bethlehem. Jer. xli. 17.

CHIMNEY. This word is only found in Hos. xiii. 3. It simply means an opening through which the smoke passes. In Eastern houses no such fire-places exist as are found among us. The fuel is deposited in a pot, which is placed in a part hollowed out for that purpose in the centre of the paved floor, and the smoke escapes through the windows. Chimneys appear to have been employed in the round towers for furnaces, but never in dwelling-houses.

CHIOS, or Coos, an island in the Archipelago, between Lesbos and Samos, on the coast of Asia Minor, now called Scio. Paul passed this way as he sailed southward from Mitylene to Samos. Acts xx. 15.

CHISLEU, the third month of the Jewish civil year, and the ninth of their sacred, answering to part of our November and December. Neh. i. 1. It contains thirty days.

CHITTIM. The Septuagint, Jerome, Epiphanius, and others, understand the Chittim of the Hebrews to be the island of Cyprus. Chittim has been taken by Hales and Lowth for all the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean; which appears most consonant with the general use of the word by the different inspired writers. In the Book of Numbers, it is predicted "Ships shall come from the coasts of Chittim;" by which the Greeks and Seleucidæ, who chastised the Hebrews and Assyrians, are generally understood. In the First Book of Maccabees, Perscus, king of Macedon, is called the King of Shittim. Several bodies of this nation settled in Cilicia; on account of which it is called in Scripture the Land of Chittim. Isa. xxiii. 1. The Kittim, the posterity of Javan, seem to be the inhabitants of Chittim. They colonized Crete and Cyprus; and Josephus says, that all the Greek isles were called Chittim. In Dan. xi. 30, it is predicted, "The ships of Chittim shall come against him." By the expression here is meant the Roman fleets, and hence we may conclude that the Chittim colonized Italy also.

CHIUN. This word occurs in an obscure passage, Amos v. 26: "But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chiun your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves." The Septuagint has no mention of Chiun at all, but reads, "And the star of your god Raiphan;" and Dr Clarke supposes that Chiun is a literal corruption for Raiphan, although he acknowledges that there is no authority for this alteration. Stephen, in quoting Amos (Acts vii. 43), thus renders the passage: "Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them: and I will carry you away beyond Babylon." Now as Stephen seems to cite Amos for the purpose of showing that the Israelites worshipped the stars, it is natural to suppose that by Chiun is meant some planet, and, accordingly, this word, in accordance with the Arabic, is explained by Kimchi and most commentators of the planet Saturn, who was worshipped by the Phœnicians, the ancient Arabians, and the ancient Egyptians, whose superstition was followed by the Israelites.

CHLOE, a noted Christian woman at Corinth, perhaps a widow, as she is represented as head of her family; from some of which Paul received his information of the divisions at Corinth. 1 Cor. i. 11.

CHOIR. This word has two meanings, 1. That part of a cathedral which corresponds to the chancel in a parish church in England, is generally called the choir. 2. A body of men set apart for the performance of all the services of the church, in the most solemn form. In its more restricted sense, it implies that body of men or boys whose special duty it is to perform the musical service. The choir should properly be divided into two parts, stationed on each side of the chancel, in order to sing alternately the psalms and hymns, one side answering the other. This alternate or responsive recitation seems to have been in use in very early times. Thus in the song of triumph which was employed by the Israelites after they had crossed the Red Sea under the guidance of Moses, Miriam appears to have responded in alternate couplets to the choir of Israel. Exod. xv. 20—"And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances." The whole song on that joyful occasion was probably sung alternately by the men and women, ranged in two bands. "And Miriam," it is said "answered them;" that is, the men, for the pronoun "them" is masculine in the original Hebrew. From this we are led to suppose that Miriam was leader of the choir to the women as Moses was to the men.

CHOOSE (elect),—1. To set apart a person or thing from among others to some particular use, office, or privilege. Exod. xvii. 9; Psal. xxv. 12. 2. To renew or manifest a choice. Isa. xiv. 1, xlviii. 10. 3. To follow, imitate, delight in, and practise. Prov. iii. 31, i. 29. God chooses men's delusions, and brings their fears upon them, when he gives them up to their delusions as the just punishment of their sins. Thus God gave up the Jews to their vain fancies, and brought on them the destruction by the Romans which they, by the murder of our Saviour, thought to evade. Isa. lxvi. 4; John xi. 50. ELECTION imports,—1. God's act of choosing men to everlasting life. Rom. ix. 11, xi. 5, 28. 2. The persons chosen to eternal life. Rom. xi. 7. See ELECTION.

CHORAZIN, a city which stood on the western shore of the lake of Genesareth. Its exact situation is not apparent from Scripture, except that it must have been near Capernaum. Chorazin appears to have been one of the cities in which most of the miracles of Christ were wrought; and in Matt. xi. 21, we find him reproaching it along with Bethsaida for its impenitent and unbelieving spirit:—"Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida!" Modern travellers inform us the remains of Chorazin are only to be found amid the mouldering heaps with which the plains on the shores of the Sea of Galilee are abundantly studded.

CHOREPISCOPI (bishops of the country). In the ancient Church, when the dioceses became enlarged by the conversion of Pagans in the country and villages at a great distance from the city church, the bishops appointed certain assistants, whom they called chorepiscopi, because by their office they were bishops of the country. There have been great disputes among the learned concerning this order, some thinking that they were presbyters; others, that there were two sorts,—some that had received episcopal ordination, and some that were presbyters; others think that they were all bishops.

Those who first received the name of Chorepiscopi, were probably the poorest and least formidable class of the country bishops, and they were, accordingly, the first victims of the ambition of the city dignitaries. "This order," says Mosheim, in his history of the fourth century, "was in most places suppressed by the bishops, with a design to extend their own authority, and enlarge the sphere of their power and jurisdiction. At first, they were merely crippled in the exercise of their privileges. It was decreed, in the thirteenth canon of the Council of Ancyra, held A.D. 314, that they should not be permitted to ordain presbyters or deacons." The Council of Antioch, held, according to Du Pin, A.D. 342, goes a step farther. The tenth canon of that council is as follows:—"It seemed good to the holy synod, that those in villages or rural districts, or those called chorepiscopi, even though they have been ordained by bishops, should know their own limits, and attend to the churches committed to them, and be content with the care and concern of them, and that they appoint readers, and subdeacons, and exorcists, and that they be content with the promotion of these, and that they must not have the assurance to ordain an elder or a deacon, without the bishop in the city, to which they and their region are subject. And if any one dare to transgress what has been ruled, that he be deprived even of the honour which he enjoys; and that a chorepiscopus be made by the bishop of the city, to which (city) he is subject." In the third century, three rural bishops ordained a bishop to the see of Rome; yet here, all such pastors are forbidden to ordain even an elder or a deacon, unless a city bishop be present to take part in the ceremony. The rights of the chorepiscopi were gradually abridged, until at length they were entirely abolished. "It was in the fourth age," says Du Pin, "that the body of the churches was perfected, and that certain rules were established for ecclesiastical decisions. The distinction, distribution, and subordination of churches were settled, for the most part, according to the form of the civil government. The civil provinces formed the body of an ecclesiastical province. The bishop of the civil metropolis was looked upon as the first bishop of the province. Some rights and prerogatives were assigned to him, and the care of overseeing the whole province was committed to him." Thus gradually arose the Papacy.

CHOSEN (lect), selected from among others to some honourable service or station. Chosen warriors are such as are picked out as the most valiant and skilful in an army, or as best adapted to some special enterprise of great moment. Exod. xv. 4; Judg. xx. 16. The Hebrew nation was an elect or chosen people; God set them apart, not for their superior excellence, but for wise and gracious purposes of his own,—to receive his Word, preserve his worship, and prepare for the advent of his Son. Psal. cv. 43; Isa. xlv. 1; Deut. vii. 6, ix. 6–29, x. 14, 15; Neh. ix. 7. Jerusalem was chosen, as the place where God was pleased to fix the peculiar symbols of his presence, and the privileges consequent thereon; as the seat of his temple, sacrifices, &c. 1 Kings xi. 13. Christ is the elect, or chosen of God; from eternity he was set apart in the Divine mind, as the only fit person to be our mediator and surety. Isa. xliii. 10; 1 Pet. ii. 4. Christ's people, saved by him, are elect and chosen; in his eternal purpose God kindly separated them from the rest of mankind—not of merit, but of mercy—not from faith foreseen, but in order to faith bestowed—that they might, through Christ, and for his sake, receive salvation, to the praise of his glorious grace, which prepares them afore unto glory, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth. 1 Pet. i. 2, ii. 9, v. 13; 2 John 1; Rev. xvii. 14; Eph. i. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 13. For the sake of these, that none of them, in their persons or progenitors, may be cut off, are the days of vengeance on wicked nations shortened; no seducer can draw any of them fully and finally from the truth of the gospel; none can lay any valid charge against them before God; no injury done them shall pass unpunished; angels shall gather them all to Christ's right hand; and they shall infallibly obtain everlasting happiness. Matt. xxiv. 22, 24, 31; Mark xiii. 20; John xv. 16, 19; Rom. viii. 33, xi. 7; Luke xviii. 7, 8. The apostles were chosen,—fixed upon and set apart from others to bear witness to Christ, and execute all the functions pertaining to their high and sacred office. Acts x. 41, ix. 15, i. 24; John vi. 70.

CHRISM, oil consecrated by the bishop, and used in the Romish and Greek Churches, in the administration of baptism, confirmation, ordination, and extreme unction. This chrism is consecrated with great ceremony on Holy Thursday. There are two kinds of it; the one a composition of oil and balsam, used in baptism, confirmation, and orders; the other plain oil, consecrated by the bishop, and used in extreme unction and for catechumens.

CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST—MESSIAH.

CHRISTIAN, a word derived from Christ, and properly applied to a person who sincerely and from the heart believes in the Lord Jesus Christ. But the word Christian is also used to denote one who professes a belief in the religion of Christ, as distinguished from all false religions. The former is the strict scriptural meaning of the word; the latter the common signification of the word in the ordinary intercourse of the world.

The disciples and followers of Christ were first denominated Christians at Antioch, A.D. 42. They distinguished themselves in the most remarkable manner by their conduct and their virtues. The faithful, whom the preaching of Peter had converted, hearkened attentively to the exhortations of the apostles, who failed not carefully to instruct them as persons who were entering upon an entirely new life. They attended the temple daily, doing nothing different from the other Jews, because it was not yet time to separate from them. But they made a still greater progress in virtue; for they sold all that they possessed, and distributed their goods to the wants of their brethren. The primitive Christians were not only remarkable for the consistency of their conduct, but were also very eminently distinguished by the many miraculous gifts and graces bestowed by God upon them.

The Jews were the first and the most inveterate enemies the Christians had. They put them to death as often as they had it in their power; and when they revolted against the Romans, in the time of the Emperor Adrian, Barchochebas, who was at the head of that revolt, employed against the Christians the most rigorous punishments to compel them to blaspheme and renounce Jesus Christ. And we find that, even in the third century, they endeavoured to get into their hands Christian women, in order to scourge and stone them in their synagogues. They cursed the Christians three times a day in their synagogues; and their rabbins would not suffer them to converse with Christians upon any occasion; nor were they contented to hate and detest them, but they despatched emissaries all over the world to defame the Christians, and spread all sorts of calumnies against them. They accused them, among other things, of worshipping the sun, and the head of an ass; they reproached them with idleness, and being a useless set of people. They charged them with treason, and endeavouring to erect a new monarchy against that of the Romans. They affirmed that, in celebrating their mysteries, they used to kill a child, and eat his flesh. They accused them of the most shocking incests, and of intemperance in their feasts of charity. But the lives and behaviour of the first Christians were sufficient to refute all that was said against them, and evidently demonstrated that these accusations were mere calumny, and the effect of inveterate malice. Pliny the younger, who was governor of Pontus and Bithynia between the years 103 and 105, gives a very particular account of the Christians in that province, in a letter which he wrote to the Emperor Trajan, of which the following is an extract:—"I take the liberty to give you an account of every difficulty which arises to me. I have never been present at the examinations of the Christians; for which reason I know not what questions have been put to them, nor in what manner they have been punished. My behaviour towards those who have been accused to me has been this: I have interrogated them, in order to know whether they were really Christians. When they have confessed it, I have repeated the same question two or three times, threatening them with death if they did not renounce this religion. Those who have persisted in their confession, have been by my order led to punishment. I have even met with some Roman citizens guilty of this frenzy, whom, in regard to their quality, I have set apart from the rest, in order to send them to Rome. These persons declare that their whole crime, if they are guilty, consists in this, that on certain days they assemble before sunrise to sing alternately a hymn to Christ as to a god; and to oblige themselves, by the performance of their religious rites, not to be guilty of theft or adultery, to observe inviolably their word, and to be true to their trust. This disposition has obliged me to endeavour to inform myself still further of this matter, by putting to the torture two of their women-servants, whom they called deaconesses; but I could learn nothing more from them than that the superstition of these people is as ridiculous as their attachment to it is astonishing."

It is easy to discover the cause of the many persecutions to which the Christians were exposed during the first three centuries. The purity of the Christian morality, directly opposite to the corruption of the Pagans, was doubtless one of the most powerful motives of public aversion. To this may be added the many calumnies most unjustly spread concerning them by their enemies, particularly the Jews; and this occasioned so strong a prejudice against them, that the Pagans condemned them without inquiring into their doctrine, or permitting them to defend themselves. Besides, their worshipping Jesus Christ as God was contrary to one of the most ancient laws of the Roman empire, which expressly forbade the acknowledging of any god which had not been approved of by the Senate. But, notwithstanding the violent opposition made to the establishment of the Christian religion, it gained ground daily, and very soon made surprising progress in the Roman empire. In the third century, there were Christians in the senate, in the camp, in the palace,—in short, everywhere but in the temples and the theatres; they filled the towns, the country, and the islands. Men and women of all ages and conditions, and even those of the first dignities, embraced the faith; inso-much that the Pagans complained that the revenues of their temples were ruined. They were in such great numbers in the empire, that, as Tertullian expresses it, were they to have retired into another country, they would have left the Romans only a frightful solitude. For persecutions of the Christians, see the article PERSECUTION.

Christians are now divided into a variety of sects. The number of Christians now in the world, of all denominations, is variously calculated at from one hundred and seventy-five to two hundred and twenty-five millions.

Christians may be considered as nominal and real. There are vast numbers who are called Christians, not because they possess any love for Christ, but because they happen to be born in what is called a Christian country, educated by Christian parents, and sometimes attend Christian worship. There are also many whose minds are well informed respecting the Christian system, who prefer it to every other, and who make an open profession of it; and yet, after all, feel but little of the real power of Christianity. A real Christian is one whose understanding is enlightened by the influences of Divine grace, who is convinced of the depravity of his nature, who sees his own inability to help himself, who is taught to behold God as the chief good, the Lord Jesus as the only way to obtain felicity, and the Holy Spirit as the grand agent in applying the blessings of the gospel to his soul. His heart is renovated, and inclined to revere, honour, worship, trust in, and live to God. His affections are elevated above the world, and centre in God alone. He embraces him as his portion, loves him supremely, and is zealous in the defence and support of his cause. His temper is regulated, his powers roused to vigorous action, his thoughts spiritual, and his general deportment amiable and uniform. In fine, the true Christian character exceeds all others as much as the blaze of the meridian sun outshines the feeble light of the glow-worm.

CHRISTIANITY, the religion of Christians.

I. CHRISTIANITY, Foundation of.—Most, if not all Christians, whatever their particular tenets may be, acknowledge the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the sole foundation of their faith and practice. But as these books, or at least particular passages in them, have, from the ambiguity of language, been variously interpreted by different commentators, these diversities have given birth to a multiplicity of different sects. These, however, or at least the greatest number of them, appeal to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the ultimate standard,—the only infallible rule of faith and manners. If asked by what authority these books claim an absolute right to determine the consciences and understandings of men with regard to what they should believe and what they should do, they answer, That all Scripture, whether for doctrine, correction, or reproof, was given by immediate inspiration from God. If, again, interrogated how those books which they call Scripture are authenticated, they reply, That the Old and New Testaments are proved to be the Word of God by evidences both internal and external.

II. CHRISTIANITY, Evidences of the truth of.—The EXTERNAL EVIDENCES of the authenticity and Divine authority of the Scriptures have been divided into direct and collateral. The direct evidences are such as arise from the nature, consistency, and probability of the facts; and from the simplicity, uniformity, competency, and fidelity of the testimonies by which they are supported. The collateral evidences are either the same occurrences supported by heathen testimonies, or others which concur with and corroborate the history of Christianity. Its INTERNAL EVIDENCES arise either from its exact conformity with the character of God, from its aptitude to the frame and circumstances of man, or from those supernatural and powerful convictions which are impressed on the mind by the immediate operation of the Divine Spirit. We shall here chiefly follow Dr Doddridge, and endeavour to give some of the chief evidences which have been brought forward, and which every unprejudiced mind must confess are unanswerable.

First, Taking the matter merely in theory, it will appear highly probable that such a system as the gospel should be indeed a Divine revelation.

1. The case of mankind is naturally such as to need a Divine revelation. 1 John v. 19; Rom. i. 17; Eph. iii. 5. 2. There is, from the light of nature, considerable encouragement to hope that God would favour his creatures with so needful a blessing as a revelation appears. 3. We may easily conclude, that if a revelation were given, it would be introduced and transmitted in such a manner as Christianity is said to have been. 4. That the main doctrines of the gospel are of such a nature as we might in general suppose those of a Divine revelation would be,—rational, practical, and sublime. Heb. xi. 6; Luke xii. 2; 1 Tim. ii. 5; Matt. v. 48, x. 29, 30; Phil. iv. 8; Rom. ii. 5.

Secondly. It is, in fact, certain that Christianity is indeed a Divine revelation; for,—I. The books of the New Testament, now in our hands, were written by the first preachers and publishers of Christianity. In proof of this, observe,—1. That it is certain that Christianity is not a new religion, but that it was maintained by great multitudes quickly after the time in which Jesus is said to have appeared. 2. That there was certainly such a person as Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified at Jerusalem, when Pontius Pilate was governor there. 3. The first publishers of this religion wrote books which contained an account of the life and doctrine of Jesus, their master, and which went by the name of those that now make up our New Testament. 4. That the books of the New Testament have been preserved, in the main, uncorrupted to the present time, in the original language in which they were written. 5. That the translation of them now in our hands may be depended upon as, in all things most material, agreeable to the original. Now,—II. From allowing the New Testament to be genuine, according to the above proof, it will certainly follow that Christianity is a Divine revelation; for, in the first place, it is plainly evident that the writers of the New Testament certainly knew whether the facts were true or false. John i. 3, xix. 27, 35; Acts xxvi. 7–9. 2. That the character of these writers, so far as we can judge by their works, seems to render them worthy of regard, and leaves no room to imagine they intended to deceive us. The manner in which they tell their story is most happily adapted to gain our belief. There is no air of declamation and harangue; nothing that looks like artifice and design; no apologies, no encomiums, no reflections, no digressions; but the facts are recounted with great simplicity, just as they seem to have happened; and those facts are left to speak for themselves. Their integrity likewise evidently appears in the freedom with which they mention those circumstances which might have exposed their Master and themselves to the greatest contempt amongst prejudiced and inconsiderate men, such as they knew they must generally expect to meet with. John i. 45, 46, vii. 52; Luke ii. 4; Mark vi. 3; Matt. viii. 20; John vii. 48. It is certain that there are in their writings the most genuine traces not only of a plain and honest but a most pious and devout, a most benevolent and generous disposition, as every one must acknowledge who reads their writings. 3. The apostles were under no temptation to forge a story of this kind, or to publish it to the world, knowing it to be false. 4. Had they done so, humanly speaking, they must quickly have perished in it, and their foolish cause must have died with them, without ever gaining any credit in the world. Reflect, more particularly, on the nature of those grand facts,—the death, resurrection, and exaltation of Christ,—which formed the great foundation of the Christian scheme, as first exhibited by the apostles. The resurrection of a dead man, and his ascension into an abode in the upper world, were such strange things, that a thousand objections would immediately have been raised against them; and some extraordinary proof would have been justly required as a balance to them. Consider the manner in which the apostles undertook to prove the truth of their testimony to these facts, and it will evidently appear, that instead of confirming their scheme, it must have been sufficient utterly to have overthrown it, had it been itself the most probable imposture that the wit of man could ever have contrived. See Acts iii., ix., xiv., xix., &c. They did not merely assert that they had seen miracles wrought by Jesus, but that he had endowed them with a variety of miraculous powers; and these they undertook to display, not in such idle and useless tricks as sleight of hand might perform, but in such solid and important works as appeared worthy of Divine interposition, and entirely superior to human power. Nor were these things undertaken in a corner, in a circle of friends or dependants; nor were they said to be wrought, as might be suspected, by any confederates in the fraud; but they were done often in the most public manner. Would impostors have made such pretensions as these? or, if they had, must they not immediately have been exposed and ruined? Now, if the New Testament be genuine, it is certain that the apostles pretend to have wrought miracles in the very presence of those to whom their writings were addressed; nay, more, they profess likewise to have conferred those miraculous gifts in some considerable degree on others, even on the very persons to whom they write, and they appeal to their consciences as to the truth of it. And could there possibly be room for delusion here? 5. It is likewise certain that the apostles did gain early credit, and succeeded in a most wonderful manner. This is abundantly proved by the vast number of Churches established in early ages at Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, Colosse, &c., &c. 6. That, admitting the facts which they testified concerning Christ to be true, then it was reasonable for their contemporaries, and is reasonable for us, to receive the gospel which they have transmitted to us as a Divine revelation. The great thing they asserted was, that Jesus was the Christ, and that he was proved to be so by prophecies accomplished in him, and by miracles wrought by him, and by others in his name. If we attend to these, we shall find them to be no contemptible arguments, but must be forced to acknowledge that, the premises being established, the conclusion most easily and necessarily follows; and this conclusion, that Jesus is the Christ, taken in all its extent, is an abstract of the gospel revelation, and therefore is sometimes put for the whole of it. Acts viii. 37, xvii. 18. (See articles MIRACLE—PROPHECY.) 7. The truth of the gospel has also received further and very considerable confirmation from what has happened in the world since it was first published. And here we must desire every one to consider what God has been doing to confirm the gospel since its first publication, and he will find it a further evidence of its Divine original. We might argue at large from its surprising propagation in the world,—from the miraculous powers with which not only the apostles, but succeeding preachers of the gospel, and other converts, were endowed,—from the accomplishment of prophecies recorded in the New Testament,—and from the preservation of the Jews as a distinct people, notwithstanding the various difficulties and persecutions through which they have passed. We must not, however, forget to mention the confirmation it receives from the methods which its enemies have taken to destroy it; and these have generally been either persecution or falsehood, or cavilling at some particulars in revelation, without entering into the grand argument on which it is built, and fairly debating what is offered in its defence. The cause has gained considerably by the opposition made to it; the more it has been tried, the more it has been approved; and, we are bold to say, no honest man, unfettered by prejudice, can examine this system in all its parts, without being convinced that its origin is Divine.

III. CHRISTIANITY, General Doctrines of.—To remove the curse from our fallen race, and restore us to the favour and love of God; to revive in the heart of man that sympathy with the Divine character and will which might prompt the exercise of every faculty in the service of God, and draw forth every affection in the love of him;—to effect this was an object alone worthy of infinite wisdom and almighty power. Had a universal feeling of compassion pervaded the angelic hosts, on beholding the desolation which sin had wrought upon our earth, and prompted them to expend, with ceaseless activity, the whole energies of their intellectual and moral nature in devising and executing schemes for our deliverance from bondage,—it were all in vain. The regeneration of a lost world is an object too stupendous in conception for even their lofty intelligence to grasp, and too arduous in execution for even their exalted power to accomplish. But while the whole intelligent creation stood amazed, as it were, at the awful spectacle of a world which had thrown off allegiance to its God, the second person of the all-glorious Trinity, advancing to the throne of the Eternal Father, declared his willingness to undertake the office of ransoming our captive race, and effecting a reconciliation between rebellious man and his justly offended Maker. The mission and mediation of Christ were then declared to be the appointed means by which darkness and chaos were to be banished from our spiritual system, and the light of the knowledge of the glory of God was again to shine into the heart of man. At length, in the fulness of time, “God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, that he might redeem us who were under the law, and that we might receive the adoption of sons.” In prosecution of the work which the Father had given him to do, Jesus Christ appeared on earth, not clothed in the nature of angels, but of a man; and being thus constituted the representative of fallen humanity, he obeyed in its full extent the law which we had broken, and suffered, in all its severity, the punishment which we deserved. Though the great Lawgiver of the universe, “God over all, blessed for ever,” he condescended to become subject to those very statutes which bound in holy and harmonious subjection the whole intelligent creation to himself; and thus, by his perfect obedience as God-man, “he magnified the law and made it honourable.” The injury and dishonour which had been done, by our disobedience, to the character of God and the rectitude of his government, he fully repaired, and secured an everlasting righteousness on which we might build our hopes of salvation.

Again, as it is a law of the Divine government, that without shedding of blood there is no remission, Jesus Christ “offered himself up a sacrifice for sin,” and “gave his life a ransom for many.” As an assurance that he was indeed the Son of God, and that his sacrifice was indeed accepted of the Father, he was raised from the dead, and, having finished the work of atonement, he entered into the holy of holies, to minister before the throne in behalf of his redeemed people. That the purpose for which he left the bosom of the Father might not be frustrated, he commissions the Holy Spirit to carry home the truth concerning himself to the hearts of men; and thus rescuing them from the captivity of Satan, to introduce them into the glorious liberty of the children of God. And as soon as we have passed from death unto life, an all-important change is effected in our hearts by the Spirit of God, which, promoted by all the sanctified dispensations of Providence and the means of grace, constitutes the perfection of our nature, and prepares us for entering into the exercises and enjoyments of the upper sanctuary, where we shall be for ever like God, for we shall see him as he is.

IV. CHRISTIANITY, Morality and Superiority of.—It has been well observed, “that the two grand principles of action, according to the Christian system, are, the love of God, which is the sovereign passion in every gracious mind; and the love of man, which regulates our actions according to the various relations in which we stand, whether to communities or individuals. This sacred connection ought never to be totally extinguished by any temporary injury. It ought to subsist in some degree even amongst enemies. It requires that we should pardon the offences of others, as we expect pardon for our own; and that we should no further resist evil than is necessary for the preservation of personal rights and social happiness. It dictates every relative and reciprocal duty between parents and children, masters and servants, governors and subjects, friends and friends, men and men; nor does it merely enjoin the observation of equity, but likewise inspires the most sublime and extensive charity; a boundless and disinterested effusion of tenderness for the whole species, which feels their distress, and operates for their relief and improvement.”

“Christianity,” it has also been observed, and with the greatest propriety, “is superior to all other religions. The disciple of Jesus not only contends that no system of religion has ever yet been exhibited so consistent with itself, so congruous to philosophy and the common sense of mankind, as Christianity; he likewise avers, that it is infinitely more productive of real consolation than all other religious or philosophical tenets which have ever entered into the soul, or been applied to the heart of man; for what is death to that mind which considers eternity as the career of its existence? What are the frowns of men to him who claims an eternal world as his inheritance? What is the loss of friends to that heart which feels, with more than natural conviction, that it shall quickly rejoin them in a more tender, intimate, and permanent intercourse, than any of which the present life is susceptible? What are the vicissitudes of external things to a mind which strongly and uniformly anticipates a state of endless and immutable felicity? What are mortifications, disappointments, and insults, to a spirit which is conscious of being the original offspring and adopted child of God,—which knows that its omnipotent Father will, in proper time, effectually assert the dignity and privileges of its nature? In a word, as this earth is but a speck in the creation, as time is but an instant in proportion to eternity, such are the hopes and prospects of the Christian in comparison of every sublunary misfortune or difficulty. It is, therefore, in his judgment, the eternal wonder of angels, and indelible opprobrium of man, that a religion so worthy of God, so suitable to the frame and circumstances of our nature, so consonant to all the dictates of reason, so friendly to the dignity and improvement of intelligent beings, so pregnant with genuine comfort and delight, should be rejected and despised by any of the human race.”

V. CHRISTIANITY, Success of.—Despised as Christianity has been by many, yet it has had an extensive progress through the world, and still remains to be professed by great numbers of mankind; though it is to be lamented many are unacquainted with its genuine influence. It was early and rapidly propagated through the whole Roman empire, which then contained almost the whole known world; and herein we cannot but admire both the wisdom and the power of God. "Destitute of all human advantages," says an excellent writer, "protected by no authority, assisted by no art, not recommended by the reputation of its Author, not enforced by eloquence in its advocates, the Word of God grew mightily, and prevailed. Twelve men, poor, artless, and illiterate, we behold triumphing over the fiercest and most determined opposition,—over the tyranny of the magistrate, and the subtleties of the philosopher,—over the prejudices of the Gentile, and the bigotry of the Jew. They established a religion which held forth high and venerable mysteries, such as the pride of man would induce him to suspect, because he could not perfectly comprehend them; which preached doctrines pure and spiritual, such as corrupt nature was prone to oppose, because it shrunk from the severity of their discipline; which required its followers to renounce almost every opinion they had embraced as sacred, and every interest they had pursued as important; which even exposed them to every species of danger and infamy,—to persecution unmerited and unpitied,—to the gloom of a prison, and to the pangs of death. Hopeless as this prospect might appear to the view of short-sighted man, the gospel yet emerged from the obscurity in which it was likely to be overwhelmed by the complicated distresses of its friends, and the unrelenting cruelty of its foes. It succeeded in a peculiar degree, and in a peculiar manner; it derived that success from truth, and obtained it under circumstances where falsehood must have been detected and crushed."

"What, then," asks Dr Inglis in his 'Vindication of the Christian Faith,' "has Christianity done for us?—It was certainly to be expected that the sublime and elevating views which it presents should produce some salutary effect; and though Christians have great cause to take shame to themselves, individually, for not having sufficiently profited by their advantages, God hath not revealed himself in vain, but hath in fact, as well as in promise, taught men to live more 'soberly, righteously, and godly.'

"If the gospel of Christ has recommended such purity, and humility, and meekness, and charity, as were not duly recognised by unassisted reason, it has not been without effect. However lamentable be the wickedness which has still prevailed, the Christian world has never been without men, who have been enabled, through divine grace, to adorn by these peculiar virtues the doctrine of their God and Saviour; nor has their example ever been without its influence on the mind and temper of others. If impurity, and hatred, and revenge, still lurk in the heart, at least they dare not, as in former times, stalk abroad in the face of day, and justify themselves to the world. Acknowledging, as it were, that their deeds are evil, they come not to the light, lest they be reproved.

"It is impossible, indeed, to question the efficacy of the gospel in respect of some of its distinguishing virtues; for the law of Christ in regard to them has so far recommended itself, as to be embraced and sanctioned by human institutions, which confessedly regulate the conduct of men."

"Although," to use the words of Bishop Porteus, "Christianity has not always been so well understood, or so honestly practised, as it ought to have been; although its spirit has been often mistaken, and its precepts misapplied, yet, under all these disadvantages, it has gradually produced a visible change in those points which most materially concern the peace and quiet of the world. Its beneficent spirit has spread itself through all the different relations and modifications of life, and communicated its kindly influence to almost every public and private concern of mankind. It has insensibly worked itself into the inmost frame and constitution of civil States. It has given a tinge to the complexion of their governments, to the temper and administration of their laws. It has restrained the spirit of the prince and the madness of the people. It has softened the rigour of despotism, and tamed the insolence of conquest. It has, in some degree, taken away the edge of the sword, and thrown even over the horrors of war a veil of mercy. It has descended into families,—has diminished the pressure of private tyranny,—improved every domestic endearment,—given tenderness to the parent, humanity to the master, respect to superiors, to inferiors ease. So that mankind are, upon the whole, even in a temporal view, under infinite obligations to the mild and pacific temper of the gospel, and have reaped from it more substantial worldly benefits than from any other institution upon earth. As one proof of this, among many others, consider only the shocking carnage made in the human species by the exposure of infants, the gladiatorial shows, which sometimes cost Europe twenty or thirty thousand lives in a month; and the exceedingly cruel usage of slaves, allowed and practised by the ancient Pagans. These were not the accidental and temporary excesses of a sudden fury, but were legal, and established, and constant methods of murdering and tormenting mankind. Had Christianity done nothing more than brought into disuse, as it confessedly has done, the two former of these inhuman customs entirely, and the latter to a very great degree, it had justly merited the title of the benevolent religion; but this is far from being all. Throughout the more enlightened parts of Christendom there prevails a gentleness of manners widely different from the ferocity of the most civilized nations of antiquity; and that liberality with which every species of distress is relieved, is a virtue peculiar to the Christian name."

But we may ask further, What success has it had on the mind of man, as it respects his eternal welfare? How many thousands have felt its power, rejoiced in its benign influence, and under its dictates been constrained to devote themselves to the glory and praise of God? Burdened with guilt, incapable of finding relief from human resources, the mind has here found peace unspeakable, in beholding that sacrifice which alone could atone for transgression. Here the hard and impenitent heart has been softened, the impetuous passions restrained, the ferocious temper subdued, powerful prejudices conquered, ignorance dispelled, and the obstacles to real happiness removed. Here the Christian, looking round on the glories and blandishments of this world, has been enabled, with a noble contempt, to despise all. Here death itself, the king of terrors, has lost its sting; and the soul, with a holy magnanimity, has borne up in the agonies of a dying hour, and calmly passed to everlasting bliss.

In respect to the future spread of Christianity, we have reason to believe that all nations shall feel its happy effects. The prophecies are pregnant with matter as to this belief. It seems that not only a nation or a country, but the whole habitable globe, shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ. And who is there that has ever known the excellency of this system,—who is there that has ever experienced its happy efficacy,—who is there that has ever been convinced of its divine origin, its delightful nature, and peaceful tendency—but what must join the benevolent and royal poet in saying, “Let the whole earth be filled with its glory! Amen and amen!”

CHRISTMAS, the day on which the nativity of our blessed Saviour is celebrated.

The first traces that we find of the observation of this day, are in the second century, about the time of the Emperor Commodus. The Decretal Epistles, indeed, carry it up a little higher, and say that Telesphorus, who lived in the reign of Antoninus Pius, ordered Divine service to be celebrated, and an angelic hymn to be sung the night before the nativity of our Saviour. That it was kept before the time of Constantine we have a melancholy proof; for whilst the persecution raged under Diocletian, who then kept his court at Nicomedia, that tyrant, among other acts of cruelty, finding multitudes of Christians assembled together to celebrate Christ's nativity, commanded the church doors where they were met to be shut, and fire to be put to it, which soon reduced them and the church to ashes.

Considerable diversity of opinion exists as to the origin of the festival of Christmas. By some it is traced to the Jewish Eucænia, or Feast of the Dedication, mentioned in 1 Maccabees iv. 56, 59; others regard it as having been substituted for the heathen Saturnalia. It was not until the sixth century that the whole Christian world agreed to celebrate the nativity on the same day.

CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF. Among the Jews these two books are comprised in one, which they term “Words of Days,” or “Journals,” probably because they were compiled from diaries or annals. The Greek translators seem to have considered them as a supplement, and indeed, they form the closing books of the most correct editions of the Hebrew Bible. Jerome was the first who applied to them the name of Chronicles. Concerning their author we have no distinct information. The Hebrews commonly assign the Chronicles to Ezra, who, they say, composed them after the return from the captivity, and was assisted in this work by the prophets Zechariah and Haggai, who were then living. One objection, however, brought forward by Mr Horne, appears fatal to this supposition, and that is, that the author continues the genealogy of Zerubbabel to the twelfth generation; but Ezra did not live to that time, and consequently could not have written the genealogy in question. The Chronicles are an abridgment of all the sacred history, but more especially from the origin of the Jewish nation to their return from the first captivity. The FIRST BOOK traces the rise and propagation of the people of Israel from Adam; and afterwards gives a circumstantial account of the reign and transactions of David. In the SECOND BOOK the narrative is continued, and relates the progress and dissolution of the kingdom of Judah, and even the very year of the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. As very little notice is taken of the kings of Israel, it is not improbable that this book was chiefly extracted from the records of the kingdom of Judah. The period of time embraced in the books of Chronicles is about 3468 years; and they may be conveniently divided into four parts, viz. :—

1. The genealogies of those persons through whom the Messiah was to descend, from Adam to the captivity and to the time of Ezra. 2. The histories of Saul and David. 3. The history of the united kingdoms of Israel and Judah under Solomon; and, 4. The history of the kingdom of Judah after the secession of the ten tribes from Rehoboam, to its after subversion by Nebuchadnezzar.

There are many variations, as well in facts as in dates, between the books of Kings and the Chronicles, which are to be explained and reconciled chiefly on the principle, that the latter are supplementary to the former; not forgetting that the language was slightly varied from what it had been,—that various places had received new names, or had undergone sundry vicissitudes,—that certain things were now better known to the returned Jews under other appellations than those by which they had formerly been distinguished,—and that from the materials before him, which often were not the same as those used by the abridgers of the histories of the kings, the author takes those passages which seemed to him best adapted to his purpose, and most suitable to the times in which he wrote. It must be considered, too, that he often elucidates obsolete and ambiguous words in former books, by a different mode of spelling them, or by a different order of the words used, even when he does not use a distinct phraseology of narration, which he sometimes does. In the original copies of the Hebrew Bible, the Books of Chronicles were comprised in one book; but in the present Hebrew Bible they are divided as with us.

CHRONOLOGY, SACRED, the science of computing and adjusting periods of time, with the view of determining exactly when the events of Scripture history occurred. The chronology of the English Bible, following the opinion of Archbishop Ussher, acknowledges the authority of the Hebrew text. Others again, as Dr Hales, prefer the chronology of the Septuagint and Josephus. A few remarks may be useful in regard to this difficult question. “For some time,” it has been remarked, “before the rise of Christianity, the professors of the Mosaic religion had been divided into three distinct and independent communities, each possessing a temple as the centre of their worship, a peculiar language and alphabet, and each viewing the other two with feelings of the most rancorous jealousy. These were, 1. The Samaritans, whose temple was situated upon Mount Gerizim, and who used a corrupted Syriac dialect, with the Phœnician characters. 2. The Hebrew Jews, who revered the temple of Jerusalem, and used the square characters of the modern Hebrew Bibles. 3. and lastly, The Hellenist Jews of Egypt, whose usual language was the Greek, written in its own letters, and who possessed a temple at Heliopolis. Of these three sects, the two former exist to this day; and although the third has entirely melted away since the Mohammedan conquest of the Greek countries, the community of language which existed between them and a large proportion of the early Christian Church, has given them and their opinions a degree of celebrity which they might not otherwise have possessed.

“From these places of worship have proceeded three distinct copies of the whole or a part of the sacred writings, which, although agreeing in general differ most materially in the chronology." In favour of the Hebrew, various arguments might be adduced. 1. The Hebrews have from the earliest period been a very numerous nation, and they have been invariably distinguished for their superstitious reverence for the letter of the law, throughout the whole of their history. 2. There is a perfect accordance between the different copies of the Hebrew edition, whereas in the Samaritan and Septuagint editions there is considerable variety. 3. The square characters of the original Hebrew appear to be more natural than the Samaritan.—On the other hand, various objections have been urged against the Hebrew chronology:—1. It is said by the believers in the Septuagint, that the period at which the sons of the patriarchs were born, according to the Hebrew, is inconsistent with the immense length of their fathers' lives, according to which they must have been longer of reaching maturity. This argument plainly proceeds on a gratuitous assumption. 2. According to the Hebrew chronology, Abraham had attained to manhood before the death of Noah, which is said to be repugnant to the tenor of the sacred history. A little consideration, however, will show that although for some time contemporary, the distance at which they lived from each other must have prevented Abraham from holding intercourse with Noah.

"The first of these objections against the Hebrew chronology has no foundation whatever, except in the minds of the objectors themselves. Nothing can be more absurd than to found an objection on the constitution of the patriarchal race, concerning which we are in total ignorance, with the exception of the revealed fact as to their longevity. Indeed, the generally assumed reason for this length of life—to hasten the population of the world—would be much more perfectly attained on the Hebrew system, than on that of the Greek version.

"The other objection is taken from the chronology after the deluge, by which it appears that Abraham had attained to manhood before the death of Noah, which is said to be repugnant to the tenor of the sacred history. I cannot see in what respect it is so; for as the builders of Babel had journeyed from the east for some time ere they reached Shinar, and as the scene of most of the remarkable events of the great patriarch's life lay to the westward even of that, he can have had little or no intercourse with Noah, who probably remained in the land from which the journey to Shinar commenced."

The chief difference between these two schemes of chronology is found in those periods which extend from the creation to the deluge, and from thence to the birth of Abraham. According to the Hebrew computation, the number of years comprised in the first period, amounts only to one thousand six hundred and fifty-six, and the second to two hundred and ninety-two. But in the Septuagint the numbers respectively are two thousand two hundred and sixty-two, and one thousand and seventy-two; thus extending the interval between the creation and the birth of Christ, from four thousand to nearly six thousand years. These variations have not yet been satisfactorily accounted for, but much light has been thrown upon the subject by the laborious investigations of Ussher, Jackson, and Hales; and the result with many, though not with all, has been to give an increased degree of confidence in the larger computations of the Septuagint. We think, however, that internal probability, as well as the Hebrew text, is against it.

The most important epoch from which years are reckoned, is the Christian era, or the era of the Incarnation, which is almost universally employed in Christian countries, and is even used in some Eastern nations. The commencement of this era is the 1st of January, in the fourth year of the 194th Olympiad, the 753d from the foundation of Rome, and the 4714th of the Julian period. It is usually supposed to begin with the year of the birth of Christ; but there are various opinions with regard to the year in which that event took place. The most probable is, that the birth of Christ happened five years and seven days before the initial day of the vulgar era. In the Christian era the years are simply marked and distinguished by the cardinal numbers; those before Christ being distinguished by the characters B.C. (Before Christ), or A.C. (Ante Christum); and those after Christ by A.D. (Anno Domini).

In Dr Hales' 'Analysis of Ancient Chronology,' the following maxims are laid down, derived, as the author informs us, from Sir Isaac Newton's 'Rules for Philosophical Investigation':—1. "To adhere to the Scriptural standard. 2. To begin with the analytical method, and end with the synthetical. 3. Not to adopt any date that shall be repugnant to any established date. 4. Never to form an hypothesis, nor to assign a conjectural date, except in case of downright necessity. 5. Carefully and critically to distinguish between different persons, in different ages and countries, called by the same name; and on the other hand, to identify persons having different names in different authors, or at different times."

CHRYSOLEITE, a precious stone, probably the tenth on the high priest's pectoral, bearing the name of Zebulun. Exod. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13. It is transparent, the colour of gold, with a mixture of green, which displays a fine lustre. The Hebrew (tarshish) is translated by the Septuagint, and by Jerome (sometimes, carbuncle,—by the rabbins, beryl. It is mentioned as the seventh foundation of the New Jerusalem. Rev. xxi. 20. Gesenius supposes that this precious stone was called tarshish, as having been brought from Tarshish or Tartessus in Spain.

CHRYSOPRASUS, the tenth of those precious stones which adorn the foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem; its colour is green, inclining to gold, as its name imports. Rev. xxi. 20.

CHUB, a word which occurs only in Ezek. xxx. 5, and probably signifies the Cubians, placed by Ptolemy in the Mareotis. Bochart takes it to be Paliurus, a city in Marmorica, because the Syriac word denotes paliurus, a sort of thorn. Some understand Coben, a part of Ethiopia. Perhaps it should be written as Gesenius seems to think—Nub, Nubia, which at least is followed by the Arabic version, doubtless in accordance with the Septuagint, although this word is wanting in our MSS. of the latter. The Arabic has people of Nubia. Perhaps it might be read Lub, Lybia.

CHURCH. This word, which is evidently derived from Kuriakon, what belongs to the Lord, is used in a variety of significations, the chief of which may be noticed. 1. The Greek word ekklesia, translated Church, properly denotes an assembly called together upon business, whether lawful or unlawful. Acts xix. 32, 39. 2. It is understood of the collective body of Christians, or all those over the face of the earth who profess to believe in Christ, and acknowledge him to be the Saviour of mankind. This is called the visible Church. 3. By the word Church, also, we are to understand the whole body of God's chosen people, in every period of time. Those on earth are called the militant, and those in heaven the triumphant Church. This is termed by divines the invisible Church. 4. By a particular Church we understand an assembly of Christians united together, and meeting in one place for the solemn worship of God. To this agrees the definition given by the compilers of the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England,—"A congregation of faithful men, in which the true Word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered, according to Christ's ordinances, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." Acts ix. 31; Gal. i. 2, 22; 1 Cor. xiv. 34; Acts xx. 17; Col. iv. 15. 5. The word is now used also to denote any particular denomination of Christians distinguished by particular doctrines, ceremonies, &c.; as the Romish Church, Greek Church, English Church, &c.

The Church may be viewed under a twofold aspect or form; the one external or visible, the other internal or invisible. The Church viewed as invisible, consists, according to the Westminster Confession, "of the whole number of the elect that have been, are, or shall be, gathered into one, under Christ the head thereof." Of this Church the apostle speaks, Eph. v. 25-27:—"Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the Church, and gave himself for it; that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word. That he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish." The invisible Church, viewed as comprehending the whole number of the elect, will not be completed until that day when "the Lord shall make up his jewels." This viewed as actually existing on earth at any particular period, is composed of those who have been called by divine grace into the fellowship of the gospel and sanctified by the truth; and these constitute one Church, because, however distant in place or diversified in circumstances, they are vitally united to Christ as their head, and to one another as members of the same body, by the power of the Spirit and of faith. "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit." 1 Cor. xii. 13. The members of this invisible Church are distinguished by various peculiarities. 1. They are born again. 2. They come out from the world. 1 Cor. vi. 17. 3. They openly profess love to Christ. Jas. ii. 14, 26; Mark viii. 34. 4. They walk in all the ordinances of the Lord blameless.

The visible Church, according to the Westminster Confession, consists "of all those throughout the world that profess the true religion, together with their children." Of this Church the apostle speaks, 1 Cor. xii. 28:—"And God hath set some in the Church, first, apostles; secondarily, prophets; thirdly, teachers; after that miracles; then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues." It is important to notice, that real saintship is not the distinguishing criterion of the members of the visible Church. None, indeed, can without it honestly offer themselves to Church-fellowship; but they cannot be refused admission for the mere want of it; for, 1. God alone can judge the heart. Deceivers counterfeit saintship. 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 7. 2. God himself admitted many members of the Jewish Church, whose hearts were unsanctified. Dent. xxix. 3, 4, 13;

John vi. 70. 3. John the Baptist and the apostles required no more than outward appearance of faith and repentance in order to baptism. Matt. iii. 5, 7; Acts ii. 28; viii. 13, 23, 24. 4. Many that were admitted members in the Churches of Judea, Corinth, Philippi, Laodicea, Sardis, &c., were unregenerate. Acts v. 1, 10; viii. 13, 23; 1 Cor. i. 11; v. 11; Phil. iii. 18, 19; Rev. iii. 5, 15, 17. 5. Christ compares the gospel Church to a floor on which corn and chaff are mingled together; to a net in which good and bad are gathered, Matt. xiii.; to a field where tares as well as good seed are sown; and the apostle Paul compares it to a great house in which are vessels of every kind, some to honour and some to dishonour. 2 Tim. ii. 20. From all these as well as other considerations, it is plain that the ground of admission to the fellowship and privileges of the visible Church is a scriptural profession. Of this alone the office-bearers of the Church are capable of judging; and to proceed upon a judgment about their spiritual state in the sight of God, would be to assume the prerogative of Him who alone "searcheth the heart."

The Congregationalists deny the existence of a universal visible Church, limiting the idea of a Church to a single congregation which ordinarily assembles in one place for public worship. But such a view is directly opposed to many passages of the New Testament. Thus we are told, Acts viii. 3, that "Saul made havoc of the Church;" and again, in the most general language, Gal. i. 13, "I persecuted the Church of God and wasted it." The various designations given to the Church evidently present it in a collective, not an isolated, individual aspect. Thus it is termed "a body," "the kingdom of God," "the house of God."

The Westminster Confession declares the children of professing Christians to be members of the visible Church. This is denied by Anti-pædobaptists, but God's covenant with his Church extends to parents and their children. "I will be a God unto thee and thy seed after thee," was the promise made to Abraham, the father of the faithful; and in the New Testament it is declared, "The promise is to you and your children, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." Infants were members of the Church under the Old Testament, and there is no word of their exclusion under the New; nay, in the New Testament there are various testimonies that the privilege of church-membership extends to infants still. Our Lord himself asserts it most expressly, Luke xviii. 16:—"But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God."

A true Church shall always be preserved upon earth. Often has the Church been greatly reduced as to numbers, and particular Churches have become so corrupt that they might rather be considered as synagogues of Satan; but never has the Church of Christ been annihilated. And as the Church has subsisted from its first erection in paradise to the present hour, so it will continue throughout all subsequent ages, till the second coming of Christ. Earthly kingdoms may be overturned, and the mightiest empires laid in ruins; but neither power nor policy can ever accomplish the utter destruction of the Church. She is "built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against her." Many and severe may be the persecutions through which she is destined to pass, but, like the typical bush on Mount Horeb, which Moses saw, though burning she shall not be consumed.

CHURCH, CONGREGATIONAL. See CONGREGATIONALISTS.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND, is the Church established by law in that kingdom.

When and by whom Christianity was first introduced into Britain, cannot, perhaps, be exactly ascertained. Eusebius, indeed, positively declares that it was by the apostles and their disciples. It is also said that numbers of persons professed the Christian faith there about the year 150; and according to Ussher, there was in the year 182 a school of learning, to provide the British churches with proper teachers. Popery, however, was established in England by Austin the monk, and the errors of it we find everywhere prevalent, until Wickliffe was raised up by Divine Providence to refute them. The Church of England remained in subjection to the pope until the time of Henry VIII. Henry, indeed, in early life, and during the former part of his reign, was a bigoted Papist. He burnt the famous Tyndale, who made one of the first and best translations of the New Testament; and he wrote in defence of the Seven Sacraments against Luther, for which the pope gave him the title of "The Defender of the Faith." But at length in the providence of God he was led to embrace the Reformed faith, and to establish it in the country, thus conferring upon England a blessing the full value of which it is impossible to calculate.

The doctrines of the Church of England, which are contained in the Thirty-Nine Articles, are certainly Calvinistic, though this has been denied by some modern writers, especially by Dr Kipling, in a tract entitled 'The Articles of the Church of England proved not to be Calvinistic.' These Articles were founded, for the most part, upon a body of articles compiled and published in the reign of Edward VI. They were first passed in the convocation, and confirmed by royal authority in 1562. They were afterwards ratified anew in the year 1571, and again by Charles I. (See ARTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.) The law requires a subscription to these Articles by all persons who are admitted into holy orders. In the course of the last century, disputes arose among the clergy respecting the propriety of subscribing to any human formulary of religious sentiments. An application for its removal was made to Parliament in 1772, by the petitioning clergy, and received the most public discussion in the House of Commons, but was rejected in the House of Lords.

The government of the Church of England is episcopal. The King is the supreme earthly head. There are two archbishops and twenty-eight bishops, all peers of the realm, and all indebted for their appointment to the Crown. The province of York comprises four bishoprics, viz., Durham, Carlisle, Chester, and the Isle of Man; all the rest of the bishoprics are in the province of Canterbury. The clerical dignitary next to the bishop is the archdeacon, whose duty, though very different in different dioceses, may be termed that of a representative of the bishop in several of his less important functions. The number of archdeacons in England is about sixty. The name of dean (decanus) was probably derived from his originally superintending ten canons or prebendaries. Each bishop has a chapter or council appointed to assist him, and each chapter has a dean as its president; but there are in the Church of England many deaneries of other descriptions. Rector is, in general, the title of a clergyman holding a living of which the tithes are entire; vicar is understood of a living where the great tithes have passed into secular hands. The very general name of curate signifies sometimes (as curé in France) a clergyman in possession of a living, but more frequently one exercising the spiritual office in a parish under the rector or vicar. The latter are temporary curates, their appointment being a matter of arrangement with the rector or vicar; the former, being more permanent, are called perpetual curates, and are appointed by the impropriator of the tithe in a parish which has neither rector nor vicar. The name of priest is, in general, confined to the clergy of the Church of Rome; in the Church of England the corresponding term is a clerk in orders. A parson denotes a clergyman in possession of a parochial church. Deacon is, in England, not a layman, as in Calvinistic countries, but a clergyman of limited qualifications, entitled to preach, baptize, marry, and bury, but not to administer the Lord's Supper. Readers are not regular clergymen, but laymen of good character, licensed by the bishop to read prayers in churches or chapels where there is no clergyman.

The number of Church livings in England and Wales is very great, being fully ten thousand five hundred. From this multiplicity of benefices, and from the general smallness of the incomes, have arisen two great irregularities,—pluralities and non-residence,—both forbidden by the ancient statutes of the Church, but both long sanctioned by usage. Many clergymen hold livings without doing duty at any of them; others do duty in one or in two which are adjacent to each other, and have a curate for the more distant; whilst curates frequently do duty at two and sometimes at three distinct places of worship. To prevent, or at least to lessen, the abuse of non-residence, an Act of Parliament was passed in 1813, directing that every non-resident incumbent should nominate a curate at a salary of not less than eighty pounds a-year, unless the entire living should be less. The effect of this act was to reduce the number of non-resident clergymen by eight hundred fully.

A part, and by no means an inconsiderable one, of the tithes of England, is held by laymen; but as the Church has other sources of income, its total revenue is computed at nearly three millions of pounds; but the absorption of large sums by several of the prelates, as the Bishops of Durham, Winchester, and London, and the accumulation of the best livings amongst a few individuals of influence, reduce the annual average income of the curates, or most numerous class, to little more than one hundred pounds a-year.

CHURCH OF IRELAND, is the same as the Church of England, and is governed by two archbishops, and twelve bishops.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. At what precise period Christianity was first introduced into Scotland is not known; but at a very early period, when the rest of the island was in complete darkness, the light of Divine truth was maintained and diffused by the Culdees, until at length, towards the end of the thirteenth century, the primitive scriptural and presbyterian Church of Scotland was suppressed by the tyranny of the Church of Rome. For more than two centuries Popery held undisputed authority in the northern as well as the southern part of Britain. Soon after the Reformation commenced in Germany, however, its principles found their way into Scotland, and spread with such rapidity, that it became necessary, in 1525, by act of Parliament, to forbid "disputations about the heresies of Luther, except it be to the confusion thereof, and that by clerks in the schools alenary." The martyrdom of Patrick Hamilton, which soon followed, led men to inquire into the truth of the reformed opinions. Inquiry led to conviction, and the adherents of these opinions became a numerous body, including men of all classes in society. Keen and long-continued was the struggle between the Popish and the Protestant party. Not Hamilton alone, but Mill, Wishart, and many others, sealed their testimony with their blood. At length the truth of God, through his blessing, prevailed. On the 24th August 1560, the Scottish parliament passed an act, in accordance with the petition of the Scottish reformers, abrogating and annulling the papal jurisdiction, and all authority flowing therefrom. Thus it was left to the Reformed Church to form its own ecclesiastical arrangements. The first meeting, accordingly, of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland was held on the 20th of December of the same year. The number that convened was small; it consisted of forty members, only six of whom were ministers. The first act of this assembly was to draw up the First Book of Discipline. This important document, containing the fundamental principles and the chief points of the government and discipline of the Church of Scotland, was drawn up by John Knox and the most eminent of the Scottish Reformers; approved by the General Assembly; and subscribed by the majority of the nobles and inferior barons and gentry composing the privy council of the kingdom. The First Book of Discipline, however, was never ratified either by the Parliament or the Queen. The Assembly, holding its regular annual meeting, gradually carried forward the system of presbyterial polity in all its arrangements. In seven years from the first Assembly, the Church of Scotland could number two hundred and fifty-two ministers, four hundred and sixty-seven readers, and one hundred and fifty-four exhorters. In 1581 an act was passed by the Assembly, erecting at once thirteen Presbyteries, and recommending the speedy extension of the system throughout the kingdom. As the Church had failed in obtaining the sanction of the civil government to the First Book of Discipline, the Second Book of Discipline was drawn up and approved by the Church, as well as ratified by the State, and is regarded to this day as the standard of the Church of Scotland in respect of government and discipline. At length, in 1592, by act of Parliament, the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, in its doctrine, worship, government, and discipline, was ratified and recognised as the Established Church of that country. The provisions of this act, which has been regarded as the great charter of the Church of Scotland, are thus briefly stated by Dr Hetherington:—"The act 1592 ratified the General Assemblies, Synods, Presbyteries, and particular Sessions of the Church; declaring them, with the jurisdiction and discipline belonging to them, to be in all time coming most just, good, and godly, notwithstanding whatsoever statutes, acts, and laws, canon, civil, or municipal, made to the contrary. It ratified and embodied also some of the leading propositions in the Second Book of Discipline, relating to the power of these judicatories. It appointed General Assemblies to be held once every year, or oftener, pro re nata, as occasion should require; the time and place of next meeting to be appointed by his Majesty or his commissioner, or, provided neither of them should be present, by the Assembly itself. It declared that the act of the Parliament 1584, respecting the royal supremacy, should be in nowise prejudicial to the privileges of the office-bearers of the Church concerning heads of religion, matters of heresy, excommunication, the appointment or deprivation of ministers, or any such essential censures, warranted by the Word of God. And it declared the act of the same Parliament, granting commission to bishops and other judges appointed by his Majesty in ecclesiastical causes, to be null, and of no avail, force, or effect in time coming; and ordained presentations to be directed to Presbyteries, who should have full power to give collation to benefices, and to manage all ecclesiastical causes within their bounds, provided they admitted such qualified ministers as were presented by his Majesty or other lay patrons. In another part of the same act it was provided, that in case a Presbytery should refuse to admit a qualified minister, presented by the patron, it should be lawful to the patron to retain the whole fruits of that benefice in his own hands."

Although the obtaining of such an act in her favour was undoubtedly a great boon to the Church, her peace and safety were far from secure. King James VI. had a secret leaning to Episcopacy, even before he ascended the throne of England, and after that event he found himself in a situation better fitted for the accomplishment of his object. Presbytery, accordingly, was overthrown, and Prelacy introduced. Charles I., the unfortunate son of James, was anxious to carry forward his father's plans, and, if possible, to assimilate the Church of Scotland to that of England. With this view he endeavoured to introduce a liturgy into Scotland, a step which met with the most determined resistance. The indignation of the Scottish people was roused. They bound themselves by the Solemn League and Covenant, in 1638, and the same year the General Assembly accomplished the Second Reformation, as it has been called, abolishing Episcopacy and restoring Presbytery. Charles II., however, on his restoration to the throne, re-established Episcopacy in Scotland. The Presbyterians continued firm to their principles, and, with the Revolution, they obtained the triumph of their cause. By act of Parliament, in 1690, Presbytery was finally established in Scotland, and by the Treaty of Union in 1707, it was agreed, both on the part of England and Scotland, that the Presbyterian Church government shall be the only government of Christ's Church in that part of Great Britain called Scotland. The Confession adhered to in the Church of Scotland is the Westminster Confession, which, at the Revolution, was recognised as the standard of the national faith. This Confession, then, along with the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, contain the avowed doctrines of the Church, which, accordingly, are strictly Scriptural and Calvinistic. The details of the government of the Church are thus clearly and distinctly stated by Mr Buck, in his 'Theological Dictionary,' under the article Presbyterianism:—

"As to the church government among the Scotch Presbyterians, no one is ignorant that, from the first dawn of the Reformation among us till the era of the Revolution, there was a perpetual struggle between the court and the people, for the establishment of an episcopal or a presbyterian form; the former model of ecclesiastical polity was patronised by the house of Stuart, on account of the support which it gave to the prerogatives of the crown; the latter was the favourite of the majority of the people, perhaps not so much on account of its superior claim to apos-tological institution, as because the laity are mixed with the clergy in church judicatories, and the two orders, which under episcopacy are kept so distinct, incorporated, as it were, into one body. In the Scottish Church, every regulation of public worship, every act of discipline, and every ecclesiastical censure, which in other churches flows from the authority of a diocesan bishop, or from a convocation of the clergy, is the joint work of a certain number of clergymen and laymen acting together with equal authority, and deciding every question by a plurality of voices. The laymen, who thus form an essential part of the ecclesiastical courts of Scotland, are called ruling elders, and hold the same office, as well as the same name, with those brethren (Acts xv.) who joined with the apostles and elders at Jerusalem in determining the important question concerning the necessity of imposing upon the Gentile converts the ritual observances of the law of Moses. These lay-elders Paul enjoined Timothy (1 Tim. v. 17) to account worthy of double honour, if they should rule well, and discharge the duties for which they were separated from the multitude of their brethren. In the Church of Scotland every parish has two or three of those lay-elders, who are grave and serious persons, chosen from among the heads of families, of known orthodoxy, and steady adherence to the worship, discipline, and government of the Church. Being solemnly engaged to use their utmost endeavours for the suppression of vice, and the cherishing of piety and virtue, and to exercise discipline faithfully and diligently, the minister, in the presence of the congregation, sets them apart to their office by solemn prayer; and concludes the ceremony, which is sometimes called ordination, with exhorting both elders and people to their respective duties.

"The kirk-session, which is the lowest ecclesiastical judicatory, consists of the minister and those elders of the congregation. The minister is ex officio moderator, but has no negative voice over the decision of the session; nor, indeed, has he a right to vote at all, unless when the voice of the elders are equal and opposite. He may, indeed, enter his protest against their sentence, if he think it improper, and appeal to the judgment of the presbytery; but this privilege belongs equally to every elder, as well as to every person who may believe himself aggrieved by the proceedings of the session. The deacons, whose proper office it is to take care of the poor, may be present in every session, and offer their counsel on all questions that come before it; but, except in what relates to the distribution of alms, they have no decisive vote with the minister and elders.

"The next judicatory is the presbytery, which consists of all the pastors within a certain district, and one ruling elder from each parish, commissioned by his brethren to represent, in conjunction with the minister, the session of that parish. The presbytery treats of such matters as concern the particular churches within its limits—as the examination, admission, ordination, and censuring of ministers; the licensing of probationers, rebuking the gross or contumacious sinners, the directing the sentence of excommunication, the deciding upon references and appeals from kirk-sessions, resolving cases of conscience, explaining difficulties in doctrine or discipline; and censuring, according to the Word of God, any heresy or erroneous doctrine which hath either been publicly or privately maintained within the bounds of its jurisdiction. Some of them have frankly acknowledged that they cannot altogether approve of that part of her constitution which gives an equal vote, in questions of heresy, to an illiterate mechanic and his enlightened pastor. We are persuaded (say they) that it has been the source of much trouble to many a pious clergyman, who from the laudable desire of explaining the Scriptures, and declaring to his folk all the counsel of God, has employed a variety of expressions of the same import to illustrate those articles of faith which may be obscurely expressed in the established standards. The fact, however, is, that in presbyteries the only prerogatives which the pastors have over the ruling elders are, the power of ordination by imposition of hands, and the privilege of having the moderator chosen from their body.

"From the judgment of the presbytery there lies an appeal to the provincial synod, which ordinarily meets twice in the year, and exercises over the presbyteries within the province a jurisdiction similar to that which is vested in each presbytery over the several kirk-sessions within its bounds. Of these synods there are in the Church of Scotland sixteen, which are composed of the members of the several presbyteries within the respective provinces which give names to the synods.

"The highest authority in the Church of Scotland is the general assembly, which consists of a certain number of ministers and ruling elders delegated from each presbytery, and of commissioners from the universities and royal burghs. A presbytery in which there are fewer than twelve parishes sends to the general assembly two ministers and one ruling elder; if it contain between twelve and eighteen ministers, it sends three of these, and one ruling elder; if it contain between eighteen and twenty-four ministers, it sends four ministers and two ruling elders; and of twenty-four ministers, when it contains so many, it sends five, with two ruling elders. Every royal burgh sends one ruling elder and Edinburgh two, whose election must be attested by the kirk-sessions of their respective burghs. Every university sends one commissioner from its own body. The commissioners are chosen annually six weeks before the meeting of the assembly; and the ruling elders are often men of the first eminence in the kingdom for rank and talents. In this assembly, which meets once a-year, the sovereign is represented by the commissioner, who is always a nobleman; but he has no voice in their deliberations. The order of their proceedings is regular, though sometimes the number of members creates a confusion, which the moderator, who is chosen from among the ministers to be, as it were, the speaker of the house, has not sufficient authority to prevent. Appeals are brought from all the other ecclesiastical courts in Scotland to the general assembly; and in questions purely religious, no appeal lies from its determinations."

The provision which has been made, by the law of Scotland, for the support of the established clergy, consists in a stipend, payable in victual or money, or partly in each; a small glebe of land; and a manse or parsonage-house and office-houses.

Patronage was abolished in Scotland A.D. 1649; was revived at the Restoration; was partly abrogated at the Revolution; and again revived in 1712.

The evils to which the existence of lay patronage in the Church of Scotland has given rise, have been long a subject of deep regret. Attempts have been often made to procure its modification, with a view to its entire abolition; but hitherto without success.

The last and most memorable effort of this nature was the Veto Act, which was passed by the General Assembly in 1834. This act, which for some time seemed likely to be productive of the best results, was declared, first by the Court of Session, then by the House of Lords, to be illegal; and the consequences have been most disastrous. Four hundred and seventy ministers separated from her communion, and those who remained succeeded in obtaining an act which put it in the power of Church courts to reject, on proper reasons assigned, an unsuitable presentee. This act having been introduced into Parliament by Lord Aberdeen, is usually known by the name of Lord Aberdeen's Act; and its operation thus far has given satisfaction to the Church.

CHURCH, GALLICAN, denotes the ci-devant Church of France, under the government of its respective bishops and pastors. This Church always enjoyed certain franchises and immunities, not as grants from popes, but as possessed by her from her first existence as a Church, and which she took care never to relinquish. These liberties depended upon two maxims,—the first, That the pope had no right to order anything in which the temporalities and civil rights of the kingdom were concerned; the second, That, notwithstanding the pope's supremacy was admitted in cases purely spiritual, yet in France his power was limited by the decrees of ancient councils received in that realm.

About the middle of the last century, a conspiracy was formed to overthrow Christianity, without distinction of worship, whether Protestant or Popish. Voltaire, D'Alembert, Frederic II., king of Prussia, and Diderot, were at the head of this conspiracy. Numerous other adepts and secondary agents were induced to join them. These pretended philosophers used every artifice that impiety could invent, by union and secret correspondence, to attack, to debase, and annihilate Christianity. They not only acted in concert, sparing no political or impious art to effect the destruction of the Christian religion, but they were the instigators and conductors of those secondary agents whom they had seduced, and pursued their plan with all the ardour and constancy which denotes the most finished conspirators.

The French clergy amounted to one hundred and thirty thousand, the higher orders of whom enjoyed immense revenues; but the curés, or great body of acting clergy, seldom possessed more than twenty-eight pounds sterling a-year, and the vicars about half the sum. The clergy, as a body, independent of their tithes, possessed a revenue arising from their property in land, amounting to five million pounds sterling annually; at the sametime, they were exempt from taxation. Before the levelling system had taken place, the clergy signified to the commons the readiness of their constituents to contribute to the exigencies of the State in equal proportion with the other citizens. Not contented with this offer, the tithes and revenues of the clergy were taken away; in lieu of which, it was proposed to grant a certain stipend to the different ministers of religion, to be payable by the nation. The possessions of the Church were then considered as national property, by a decree of the Constituent Assembly. The religious orders, viz., the communities of monks and nuns, possessed immense landed estates; and, after having abolished the orders, the Assembly seized the estates for the use of the nation. The gates of the cloisters were now thrown open. The next step of the assembly was to establish what is called the civil constitution of the clergy. This, the Roman Catholics asserted, was in direct opposition to their religion; but, though opposed with energetic eloquence, the decree passed, and was soon after followed by another, obliging the clergy to swear to maintain the civil constitution. Every artifice which cunning, and every menace which cruelty could invent, were used to induce them to take the oath; great numbers, however, refused. One hundred and thirty-eight bishops and archbishops, sixty-eight curates or vicars, were on this account driven from their sees and parishes. Three hundred of the priests were massacred in one day in one city. All the other pastors who adhered to their religion, were either sacrificed or banished from their country, seeking through a thousand dangers a refuge among foreign nations. A perusal of the horrid massacres of the priests who refused to take the oaths, and the various forms of persecution employed by those who were attached to the Roman Catholic religion, must deeply wound the feelings of humanity. Those readers who are desirous of further information are referred to Abbé Barruel's 'History of the Clergy.'

Some think that there was another cause for the Revolution, and which may be traced as far back, at least, as the revocation of the edict of Nantz, in the seventeenth century, when the great body of French Protestants, who were men of principle, were either murdered or banished, and the rest in a manner silenced. The effect of this sanguinary measure must needs be the general prevalence of infidelity. Let the religious part of any nation be banished, and a general spread of irreligion must necessarily follow. Such were the effects in France. Through the whole of the eighteenth century infidelity was the fashion, and that not only among the princes and noblesse, but even among the greater part of the bishops and clergy. The Roman Catholic religion is the dominant religion in France, and, through the influence of the Jesuits, toleration, though nominally granted to Protestants, is a mere name. Fourteen-fifteenths of the people belong to the Roman Catholic Church, the small remainder being Protestants.

CHURCH, GREEK, comprehends in its bosom a considerable part of Greece, the Grecian Isles, Wallachia, Moldavia, Egypt, Abyssinia, Nubia, Libya, Arabia, Mesopotamia, Syria, Cilicia, and Palestine; which are all under the jurisdiction of the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. If to these we add the whole of the Russian empire in Europe, great part of Siberia in Asia, Astracan, Kasan, and Georgia, it will be evident that the Greek Church has a wider extent of territory than the Latin, with all the branches which have sprung from it; and that it is with great impropriety that the Church of Rome is called by her members the catholic or universal church. That in these widely distant countries the professors of Christianity are agreed in every minute article of belief, it would be rash to assert; but there is certainly such an agreement among them, with respect both to faith and to discipline, that they mutually hold communion with each other, and are, in fact, but one church. It is called the Greek Church, in contradistinction to the Latin or Romish Church; as also the Eastern, in distinction from the Western Church. We shall here present the reader with a view of its rise, tenets, and discipline.

1. Greek Church, rise and separation of.—The Greek Church is considered as a separation from the Latin. In the middle of the ninth century, the controversy relating to the procession of the Holy Ghost (which had been started in the sixth century) became a point of great importance, on account of the jealousy and ambition which at that time were blended with it. Photius, the Patriarch of Jerusalem, having been advanced to that see in the room of Ignatius, whom he procured to be deposed, was solemnly excommunicated by Pope Nicholas, in a council held at Rome, and his ordination declared null and void. The Greek Emperor resented this conduct of the Pope, who defended himself with great spirit and resolution. Photius, in his turn, convened what he called an œcumenical council, in which he pronounced sentence of excommunication and deposition against the pope, and got it subscribed by twenty-one bishops and others, amounting in number to a thousand. This occasioned a wide breach between the sees of Rome and Constantinople. However, the death of the Emperor Michael, and the deposition of Photius, subsequent thereupon, seem to have restored peace; for the Emperor Basil held a council at Constantinople in the year 869, in which entire satisfaction was given to Pope Adrian; but the schism was only smothered and suppressed a while. The Greek Church had several complaints against the Latin; particularly, it was thought a great hardship for the Greeks to subscribe to the definition of a council according to the Roman form, prescribed by the Pope, since it made the Church of Constantinople dependent on that of Rome, and set the Pope above an œcumenical council; but, above all, the pride and haughtiness of the Roman court gave the Greeks a great distaste; and as their deportment seemed to insult his imperial majesty, it entirely alienated the affections of the Emperor Basil. Towards the middle of the eleventh century, Michael Cerularius, Patriarch of Constantinople, opposed the Latins, with respect to their making use of unleavened bread in the eucharist, their observation of the Sabbath, and fasting on Saturdays, charging them with living in communion with the Jews. To this Pope Leo IX. replied; and, in his apology for the Latins, declaimed very warmly against the false doctrine of the Greeks, and interposed at the same time the authority of his see. He likewise, by his legates, excommunicated the Patriarch in the church of Santa Sophia, which gave the last shock to the reconciliation attempted a long time after, but to no purpose; for from that time the hatred of the Greeks to the Latins, and of the Latins to the Greeks, became insuperable, insomuch that they have continued ever since separated from each other's communion.

2. Greek Church, tenets of.—The following are some of the chief tenets held by the Greek Church:—They disown the authority of the Pope, and deny that the Church of Rome is the true Catholic Church. They do not baptize their children till they are three, four, five, six, ten, nay, sometimes eighteen years of age: baptism is performed by trine immersion. They insist that the sacrament of the Lord's Supper ought to be administered in both kinds, and they give the sacrament to children immediately after baptism. They grant no indulgences, nor do they lay any claim to the character of infallibility, like the Church of Rome. They deny that there is any such place as purgatory; notwithstanding they pray for the dead, that God would have mercy on them at the general judgment. They practise the invocation of saints; though, they say, they do not invoke them as deities, but as intercessors with God. They exclude confirmation, extreme unction, and matrimony, out of the seven sacraments. They deny auricular confession to be a divine precept, and say it is only a positive injunction of the Church. They pay no religious homage to the eucharist. They administer the communion in both kinds to the laity, both in sickness and in health, though they have never applied themselves to their confessors; because they are persuaded that a lively faith is all which is requisite for the worthy receiving of the Lord's Supper. They maintain that the Holy Ghost proceeds only from the Father, and not from the Son. They believe in predestination. They admit of no images in relief or embossed work, but use paintings and sculptures in copper or silver. They approve of the marriage of priests, provided they enter into that state before their admission into holy orders. They condemn all fourth marriages. They observe a number of holy days, and keep four fasts in the year more solemn than the rest, of which the fast in Lent, before Easter, is the chief. They believe the doctrine of consubstantiation, or the union of the body of Christ with the sacramental bread.

3. Greek Church, state and discipline of.—Since the Greeks became subject to the Turkish yoke, they have sunk into the most deplorable ignorance, in consequence of the slavery and thralldom under which they groan; and their religion is now greatly corrupted. It is, indeed, little better than a heap of ridiculous ceremonies and absurdities. The head of the Greek Church is the Patriarch of Constantinople, who is chosen by the neighbouring archbishops and metropolitans, and confirmed by the emperor or grand vizier. He is a person of great dignity, being the head and director of the Eastern Church. The other patriarchs are those of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria. Mr Tournefort tells us that the patriarchates are now generally set to sale, and bestowed upon those who are the highest bidders. The patriarchs, metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops, are always chosen from among the caloyers, or Greek monks. The next person to a bishop, among the clergy, is an archimandrite, who is the director of one or more convents, which are called mandren; then come the abbot, the arch-priest, the priest, the deacon, the under-deacon, the chanter, and the lecturer. The secular clergy are subject to no rules, and never rise higher than high-priest. The Greeks have few nunneries, but a great many convents of monks, who are all priests, and (students excepted) obliged to follow some handicraft employment, and lead a very austere life.

The Russians adhere to the doctrines and ceremonies of the Greek Church, though they are now independent of the Patriarch of Constantinople. The Russian Church, indeed, may be reckoned the first, as to extent of empire; yet there is very little of the power of vital religion among them. The Roskolniki, or, as they now call themselves, the Staroverctzi, were a sect that separated from the Church of Russia about 1666: they affected extraordinary piety and devotion, a veneration for the letter of the holy Scriptures, and would not allow a priest to administer baptism who had that day tasted brandy. They harboured many follies and superstitions, and have been greatly persecuted; but perhaps there will be found among them "some that shall be counted to the Lord for a generation." Several settlements of German Protestants have been established on the Volga. The Moravians, also, have done good in Livonia and the adjacent isles in the Baltic under the Russian government.

CHURCH, LATIN, or WESTERN, comprehends all the churches of Italy, Portugal, Spain, Africa, and all other countries whither the Romans carried their language. Great Britain, part of the Netherlands, of Germany, and of the north of Europe, have been separated from it almost ever since the Reformation.

CHURCH, REFORMED, comprehends the whole Protestant Churches in Europe and America, whether Lutheran, Calvinistic, Independent, Quaker, Baptist, or any other denomination who dissent from the Church of Rome. The term Reformed is now, however, employed on the Continent of Europe to distinguish the Calvinists from the Lutherans.

CHURCH OF ROME. See ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

CHURCH-WARDENS, officers chosen yearly in parishes in England, either by the consent of the minister, or of the parishioners, or of both. Their business is to look to the church and churchyard, and to observe the behaviour of the parishioners. Churches are to be repaired by the church-wardens at the charge of all the inhabitants, or such as occupy houses or lands within the parish. The origin of these functionaries is thus stated by Dr Hook:—"In the ancient episcopal synods, the bishops were wont to summon divers creditable persons out of every parish, to give information of, and to attest the disorders of clergy and people. They were called testes synodales; and were in after times a kind of empanelled jury, consisting of two, three, or more persons in every parish, who were upon oath to present all heretics and other irregular persons. And these, in process of time, became standing officers in several places, especially in great cities, and from hence were called Synods-men, and by corruption sidesmen: they are also sometimes called questmen, from the nature of their office, in making inquiry concerning offences. And these sidesmen or questmen, by Canon 90, are to be chosen yearly in Easter week, by the minister and parishioners (if they can agree), otherwise to be appointed by the Ordinary of the diocese. But for the most part this whole office is now devolved upon the church-wardens, together with that other office which their name more properly imports, of taking care of the church and of the goods thereof, which has long been their function."

CHURCHYARD, a piece of ground adjoining to the church, set apart for the interment of the dead. The period which is usually fixed upon as that in which monks were permitted to bury in churches and their neighbourhood, was the time of Gregory the Great. The liberty, however, was at first limited to priests or peculiarly holy men. At length it became the custom to have a churchyard connected with every parish church. By the law in England the churchyard belongs in freehold to the parson; but the parishioners are required to maintain the fences. In the Church of Rome, churchyards are consecrated with great solemnity. If a churchyard which has been thus consecrated shall afterwards be polluted by any indecent action, or profaned by the burial of an infidel, a heretic, an excommunicated or unbaptized person, it must be reconciled; and the ceremony of the reconciliation is performed with the same solemnity as that of the consecration! See CONSECRATION.

CHURNING. The Hebrew word thus translated in Prov. xxx. 33, signifies the act of pressing, and corresponds with the Eastern mode of converting milk into butter. See BUTTER—CHEESE.

CHUSHAM-RISHATHAIM, a King of Mesopotamia, mentioned in the Book of Judges, who oppressed the Israelites for eight years. The Israelites were delivered from his yoke by Othniel. Judg. iii. 8-10.

CHUZA, the steward of Herod Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee, whose wife is mentioned, in Luke viii. 3, as having ministered to our Lord. From the Greek word translated steward in the passage, it is not exactly evident what precise office is referred to. Some think that it implies an inspector of domestic affairs, but it is more probably a governor of a province.

CILICIA, a country of Asia Minor, on the sea-coast, south of Mount Taurus, and west of the Euphrates. Its capital was Tarsus. A synagogue of this province is mentioned Acts vi. 9, and as Paul was of this country, and of a city so considerable as Tarsus, it may be thought that he was also of this synagogue; so that it is probable he was one of those who had been disputing with Stephen, and were overcome by the arguments of that proto-martyr. See TARSUS.

CINNAMON. This word occurs four times in our translation of the Scriptures, once in the New Testament, and thrice in the Old. It was one of the ingredients in the perfumed oil with which the tabernacle and its vessels were anointed. Exod. xxx. 23. It seems to have been used as a perfume in the chambers of Eastern houses. Hence, "I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinuamon." Prov. vii. 17. In the description of the fall of Babylon, cinnamon is mentioned as one of the articles of merchandise brought from afar to that great city. Thus, "The merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet, and all thyine wood, and all manner vessels of ivory, and all manner vessels of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble, and cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, and slaves, and souls of men. And the fruits that thy soul lusted after are departed from thee, and all things which were dainty and goodly are departed from thee, and thou shalt find them no more at all." Rev. xviii. 12-14. The tree which yields the spice termed cinnamon, is termed by botanists the Laurus cinnamomum, or cinnamon tree. It is a native of the East Indies, particularly of Ceylon. It is a shrub varying from two to ten feet in height, with numerous spreading branches. The inner bark of this species constitutes the spice. The leaves, the fruit, and the root are also valuable. The circumstance of cinnamon being in common use in the time of Moses, shows that there must have been at a very early period a close commercial intercourse between the countries of the East and the far West.

CINNERETH, or CENEROTH, or CENNEROTH, a city of Naphtali, south of which lay a great plain, which reached to the Dead Sea, all along the River Jordan. Josh. xix. 35. Many believe, and with probability, that Cinnereth was the same as Tiberias; for, as the Lake of Gennesareth (in Hebrew, the Lake of Cinnereth) is, without doubt, that of Tiberias, it seems reasonable that Cinnereth and Tiberias should also be the same city. Deut. iii. 17. See TIBERIAS.

CIRCLE. This word is applied to the arch or vault of the heavens (Job xxii. 14), and also to the circuit of the earth, in Isa. xl. 22. The ancients supposed that the sky was solid, and extended like an arch over the earth.

CIRCUIT. The word is used in reference to the sun. Ps. xix. 6. Hence it is applied to the revolution of the seasons in 1 Sam. i. 20, where the same word is translated coming about.

CIRCUMCELLIANS, or CIRCONCELLIONES (wanderers—circum cella among the monks), certain Donatists who, being expelled from Africa by the Emperor Constantine, wandered about, sometimes begging a subsistence, and at others forcing one by their arms. They are described as “rough and savage fanatics,” who raised insurrections, and committed all sorts of excesses, daring death and martyrdom in the most heroic manner. Taking the sword, however, in defence of their religious principles, as our Lord predicted, and as has generally been the case, many of them perished by the sword, though the sect was not totally suppressed till the sixth century. Their professed religious sentiments will be seen under the parent term DONATISTS, who were, however, compelled to disown and expel them from their communion.

CIRCUMCISION, a custom prevailing among several Eastern nations. It was enjoined as a religious rite on Abraham and his posterity. The Mohammedan circumcision is probably an ancient Ishmaelite custom, which was received from Abraham, the common father of the Israelites and Ishmaelites. It was not introduced into Arabia by the Koran of Mohammed, but was already in use among his nation, and was adopted, and has been introduced by his followers, as a sacred rite, and one of the essential parts of Islamism, into all countries where this religion has been received. There is also a kind of circumcision or excision performed on the female sex. In Egypt, Mohammedan maidens are frequently circumcised; and the Abyssinians circumcise both sexes. The importance attached to this rite among the Jews, even in the first age of Christianity, occasioned the Apostle of the Gentiles thus to address certain Galatians, “Behold, I Paul say unto you, if ye be circumcised” (that is, as the ground of justification before God), “Christ shall profit you nothing.” Gal. v. 2. Circumcision is declared, in the case of Abraham, to have been “a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised.” It was a seal of a covenant, and a token or pledge that Abraham believed in the ultimate fulfilment of the terms of the covenant. Hence Stephen speaks, in Acts vii. 8, of the covenant of circumcision. The Jews are termed distinctively the circumcision, in opposition to the Gentiles, who are termed the uncircumcision. Paul says (Gal. v. 3), that he who is circumcised is bound to keep the whole law. He is thereby declared to be under the law as a covenant. Hence our Saviour was circumcised, that he might be declared to be under the law, and redeem those who were under the law. Joshua (v. 2–9) commanded all the Israelites who, having been born in the wilderness, were uncircumcised, to undergo the rite of circumcision before they entered the land of Canaan. This being a distinctive badge of Judaism, some early converts to Christianity, still retaining a lingering attachment to the faith of their fathers, insisted that the rite should still be continued, especially among those who were of Jewish origin. Paul, however, expressly prohibited the continuance of the practice, in 1 Cor. vii. 18.

Circumcision was performed on the eighth day (Gen. xvii. 12), including the day on which the child was born, and that on which the rite was performed; and so scrupulous were the Jews in obeying the letter of this injunction, that it was never neglected, even when it happened on the Sabbath-day. John vii. 22, 23. At the same time that the child was circumcised, it was usual for the father or some near relative to give him a name. At the institution of this rite, Abram's name was changed to Abraham. In modern times, circumcision is still observed with all due ceremony. The ceremony is performed in the following manner:—“The circumcisor being provided with a very sharp knife, plasters, cummin seed, wine to wash the wound, proper bandages, &c., the child is brought to the door of the synagogue by the godmother, where the godfather receives it from her. As soon as the godfather enters with the child, the congregation say, Boruch Hobo; that is, ‘Blessed is he that cometh to be circumcised, and enters into the covenant on the eighth day.’ The child being brought into the synagogue, a large chair with two seats is placed,—one for the godfather to sit upon, the other being called the seat of Elijah the prophet, who is supposed to be the angel or messenger of the covenant. The godfather being seated, and the child placed on a cushion in his lap, the circumcisor performs the operation; and having properly bound up the wound, the godfather gets down from his chair, and holding the child in his arms, the circumcisor takes a glass of wine into his right hand, and says a prayer appointed for the occasion. The father of the child then says the following grace: ‘Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and commanded us to enter the covenant of our father Abraham.’ The congregation answer, ‘As he hath entered into the law, the canopy, and the good and virtuous deeds.’ This closes the scene. Many readers may imagine that this operation upon a child of such tender age would be attended with danger, but such is not the case; for it would be considered a surprising and wonderful circumstance to hear of a child dying on account of it. In general, the child is healed in three days.”

CIRCUMCISION, FEAST OF THE, a festival celebrated in the Episcopalian Church on the first of January. It is of considerable antiquity. A service for it was in use in the sixth century. It is sometimes called the “Octave of Christmas,” being the eighth day from that festival.

CIRCUMSPECT, cautious, seriously attentive to every part of the revealed will of God, and very careful not to cast stumblingblocks in the way of others. Exod. xxiii. 13; Eph. v. 15.

CISTERN. There were cisterns throughout Palestine, in cities and in private houses. As the cities were mostly built on mountains, and the rains fall in Judea at two seasons only (spring and autumn), it was necessary for the inhabitants to preserve their water in cisterns or reservoirs. Niebulir found three of these on one of the mountains of Arabia. They were about two and a half feet square, and from five to seven feet high, round or pointed at the top, of mason work. The El-Burak, or the pools of Solomon, are three large cisterns, distant about three hours' walk from Bethlehem. They are of quadrangular shape, partly built on the sides with hewn stones, and partly hewn out of the solid rock. Dr Wilson describes them as having undoubtedly the appearance of great antiquity. They are fed from fountains in the neighbourhood. Worldly enjoyments are called "broken cisterns that can hold no water" (Jer. ii. 13).

CISTERTIAN MONKS, a religious order, founded in the eleventh century by St Robert, a Benedictine.

CITIES OF REFUGE. See REFUGE.

CITIZEN. This word seldom occurs in our version of the Scriptures; but the privileges of citizenship are not unfrequently alluded to in the New Testament. Paul gloried in being a Roman citizen; and accordingly we find that when the chief captain, in Acts xxii., declared vauntingly, "With a great sum obtained I this freedom," Paul instantly replied, "But I was free-born;" implying that his title to citizenship was more honourable and more unquestionable than the other. On more than one occasion the apostle availed himself of the privileges which belonged to him as a citizen of Rome. Thus he claimed immunity, on this ground, from the dishonourable punishment of scourging; for he said to the centurion, as the soldiers were fastening him to the pillar with thongs, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman?" So also at Philippi he told the messengers of the magistrates, "They have beaten us openly, uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison, and now do they thrust us out privily? Nay, verily, but let them come themselves and fetch us out. And the serjeants told these words unto the magistrates, and they feared when they heard that they were Romans;" dreading, no doubt, lest by the dishonour which they had cast upon a Roman citizen, they had subjected themselves to the displeasure of the Roman senate. And in another passage we are informed that Lysias, the tribune, was afraid when he found that Paul was a Roman citizen, and because he had bound him. In Phil. iii. 20, the apostle uses the word citizenship to denote the peculiar privileges and responsibilities of the people of God. "Our conversation," or more literally, citizenship, "is in heaven." It may, at first sight, appear strange that he should use such a word in speaking of the exalted honours which belong to all true believers; but when we reflect that a short time before the epistle was written, Philippi had been invested with the privileges of a Roman colony, the use of the word citizenship will appear peculiarly appropriate, calling the attention of the Philippian Christians to a far higher and nobler citizenship than that which they had recently received, and involving privileges more valuable, and responsibilities more weighty, than those which Roman power or Roman policy could confer.

CITY, OR CITIES. By referring to some peculiarities in the building and fortifying of Eastern cities, we shall the better understand several allusions and expressions of the Old Testament. It is evident that the Orientals were attentive to safety, no less than to convenience and pleasure in the construction of their cities. The walls were generally lofty, and often strongly fortified. One method of securing the gates of fortified places among the ancients, was to cover them with thick plates of iron; a custom which still prevails in the East. But the locks and keys which secure these iron and brazen doors, by a singular custom, are of wood! Those cities, however, which were fortified with more than ordinary care, had sometimes bars of brass or iron. Hence, in describing the strength of Babylon, the prophet speaks of gates of brass and bars of iron. And to the same we find an allusion in Prov. xviii. 19: "A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city; and their contentions are like the bars of a castle." Not contented with these precautions for the defence of their cities, watchmen were employed to patrol the streets during the night. To this custom Solomon alludes in Song v. 7: "The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me." In a time of danger the watchman seems to have taken his station in a tower which was built over the gate of the city. There is a reference to this in 2 Sam. xviii. 24: "And David sat between the two gates: and the watchman went up to the roof over the gate unto the wall, and lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold a man running alone." The fortified cities in Canaan were commonly strengthened with a citadel, to which the inhabitants usually fled when no longer able to defend the place. This was commonly placed on an eminence, to which the people ascended by a flight of steps. It is not unusual for a particular gate of a city to be exclusively appropriated to the use of royalty. The gate of a city through which a monarch has entered is never allowed to be afterwards profaned by vulgar feet. It is closed up never again to be opened unless the sovereign be again to pass through. To this custom Ezekiel obviously refers (xliv. 2, 3): "Then said the Lord unto me, This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter in by it; because the Lord, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut. It is for the prince; the prince, he shall sit in it to eat bread before the Lord; he shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate, and shall go out by the way of the same." The gate of a city has always, in Eastern countries, been a place of resort, where markets are held and public business transacted. The gate of the city was the seat of justice, where causes were decided, and all judicial affairs were settled. Hence the judges were termed the "elders in the gate." Deut. xxii. 15, xxv. 7. In early periods fairs were held at or near the gates of cities. Here commodities were exposed for sale, either in the open air or in tents. 2 Kings vii. 18.

CLAPPING. The custom of clapping the hands was used in the East, as among ourselves, to express joy, but often a triumphant or insulting joy. In this way the enemies of Jerusalem expressed their satisfaction at its fall. "All that pass by clap their hands at thee; they hiss and wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, Is this the city that men call The perfection of beauty, The joy of the whole earth?" Lam. ii. 15. And Job, describing the destruction of a wicked man, says, "Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place."

CLAUDA (called CAUDA in the Vulgate), a small island near the south-west coast of Crete, which Paul passed in his tempestuous voyage to Italy. Acts xxvii. 16. It is now called Gozo.

CLAUDIA, a Roman lady converted by Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 21. Some think she was the wife of Pudens, who is named immediately before her; others conjecture that she was a British lady, sister of Linus.

CLAUDIUS CÆSAR, an emperor of Rome, and successor of Caius Caligula, A.D. 41. His reign extended to thirteen years. On succeeding to the throne, he gave to Agrippa all Judea; but on the death of Agrippa, A.D. 44, Judea was reduced to a Roman province, and Cuspius Fadus appointed governor. It was about this time that the famine occurred, to which reference is thus made in Acts xi. 28-30: "And there stood up one of them, named Agabus, and signified by the Spirit that there should be great dearth throughout all the world: which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar. Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea; which also they did, and sent it to the elders by the hands of Barnabas and Saul." At this period, also, Claudius gave authority to Herod over the temple and consecrated money. In the ninth year of his reign, A.D. 49, the Emperor published an edict, expelling the Jews from Rome, an edict which is thus alluded to in Acts xviii. 2: "And found a certain Jew, named Aquila, born in Pontus, lately come from Italy, with his wife Priscilla, (because that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome,) and came unto them." Claudius was poisoned by his wife Agrippina, and was succeeded by Nero.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, a Roman tribune, who is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles as keeping guard at the temple of Jerusalem. On that occasion (Acts xxi. 27-36) he rescued the Apostle Paul in the midst of a tumult which had arisen, and carried him to Fort Antonia, which communicated with the temple, and having secured his safety, he sent him to Cæsarea.

CLAY is often mentioned in Scripture, nor is it necessary to explain the various references to what is so well known. We find an allusion to the use of clay in the art of pottery, in Isa. lxiv. 8: "But now, O Lord, thou art our father; we are the clay, and thou our potter; and we all are the work of thy hand." The same image is employed in a still more expanded form by the Prophet Jeremiah (xviii. 1-6), "The word which came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, Arise, and go down to the potter's house, and there I will cause thee to hear my words. Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the wheels. And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter; so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it. Then the word of the Lord came to me, saying, O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the Lord. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel." And an allusion to the same use of clay occurs in Rom. ix. 21: "Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?" (See POTTERY.) It may be remarked, however, that clay was used for sealing doors. Norden and Pococke observe, that the inspectors of the granaries in Egypt, after closing the door, put their seal upon a handful of clay, with which they cover the lock. This may help to explain Job xxxviii. 14, in which the earth is represented as assuming form and imagery from the brightness of the rising sun, as rude clay receives a figure from the impression of a seal or signet.

CLEAN, CLEANSE. See PURIFICATIONS—PURIFY—ANIMALS.

CLEAVE. To cleave to any one is to adhere firmly, with ardent love. To cleave to the Lord, is firmly to believe his Word, hold intimate fellowship with him in his fulness, receive and retain his Spirit, abide faithful to his truth, follow closely his example, and obey all his commands. Acts xi. 23.

CLEMENCY, a mild, generous, and forgiving disposition. It is often falsely ascribed to princes, by flatterers. Acts xxiv. 4.

CLEMENT, whose name is in the Book of Life, Phil. iv. 3. Most interpreters conclude that this is the same Clement known by the name of Clemens Romanus, who was pastor of the Church at Rome. The Church at Corinth having been disturbed by divisions, Clement wrote a letter to the Corinthians, which was so much esteemed by the ancients, that they read it publicly in many churches. It is still extant, and some have been inclined to rank it among the canonical writings. It forms a part of the Apocryphal New Testament, and breathes a spirit of true Christian charity and simplicity. We have no authentic accounts of what occurred to Clement during the persecution of Domitian; we are assured that he lived to the third year of Trajan, A. D. 100.

CLEMENT, TITUS FLAVIUS, known as Clemens Alexandrinus, or Clement of Alexandria, one of the fathers of the Church, and distinguished for learning and eloquence, was born about A.D. 217, was converted to Christianity, and succeeded Pantænus in the catechetical school of Alexandria. The time and place of his death are unknown. The best edition of his theological works is that by Potter, in two folio volumes.

CLEMENTINES (said to be so called after a priest of the name of Clement, their first leader), a considerable sect of religious persons in France, scattered in small bodies throughout the country, but who are most numerous in the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees, distinguished by a partial separation from the Church of Rome. They have always refused to acknowledge those priests who took the oaths to the new government,—that of the Revolution,—and even disown the pope on that account. They retain the mass, confession, &c., having a few priests of their own sentiments among them; but they express a strong dislike to many of the Popish ceremonies, which they account a solemn mockery. They are far less superstitious, and more serious and devout, than the bulk of the Roman Catholics. They are strenuous in their opposition to the general body of Roman Catholics, and will not enter their churches; they particularly dislike the ringing of bells on the death or funeral of any person. They incline to the doctrine of free grace, and seem to adopt on those points the sentiments of Augustine. They reject the use of images in worship, and laugh at the pompous religious processions. Many of them use the French language instead of Latin in their prayers. They are said to be generally moral in their conduct, and strict in their observance of the Lord's day.

CLEOPAS, according to Eusebius and Epiphanius, was brother of Joseph, both being sons of Jacob. He was the father of Simeon, pastor of Jerusalem, of James the Less, of Jude, and of Joseph, or Joses. Cleopas married Mary, sister of the Virgin; so that he was uncle to Jesus Christ. He, his wife, and sons, were disciples of Christ; but Cleopas did not sufficiently understand what Jesus had so often told his disciples, that it was expedient he should die, and return to the Father. Having beheld our Saviour expire on the cross, he lost all hope of seeing the kingdom of God established by him on earth; but going to Emmaus with another disciple, they were joined by our Lord, who accompanied them, and revealed himself to them. Luke xxiv. 13, to end.

CLERGY (from the Greek word kleros, heritage), in the general sense of the word, as used by us, signifies the body of ecclesiastics of the Christian Church, in contradistinction to the laity; but, strictly speaking, such a distinction is unwarranted, and according to Scripture, it means the Church. "When Joshua," as one observes, "divided the Holy Land by lot among the Israelites, it pleased God to provide for a thirteenth part of them, called Levites, by assigning them a personal estate equivalent to that provision made by real estate, which was allotted to each of the other twelve parts. In conformity to the style of the transaction, the Levites were called God's lot, inheritance, or clergy. This style, however, is not always used by the Old Testament writers. Sometimes they call all the nation God's lot. Deut. xxxii. 9; Ps. lxxviii. 71, xxviii. 9, &c. The New Testament writers adopt this term, and apply it to the whole Christian Church. 1 Pet. v. 3. Thus it is the Church distinguished from the world, and not one part of the Church as distinguished from another part." The word clergy, however, among us, always refers to ecclesiastics.

The English clergy have large privileges allowed them by our municipal laws, and had formerly much greater, which were abridged at the Reformation, on account of the ill use which the Popish clergy had endeavoured to make of them; for the laws having exempted them from almost every personal duty, they attempted a total exemption from every secular tie. The personal exemptions, indeed, for the most part, continue. A clergyman cannot be compelled to serve on a jury, nor to appear at a court leet, which almost every other person is obliged to do; but if a layman be summoned on a jury, and before the trial takes orders, he shall, notwithstanding, appear, and be sworn. Neither can he be chosen to any temporal office, as bailiff, reeve, constable, or the like, in regard of his own continual attendance on the sacred function, though the clergy are now often found filling the office of justice of the peace. During his attendance on Divine service, he is privileged from arrest in civil suits. In cases of felony, also, a clerk in orders shall have the benefit of clergy, without being branded in the hand, and may likewise have it more than once; in both which cases he is distinguished from a layman.

Benefit of clergy was a privilege whereby a clergyman claimed to be delivered to his ordinary to purge himself of felony, and which anciently was allowed only to those who were in orders; but, by the statute of 18 Elizabeth, every man to whom the benefit of clergy is granted, though not in orders, is put to read at the bar, after he is found guilty, and convicted of felony, and being burnt in the hand, is set free for the first time, if the ordinary or deputy standing by do say, Legit ut clericus; otherwise he shall suffer death. As the clergy have their privileges, so they have also their disabilities, on account of their spiritual avocations. Clergymen are incapable of sitting in the House of Commons; and by the statute of 21 Henry VIII., c. 13, are not in general allowed to take any lands or tenements to farm, upon pain of ten pounds per month, and total voidance of the lease; nor upon like pain to keep any tap-house or brew-house; nor engage in any trade, nor sell any merchandise, under forfeiture of the treble value; which prohibition is consonant with the canon law. See BENEFIT OF CLERGY.

The number of clergy in England and Wales amounts, according to the best calculation, to eighteen thousand. The revenues of the clergy were formerly considerable, but since the Reformation, they are comparatively small, at least those of the inferior clergy.

CLERK,—1. A word originally used to denote a learned man, or man of letters, but now the common appellation by which clergymen distinguish themselves in signing any deed or instrument. 2. Also the person who reads the responses of the congregation in the Episcopal Church, or gives out the hymns at a meeting. 3. There is a word which occurs in Acts xix. 35, and which, though it strictly signifies scribe or clerk, is translated town-clerk. This person appears, however, to have been a civil rather than an ecclesiastical officer. See TOWN-CLERK.

CLOAK, the upper garment which, as being thrown loose across the shoulders, was liable to be stolen. Hence the saying used by our Lord in his Sermon on the Mount, "Whosoever will take thy coat, let him have thy cloak also." The miel, or upper garment of the Old Testament, is explained by Gesenius to have been an exterior tunic, fuller and longer than the common one, but without sleeves. It was worn by women, by men of birth and rank, by kings and princes, by priests, and especially by the high priest, under the ephod.

CLODS. It was often necessary for the husband man in Palestine, after he had finished the operation of ploughing, to break the clods in clayey soils. To this process there is an allusion in Isa. xxviii. 24: "Doth the plowman plow all day to sow? doth he open and break the clods of his ground?"

CLOTHES. See DRESS.

CLOUD, a collection of vapours suspended in the atmosphere. After the Israelites had left Egypt, we are informed (Exod. xiii. 21, 22) that "the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light, to go by day and night. He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people." This pillar-cloud was a striking emblem of the divine protection and guidance to the chosen people in their sojournings in the wilderness. On this subject Professor Bush makes the following remarks in his notes on the passage just quoted:—"Of its uses as a guiding signal to the chosen tribes in their march through the wilderness, we have, both here and elsewhere, the clearest intimations. Thus, Ps. lxxviii. 14, 'In the day-time also, he led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire.' So also Neh. ix. 12, 'Moreover thou leddest them in the day by a cloudy pillar; and in the night by a pillar of fire, to give them light in the way wherein they should go.' In what particular manner this twofold office of a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night, could be performed by one and the same aerial column, is not entirely obvious. Whether the whole mass of cloud which was opaque by day became luminous by night, or whether there was a rending at night of the outer dark body of the cloud and the consequent disclosure of an interior splendour, which was enveloped and concealed from view during the day, has never been satisfactorily determined. We are inclined, on the whole, to adopt the latter opinion, not only because it strikes us as affording a more easy and consistent interpretation of the letter of various passages in which it is spoken of, but also because it harmonises better with what we conceive to have been the substance of this sublime symbolical shadow; on both which points we shall be more full in our subsequent annotations. This inwrapped inner splendour, which appeared at night, we suppose to have been that which is more appropriately termed 'the glory of the Lord;' and this 'glory' is said occasionally to have appeared, in the day time, particularly when God would convey to his people an expression of his displeasure on account of their transgressions, or when he would strike them with a trembling awe of his majesty, as at the giving of the law from Sinai, where the glory of the Lord appeared as a devouring fire on the summit of the mount. Comp. Exod. xvi. 10 with Numb. xvi. 42. In like manner, it appears that when the two sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, offended by strange fire in their offerings, a fatal flash from the cloudy pillar instantaneously extinguished their lives. We cannot doubt, therefore, that this majestic pillar of cloud was intended to serve as the Shekinah, or visible representative of Jehovah, dwelling in the midst of the chosen people."

Mr Fairbairn, in his 'Typology,' gives additional explanations of this mysterious appearance. "Besides being a symbol," he says, "of the Lord's revealed character, the pillar of fire and cloud had certain offices to perform to the Israelites. These were for guidance and protection. It was by this that the Lord directed their course through the dreary and trackless waste which lay between Egypt and Canaan, showing them when to set forth, in what direction to proceed, where to abide, and also affording light to their steps, when the journey was by night. For this purpose, when the people marched, the ark of the covenant went foremost (not in the centre, as is sometimes supposed), and the pillar accompanied it, being the part most immediately connected with the presence of God. Numb. iv. 4, 5, x. 17, 33. In addition to these gracious benefits, it also served as a shade from the heat of a scorching sun; and on one occasion at least—when the Israelites were closely pursued by the Egyptians—it stood as a wall of defence between them and their enemies.

"That in all this the pillar of fire and cloud performed externally and visibly the part which is now discharged by Christ toward his people in the spiritual and divine life, is too evident to require any illustration. He reveals himself to them as the Captain of Salvation, who conducts them through the wilderness of life, and brings them in safety to his Father's house. He never leaves them alone, but by his Word and Spirit leads them into all the truth—assuring them of his continual nearness to comfort them in trouble, and support them under temptation."

The promise is still with the Church, that the Lord will create upon every dwelling-place of Mount Zion, and upon all her assemblies, a cloud and a smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night; for upon all the glory shall be a defence. Isa. iv. 5. And though this overshadowing care of the Head of the Church be not visible now, as of old, yet the presence of the Lord is equally real, and his guiding and protecting love equally great, from the Succoth of conversion to the Jordan of death.

CLUSTER. An ancient author tells us that the Jews were accustomed to call such men as excelled in good qualities Eshcoloth; that is, clusters. And hence they had a saying, that after the death of Jose Ben Joezen, a man of Tzerda, and Jose Ben Jochanan, a man of Jerusalem, the clusters ceased.

Nothing could be more happily chosen to set forth the unrivalled fertility and richness of Canaan, than the cluster of its fruits which the spies brought back from Eshcol. Numb. xiii. 23. It was, indeed, a lively earnest of the fulness, sweetness, and blessedness of the Promised Land. But a more glorious object is set forth (in Cant. i. 14) under the image of "a cluster of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi." All Divine, all human excellencies concentrate in Christ, the Lord and Saviour of the Church. Full of truth and full of grace, he is indeed a cluster of all that is desirable, both in the life that now is, and in that which is to come.

CNIDUS, a city in the province of Caria, properly called Doris, in Asia Minor, mentioned in the account of Paul's voyage to Rome. Acts xxvii. 7. It is now a heap of ruins, though once noted for the worship of Venus, and especially for the celebrated statue of that goddess executed by Praxiteles.

COALS. Temptations to unchastity are compared to burning coals, which cannot be approached without inflaming and fatally injuring the soul. Prov. vi. 28. The same is true of strife and contention. Prov. xxvi. 21. So the judgments of God are represented under the terrible image of coals of juniper (the most intense and enduring heat) applied to the human body. Psal. cxl. 10, cxx. 4, xviii. 8. On the other hand, the Divine promise of forgiveness and grace is represented by a live coal taken from the celestial altar; because, being conveyed to us through the Redeemer's sacrifice, it inflames the soul with love, melts it into godly sorrow, and purges away the dross of sinful corruption. Isa. vi. 6. The love of saints to their Lord and Saviour is as coals of fire, that have a most vehement flame; it makes their hearts burn with desire after him, imparts a resplendent lustre to their character, and resists all the efforts of earth and hell to extinguish it. Cant. viii. 6, 7. So also good deeds and kind offices to enemies are as coals of fire heaped on their heads; they tend to melt down the obdurate spirit into grief and love, or else to prepare them for the more speedy and just infliction of Divine punishment upon their impenitence. Prov. xxv. 22; Rom. xii. 20.

COAT. The tunic or inner garment, worn next the skin, reached commonly to the knees,—sometimes to the ancles. The ketoreth, mentioned in Gen. xxxvii. 3, appears at first to have been simply a large linen cloth, thrown loosely round the body. Another under garment, termed mecanesim, was worn in the time of Moses from the loins to the knees, and afterwards to the ancles. It was commanded to be worn by the priests in the time of sacrifice. Usually the tunic was composed of two pieces of cloth sewed together; hence, those which were woven whole or without seam were highly valued. Such was the garment of our Lord mentioned in John xix. 23; and a similar tunic is said by Josephus to have been worn by the high priest. The tunic of the Hebrews, when hanging loose, was liable to impede a person when walking, and, accordingly, when activity was required, it was fastened round the body by a girdle. 2 Kings iv. 29; John xxi. 7.

COCCEIANS, a denomination which arose in the seventeenth century, so called from John Cocceius, professor of divinity in the university of Leyden. He represented the whole history of the Old Testament as a mirror, which held forth an accurate view of the transactions and events that were to happen in the Church under the dispensation of the New Testament, and unto the end of the world. He maintained that by far the greatest part of the ancient prophecies foretold Christ's ministry and mediation, and the rise, progress, and revolutions of the Church, not only hid under the figure of persons and transactions, but in a literal manner, and by the very sense of the words used in these predictions; and laid it down as a fundamental rule of interpretation, that the words and phrases of Scripture are to be understood in every sense of which they are susceptible; or, in other words, that they signify, in effect, everything that they can possibly signify.

Cocceius also taught, that the covenant made between God and the Jewish nation, by the ministry of Moses, was of the same nature as the new covenant, founded on the mediation of Jesus Christ. In consequence of this general principle, he maintained that the ten commandments were promulgated by Moses, not as a rule of obedience, but as a representation of the covenant of grace; that when the Jews had provoked the Deity by their various transgressions, particularly by the worship of the golden calf, the severe and servile yoke of the ceremonial law was added to the decalogue, as a punishment inflicted on them by the Supreme Being in his righteous displeasure; that this yoke, which was painful in itself, became doubly so on account of its typical signification, since it admonished the Israelites, from day to day, of the imperfection and uncertainty of their state, filled them with anxiety, and was a perpetual proof that they had merited the righteous displeasure of God, and could not expect, before the coming of the Messiah, the entire remission of their iniquities; that indeed good men, even under the Mosaic dispensation, were, immediately after death, made partakers of everlasting glory,—but that they were, nevertheless, during the whole course of their lives, far removed from that firm hope and assurance of salvation which rejoices the faithful under the dispensation of the gospel; and that their anxiety flowed naturally from this consideration, that their sins, though they remained unpunished, were not pardoned, because Christ had not as yet offered himself up a sacrifice to the Father, to make an entire atonement for them.

COCKATRICE. The translators of the English Bible have variously rendered the Hebrew words tzepha and tzephoni, by adder and cockatrice; and we are by no means certain of the particular kind of serpent to which the original term is applied. In Isa. xi. 8, “the tzephoni,” says Dr Harris, “is evidently an advance in malignity beyond the peten which precedes it; and in Isa. xiv. 29, it must mean a worse kind of serpent than the nachash,” but this still leaves us ignorant of its specific character. Mr Taylor, who has taken extraordinary pains to identify it, is of opinion that it is the naja or cobra di capello of the Portuguese, which we find thus described by Goldsmith:—“Of all others, the cobra di capello, or hooded serpent, inflicts the most deadly and incurable wounds. Of this formidable creature there are five or six different kinds; but they are all equally dangerous, and their bite is followed by speedy and certain death. It is from three to eight feet long, with two long fangs hanging out of the upper jaw. It has a broad neck, and a mark of dark brown on the forehead, which, when viewed frontwise, looks like a pair of spectacles, but behind like the head of a cat. The eyes are fierce and full of fire; the head is small, and the nose flat, though covered with very large scales, of a yellowish ash colour; the skin is white, and the large tumour on the neck is flat, and covered with oblong smooth scales. The bite of this animal is said to be incurable, the patient dying in about an hour after the wound; the whole frame being dissolved into one putrid mass of corruption. The effects here attributed to the bite of this creature answer very well to what is intimated of the tzephoni in Scripture. Thus, in Isa. xi. 9: ‘They [the tzephoni immediately preceding] shall not hurt nor destroy [corrupt] in all my holy mountain.’ And Prov. xxiii. 32: ‘At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth [spreads, diffuses its poison; so the Seventy and Vulgate] like a cockatrice.’”

We must not omit to notice the very powerful argument adduced in the last cited passage against the sin of intemperate drinking. Like the poison of the deadly cockatrice, it paralyzes the energies both of mind and body, and speedily diffuses corruption throughout the entire frame. “Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine.” “Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging: and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise.” Prov. xxiii. 29, 30, xx. 1.

The unyielding cruelty of the Chaldean armies, under Nebuchadnezzar, the appointed minister of Jehovah's vengeance on the Jewish nation, whose iniquities had made him their enemy, is expressively alluded to in the following passage: “For, behold, I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you, which shall not be charmed, and they shall bite you, saith the Lord.” Jer. viii. 17.

In Egypt and other Oriental countries, a serpent was the common symbol of a powerful monarch; it was embroidered on their robes, and blazoned on their diadem, to signify their absolute power and invincible might; and also, that as the wound inflicted by the basilisk is incurable, so the fatal effects of their displeasure were neither to be avoided nor endured. These, says Paxton, are the allusions involved in the address of the prophet in reference to the irreconcilable enemies of his nation: “Rejoice not thou, whole Palestina, because the rod of him that smote thee is broken: for out of the serpent's root shall come forth a cockatrice, and his fruit shall be a fiery flying serpent.” Isa. xiv. 29. Uzziah, the king of Judah, had subdued the Philistines; but, taking advantage of the weak reign of Ahaz, they again invaded the kingdom of Judah, and reduced some cities in the southern part of the country under their dominion. On the death of Ahaz, Isaiah delivers this prophecy, threatening them with a more severe chastisement from the hand of Hezekiah, the grandson of Josiah, by whose victorious arms they had been reduced to sue for peace; which he accomplished, when “he smote the Philistines, even unto Gaza, and the borders thereof." 2 Kings xviii. 8. Uzziah, therefore, must be meant by the rod that smote them, and by the serpent from whom should spring the fiery flying serpent, that is, Hezekiah, a much more terrible enemy than even Uzziah had been. But the symbol of regal power which the Oriental kings preferred to all others, was the basilisk. All the other species of serpents are said to acknowledge the superiority of the basilisk, by flying from its presence, and hiding themselves in the dust. It is also supposed to live longer than any other serpent; the ancient heathens, therefore, pronounced it to be immortal, and placed it in the number of their deities; and because it had the dangerous power, in general belief, of killing with its pestiferous breath the strongest animals, it seemed to them invested with the power of life and death. It became, therefore, the favourite symbol of kings, and was employed by the prophet to symbolize the great and good Hezekiah, with strict propriety. The Prophet Isaiah sometimes uses the cockatrice as a symbol of wicked and ungodly men. Thus: "They hatch cockatrice' eggs, and weave the spider's web; he that eateth of their eggs dieth, and that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper." Isa. lix. 5.

COCK-CROWING. The cock usually crows at two different times of the night; the first time a little after midnight, and a second time about the break of day. (See Hour.) This last season is usually called cock-crowing; and this was the time intended by our Lord when he said to Peter, "Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice." Matt. xxvi. 34. Mark and John refer to both seasons, but Matthew only to the last. Mark xiv. 40; John xiii. 38. Compare the fulfilment of the prediction. Matt. xxvi. 69-74; Mark xiv. 66-72; Luke xxii. 54-61; John xviii. 25-27.

These texts may be satisfactorily reconciled, by observing, that ancient authors, both Greek and Latin, mention two cock-crowings, the one of which was soon after midnight, the other about three o'clock in the morning; and this latter, being most noticed by men as the signal of their approaching labours, was called, by way of eminence, the cock-crowing; and to this alone Matthew, giving the general sense of our Saviour's warning to Peter, refers; but Mark, recording his very words, mentions the two cock-crowings.

The Rabbins tell us that coeks were not permitted to be kept in Jerusalem, on account of the holiness of the place; and for this reason some modern Jews cavil against this declaration of the evangelists; but the cock is not among the birds prohibited in the law of Moses. If there was any restraint in the use and domestication of the animal, it must have been an arbitrary practice of the Jews, and could not have been binding on foreigners, of whom many resided at Jerusalem as soldiers or traders. Strangers would not be willing to forego an innocent kind of food in compliance with a conquered people; and the trafficking spirit of the Jews would induce them to supply aliens, if it did not expressly contradict the letter of their law. This is sufficient to account for fowl of this kind being there, even admitting a customary restraint. Reland, besides, solves the difficulty, by telling us, that though the Jews were not allowed to breed coeks in the city, they were not prohibited from purchasing them for food; and that, therefore, the cock mentioned in the Gospel, might have been kept in the house of a Jew, who designed to kill it for his own table. The Jewish doctors distinguish the cock-crowing into the first, second, and third times. The heathen nations in general speak of only two. Dr Macknight tells us, in his 'Harmony of the Gospels,' that "in remembrance of the crowing of the cock, which brought Peter to a sense of the great evil he was guilty of in denying his Master, the practice, it is said, began of placing weather-cocks upon towers and steeples." See Day—Hour—Watches.

COCKLE. This word occurs only once in the Bible, viz., in Job xxxi. 40: "Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley." By the Chaldee it is rendered noxious herbs; by the Septuagint, the blackberry bush; by Celsius, followed by Michaelis, acenite; and by Bishop Stock and Dr Mason Good, the nightshade. Gesenius simply translates it, a bad plant, a weed. It is most probably the aconitum album, which grows among corn in many parts of Syria, and may, perhaps, be the plant referred to by our Lord in the parable of the tares.

CŒLE-SYRIA, hollow or depressed Syria; Syria in the vale. This name imports the hollow land, or region situated between two long ridges of mountains; and those mountains have been always understood to be Libanus and Anti-Libanus. As these ridges run parallel for many leagues, they contain between them a long, extensive, and extremely fruitful valley. In this romantic and sequestered valley, the credulous natives still believe that Paradise was placed; and proud of occupying the interesting spot where dwelt the father of the human family before the entrance of sin, they conduct the traveller to the place where Adam was created, to that where Cain murdered his brother, and to the tomb where the bones of Abel repose.

CÆLICOLÆ (worshippers of the heavens), an obscure sect of African heretics in the fifth century, who seem to have mixed up some parts of Judaism and Paganism with Christianity, and to have used both circumcision and baptism. It is not, however, improbable that they have been slandered, as the Pagans called the Jews themselves by this name.

CŒNOBITES, monks of the fourth century, who lived in a settled community under an abbot.

COFFER. This word occurs only in 1 Sam. vi. 8. 11, 15, in reference to the removal of the ark of the Lord to Beth-shemesh. Gesenius explains the Hebrew term argaz, to mean a box or chest hanging from the side of a cart or waggon, corresponding to a similar Arabic word, which signifies a sack of stones suspended from a camel by way of equipoise.

COFFIN. The word translated coffin in Gen. i. 26, means generally a chest, and is spoken of a money-chest in 2 Kings xii. 10. Most frequently it is employed when describing the sacred ark in which the two tables of the law were deposited. The chest in which the body of Joseph was deposited is supposed by Dr Clarke to have been constructed of marble; but it was most likely of sycamore, a wood which grew in great abundance in that country. The probability is, that the body of Joseph, after having been embalmed, was placed in a mummy-chest similar to those which are so well known to have been in use among the Egyptians. The humbler classes seem to have been buried in the East without a coffin. This appears to have been the case with our blessed Lord. Sometimes the body was carried to the grave on a flat board, simply covered with a cloth. (See BIER.) It was among the Egyptians that the use of coffins appears to have originated. Sometimes these were composed of sycamore wood, but more generally of a number of layers of pasteboard glued together, and engraven on the outside with a variety of hieroglyphical figures. The drawings on the mummy-cases are in profile, the Egyptians being ignorant of perspective; their reliefs are, however, full of vigour, life, and expression. It was formerly supposed that the representations on the outer cases were intended to give a history of the life of the person embalmed within, but they are now regarded as a collection of images offered by the deceased to Osiris. The Egyptians of high rank were deposited in two, three, and sometimes four of these coffins, each outer case surpassing the other in the costliness of the materials as well as in the elegance of the workmanship. Some mummies are without any painted case, but placed in a sarcophagus, generally of sycamore wood, formed out of the trunk of a tree, the inside of which is scooped out to receive the body, and the surface covered with pitch.

COHORT, a military term used by the Romans, to denote a company generally composed of six hundred foot soldiers. A legion consisted of ten cohorts, every cohort being composed of three maniples, and every manipule of two hundred men; a legion, consequently, contained in all six thousand men. Others allow but five hundred men to a cohort, which would make five thousand in a legion. It is probable, that cohorts among the Romans, as companies among the moderns, often varied as to their number.

COIN. See MONEY.

COLD. Spiritual coldness consists in an utter or very great unconcern about Jesus Christ and Divine things. Matt. xxiv. 12. Professors are neither cold nor hot when they retain the profession of truth in some degree, but have no active liveliness, zeal, or concern for the power of it. Christ's wishing men were either cold or hot imports, that none are more detested of him, or dishonouring to him, than hypocritical and careless professors of the Christian faith. Rev. iii. 15, 16.

COLLATION, in canon law, the giving or bestowing of a benefice on a clergyman by a bishop, who has it in his own gift or patronage. Anciently the right of presentation to all livings was vested in the bishop; and now, if the patron neglects to present to a church in England, the right returns to the bishop by collation. If the bishop neglects to collate after six months, the right passes to the archbishop, and if the archbishop neglects to collate, it devolves to the king. Collation differs from institution in this, that institution is performed by the bishop upon the presentation of another, and collation is his own gift or presentation; and it differs from a common presentation, as it is the giving of the church to the person, whereas the presentation is the giving of the person to the church.

COLLECT, a short prayer. In the liturgy of the Church of England, and the mass of the Romanists, it denotes a prayer accommodated to any particular day, occasion, or the like. In general, all the prayers in each office are called collects, either because the priest speaks in the name of the whole assembly, whose sentiments and desires he sums up by the word "Oremus," "Let us pray," or because those prayers are offered when the people are assembled together. The Popes Gelasius and Gregory are said to have been the first who established collects.

COLLEGE. The word mishnah, which occurs several times in the Old Testament, is translated "college" in 2 Kings xxii. 14, and 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22. It implies, literally, the second part, and refers probably to the residence of the subordinate priests, near to which there may have been a school or college. It is generally believed, among learned men, that Samuel was at the head of a college for the education of those who were designed to the prophetic office, as well as for the social comfort of such as were already prophets. This college was at Ramah, in Mount Ephraim, the place of Samuel's ordinary residence, or perhaps rather at Gibeah, a place in the neighbourhood. Hence, after Saul had been anointed king over Israel, Samuel gave him the following sign that what had been done was of God: "It shall come to pass, when thou art come thither to the city" (Gibeah) "that thou shalt meet a company of prophets coming down from the high place" (probably a place of worship) "with a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp, before them; and they shall prophesy: and the Spirit of the Lord will come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them, and shalt be turned into another man." 1 Sam. x. 5, 6. We have no further mention of any such institutions until the time of Elijah, in the reign of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and Jehoram, king of Israel. When Elijah was about to be translated, there were three such colleges,—one at Gilgal, one at Bethel, and one at Jericho. Elisha accompanied him to the first of these; and although Elijah wished him to remain, probably to take charge of the establishment, he declined, and they proceeded together to Bethel. On their arrival it is said: "And the sons of the prophets that were at Bethel came forth to Elisha, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head to-day? And he said, Yea, I know it; hold ye your peace." 2 Kings ii. 3. When they had reached Jericho, the sons of the prophets addressed Elisha in the same language as those at Bethel; and when Elijah went onward to Jordan, we are informed that "fifty men of the sons of the prophets" from Jericho went also to witness the ascension. And on the return of Elisha, they offered to send "fifty strong men," probably only a portion of their number, to search for the body of Elijah. From this we may fairly infer, that a college for the education of prophets existed at Jericho, attended by upwards of fifty; and there may perhaps have been an equal number at Bethel and Gilgal. This last appears to have been under the special care of Elisha after the translation of his master; and it appears so to have flourished, that the number of disciples reached an hundred. 2 Kings iv. 43. Nay, it appears even to have exceeded this number; for it is said: "And the sons of the prophets said unto Elisha, Behold now, the place where we dwell with thee is too strait for us. Let us go, we pray thee, unto Jordan, and take thence every man a beam, and let us make us a place there, where we may dwell. And he answered, Go ye." 2 Kings vi. 1, 2. Colleges of prophets were, in all likelihood, maintained throughout the whole of the Old Testament history.

COLLEGIANS, or COLLEGIANTS, a sect formed among the Arminians and Baptists in Holland, about the beginning of the seventeenth century; so called because of their colleges or meetings twice every week, where every one, females excepted, has the same liberty of expounding the Scripture, praying, &c. They are said to be all either Arians or So-cinians: they never communicate in the college, but meet twice a-year, from all parts of Holland, at Rhinsbergh (whence they are also called Rhinsberghers), a village two miles from Leyden, where they communicate together; admitting every one that presents himself, professing his faith in the divinity of the Holy Scriptures, and resolution to live suitably to their precepts and doctrines, without regard to his sect or opinions. They have no particular ministers, but each officiates as he is disposed. They baptize by immersion.

COLLUTHIANS, followers of Colluthus, a priest of Alexandria, in the fourth century, who is said to have taught that God was not the author of the evils and afflictions of this life; also that a presbyter might ordain. If we can forgive the latter error, which, it seems, he put in practice, we may easily account for the former, which probably originated from the strong terms he used in opposing Necessarian errors; teaching that men's sins originated from themselves, and not from God; and that these were the cause of all our sufferings. He was condemned, however, at a council, held at Alexandria, in A.D. 335, and the sect vanished soon after.

COLLYRIDIANs, were so called from certain cakes or loaves (collyrides) which, once a-year, they offered to the Virgin Mary, with some superstitious rites, and then divided them among themselves. These superstitious people had their rise in the fourth century; first in Thraee, and afterwards they spread into Africa, chiefly among female devotees who sought the protection of the Virgin.

COLONY. This word does not always imply that any considerable body of citizens from Rome had left their native city, and had founded a new town where there had been none, as the colonies in America were founded. No doubt a settlement of Romans might give rise to Roman colonies; and many bodies of their troops, after they were dismissed from military service, received allotments in distant towns. But anciently many cities were favoured with the character of colonies, by which they became entitled to the privileges of Roman citizens, and were considered as being in a manner Roman, in reward for services which they had rendered to the government of Rome, or to the emperors. Such, no doubt, was the case with Philippi. The word "colony" occurs only in Acts xvi. 12: "Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony." Now colonies, it must be remembered, were invested with different kinds of civil rights. Some were called Roman, which, however, had not the complete rights of citizenship, but only the private rights of Quirites, without the privilege of suffrage, or of bearing office in the State. Others were styled Latin, which had not the rights of Quirites, but might have suffrage at the popular assemblies for legislation, if summoned thereto by the Roman magistracy; and when they had held the office of magistrate in a Latin city, they thereby obtained the Roman citizenship. Others again, as were most of those out of Italy, were Italian; a privilege inferior to the Latin, and which consisted in immunity from tribute, whether land or capitation tax.

COLOSSE, a city of Phrygia, in Asia Minor, which stood on the River Lyeus, at an equal distance between Laodicea and Hierapolis. These three cities, says Eusebius, were destroyed by an earthquake, in the tenth year of Nero, or about two years after the date of Paul's Epistle to the Colossians. The ancient Colosse seems to have occupied the site of the modern Khonas, and in the tenth century Colosse was called Chonae. Ecclesiastical historians inform us that the Bishop of Chonae was present at the second Nicene Council. Mr Arundell thus describes its present aspect:—"The approach to Khonas, as well as the village itself, is beautiful, abounding in tall trees from which vines of most luxuriant growth are suspended. In the immediate neighbourhood of the village are several vestiges of an ancient city, consisting of arches, vaults, squared stones, while the ground is strewn with broken pottery, which so generally and so remarkably indicates the site of ancient towns in the East."

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. This epistle, from its resemblance to the epistle addressed to the Ephesians as well as from an incidental remark in Col. iv. 3, in which he alludes to his imprisonment, appears to have been written nearly at the same time. The date is generally supposed to be about the year 62.

Michaelis is of opinion that this epistle was directed against the tenets and practices of the *ESSENE*s (which see). There appear to have been judaizing teachers, who diligently circulated the absurd notions of the Rabbins; and partial converts from heathenism, who mingled Platonic notions with the doctrines of the gospel. It is evident, from Col. ii. 18, that the false teachers inculcated the worship of angels. "Whoever," says Michaelis, "would understand the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, must read them both together. The one is, in most places, a commentary on the other; the meaning of single passages of one epistle, which, if considered alone, might be variously interpreted, being determined by the parallel passages in the other epistle."

COME, COMING. God's coming does not signify literally any change of place; for "do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord;" but it signifies some new manifestation of his presence; either by a resplendent and awful symbol, as to Israel of old; or by the operations of his power in mercy or judgment, in which sense he may be said to visit men from age to age. Psal. l. 3, ei. 2; John xiv. 23. Men come to God when they worship and serve him, apply to him by prayer, enjoy his presence, and receive out of his fulness. Heb. vii. 25, xi. 6; John xiv. 6. To come to Christ is to apply to him for salvation as lost sinners, renouncing all dependence on our own righteousness, wisdom, and strength, and seeking by faith and prayer every needed, provided, and promised blessing in him. John v. 40, vi. 37; 1 Pet. ii. 4. It may be remarked that this very application, this movement of the heart in approaching the unseen Saviour, involves a belief in him as an omnipresent, and, of course, an infinite Friend.

COMING OF CHRIST. This expression is either literal or metaphorical. Literally, it is used in reference to his first appearance in the flesh (1 John v. 20; 2 John 7), or to his future appearance at the last day to fulfil his promises, to raise the dead, and judge the world in righteousness. Acts i. 11, iii. 20, 21; Heb. ix. 28; 1 Thess. iv. 15-18; 1 Cor. xv. 23; Acts x. 42; 2 Tim. iv. 1; Matt. xvi. 27, xxv. 31-46.

Metaphorically, Christ is said to come when his gospel is introduced or preached in any place by his ministers (John xv. 22; Eph. ii. 17); when his Church or kingdom is visibly and powerfully established in the world (Matt. xvi. 28); when he bestows upon believers the influences of his Spirit, and the peculiar benefits of his purchase. All judgments are spoken of in Scripture under the figure of Christ's coming; they are links in a chain which gradually conducts onward to his final coming and the end of the world. In the Word of God, history is mentioned not so much by the progress of time as by the progress of events. And the destruction of Jerusalem being the grand closing scene, the dispensations of God towards the Jewish Church are fitly introduced by our Lord as a sign of his second coming, which will be the closing scene of the whole dispensations of God towards his Church, both Jew and Gentile. Matt. xxiv. 29-35.

Christ is said to come when he bestows on his people the tokens of his love (John xiv. 18, 23, 28, xvi. 16, 17); when he executes his judgments on wicked communities who reject or corrupt his gospel (2 Thess. ii. 8); and when his providence calls us away from the world by death, as preparatory to the judgment of the last day. Matt. xxiv. 42, xxv. 13; John xiv. 3. But the coming of Christ most commonly refers to that solemn day predicted by Enoch of old, Jude 14, 15, when he shall come "with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgments upon all."

The basis of this metaphorical usage, in regard to the coming of Christ, is the same as in relation to the coming of God, viz., that as he governs the world, every specific act of his providence and authority indicates his presence in a more striking manner to human conception; on the principle that no agent can act where he is not.

COMFORTER (Paracletos), one of the titles by which the Holy Spirit is designated in the New Testament. John xiv. 16, 26, xv. 26. The name has, no doubt, a reference to his peculiar office in the economy of redemption, namely, that of imparting consolation to the hearts of Christ's disciples; which he effects by "taking of the things that are Christ's," and explaining them; or, in other words, by illuminating their minds as to the meaning of the Scriptures, assuring them of the Saviour's love, bringing to their recollection his consolatory sayings, and filling their souls with comfort in believing them. The word has also been rendered advocate, helper, monitor, teacher. The first well describes the office of the Spirit, as striving and pleading with the unconverted world, and especially as convincing of sin (John xvi. 7-11); but the others are not so well supported by the connection of our Lord's discourse, which favours the translation, Comforter; because, whatever gracious offices the Holy Spirit was to perform for the disciples, the great end of all was to remove that sorrow which the approach of the departure of Christ had produced, and to render their joy full and complete. Hence believers are said (Acts ix. 31) to walk "in the comfort of the Holy Ghost." The term Paraclete, Advocate or Comforter, is also applied to Christ (1 John ii. 1), because he, as well as the Father and the Holy Ghost, comforts his people's hearts, and gives them everlasting consolation and good hope through grace. Thus the comfort of God's people is ascribed in Scripture to each of the three persons in the Godhead, and represented as flowing to them out of the various offices which they execute under the covenant of redemption. In regard to the office of the Spirit as a Comforter, Dr Buchanan, in his treatise entitled 'The Office and Work of the Holy Spirit,' thus remarks:—"The Spirit's love as a Comforter is manifested in various ways. For, first, It was the Spirit with which Christ himself was anointed, and by which he was qualified, in respect of his human nature, for the execution of his great design: 'The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, for he hath anointed me to preach;'—secondly, It was the Spirit who dictated the whole of that message of grace and mercy which is contained in the gospel, for 'holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;' and to him, therefore, is to be gratefully ascribed every consolation which the gospel imparts, and every hope which it inspires;—and thirdly, It is the Spirit who, by his continued agency in the Church, and his internal operation on the minds of believers, enables them to understand the gracious import, and to feel the blessed influence of the gospel, so that they are 'filled with all peace and joy in believing, and abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost.'" See HOLY GHOST.

COMMAND. God commands the blessing of life, or the strength of his people, when by his will he furnishes it. Psal. cxxxiii. 3, lxviii. 28. Saints command God concerning his sons and daughters, and the works of his hands, when in Christ's name they earnestly plead his promise, and argue from his faithfulness, power, equity, and love, pledged therein. Isa. xlv. 11. Jesus Christ is the commander given to the people; he enlists men for his spiritual soldiers—he convenes, orders, encourages, and goes before them, in their gracious warfare. Isa. lv. 4.

COMMEND. God commends his love; he makes it appear glorious and unbounded, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Rom. v. 8. Our unrighteousness commends the righteousness of God; it gives occasion for him clearly to manifest his justice in punishing us, or in forgiving us through Christ's blood; and the Jews' rejection of Christ demonstrates the faithfulness of God in the ancient predictions. Rom. iii. 5.

COMMENDAM, the term usually employed in England to denote a living commended by the crown to the care of a clergyman until a proper pastor is provided for it. These commendams for some time have been seldom or never granted to any but bishops, who, when their bishoprics were of small value, were by special dispensation allowed to hold their benefices, which on their promotion devolved to the crown.

COMMENDATORY LETTERS. These were used in the early Christian Church, and the occasion on which they were written is thus described by the late Dr Neander:—"When a Christian entered a foreign city, his first inquiry was for the Church; and here he was received as a brother, and supplied with whatever could contribute to his spiritual and to his bodily refreshment. But as deceivers, informers, false teachers, seeking only to gain more followers for their peculiar opinions, abused the confidence and charity of the Christians, it became necessary to adopt precautionary measures to prevent the manifold evils which might in this way arise. The regulation was therefore adopted, that in foreign Churches those travelling Christians only should be received as Christian brethren, who could produce a certificate from the bishop of the community to which they belonged. These Church letters,—which were as tessaræ hospitales, whereby Christians from every quarter of the world stood in fraternal union with each other,—received the name of epistolæ or literæ formatæ; because, to guard against counterfeits, they were drawn up after a certain form; and also, 'epistolæ communicatoriæ,' inasmuch as they indicated as well that the bearers were in the fellowship of the Church, as that the bishops who mutually sent and received such letters were united together in the bonds of church-fellowship. By degrees the church letters (epistolæ clericæ) were divided into different classes, according to the different objects for which they were written." The term is still used in England to denote the letter given by a bishop to any one of his clergy or flock who is travelling into another diocese; whereby it may be seen that the holder of the letter is in catholic communion, and that he ought to be admitted to all the privileges of communion and of his order wherever he goes. Such letters correspond to what are known in Scotland as certificates of church communion, which are given by kirk-sessions to members of churches when removing from one place to another.

COMMERCE. The commercial intercourse of different nations is of great antiquity. In Gen. xxxvii. we find mention made of a caravan of Ishmaelites travelling on purposes of merchandise into Egypt. Their camels seem to have been laden with spices and other articles from Gilead. There were two different routes from Palestine to Egypt; one along the coast of the Mediterranean, and another from Gaza to the Elamite branch of the Arabian Gulf. Commerce, however, was not encouraged by the laws of Moses, and it was not until a late period, that direct mention is made of commercial transactions as having been carried on by the Hebrews. David appears to have been the first who began an extensive traffic with other nations; for, having conquered the kingdom of Edom, and reduced it to be a province of his empire, he thereby became master of two sea-port towns on the Red Sea, Elath and Eziongeber, which then belonged to that kingdom; and seeing the advantage which might be made of the situation of these two places, he wisely took the benefit of it, and there opened up trade. There are two places mentioned in Scripture to which it was from thence carried on, that is, Ophir and Tarshish. From the former of these, David in his time drew great profit: for the three thousand talents of gold of Ophir which he is said (1 Chron. xxix. 4) to have given to the house of God, seem to be of that gold of Ophir which he himself had by his fleets in several voyages brought to him from thence: for what he had reserved for this work out of the spoils of war, the tributes of the conquered nations, and the public revenues of his kingdom, is before mentioned (chap. xxiv. 14), and amounted to a prodigious sum. The three thousand talents of the gold of Ophir which he added, was over and above this, and out of his own proper goods, or private estate, which he had besides what belonged to him as king. And how he could increase that so far, as out of that only to be able to give so great a sum, can scarce any other way be accounted for, than by the great returns which were made him from this traffic: for the gold alone amounted to above one and twenty millions of our money, besides the seven thousand talents of refined silver which were included in the same gift. After David, Solomon carried on the same traffic to Ophir, and had from thence in one voyage four hundred and fifty talents of gold. And if Solomon got so much in one voyage, well might David have gained the sum above mentioned in the several voyages which were made thither for him, from the time that he had subdued the land of Edom to the time of his death, which was at least twenty-five years. But it must be acknowledged that Solomon much improved this trade, not only by his greater wisdom, but also by his greater application to all the business of it. For not being perplexed and encumbered with such wars as his father David was, he had more leisure to attend thereto. And, therefore, for the better settling of it, he went in person to Elath and Eziongeber, and there took care, by his own inspection, for the building of his ships, the fortifying of both those ports, and the settling of every thing else which might tend to the successful carrying on of this traffic, not only to Ophir, but to all other parts where the sea on which these ports lay opened a passage. But his chief care was to plant those two towns with such inhabitants, as might be best able to serve him in this design. For which purpose he brought thither from the sea-coasts of Palestine as many as he could get of those who had been there used to the sea, especially of the Tyrians, whom his friend and ally, Hiram king of Tyre, from thence furnished him with in great numbers: and these were the most useful to him in this affair; for they being in those days, and for many ages after, the most skilful of all others in sea affairs, they were the best able to navigate his ships and conduct his fleets through long voyages. But the use of the compass not being then known, the way of navigation was in those times only by coasting, which often made a voyage to be of three years, which now may be finished almost in three months. However, this trade succeeded so far, and grew to so high a pitch under the wise management of Solomon, that thereby he drew to these two ports and from thence to Jerusalem, all the trade of Africa, Arabia, Persia, and India, which was the chief fountain of those immense riches which he acquired, and whereby he exceeded all the kings of the earth in his time, as much as he did by his wisdom; so that he made silver to be at Jerusalem as plentiful as the stones, by reason of its amazing and almost incredible abundance during his reign. After the division of the kingdom, Edom being of that part which remained to the house of David, they still continued to carry on this trade from those two ports, especially from Eziongeber, which they chiefly made use of till the time of Jehoshaphat. But he having there lost his fleet, which he had prepared to sail from thence to Ophir in partnership with Ahaziah king of Israel, this spoiled the credit of that harbour. For there being nigh the mouth of it a ridge of rocks, as this fleet was passing out of the port, they were by a sudden gust of wind, which God sent on purpose for the punishment of this confederacy, driven upon those rocks, where they were all broken to pieces and lost. And therefore, for the avoiding of the like mischief for the future, the station of the king's ships was thenceforth removed to Elath, and accordingly Jehoshaphat the next year after sent out another fleet from the same place. For whereas it is said that he lost the first fleet for confederating with the idolatrous king of Israel, and we are told in another place of his sending forth a fleet for Ophir in which he would not permit Ahaziah to have any partnership with him, this plainly proves the sending out of two fleets by Jehoshaphat, the first in partnership with Ahaziah, and the other without it. And thus this affair was carried on from the time of David until the death of Jehoshaphat. For till then the land of Edom was all in the hands of the kings of Judah, and was wholly governed by a deputy or viceroy, there placed by them. But when Jehoram succeeded Jehoshaphat, and God, for the punishment of the exceeding great wickedness of that prince, had withdrawn his protection from him, Esau, according to the prophecy of Isaac, did break the yoke of Jacob from off his neck, after having served him (as foretold by that prophecy) for several generations; that is, from the time of David till then. For, on Jehoram's having revolted from God, the Edomites revolted from him, and, having expelled his viceroy, chose them a king of their own, and under his conduct recovered their ancient liberty, and were not after that any more subject to the kings of Judah. And from this time the Jewish traffic through the Red Sea had an interruption till the reign of Uzziah. But he, in the very beginning of his reign, having recovered Elath again to Judah, fortified it anew, and, having driven out the Edomites, planted it again with his own people, and there renewed their old traffic; which was from thence carried on and continued till the reign of Ahaz. But then Rezin, king of Damascus, having, in conjunction with Pekah, king of Israel, oppressed and weakened the once powerful kingdom of Judah to a very great degree, he took advantage of it to seize Elath, and, driving out the Jews from thence, planted it with Syrians, purposing thereby to draw to himself the whole profit of that traffic of the Southern Seas, which the kings of Judah had hitherto reaped by having that port. But the next year after, Tiglath-Pileser having conquered Rezin, and subdued the kingdom of Damascus, he seized with it Elath, as then belonging to his new conquest, and without having any regard to his friend and ally, King Ahaz, or the just claim which he had thereto, kept it ever after, and thereby put an end to all that great profit, which the Jews till then had reaped from this traffic, and transferred it to the Syrians; which became a great diminution of their wealth. For although they did not always carry it on with the same full gales of prosperity, as in the time of King Solomon, yet it was constantly, as long as they had it, of very great advantage to them. For it included all the trade of India, Persia, Africa, and Arabia, which was carried on through the Red Sea. But after Rezin had thus dispossessed them of it, they never had it any more restored to them, but were ever after wholly excluded from it. From thenceforth all the merchandise that came that way, instead of being brought to Jerusalem, was carried elsewhere. But at what place the Syrians fixed their principal mart for it, while it was in their hands, is no where said. But at length we find the whole of this trade engrossed by the Tyrians, who, managing it from the same port, made it by the way of Rhinocorura (a sea-port town lying between the confines of Egypt and Palestine) centre all at Tyre; and from thence they furnished all the western parts of the world with the wares of Persia, India, Africa, and Arabia, which thus by the way of the Red Sea they traded to: and hereby they exceedingly enriched themselves during the Persian empire, under the favour and protection of whose kings they had the full possession of this trade. In various parts of the Old Testament Scriptures, we find the Tyrians spoken of as remarkable for being addicted to merchandise. The merchants were princes, and lived in a style of magnificence unknown to other nations. No ships except the Tyrian were for ages daring enough to pass the straits of the Red Sea on the one side, or of the Mediterranean on the other. But when the Ptolemys prevailed in Egypt, they succeeded, by building Berenice, Myos-Hormos, and other ports on the Egyptian or western side of the Red Sea, (for Elath and Eziongeber lay on the eastern), and by sending forth fleets from thence to all those countries to which the Tyrians traded from Elath, in drawing all this trade into that kingdom, and there fixed the chief mart of it at Alexandria, which was thereby made the greatest mart in the world; and there it continued for a great many ages after, and all the traffic, which the western parts of the world from that time had with Persia, India, Arabia, and the eastern coasts of Africa, was wholly carried on through the Red Sea and the mouth of the Nile, till a way was found, in 1497, of sailing to those parts by the way of the Cape of Good Hope. After this the Portuguese for some time managed this trade; but now it has in a manner wholly got into the hands of the English and Dutch. The route by the Red Sea again became of importance to the commerce of Britain, by the opening up of the overland course to India, through Egypt and the Desert.

COMMISSARY, an officer of the bishop, who exercises spiritual jurisdiction in places of a diocese so far from the episcopal see that the chancellor cannot call the people to the bishop's principal consistory court without great inconvenience.

COMMIT. To commit one's self, spirit, way, or salvation to God, is, upon the faith of his promise, to intrust the same to his care, that he may receive, uphold, direct, preserve, and save us. Psal. xxxi. 5, x. 14, xxxvii. 5; Prov. xvi. 3; 2 Tim. i. 12.

COMMON, profane, ceremonially unclean. Mark vii. 2, 5; Acts x. 14, 15; Rom. xiv. 14. It is said in Acts ii. 44, that such as believe "had all things common;" and in Acts iv. 32, we read "neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common." From these passages it is obvious that the use of the possessions was common, though not probably the possessions themselves. "It clearly appears," says Kuinoel, "that there were those among the Christians who had property and kept it. Thus, in Acts xii. 12, mention is made of one Mary, who had a house of her own at Jerusalem. Nor do we find in the Epistles any vestige of there having been a community of property in the rest of the Christian societies. Nay, we find that there were rich and poor. By the admonition of the apostle, money was collected for the use of the poor, and contributed on the Lord's day. The brethren, therefore, had retained their possessions. Moreover, in 1 Thess. iv. 11, the apostle exhorts the Christians to provide for their support by the labour of their hands; and in 2 Thess. iii. 7, 12, he urges this admonition by proposing his own example." This view of the community of goods is scarcely satisfactory, but it seems to have extended still further. The early Christians seem, at all events, to have regarded their property as if not their own, but held in trust for the advantage of their fellow-Christians. Doddridge remarks, that "peculiar reasons made this community of goods eligible at this time; not only as so many sojourners, who had come from other parts, would justly be desirous to continue at Jerusalem much longer than they intended when they came up to the feast, that they might get a thorough knowledge of the gospel, but as the prospect likewise of the Roman conquests, which, according to Christ's known prediction, were soon to swallow up all Jewish property, would, of course, dispose many more readily to sell their lands." Dr Ncander tells us that a common chest was established from which the necessities of the poorer members of the Church, and perhaps certain expenses incurred by the whole Church, such as the celebration of the agapæ, were defrayed; and, in order to increase their contributions, many persons parted with their estates. Probably a union of this kind existed among the persons who attended the Saviour and ministered to his necessities (Luke viii. 3); and a fund for similar purposes was afterwards formed by public collection in the apostolic Churches.

COMMON SENSE. The principles of common sense on which men usually proceed, in the ordinary affairs of life, are connected with the primary elements of reason. All men, for example, believe in the uniformity of the course of nature in general, whereas they have an intuitive knowledge of this uniformity in one class of phenomena only—those of mind; and yet, though only dogmatically certain of the intuition, they proceed with equal certainty in its application. That men are warranted in this extent of confidence simply from its universal prevalence, we cannot admit. It is necessary to inquire into the ground on which the confidence rests; and, on reflection, we may perceive that, however generally the belief in nature's uniformity may prevail, no warrant for its existence, as a universal principle, is to be found in our nature. It no doubt occupies a place in the fundamental principles of our constitution as thinking beings, but only as exhibited in the processes of mind. Uniformity among material phenomena cannot, at that early stage of our intellectual history, be discovered, nothing, in fact, being known of the existence of objects in any other sense except phenomenally. We are then aware of the existence of objects, but not as possessed of material qualities; we only know them as existing relatively to our mental operations. In these circumstances, it is impossible that we can believe in the uniformity of nature's sequences to any other than a very limited extent, and being dogmatically certain of its truths thus far, we have no hesitation in carrying our confidence still further.

It is wrong, however, to imagine that because the certainty in the one case was intuitive, it is necessarily so in the other. The fact is, that all those principles which we class under the name of common sense, are derived from the application of our intuitions, instead of being intuitions themselves. Yet, it is alleged by Dr Reid to be "the province, and the sole province of common sense, to judge of things that are self-evident;" and still more specifically he informs us, that "it is such a degree of reason as makes a man capable of managing his own affairs, and answerable for his conduct to others." This explanation, however, does not point out to us whether common sense be natural or acquired. If it be natural, then it must either be synonymous with pure reason which is dogmatically certain, or it must mean simply that confidence which we naturally feel in the exercise of our own powers. The sole mental operation is thought, and our confidence in it is simply grounded on the fact that we are conscious of it. In this view, the evidence of common sense might be reduced to that of consciousness which is indubitably certain.

But the meaning usually attached to the word seems to be somewhat different, pointing us rather to certain truths connected with the common affairs of life, which, without examination, we readily admit, and which, even though opposed by powerful, nay, irresistible argument, we still tenaciously retain. We believe them, and yet on many occasions we are unable to assign a valid reason for our belief. Whence, then, arises this resolute firmness in adhering to truths in many cases so inexplicable? The reason, we suspect, is to be found in the similarity of appearance which they bear to a priori intuitions. Having commenced at a very early period to extend our use of these intuitions beyond their legitimate province, it is difficult for us, unless by the exercise of powerful abstraction and a minute analysis, to discover the point at which we have begun to reason doubtfully instead of dogmatically. The transition was made insensibly, and we feel all along as if we were still acting upon intuitions, while, in fact, we are proceeding upon mere arbitrary applications of our intuitions.

The evidence of common sense, then, is not demonstratively certain, but simply probable. No doubt, there is a high probability in favour of its truth, arising from various circumstances, but from none more strongly than the fact of the universal prevalence of such principles. Though not strictly intuitive, still, if mankind have uniformly applied their intuitions so as to arrive at the same conclusions, this, of itself, constitutes a strong presumption in their favour. They are not the current maxims of a mere class or sect of men, who might be supposed to have acquired them from some peculiarity connected with their habits or condition; they are the current maxims of the great mass of mankind, on which they are uniformly accustomed to act; and if, therefore, they are nothing more than prejudices, they are, at all events, prejudices attaching to the human family in general; and, as may easily be conceived, where a prejudice or error is universal, he would be a bold man who would dare to deny it on his own sole responsibility. On the single ground, then, of this immediate recognition of their truth by men of all ages and of all countries, would we attach a high value to the principles grounded on the evidence of common sense. They are not the intuitions of humanity, but they are the universal applications of these intuitions. They are not the outgoings of the original constitution of humanity, but they are the spontaneous outgoings of the collective wisdom of humanity; and the moment that any one of the principles included under this head is stated, it meets with an instant response in every man's mind. He assents to it immediately, and almost without reflection. It is an axiom, an acknowledged principle which he has no inclination to deny.

On these grounds, then, while we cannot attach to common sense such a high importance, such a resistless power, as to overthrow the arguments of even a sound philosophy, we have no hesitation in acknowledging that its dictates are uniformly correct; and yet on no occasion would we be inclined to oppose a statement of philosophy on the ground that it violated the common sense of mankind. In such a mode of procedure there is evidently a shrinking from argument, and an attempt to conceal our conscious lack of sound reasoning by an appeal to the ordinary judgment of our fellow-men. It was, no doubt, a fine apostrophe with which Dr Reid closed the 'Introduction to his Inquiry into the Human Mind,' and yet it is far from prepossessing the reflective reader in favour of the author's view. "Admired Philosophy!" he exclaims, "daughter of light! parent of wisdom and knowledge! if thou art shewn surely thou hast not yet arisen upon the human mind, nor blessed us with more of thy rays than are sufficient to shed a darkness visible upon the human faculties, and to disturb that repose and security which happier mortals enjoy, who never approached thine altar, nor felt thine influence! But if, indeed, thou hast not power to dispel those clouds and phantoms which thou hast discovered or created, withdraw this penurious and malignant ray. I despise philosophy, and renounce its guidance; let my soul dwell with common sense."

COMMUNE. To commune with our heart is seriously to propose to it important questions, entertain it with the view of excellent subjects, and address it with weighty charges and directions. Psal. iv. 4. See COMMUNION.

COMMUNICANT. See LORD'S SUPPER.

COMMUNION,—1. The word koinōia, in its strict and proper sense, signifies sharing something in common with another. Acts ii. 44; 2 Cor. xiii. 14. 2. In a more general sense, it denotes agreement, or participation. 2 Cor. vi. 14; Eph. v. 11. 3. It signifies converse, or friendly intercourse, wherein men contrive or consult together about matters of common concern. Luke vi. 11; Psal. iv. 4. 4. Communion is also used for the Lord's Supper, because we herein make a public profession of our conformity to Christ and his laws; of our spiritual participation of his body and blood; and of our agreement with other Christians in the spirit and faith of the gospel. See LORD'S SUPPER.

COMMUNION SERVICE, the office in the liturgy of the Church of England for the administration of the eucharist, or sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

COMMUNION WITH GOD, is that delightful fellowship and intercourse which a believer enjoys with his heavenly Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ. Rom. v. 1, 2; Eph. ii. 18; Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6. It is founded upon union with Christ, and consists in a communication of Divine graces from him, and a return of devout affections to him. The believer holds communion with God in his works, in his Word, and in his ordinances. There can be no communion without likeness, nor without Christ as the Mediator. Some distinguish communion with God from the sense and feeling of it,—that is, that we may hold communion with him without raptures of joy; and that a saint, even under desertion, may have communion with God as really, though not so feelingly, as at any other time. This communion cannot be interrupted by any local mutations; it is far superior to all outward services and ordinances whatsoever; it concerns the whole soul, all the affections, faculties, and motions of it being under its influence; it is only imperfect in this life, and will be unspeakably enlarged in a better world. In order to keep up communion with God, we should inform ourselves of his will (John v. 39); be often in prayer (Luke xviii. 1); embrace opportunities of retirement (Psal. iv. 4); contemplate the Divine perfections, providences, and promises (Psal. civ. 34); watch against a vain, trifling, and volatile spirit (Eph. iv. 30); and be found in the use of all the means of grace. Psal. xxvii. 4. The blessed effects of communion with God are, deadness to the world (Phil. iii. 8); patience under trouble (Job i. 22); fortitude in danger (Psal. xxvii. 1); gratitude for mercies received (Psal. ciii. 1); direction under difficulties (Prov. iii. 5, 6); peace and joy in opposition (Psal. xvii. 3); happiness in death (Psal. xxiii. 4); and an earnest desire for heaven and glory. 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8.

COMPACT, a covenant, or a regular adjustment. Psal. cxxii. 3. The Church is compact together; every member has his own proper station and work, and yet all are so joined as to conduce to her general glory and welfare. Eph. iv. 16; Col. ii. 19.

COMPARE, to set things together, in order that the likeness or difference may clearly appear. 1 Cor. ii. 13; Judg. viii. 2. It is not wise to compare ourselves with either our enemies or our friends; as not they, but the law of God, is the proper standard by which we ought to judge ourselves. 2 Cor. x. 12.

COMPASSION. God's being full of compassion, imports the infinite greatness of his tender mercy and love, and his readiness to comfort and relieve such as are afflicted. Psal. lxxviii. 38, lxxxvi. 15, cxi. 4, cxlv. 8.

COMPEL. Ministers compel sinners to come in to Christ's house, when, with the utmost earnestness and concern, they show them their sinfulness and danger; the excellency, love, and loveliness of Christ; the happiness of those who receive him; their warrant, and the command of God to believe in him; and beseech them, as in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God. Luke xiv. 23.

COMPLETE, fully finished. Lev. xxiii. 15. Saints are complete in Christ; they are perfectly justified, and have in him complete fulness of grace to render them perfectly holy and happy. Col. ii. 10. They stand complete in all the will of God, when they regard all his commandments, and obey them in an eminent degree. Col. iv. 12.

COMPLIMENTS. The manner in which Eastern subjects were accustomed to address their princes was of a very servile and extravagant description. Thus, we have a striking instance of this in the address of the woman of Tekoah to David: "Then thine handmaid said, The word of my lord the king shall now be comfortable: for as an angel of God, so is my lord the king to discern good and bad: therefore the Lord thy God will be with thee. To fetch about this form of speech hath thy servant Joab done this thing: and my lord is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel of God, to know all things that are in the earth." 2 Sam. xiv. 17, 20. In Oriental countries, the wisdom of the ruler has always been held in the highest estimation, and it was no small compliment, therefore, which Judah paid to his brother Joseph, when he said, "Thou art even as Pharaoh." And not only was it customary to use hyperbolical language, but on the approach of a ruler or conqueror, flowers and branches of trees, and even the most costly garments, were spread along the road. The Jews, accordingly, who believed that Christ was the King of Israel, cut down branches of the trees, and strewed them in the way. And also at a much earlier period, on the elevation of Jehu to the throne, we are informed that "the people hastened and took every man his garment, and put it under him, on the top of the stairs."

COMPREHEND. To comprehend, with all saints, the unbounded love of Christ, is to have a clear, extensive, and heart-ravishing knowledge of its nature and effects. Eph. iii. 18.

CONCEPTION OF CHRIST, the supernatural and miraculous formation of the human nature of Christ in the womb of the Virgin Mary. From the earliest times, this mysterious event was predicted. The very terms in which the first evangelical promise was given seem to point forward to it: "The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent." In accordance with this promise, Jeremiah foretold (xxx. 22), "The Lord hath created a new thing in the earth, a woman shall compass a man." And again :—"Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign; Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." Isa. vii. 14. Jesus was born of a virgin, that in his nature he might be without sin, free from that original impurity which attaches to all who are born after the ordinary mode of generation. For a long period it was a point keenly contested, more especially between the Scotists and Thomists, whether the Virgin Mary was or was not conceived without the stain of original sin. In honour of the Immaculate Conception, as it is termed, the Romish and Greek Churches have both of them established festivals. "Those who support the doctrine of the immaculate conception allege, that they have the consent of nearly the universal Church, and of all universities, especially that of Paris, where no man was admitted to be Master in Theology, unless he bound himself by oath to maintain that doctrine. On the other hand, Cajetan brings the irrefragable testimony of fifteen fathers against it; others bring no less than two hundred; and Bandellus adduces nearly three hundred. To this array of witnesses, the friends of the immaculate conception reply, that some of these authors have been brought in falsely, and that the multitude of witnesses is of little avail, seeing their opinions may all be traced to some individual doctor. Thus they contend, and decide nothing." "In the famous question of the Virgin's immaculate conception, though the fathers are acknowledged to be generally against it, their own Bishop Canus reckons up St Ambrose, St Austin, St Chrysostom, and a great many more, who expressly assert her being conceived in original sin, and say, 'that this is the unanimous opinion of all the fathers who happen to make mention of it;' yet he declares 'this to be a very weak and infirm argument which is drawn from the authority of all the fathers.'"

CONCISION, (cutting off.) The Jews are called the Concision, because, under pretence of zealous adherence to circumcision, they, after it was abolished by our Saviour's death, cut their bodies, rent the Church, and cut off themselves from the blessings of the gospel. Phil. iii. 2.

CONCLAVE, the assembly or meeting of the cardinals shut up for the election of a Pope. Conclave also signifies the place in which the cardinals of the Romish Church meet for the above-mentioned purpose. The Conclave is a range of small cells, ten feet square, made of wainscot; these are numbered, and drawn by lot. They stand in a line along the galleries and hall of the Vatican, with a small space between each. Every cell has the arms of the cardinal over it. The Conclave is not fixed to any one determinate place, for the constitutions of the Church allow the cardinals to make choice of such a place for the Conclave as they think most convenient; yet it is generally held in the Vatican.

CONCORD, FORM OF. Form of Concord, in ecclesiastical history, a standard book among the Lutherans, composed at Torgau, in 1576, and thence called the Book of Torgau, and reviewed at Berg, by six Lutheran doctors of Germany, the principal of whom was James Andreas. This book contains, in two parts, a system of doctrine, the subscription of which was a condition of communion, and a formal and very severe condemnation of all who differed from the compilers of it; particularly with respect to the majesty and omnipresence of Christ's body, and the real presence of his flesh and blood in the eucharist. It was first imposed upon the Saxons by Augustus, and occasioned great opposition and disturbance. The dispute about it was revived in Switzerland in 1718, when the magistrates of Berne published an order for adopting it as a rule of faith; the consequence of which was a contest that reduced its credit and authority.

CONCORDANCE, a book which is designed to serve as an index to the Bible, in which all the leading words are arranged alphabetically, and the books, chapters, and verses in which they occur stated, to assist in finding out passages, and comparing together the several significations of the same word. Works of this kind, whether referring to the original Scriptures, or to the English version, have always been regarded as affording most valuable assistance to the student of the Word of God. Cardinal Hugo is said to have been the first who compiled a Concordance to the Holy Scriptures. The most recent Hebrew and Greek Concordances are those published by the Messrs Bagster. The most valuable Concordance to the English Bible is that of Cruden, which has been long held in high estimation.

CONCUBINAGE, the act of living with a woman to whom the man is not legally married. It is used in Scripture generally for a marriage with a woman of inferior condition (performed with less solemnity than the formal marriage), and to whom the husband does not convey his rank. The concubine had no authority in the family, though her children were reckoned legitimate. It was customary for the father to provide for such children in his lifetime, by bestowing upon them a portion of his cattle and goods. Thus: "And Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac. But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east country." Gen. xxv. 5, 6. If a woman was taken captive in war, she was allowed a month to mourn the loss of her parents and friends; and neither father nor son was permitted to take her as a concubine, until the expiration of that time. Deut. xxi. 10-13. As polygamy was sometimes practised by the patriarchs, it was a common thing to see one, two, or many wives in a family; and, besides these, several concubines. 2 Sam. iii. 2-5; 1 Kings xi. 3; 2 Chron. xi. 21. But ever since the abrogation of polygamy, and the reduction of marriage to its primitive institution, concubinage has been forbidden and condemned among Christians.

CONCUPISCENCE,—1. The corruption of our nature, or inward disposition, whence all actual sin proceeds. Rom. vii. 7; James i. 14. 2. Actual motions and inclinations of our hearts towards sinful deeds. Rom. vii. 8. 3. Unchastity, especially of desire. Col. iii. 5; 1 Thess. iv. 5.

CONDEMNATION, a judicial declaration of guilt, accompanied with a sentence of punishment. In this sense Christ did not condemn the woman taken in adultery (John viii. 1-11); that is, he did not assume the office of a judge, though he bade her "go and sin no more." The word is used also in reference to rash, uncharitable, unjust opinions, pronounced upon others in a spirit of censoriousness. Luke vi. 37. Also, for a practical testimony against sin, impenitence, and unbelief, exhibited in a contrary course of conduct. Thus the Ninevites condemned the Jews of our Saviour's time (Matt. xii. 41), and Noah condemned the world before the flood. Heb.

xi. 7. The condemnation of the devil, seems to mean a sin and punishment similar to his. 1 Tim. iii. 6. The condemnation which all the unconverted lie under, and from which all believers in Christ are made free, is primarily a legal charge of sin, and the sentence of the Divine law adjudging them as guilty to bear the wrath of God, or the execution of his tremendous curse, unless it be satisfied for them by Christ for ever and ever. Rom. v. 16, 18, viii. 1; Gal. iii. 10-14, compared with Matt. xxv. 41-46. This legal condemnation is, however, fearfully enhanced to those who reject the glorious gospel. John iii. 19; 2 Thess. i. 7-10. God condemned sin in the flesh, by executing the punishment due to sin upon Christ in our nature, when submitting to suffer in our stead, he clearly demonstrated how criminal and abominable it is in his sight, provided a full and glorious expiation for its guilt, and adjudged its power in the believer's soul to utter destruction. Rom. viii. 3.

CONDESCENSION is that species of benevolence which designedly waves the supposed advantages of birth, title, or station, in order to accommodate ourselves to the state of an inferior, and diminish that restraint which the apparent distance is calculated to produce in him. It is enjoined on the Christian, and is peculiarly ornamental to the Christian character. Rom. xii. 16. The condescension of God appears every way great, when we consider his infinite perfection, his absolute independence of his creatures, his purpose of mercy toward them, and his continual care over them. The incarnation of Christ is, however, the most wonderful example of condescension ever known, and cannot fail to affect, in a suitable manner, the spirit of every Christian. Phil. ii. 5-11.

CONDITION, the term of a bargain to be performed. It has been debated whether faith should be called the condition of our salvation. If by it we mean a valuable equivalent for the benefit received, or something to be performed in our own strength, or that will be meritorious, it is certainly inapplicable; but if by it be meant that it is only a means without which we cannot be saved, in that sense it is not improper. Yet, as the term is often made use of improperly by those who are mere legalists, perhaps it would be as well to decline the use of it.

CONEY (shaphan). Lev. xi. 5; Dent. xiv. 7; Psal. civ. 18, Prov. xxx. 26. Bochart and others have supposed the shaphan of the Scriptures to be the jerboa; but Mr Bruce thinks that the ashkoko is intended. This curious animal is found in Ethiopia, and in great numbers on Mount Lebanon, &c. Instead of holes, they seem to delight in more airy places,—in the mouths of caves, or clefts in the rock. They are gregarious, and frequently several dozens of them sit upon the great stones at the mouths of caves, and warm themselves in the sun, or come out and enjoy the freshness of the summer evening. They do not stand upright upon their feet, but seem to steal along as in fear, their belly being nearly close to the ground; advancing a few steps at a time, and then pausing. They have something very mild, feeble-like, and timid in their deportment; are gentle and easily tamed, though, when roughly handled at the first, they bite very severely. Many are the reasons to believe this to be the animal called shaphan in Hebrew, and erroneously by our translators "the coney," or rabbit. The latter are gregarious, indeed, and so far resemble the other, as also in size; but they seek not the same place of retreat; for the rabbit burrows most generally in the sand. Nor is there anything in the character of rabbits that denotes excellent wisdom, or that they supply the want of strength by any remarkable sagacity. The shaphan, then, is not the rabbit; which last, unless it was brought to him by his ships from Europe, Solomon never saw.

Let us now apply the characters of the ashkoko to the shaphan. "He is above all other animals so much attached to the rocks, that I never once," says Mr Bruce, "saw him on the ground, or from among large stones in the mouth of caves, where is his constant residence." He lives in families or flocks. He is in Judea, Palestine, and Arabia, and, consequently, must have been familiar to Solomon. David describes him very pertinently, and joins him to other animals perfectly known: "The hills are a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the shaphan;" and Solomon says that "they are exceeding wise," that they are "but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks." Now this seems very obviously to fix the ashkoko to be the shaphan; for his weakness seems to allude to his feet, and how inadequate these are to dig holes in the rock, where yet, however, he lodges. From their tenderness, these are very liable to be excoriated or hurt; notwithstanding which, they build houses in the rocks more inaccessible than those of the rabbit, and in which they abide in greater safety, not by exertion of strength, for they have it not, and are truly, as Solomon says, "a feeble folk," but by their own sagacity and judgment; and are, therefore, justly described as wise. Lastly,—what leaves the thing without doubt is, that some of the Arabs, particularly Damir, say that the shaphan has no tail, that it is less than a cat, that it lives in houses or nests, which it builds of straw, in contradistinction to the rabbit and the rat, and those animals that burrow in the ground. The Rabbins render the shaphan, as in our translation, the coney or rabbit. The Septuagint seem to regard it as the dipus jaculus of Linnæus, or the jerboa, an animal about the size of the rabbit, with a head resembling that of the hog, and the hind legs very long, and adapted for leaping; it lives in burrows dug in the sand, and is noted for its cunning.

CONFERENCE, the act of discoursing with another, in order to treat upon some subject, or to settle some point of dispute. Conference meetings, in a religious sense, are meetings assembled for the purpose of relating experience, discoursing on some religious subject, or for transacting religious business. "Religious conference," says a divine, "is one way of teaching religion. We all have leisure time, and it is well spent when it is employed in set conferences on religion. There the doubting man may open all his suspicions, and confirmed Christians will strengthen his belief; there the fearful may learn to be valiant for the truth; there the liberal may learn to devise liberal things; there the tongue of the stammerer may learn to speak plainly; there Paul may withstand Peter to the face, because he deserves to be blamed; there the gospel may be communicated severally to them of reputation; there, in one word, ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted. One hour in a week thus spent, will contribute much to our edification, provided we abstain from the disorders that have often disgraced, and sometimes destroyed, this excellent Christian practice. Time should be kept, order should be preserved, no idle questions should be asked; freedom of inquiry should be nourished; immodest forwardness should be restrained; practical, experimental, and substantial subjects should be examined. Charity, with all its gentle train, should be there; for she openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness."

CONFERENCE, METHODIST. See METHODIST.

CONFESSION, the open and penitential acknowledgment which a Christian makes of his sins to God. Among the Jews, it was the custom, on the annual Feast of Expiation, for the high-priest to make confession of sins to God, in the name of the whole people. Besides this general confession, the Jews were enjoined, if their sins were a breach of the first table of the law, to make confession of them to God; but violations of the second table were to be acknowledged to their brethren.

Confession, according to Dr Watts, is the third part of prayer, and includes—1. A confession of the meanness of our original, our distance from God, our subjection to him, and constant dependence on him. 2. A confession of our sins, both original and actual, in thought, life, omission, and commission. 3. A confession of our desert of punishment, and our unworthiness of mercy. 4. A confession or humble representation of our wants and sorrows of every kind.

Confession also may be considered as a relative duty, or the acknowledgment of any offence we have been guilty of against a fellow-creature.

The confession of sins, says Andrew Fuller, is of the nature of a solemn oath,—an oath of abjuration; and it is awful to think that we should ever use it without a desire and determination to forsake sin. Prov. xxviii. 13.

CONFSSIONAL, a cell in which the Popish confessor sits to hear confessions.

CONFESSIO, AURICULAR. The Romish and Greek Churches require confession of sins to a priest, not only as a duty, but it is regarded as a sacrament, and absolutely necessary to absolution. "These confessions are made to the priest, and are private and auricular; and the priest is not to reveal them, under pain of the highest punishment. This, however, is both unnecessary and unscriptural; for, in the first place, there is no proof that the power of remitting and retaining sins (the pretended ground of sacramental confession) was imparted to any but the apostles, or at most to those to whom a discernment of spirits was communicated. 2. If our Saviour had designed this to have been a duty, he would most probably have delivered us an express command to this purpose. 3. This authority of pardoning sins immediately in relation to God (the foundation of the pretended duty of secret confession), without any reference to church censures, was never claimed for many ages after Christ."

Secret confession to a priest was unknown until the fifth century, and was not established as one of the commandments of the Church till the thirteenth century.

CONFESSIO OF FAITH, a list of the several articles of the belief of any Church. There is some difference between creeds and confessions. Creeds, in their commencement, were simply expressions of faith in a few of the leading and undisputed doctrines of the gospel. Confessions were, on the contrary, the result of many a hazardous and laborious effort, at the dawn of reviving literature, to recover these doctrines, and to separate them from the enormous mass of erroneous and corrupted tenets, which the negligence or ignorance of some, and the artifices of avarice and ambition in others, had served to accumulate for the space of a thousand years, under an implicit obedience to the arrogant pretensions of an absolute and infallible authority in the Church of Rome. Objections have been formed against all creeds and confessions of faith, on the ground that they infringe upon Christian liberty, supersede the Scriptures, exclude such persons as ought not to be excluded, and admit such as ought not to be admitted; are often too particular and long; are liable to be abused; tempt men to hypocrisy; preclude improvement; and have been employed as means of persecution. On the other hand, the advocates for them observe, that all the arts and sciences have been reduced to a system; and why should not the truths of religion, which are of greater importance? That a compendious view of the chief and most necessary points of the Christian religion, which lie scattered up and down in the Scriptures, must be useful to inform the mind, as well also to hold forth to the world what are in general the sentiments of such a particular Church or Churches; that they tend to discover the common friends of the same faith to one another, and to unite them; that the Scriptures seem to authorise and countenance them; such as the Moral Law, the Lord's Prayer, the "form of doctrine" mentioned by Paul, Rom. vi. 17; and again, "the form of sound words," in 2 Tim. i. 13, &c.; that their becoming the occasion of hypocrisy is no fault of the articles, but of those who subscribe them; that persecution has been raised more by the turbulent tempers of men, than from the nature of confessions. Some think that all articles and confessions of faith should be expressed in the bare words of Scripture; but it is replied, that this would destroy all exposition and interpretation of Scripture; that it would have a tendency to make the ministry of the Word useless,—in a great measure cramp all religious conversation; and that the sentiments of one man could not be distinguished from another in some points of importance.

CONFESSOR, a Christian who has made a solemn and resolute profession of the faith, and has endured torments in its defence. A mere saint is called a confessor, to distinguish him from the roll of dignified saints, such as apostles, martyrs, &c. In ecclesiastical history, the word confessor is sometimes used for martyr; in after times it was confined to those who, after having been tormented by the tyrants, were permitted to live and die in peace; and at last it was also used for those who, after having lived a good life, died under an opinion of sanctity. According to Cyprian, he who presented himself to torture, or even to martyrdom, without being called to it, was not called a confessor, but a professor; and if any, from want of courage, abandoned his country, and became a voluntary exile for the sake of the faith, he was called ex terris.

Confessor is also a priest in the Romish Church, who has a power to hear sinners in the sacrament of penance, and to give them absolution. The confessors of the kings of France, from the time of Henry IV., have been constantly Jesuits; before him, the Dominicans and Cordeliers shared the office between them. The confessors of the house of Austria have also ordinarily been Dominicans and Cordeliers, but the later emperors have all taken Jesuits.

CONFIRMATION, the act of establishing any thing or person. 1. Divine confirmation is a work of the Spirit of God, strengthening, comforting, and establishing believers in faith and obedience. 1 Pet. v. 10; 1 Cor. i. 8. 2. Ecclesiastical confirmation is a rite in Episcopal Churches, whereby a person arrived at years of discretion undertakes the performance of every part of the baptismal vow made for him by his godfather and godmother. The bishop lays his hand upon the head of the person, in token of the baptismal vows being conveyed over to the individual.

In the ancient Church it was done immediately after baptism, if the bishop happened to be present at the solemnity. Throughout the East it still accompanies baptism; but the Romanists make it a distinct, independent sacrament. Seven years is the stated time for confirmation; however, it is sometimes performed beyond that age. The person to be confirmed has a godfather and godmother appointed him, as in baptism. In the Church of England, the age of the persons to be confirmed is not fixed. The passage usually adduced in support of this rite is Acts viii. 14, 15, 17: "Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the Word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John: who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost: then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost." But a little consideration is sufficient to show that the object which the apostles had in view, when they laid their hands on those whom Philip had baptized, was widely different from that which is involved in confirmation. It is expressly stated that they "prayed for them," and "laid their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost." That miraculous gifts were conveyed on that occasion is evident; for it is said, "When Simon saw that through laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money." Besides, as Dr Whitby justly observes, if they laid not their hands on all who were baptized, it makes nothing for confirmation; if they did, then Simon Magus also was confirmed, and received the Holy Ghost. The ceremony of confirmation was unknown to the primitive Church. Tertullian is the most ancient author by whom any mention is made of confirmation. This rite, therefore, is unsanctioned by Scripture, and unrecognised by the early Christian Church.

CONFLAGRATION, GENERAL, a term used to denote that grand period or catastrophe of our world, when the face of nature is to be changed by fire, as formerly it was by water.

1. Scripture assures us in general, that this earth in its present form will not be perpetual, but shall come to an end. 2. It further tells us, that this dissolution of the world shall be by a general conflagration, in which all things upon the face of the earth shall be destroyed; by which the atmosphere shall also be sensibly affected, as in such a case it necessarily must be,—2 Pet. iii. 5, 7, 10, 12; where, from the connection of the words, the opposition between the conflagration and the deluge, as well as the most literal and apparent import of the phrases themselves, it is plain they cannot, as Dr Hammond strangely supposes, refer to the desolation brought on Judea when destroyed by the Romans, but must refer to the dissolution of the whole earth. 3. The Scripture represents this great burning as a circumstance nearly connected with the day of judgment (2 Pet. iii. 7, compared with 2 Thess. i. 7, 8; Heb. x. 27; 1 Cor. iii. 12, 13); and it is probable there may be an allusion to this in several passages of the Old Testament, such as Psal. xi. 6, l. 3, xvi. 13; Isa. xxxiv. 4, lxvi. 15; Dan. vii. 9, 10; Mal. iv. 1; Zeph. iii. 8; Deut. xxxii. 22, to which many parallel expressions might be added from the canonical and authorized books. 4. It is not expressly declared how this burning shall be kindled, nor how it shall end, which has given occasion to various conjectures about it.

The ancient Pythagoreans, Platonists, Epicureans, and Stoics, appear to have had a notion of the conflagration; though whence they should derive it, unless from the sacred books, is difficult to conceive,—except, perhaps, from the Phœnicians, who themselves had it from the Jews. Mention of the conflagration is made in the books of the Sibyls, Sophocles, Hystaspes, Ovid, Lucan, &c. Dr Burnet, after J. Tachard and others, relates that the Siamese believe that the earth will at last be parched up with heat, the mountains melted down, the earth's whole surface reduced to a level, and then consumed with fire. And the Brahmans of Siam do not only hold that the world shall be destroyed by fire, but also that a new earth shall be made out of the remains of the old.

Divines ordinarily account for the conflagration theologically, and think it will take its rise from a miracle, as fire from heaven. Philosophers contend for its being produced from natural causes. Some think an eruption of the central fire sufficient for the purpose, and add, that this may be occasioned several ways, viz., either by having its intensity increased, which again may be effected either by being driven into less space by the encroachments of the superficial cold, or by an increase of the inflammability of the fuel whereon it is fed; or by having the resistance of the imprisoning earth weakened, which may happen either from the diminution of its matter, by the consumption of its central parts, or by weakening the cohesion of the constituent parts of the mass by the excess or the defect of moisture. Others look for the cause of the conflagration in the atmosphere, and suppose that some of the meteors there engendered in unusual quantities, and exploded with unusual vehemence, from the concurrence of various circumstances, may effect it without seeking any further. Lastly, others conclude the world is to undergo its conflagration from the near approach of a comet.

Various opinions are also entertained as to the renovation of the earth after the conflagration.—1. Some suppose that the earth will not be entirely consumed, but that the matter of which it consists will be fully purified and refined; which they say will be the natural consequence of the action of the fire upon it; though it is hard to say what such a purification can do towards fitting it for its intended purpose, for it is certain a mass of crystal or glass would very ill answer the following parts of this hypothesis. 2. They suppose that from these materials thus refined, as from a second chaos, there will, by the power of God, arise a new creation; and that the face of the earth, and likewise the atmosphere, will then be so restored, as to resemble what it originally was in the paradisaical state, and consequently to render it a more desirable abode for human creatures than it at present is; and they urge for this purpose the following texts, viz., 2 Pet. iii. 13 (compare Isa. lxv. 17, lxvi. 22); Matt. xix. 28, 29 (compare Mark x. 29, 30; Luke xviii. 29, 30); Psal. cii. 25, 26; Acts iii. 21; 1 Cor. vii. 31; Rom. viii. 21. 3. They agree in supposing that in this new state of things there will be no sea. Rev. xxi. 1.

4. They suppose that the earth, thus beautified and improved, will be inhabited by those who shall inherit the first resurrection, and who shall here enjoy a very considerable degree of happiness, though not equal to that which is to succeed the general judgment; which judgment shall, according to them, open when those thousand years are expired mentioned in Rev. xx. 4, &c.; 1 Thess. iv. 17 (compare verse 15), which passage is thought by some to contain an insinuation that Paul expected to be alive at the appearance of Christ, which must imply an expectation of being thus raised from the dead before it; but it is answered that the expression, Wethat are alive, may only signify, "those of us that are so," speaking of all Christians as one body. 1 Cor. xv. 49–52. Dr Hartley declared it as his opinion, that the millennium will consist of one thousand prophetic years, where each day is a year,—that is, three hundred and sixty thousand,—pleading that this is the language used in other parts of the Book of Revelation. But it seems an invincible objection against this hypothesis, which places the millennium after the conflagration, that the saints inhabiting the earth after the first resurrection are represented as distressed by the invasion of some wicked enemies. Rev. xx. 7–9; Ezek. xxxviii. 39. See MILLENNIUM.

Divine revelation, not human philosophy, must here be our only guide. It is probable that the earth will survive its fiery trial, and become the everlasting abode of righteousness, as part of the holy empire of God; but, seeing the language used in Scripture, and especially in the Book of Revelation, is often to be considered as figurative, rather than literal, it becomes us to be cautious in our conclusions. See DISSOLUTION.

CONFORMITY. The saints are conformed to Christ; they are made like him in their covenant relation to God, in their privileges, graces, and holy deportment on earth; and they will be made like him in glory, when they shall see him as he is. Rom. viii. 29. They are conformable, or like to him in his death; they gradually die to their corrupt lusts; have their old man crucified with him,—its lusts and deeds mortified through the influence of his death; and they are exposed to suffering for his sake. Phil. iii. 10. They ought not to be conformed to this world; ought not to imitate or join in the vain or wicked maxims, customs, and practices thereof. Rom. xii. 2.

CONFOUND. He that believeth shall not be confounded; he shall not be disappointed of his expected salvation; shall not, with perplexity or surprise, be exposed to any fearful destruction: nor shall he make haste; shall not basely catch at unlawful means of deliverance, but patiently wait till God deliver him. 1 Pet. ii. 6; Isa. xxviii. 16; Rom. ix. 33.

CONFUCIANS, the disciples of Confucius, a celebrated Chinese philosopher, who lived about five hundred years before the Christian era. This religion, which is professed by the literati and persons of rank in China and Tonquin, consists in a deep inward veneration for the God or King of heaven, and in the practice of every moral virtue. They have neither temples nor priests, nor any settled form of external worship; every one adores the Supreme Being in the way he likes best.

Confucius, like Socrates, who was nearly his contemporary, did not dive into abstruse notions, but desired always to speak with the deepest regard of the great Author of all beings, whom he represents as the most pure and perfect essence and fountain of all things; to inspire men with greater fear, veneration, gratitude, and love of him; to assert his Divine providence over all his creatures; and to represent him as a being of such infinite knowledge, that even our most secret thoughts are not hidden from him; and of such boundless goodness and justice that he can let no virtue go unrewarded, or vice unpunished.

The following passage contains the substance of the moral precepts of Confucius:—"I teach you nothing," said he continually to his contemporaries, "which you might not learn of yourselves, if you would only make a proper use of the faculties of your mind. Nothing is more natural, nothing more simple, than the principles of the morality which I endeavour to inculcate in its salutary maxims. Everything I tell you has been practised by our ancient sages before you; and this practice, which in remote times was universally adopted, resolves itself into the observance of the three fundamental laws pertaining to the relations of sovereigns and subjects, of fathers and children, of husband and wife, and the exact practice of five chief virtues, which it is enough to name in order to give you the idea of their excellence, and the necessity of practising them. They are,—humanity, that is to say, universal charity between all of our race, without distinction; justice, which gives to every individual what is his due, without favouritism or partiality; conformity to established usages and ceremonies, in order that those who live together may have the same manner of living, and share alike the same advantages and inconveniences; uprightness, that is to say, that rectitude of mind and heart which leads one to seek and desire the truth in everything, without wishing to deceive himself or others; finally, sincerity or good faith,—that frankness, that openness of heart, blended with confidingness, which excludes all feints, all disguise in conduct or action. These are the virtues which rendered our primitive teachers respectable during life, and which have immortalized their names after their death. Let us take them for our models; let us do our best to imitate them."

So highly is Confucius esteemed in China, that there are more than fifteen hundred and sixty temples dedicated to him, and sixty-two thousand animals, chiefly pigs and rabbits, immolated annually to his memory. This is asserted by Dr Milne, on the authority of their own writers. Mr Maurice asserts, that Confucius strictly forbade all images of the Deity, and the deification of dead men; and that, in his dying moments (like Socrates in this also), he encouraged his disciples, by predicting that, "in the West the Holy One would appear." The Chinese, however, still honour their deceased ancestors, burn incense before their images, bow themselves before their pictures, and invoke from them all temporal blessings.

CONFUSION OF TONGUES. See BABEL.

CONGREGATIONALISTS, a large and respectable body of professing Christians, who hold that each congregation of Christians meeting in one place, and united by a solemn covenant, is a complete Church, with Christ for its only head, and deriving from him the right to choose its own officers, to observe the sacraments, to have public worship, and to exercise discipline upon its own members. They also hold the parity of ministers and of Churches, and regard as of sacred and binding force the great principle of the fellowship or communion of Churches, by which all whom they regard as true Churches of Jesus Christ are bound together by ties similar in their nature and obligation to those which unite to each other the members of a single Church. The Churches they regard as the source of all power, and councils, and other ecclesiastical bodies, as having only a delegated authority, by which they act for and in the name of their constituents; and that their decisions have no other force than the moral power which united wisdom and piety give them. Still there are certain public acts of Church order and discipline, which, in their opinion, from a regard to custom, and to the great and fundamental principle of the communion of Churches, can be performed by councils only, except in cases where it is impossible for a Church to avail itself of such assistance.

"Every individual church is held to be complete within itself, not wanting nor admitting any interference on the part of other churches or of representative assemblages or synods. Every congregation chooses its own officers—admits, rejects, or excommunicates its members or the candidates for membership—and raises and administers its own resources. And in all the various decisions on these matters, every member has a voice: if a new member is received, it is upon the approval of the existing members, who must first have been convinced of his religious character; if an existing member is expelled, it is upon the judgment of the other members after evidence produced before them. So, of other questions, all authority is vested in the church itself—none given absolutely to its officers; and from the individual church's judgment there is no appeal. To express the total freedom of the body from exterior control, the term 'Independency' is used; to convey the idea that every member of the church participates in its administration, 'Congregationalism,' a more modern appellation, is adopted.

"Two descriptions only of church officers are viewed as warranted by scriptural authority: viz., bishops (or pastors) and deacons; the former instituted to promote the spiritual, and the latter to advance the temporal, welfare of the church. The various expressions, 'bishop,' 'elder,' 'pastor,' 'presbyter,' employed in Scripture, are employed, it is affirmed, indifferently and interchangeably, intending always a precisely similar office. Whether there should be in any congregation more than one such bishop, is conceived to be a matter undecided by the Scriptures, and left to the discretion of the church itself. The only valid 'call' to the pastorate is held to be an invitation to that office by an individual church; and where a person is invited thus, no licence, as in Presbyterian, nor ordination, as in Episcopal churches, is considered to be requisite in order to confer authority to preach or to administer the sacraments. Still, after this election by an individual church, an ordination of the chosen minister by ministers of neighbouring churches is esteemed a fitting introduction to the pastoral office; and the custom always has been general, throughout the Independent body, of inaugurating newly chosen pastors at a special service, when they make profession of their orthodox belief and receive fraternal recognition from the other pastors present. But such ordination is not looked upon as imparting pastoral authority; this flows exclusively from the election by a church, without whose previous sanction ordination is regarded as of no avail. And, in the selection of its minister, a church is not restricted to a special class prepared by education for the office: any person who, by Christian character and aptitude for preaching, so commends himself as to receive an invitation to the ministry, is recognised as being lawfully a pastor. Yet is an educated ministry considered very desirable; and, practically, the majority of Congregational ministers receive preparatory training at the various theological academies and colleges belonging to the general body. But while scriptural authority is thus asserted for the existence of a ministerial order, no restriction to this order of the exclusive privilege of preaching is contended for.

"The theory which Independents cherish of the scriptural model of a Christian church induces them, of course, to look with disapproval on all state establishments of religion. Hostile, as already intimated, to the slightest interference from external bodies—even where, as in the Presbyterian communities, the partly popular assembly may be not unfairly taken to reflect with faithfulness the best ideas and abilities of all the individual churches—Independents are inevitably still more hostile to the interference of a secular and miscellaneous body like the national parliament, to whose decision they assert all questions of dispute in national establishments must actually or virtually be referred. And not alone upon the ground of interference with self-government do Independents disapprove of national churches: even if the state were to allow the fullest freedom, and confine its operations to the mere provision of the necessary funds for public worship, there would still remain insuperable conscientious scruples springing from their notions of the impropriety of all endowments for religious purposes. Religion, they contend, should be committed, for its maintenance and propagation, to the natural affection of its votaries. Religious zeal, they say, will furnish ample means for originating and sustaining all the institutions, ministers, and missionaries, necessary for the promulgation of religious truth. Where no such zeal is manifested in a church, its absence is regarded as a certain sign that there the truth is either not at all, or not in all its purity, professed. They argue, therefore, that the operation of these voluntary motives would supply the best security, not only that the true religion would receive an adequate support, but also that erroneous doctrines would obtain but limited success; whereas the state, possessing no peculiar fitness, even for discriminating truth from error, still less for appreciating nicely all the various forms of truth, is liable to the double danger either of affording to erroneous doctrines artificial nourishment, or of inflicting, to support one special form of truth, injustice and discouragement on all the rest."

Congregationalists in general hold that the word Church, in the New Testament, is applied either to the whole Christian community, or to a single congregation, and that it is used in no other sense. But some maintain that the whole body of Christians residing in a particular city or vicinity were but one Church, though far too numerous to meet in a single place of worship. Hence they derive the propriety of regarding a number of contiguous Churches, when consociated, as in certain respects but one body, and the removal of a cause from a particular Church to a consociation, as a reference from a part to the whole, rather than an appeal from a lower to a higher tribunal. The common opinion, however, is, that a single Church is the highest judicial or executive tribunal known in the Scriptures, and that councils of all kinds are merely human devices. Their decisions are considered merely advisory, having no force, except as they are sanctioned and carried into effect by the Churches. It is held that where the whole body of believers in any province or country are mentioned in the New Testament, they are spoken of not as the Church, but as the Churches of that country, and that a Church is often spoken of as meeting in one place not only for worship, but for the choice of officers, and other business. In accordance with this, the following translation is given to Acts xiv. 23: "They appointed elders" (or ministers) "in every Church by the lifting up of hands."

As to the Churches after the time of the apostles, the learned Dr Owen asserts and defends the following proposition: "That in no approved writer, for the space of two hundred years after Christ, is there any mention of any other organical or visibly professing Church, but that only which is parochial or congregational." It is held that the Epistles of Clement and Polycarp contain statements which cannot be reconciled with any other views than those which have been given above. Mosheim says, "All the Churches of those primitive times, until near the end of the second century, were independent bodies, none of them subject to the jurisdiction of any other. Each Church was a little independent republic, governed by its own laws, which were enacted, or at least sanctioned, by the people. For though the Churches founded by the apostles were often consulted in different cases, yet they had no judicial authority, no control, no power of giving laws. On the contrary, it is clear as the noon-day, that all Christian Churches had equal rights, and were in all respects on a footing of equality. The meeting at Jerusalem, as given in the Book of Acts, was only a conference of a single Church. The councils of delegates of the Churches to consult for the common good, were first held near the close of the second century. This custom arose in Greece, and was an imitation of the political councils which had long been known there."

Associations are composed of ministers only, who meet for their own benefit, and to consult for the good of the Churches. They examine and license candidates for the ministry, but have no power of making laws for the Churches. Some maintain that, on the general principle that a man is to be tried by his peers, a minister is accountable, in the first case, only to the association of which he is a member; so that until he is deposed by them, or by the consociation before which they bring him for trial, he is not amenable to the Church of which he is a member. Others hold that a Church has a right to try its minister in the same way that it would one of its private members. The principle generally recognised among Congregationalists is, that in the discipline of ministers, there is to be a council of Churches, where it may be had; but where this cannot be, the Church may proceed to act.

The general tenets of the Congregational body may be termed a system of orthodox Calvinism. They do not, however, acknowledge the necessity of subscription to any particular creed, and yet the Congregational Union issued, in 1833, a "Declaration of Faith, Order, and Discipline," which may be regarded as a faithful exhibition of their principles.

Congregationalism or Independency seems to have had its origin towards the end of the sixteenth century. The adherents of these new doctrines were very harshly treated in the reign of Elizabeth, and many of them obliged to take refuge in Holland. In the time of Cromwell, himself an Independent, the principles of this body were not only tolerated, but held in high estimation. From the Restoration to the Revolution, however, persecution again raged. From that period down to the present day, the Congregationalists, in common with all other dissenters, have enjoyed perfect liberty, and so rapidly have they increased of late, that while in 1838 their churches were estimated to amount to 1840, the last census in 1851 shows their number to have risen to 3244. They have no fewer than eight theological seminaries for the training of young men for the ministry. In Scotland, however, the Congregationalists are a small body, dating no farther back than the labours of the two Haldanes, in the end of the last century.

CONONITES, the followers of Conon, bishop of Tarsus, in the sixth century. He was a Trinitarian, and even a Tritheist,—carrying too far the distinct personality. But his peculiar tenet was a scholastic distinction. Philoponus, his contemporary, an Alexandrian philosopher and grammarian, taught that the form, as well as matter of all bodies, was subject to corruption. Conon, on the contrary, taught that the body never lost its essential form; that its matter alone was subject to corruption and decay, and was to be restored when this mortal shall put on immortality. Such was the ingenuity of those times in multiplying sects and parties!

CONQUERORS. (See ARMS—ARMY.) In all their tribulations the saints are more than conquerors through Christ; by his grace and presence they overcome them most certainly, easily, and quickly; they patiently bear them, rejoice in them, and gain much advantage by them. Rom. viii. 37.

CONSCIENCE. The constitution of man is twofold. He has an intellectual and he has a moral constitution. To each of these departments of his nature there are corresponding classes of truths,—there being truths which are purely intellectual, and truths which are purely moral. The evidence which supports the one is essentially distinct from that which supports the other. An intellectual truth is addressed to the reason alone, and has properly no bearing upon the affections and conduct. A moral truth is addressed at once to the head and to the heart. It affects the rational, and it also affects the emotional nature. It calls upon us to think; but it also calls upon us to feel, and influences us to act.

As was formerly remarked (See APPROBATION and DISAPPROBATION), sometimes the attempt has been made to resolve conscience into a process of reasoning of some kind or other; but, besides that the instantaneousness of the judgment seems to exclude such a supposition, it is impossible to adduce a process of the kind which does not involve the very feeling for which it would wish to account. Every feeling of approbation or disapprobation, whether exercised upon our own actions or extended to the actions of others, supposes necessarily some standard to which the action is referred. That standard, then, must either exist in our own constitution, or must exist without us. If it exist within us, the judgment may be immediate; but if it exist without us, the comparison with the standard must involve a process of intellectual reasoning; which, of course, to lead to anything like a uniform conclusion, must proceed upon some fundamental principles of the human constitution; and if it does not so proceed, the most discordant views will be entertained upon the subject. Without, however, entering upon the discussion of the much-disputed question as to the origin and nature of that principle, in virtue of which a moral judgment in reference to our own conduct is formed, we may simply remark, that whether it be a separate principle, as is generally held, under the name of conscience, or a mere modification of reason, as is sometimes alleged, the rapidity, and almost complete uniformity, of the judgment, shows it to have its foundation in the constitution of man, and therefore to have all the weight and certainty of intellectual intuition. The evidence of consciousness and the evidence of conscience are equally certain, though bearing upon truths of different kinds. If the former constitutes the ultimate conditions on which we think, the latter constitutes the ultimate conditions on which we feel and act. According to the nature we have received, we cannot think without consciousness, and all that it necessarily involves; neither can we act without conscience, and all that it necessarily involves. The judgments of both, then, are dogmatical and indubitably certain. If we do what is right, we have an approving principle within us; if we do what is wrong, this faithful monitor warns us of our error."

Admitting, then, that the judgments of conscience are certain, when viewed in reference to our own conduct, are we warranted in pronouncing them equally certain when viewed in reference to the conduct of others? In reply to this question we may remark, that if the judgment be applied to the virtuousness or viciousness of the action in itself, conscience does speak with equal certainty as in our own case. The feeling of approbation is momentarily excited in witnessing a virtuous action, and the feeling of disapprobation in witnessing a vicious action. Both are immediate and intuitive.

It is impossible to draw the line of distinction between the moral judgment and the moral sentiment. They are inseparably connected. We feel and we judge at one and the same moment, in regard to moral actions. With the nature of that standard according to which we judge, we of course have no concern. It is enough to know that our moral judgments are, like our intellectual intuitions, immediate and certain; so that we cannot deny them, without denying the very existence of our moral constitution. But, in alleging the certainty of the judgments of conscience, we must bear constantly in mind that our moral nature is spoken of in its fundamental principles alone. It is this which constitutes man a responsible creature. He has a law within him, whose dictates he is bound to obey; and should he transgress them, there is a voice from within which proclaims his criminality and liability to punishment. This law, promulgated by conscience, leads us to recognise good, and to distinguish it from evil.

We require no process of reasoning to convince us whether our own actions are right or wrong. Of this we have immediate information from the dictates of conscience, which so rapidly and almost instinctively operates, that it has been termed by some philosophers a sense. It is when we judge of actions without the range of our individual conscience, that reasoning, founded on moral evidence, is required to ascertain the facts of the case,—the circumstances in which the actions were performed. That it is our duty to uphold and strenuously to promote what is just and right, is an abstract truth; but to ascertain what is just and right, must require a knowledge of facts, which can only be obtained by moral evidence. In this respect, then, there is a distinction between the force of the evidence of conscience, as applied to ourselves and as applied to others. In our own case, it is certain and immediate; in the case of others, it is dependent upon the nature of the facts, and therefore, to some extent, may be regarded as a process of reasoning. Hence the difference, in point of force, in the evidence of conscience as exhibited in different circumstances.

In thus exercising authority over the other departments of our nature, conscience bears testimony to the moral character of our thoughts, actions, and feelings, with a power which it is often difficult to withstand. The evidence is in itself irresistible; and, however intricate the action may be, both in itself and in its consequences, its moral nature is clearly made known to us by the declarations of that power which has been well termed the vicegerent of God in the soul of man. In all circumstances, the evidence is certain; but we are not at all times prepared to listen to its dictates; and hence we sometimes venture to charge upon conscience a defectiveness in the testimony, when, in fact, we ourselves are refusing to listen to the testimony. It is thus we not unfrequently deceive ourselves in regard to our own actions. But to show that the evidence of conscience is worthy of all belief, we might refer to the uniform judgment which is passed by mankind upon actions in general. This is, and always has been, on the side of virtue. Some apparent exceptions to this remark have been sometimes adduced; but they are apparent, not real. They do not invalidate the testimony of conscience; but they serve to show that there are situations in which men have preferred the testimony of other principles and feelings to that of conscience. The Spartans exalted the virtue of dexterity above that of honesty and integrity; but they did not, on that account, deny the criminality of theft. They only agreed to suspend the punishment of that crime, that a quality which they considered valuable to the commonwealth might be promoted. Even here they had not cast aside the evidence of conscience; nay, the law bore, that the crime was to be punished, if detected; and, though there was an evident want of principle in their view of the subject, it detracts not in the least from the force of the evidence we are now considering. One thing, however, it shows,—that conscience, though she invariably speaks the truth, may nevertheless be resisted. We are in possession of that freedom of action which is necessary to constitute us responsible beings. There is no physical necessity laid upon us, by the structure either of our intellectual or moral constitution, to act in obedience to the dictates of conscience. It is intended to operate in regulating, but not in irresistibly controlling, our conduct. We may, as we often do, lend a deaf ear to the remonstrances of this faithful monitor; but it becomes us not, on that account, to deny the fidelity and truth of its admonitions. If we do, the united testimony of the whole human family will bear out completely the force of that evidence which conscience bears to the moral character of actions.

CONSCIOUSNESS, the intuitive conviction which every man possesses of his own mental operations. "I think," and "I am conscious of thinking," are, in fact, convertible expressions. But consciousness merely predicates existence of its object, it cannot possibly assert any thing as to its nature. Thus, in being conscious of thought, I am necessarily conscious of the existence of myself who am thinking; but I am not conscious whether that which thinks be either mind or matter, nay, I am not conscious of any thinking principle at all. There is a simple belief of personal existence; which is nothing more than another expression to denote consciousness. To speak of being conscious, without a belief in our own existence, would be to utter a contradiction. And yet the opinion of Mr Stewart appears to have been very different. "According to the common doctrine of our best philosophers," says he, "it is by the evidence of consciousness we are assured that we ourselves exist. The proposition, however, when thus stated, is not accurately true; for our own existence is not a direct and immediate object of consciousness, in the strict and logical meaning of that term. We are conscious of sensation, thought, desire, volition; but we are not conscious of the existence of mind itself; nor would it be possible for us to arrive at the knowledge of it (supposing us to be created in the full possession of all the intellectual capacities which belong to human nature), if no impression were ever to be made on our external senses." And again, he states his conviction to be, that a belief in our own existence "is rather a judgment accompanying the existence of that power (consciousness), than one of its immediate intimations concerning its appropriate class of internal phenomena. It appears to me, therefore," he continues, "more correct to call the belief of our own existence a concomitant or accessory of the exercise of consciousness, than to say, that our existence is a fact falling under the immediate cognizance of consciousness, like the existence of the serious, agreeable, or painful sensations which external objects excite in our mind."

Throughout these remarks may be perceived that false view of consciousness which, as inculcated by the Scotch philosophers generally, would go to limit its meaning most unwarrantably, applying it to something which has no existence, either in the world without or in the world within us. It is alleged to make known to us thought, while the object which it makes known is so stripped of all its qualities, even the most essential, as that we are prevented from speaking of conscious thought, as either a thought having an object or a subject. It is simply an act without an agent or anything acted upon. In a consciousness of this kind we cannot believe, simply because we cannot conceive its existence. It is so pure an abstraction as to be beyond our comprehension.

Consciousness, as far as we can succeed in analysing the matter, is simply thought, necessarily implying an object of which we are conscious and a subject who is conscious. We are as much entitled, we conceive, to say that we are conscious of our own existence, as that we are conscious of our own thought,—both statements being inseparably connected. Each of them contains in gremio the necessary supposition of the other.

In thought, the same act which makes us conscious of our own existence, convinces us also of the existence of something which is not ourselves. But this is the utmost extent of the information which consciousness or intuition gives. It imparts no information as to the nature or qualities of that object whose phenomenal existence it makes known to us. We are merely made aware that there is an object, but what the object is, or of what it consists, consciousness affirms nothing.

This simple view of the evidence of consciousness or intuition, as limited exclusively to the primary elements of reason, or what may be termed the ultimate conditions of thought, prevents us from attributing dogmatical certainty to what are merely highly probable truths; or, as in the case of mathematical axioms, to what are merely identical propositions. To a thinking being, that alone is entitled to be considered as dogmatically certain which he cannot deny without contradicting and belying his mental constitution. There may be other truths which wear the appearance of equal certainty with the first dictates of consciousness, but their certainty rests on a quite different foundation. They are not implied in thought necessarily as developed in a thinking being.

These ultimate truths, however, founded on the undisputed and indisputable evidence of consciousness, form the ground-work on which the whole of our after-reasonings rest. They are, or may be, detected at every step as we proceed, and give us a peculiar confidence and security in all our reasonings. Mr Stewart well describes such truths when he says, that "they are not the principles from which our reasonings set out, and on which they ultimately depend; but the necessary conditions on which every step of the deduction tacitly proceeds." In this view, intuitive truths are the elements of reason, rather than the foundations of reasoning. They belong not exclusively to the process of reasoning, but are, with equal certainty, involved in every act of thinking and judging. They attach to the mental constitution of man as an intelligent creature, independently of all the peculiarities which belong to individual men.

On this evidence, then, men must necessarily proceed in all that they think, and say, and do, as intelligent creatures, and while each man feels the force of the conviction for himself, it is impossible, in the nature of things, that he can impart that dogmatically certain conviction to any other person. Each man's consciousness belongs to himself alone, and to no other is its testimony valid. This, then, is a strictly personal species of evidence; but not the less certain on that account. No man doubts his own consciousness. It is the strongest evidence he can possess.

CONSECRATION. When any person or thing is set apart for the service of God, it is said to be consecrated. The first-born, by the Mosaic law were consecrated to God, and afterwards the tribe of Levi were set apart for his service. Under the Old Testament, the token of consecration was anointing with holy oil. In this way, by pouring on his head the most holy oil (Exod. xxix. 7, xxx. 30), the high priest was consecrated to his mystical office. Thus also kings and prophets, and the tabernacle itself were consecrated. These, however, were types of Jesus Christ, who, as the prophet, priest, and king of his people, was "anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows." Believers also, being a holy priesthood, are consecrated to God, having an unction from the Holy One; that is, being anointed by the Spirit of God. It has been customary in all ages to consecrate or set apart various objects for the service of God. Thus Hannah consecrated her son Samuel to the Lord. The Hebrews sometimes consecrated their fields and cattle to the Lord. Christians in general are consecrated to the Lord, and are a holy race—a chosen people. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Ministers of the gospel are, in a peculiar manner, set apart for his service, and so also are places of worship; the forms of dedication varying according to the views of different bodies of Christians; and by some a series of ceremonies has been introduced, savouring of superstition, or at best of Judaism.

CONSIDER. God considers men, in general, by a perfect knowledge and exact observation of their works. Psal. xxxiii. 15. He considers his people, in graciously observing and regarding their persons, prayers, and troubles, in order to deliver and bless them. Psal. v. 1, xiii. 3, ix. 13, xxv. 19. We consider Jesus Christ, by thinking on, observing, and admiring his person, offices, relations, undertaking, incarnation, life, death, resurrection, and glory, and applying him to ourselves in all these respects. Heb. iii. 1. We consider ourselves, when, with serious concern and earnest care, we mark and ponder our own frailty, sinfulness, and danger of being led astray. Gal. vi. 1. We consider one another, when we charitably observe our brethren's tempers, circumstances, infirmities, and temptations, that we may accordingly incite and encourage them to their duty. Heb. x. 24.

CONSISTORY, a word commonly used for a council of ecclesiastical persons, or place of justice in the spiritual court,—a session or assembly of prelates. Every archbishop and bishop of every diocese has a consistory court, held before his chancellor or commissary, in his cathedral church, or other convenient place of his diocese, for ecclesiastical causes. The bishop's chancellor is the judge of this court, supposed to be skilled in the civil and canon law; and in places of the diocese far remote from the bishop's consistory, the bishop appoints a commissary to judge in all causes within a certain district, and a registrar to enter his decrees, &c. Consistory at Rome, denotes the college of cardinals, or the Pope's senate or council, before whom judiciary causes are pleaded. In the Church of England before the Norman conquest, the ecclesiastical jurisdiction was not separated from the civil; for the earl and the bishop sat in one court, that is, the county court. The consistory on the Continent corresponds to the kirk-session in Scotland.

CONSOLATION. The great work of God the Holy Ghost is consolation; and it is most blessed to the souls of the truly regenerate, in whose hearts the Lord graciously carries it on by his inward spiritual refreshments, to watch and observe how the communications of his grace are made to them. "He takes of the things of Christ, and sheweth them unto them;" and he it is that sheds abroad the love of God the Father in the heart, and directs the minds of his people into "the patient waiting" for Jesus Christ. So that all the actings of our faith upon any one of the persons of the Godhead are from his sweet influences. And it is God the Holy Ghost who teacheth the soul how to receive and enjoy all the manifestations made to the soul of the believer. And by this continual process of grace, he doth what the apostle prayed he might do for the Church, as the God of hope,—"fill the soul with all joy and peace in believing, that they might abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost." Rom. xv. 13.

The foundation of this consolation is secure and everlasting. It is laid in the terms of the new and well-ordered covenant. "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." It is our acquittal in the sight of God, the apprehension of Christ as having ransomed us to God by his precious blood, that forms the only legitimate foundation of the Christian's comfort. He has peace and joy in believing that Christ is his all and in all.

This is the consolation of the Holy Ghost; and derived therefore from his application of the truth as it is in Jesus to our consciences and hearts. It is not enough that the Holy Ghost reveal the gospel in the Word; he must reveal it in all its saving and sanctifying efficacy to the heart, otherwise no true comfort can be derived from it. What consolation is it to me to learn from the Bible that Christ died for sinners, unless I am made to feel my sinful state, and am led to see that Christ died for me? It is in this appropriation of the truth to our own personal condition, that we have the true peace and joy connected with believing. The gospel thus becomes a matter of individual interest and importance; and realising the value of its precious and consolatory truths, we experience in all its delightful force and efficiency, "the comfort of the Holy Ghost."

CONSTANCY, in a general sense, denotes immutability or invariableness. When applied to the human mind, it is a steady adherence to those plans and resolutions which have been maturely formed; the effect of which is, that a man never drops a good design out of fear, and is consistent with himself in all his words and actions. Constancy is more particularly required of us,—1. In our devotions. Luke xviii. 1; 1 Thess. v. 17, 18. 2. Under our sufferings. Matt. v. 10–13; 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13. 3. In our profession and character. Heb. x. 23. 4. In our beneficence. Gal. vi. 9. 5. In our friendships. Prov. xxvii. 10.

CONSTANTINE, surnamed the Great, was the son of Constantius Chlorus the emperor, and his first wife, Helena. He was born A.D. 274. His father was friendly to the Christians, and, probably, as Neander thinks, a follower of that species of religious ecclesiasticism which united Christ with the gods of Rome. While a youth, he resided at the court of Dioclesian; and afterwards at that of Galerius. He witnessed at Nicomedia the outburst of the persecution against the Christians, and saw such proofs of the power of Christian faith as might well make an impression on him. Yet even after, as his father's successor, he had been proclaimed Augustus in A.D. 306, by the legions in Britain, he appears to have been still attached to the Pagan forms of worship. It was not, indeed, until after his victory over Maxentius, that Constantine publicly declared in favour of Christianity. Eusebius imputes the change to a miraculous vision, in which there appeared to him spread on the face of the heavens a glittering cross, and over it the inscription, Hoc vince—"By this conquer." That same night, Eusebius says, Christ appeared in a dream to the emperor, directing him to cause a banner to be prepared after the pattern he had seen. Constantine obeyed, and sent for Christian teachers, by whose instructions he was brought to the knowledge and the acknowledgment of the truth. From this time the sign of the cross was used by him on the most ordinary occasions, and he was often observed to draw the sign of the cross upon his forehead. In 313 he published an edict in favour of the Christians, by which they were allowed the free exercise of their religion: their property, which had been confiscated, was restored to them, and they were declared eligible to public offices. It was not, however, until Constantine had become sole master of the Roman Empire in 325, that Christianity became the established religion of the country. That same year he attended the Council of Nice at which the heresy of Arius was condemned. Though thus publicly favourable to Christianity, Constantine had not yet received baptism. He continued to remain in the first class of catechumens though already sixty-four years of age. Now, however, being attacked with an illness which threatened to prove mortal, he made the confession which was customary before entering into the second class of the catechumens, so called, in the strictest sense, and the bishop gave him the blessing. He next repaired to a castle near the city of Nicomedia, where he called together an assembly of the bishops, and surrounded by them, received baptism from Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia. This took place shortly before his death, which happened in the year A.D. 337.

CONSTELLATION. The great multitude of stars visible even to the naked eye, renders it impossible to distinguish each by a particular name; astronomers, accordingly, for the sake of reference, have formed them into groups, to which they give the name of Asterisms or Constellations. To the different constellations, the early astronomers gave the names of men and animals, and other familiar objects, from some fancied resemblances or analogies, which, for the most part, are not easily traced. These denominations, consecrated by ancient usage, are preserved in modern catalogues. We find mention made of particular stars in the Book of Job, and constellations are expressly referred to in Isa. xiii. 10, where it is said, that the "stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light."

CONSTITUTION, in the Roman Church, a decree of the Pope in matters of doctrine. In France, however, this name has been applied, by way of eminence, to the famous bull UNIGENITUS (which see).

CONSTITUTIONS, APOSTOLIC. See APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS.

CONSUBSTANTIAL, a term denoting of the same substance with another. Thus we say that Christ is consubstantial or coessential with the Father. This term was first adopted by the fathers in the Council of Nice, A.D. 325. The Arians allowed that the Word was God as having been made God; but they denied that he was the same God and of the same substance with the Father. The term consubstantial is at this day a distinguishing criterion between an orthodox Christian and an Arian heretic.

CONSUBSTANTIATION, a tenet of the Lutheran Church, by which they attempted to explain the mode of the presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper. Luther and his followers denied that any change takes place in the elements after consecration. They assert, on the contrary, that the elements remain the same as before; but, that along with the elements, the body and blood of Christ are substantially present, and are received by communicants.

CONTEMN. A vile person is rightly contemned when we shun intimacy with him, and prefer the meanest of the saints to him. Psal. xv. 4. The glory of Moab was contemned when their wealth, power, and honour were rendered despicable. Isa. xvi. 14.

CONTEMPLATION, studious thought on any subject; continued attention. "Monks and mystics consider contemplation as the highest degree of moral excellence; and with them a silent spectator is a divine man;" but it is evident we are not placed here only to think. There is something to do as well as to contemplate. There are duties to be performed, offices to be discharged; and, if we wish to be happy in ourselves, and useful to others, we must be active as well as thoughtful.

CONTENTION is either sinful, when, with carnal affections, we strive with one another (Prov. xiii. 10); or lawful, when we eagerly promote that which is good, notwithstanding great opposition. 1 Thess. ii. 2. We contend earnestly for the faith, when, notwithstanding manifold sufferings and dangers, we are strong in the faith of God's truth contained in his Word; zealously profess and practise it, and incite others to do so, and exert ourselves to promote the censure of scandalous and heretical persons. Jude 3.

CONTENTMENT is a disposition of mind in which our desires are confined to what we enjoy, without murmuring at our lot, or wishing ardently for more. It stands opposed to envy (James iii. 16); to avarice (Heb. xiii. 5); to pride and ambition (Prov. xiii. 10); to anxiety of mind (Matt. vi. 25, 34); to murmurings and repinings. 1 Cor. x. 10. Contentment does not imply unconcern about our welfare, or that we should not have a sense of anything uneasy or distressing; nor does it give any countenance to idleness, or prevent diligent endeavours to improve our circumstances. It implies, however, that our desires of worldly good be moderate; that we do not indulge unnecessary care, or use unlawful efforts to better ourselves; but that we acquiesce in, and make the best of our condition, whatever it be. Contentment arises not from a man's outward condition, but from his inward disposition, and is the genuine offspring of humility, attended with a fixed habitual sense of God's particular providence, the recollection of past mercies, and a just estimate of the true nature of all earthly things. Motives to contentment arise from the consideration of the rectitude of the Divine government (Psal. xevii. 1, 2); the benignity of the Divine providence (Psal. cxlv.); the greatness of the Divine promises (2 Pet. i. 4); our own unworthiness (Gen. xxxii. 10); the punishments we deserve (Lam. iii. 39, 40); the reward which contentment itself brings with it (1 Tim. vi. 6); the speedy termination of all our troubles here, and the prospect of eternal felicity in a future state. Rom. v. 2.

CONTINENCE is that moral virtue by which we restrain sensual desires. There is this distinction between chastity and continence:—chastity requires no effort, because it may result from constitution; whereas continence appears to be the consequence of a victory gained over ourselves. The term is most usually applied to men, as chastity is to women. See CHASTITY.

CONTINGENT, anything that happens without a foreknown cause, commonly called accidental. An event not come to pass is said to be contingent, which either may or may not be; what is already done, is said to have been contingent, if it might or might not have been. What is contingent or casual to us, is not so with God. As effects stand related to a second cause, they are many times contingent; but as they stand related to the first cause, they are acts or God's counsel, and directed by his wisdom.

CONTRACTS. The first contracts appear to have been merely oral, and it was not until a much later period that written instruments were introduced. The first contract of this kind, as we have already noticed (see BARGAINS), occurs in Jer. xxxii. 6–12, in reference to a purchase of land. Contracts of every kind were made publicly at the gate of the city; and Moses does not speak of a written document as imperative in any case, except that of a divorce. In Ruth iv. 7, there is a peculiar mode of ratifying an agreement—by pulling off the shoe. At an after period, contracts were concluded by striking hands. To this there is a distinct allusion in Prov. vi. 1: "My son, if thou be surety for thy friend, if thou hast stricken thy hand with a stranger;" and Job xvii. 3: "Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee; who is he that will strike hands with me?"

Contracts were frequently ratified by oath. Another mode in which engagements of this nature were confirmed, was by the blood of a sacrifice; when they cut the victim into two parts, placing each part upon an altar, and causing the contracting parties to pass between the pieces, to intimate that so should they be cut asunder who violated the agreement. Hence the very general phrase in the Hebrew of the Old Testament, "to cut a covenant." The celebration of a feast, of which the two contracting parties partook, was a very frequent mode of confirming an agreement. The use of salt on such occasions was reckoned peculiarly important. Hence when the Lord gave the kingdom of Israel to David for ever, to him and his sons, it is termed a "covenant of salt,"—a sign that it would never be revoked. Another mode of ratification was by great men presenting a party with some article of their own dress; and if they were warriors, by exchanging their arms. Thus when Jonathan made his covenant with David: "And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle." 1 Sam. xviii. 4. Written contracts were cancelled, either by blotting them out, or drawing a line across them, or striking them through with a nail. Hence: "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross." Col. ii. 14. A rod was sometimes broken, as a sign that the contract was at an end. Thus: "And I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break my covenant which I had made with all the people. Then I cut asunder mine other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel." Zech. xi. 10, 14.

CONTRADICTION. The contradiction of sinners, which Christ endured, was the entire series of objections, evasions, reproaches, taunts, blasphemies, and perpetual opposition to his doctrines and miracles. Heb. xii. 3.

CONTRARY. Grace and corruption in the saints are contrary; their nature, quality, and exercise are destructive of one another. Gal. v. 17. We walk contrary to God, doing what is abominable to his nature, and opposite to his law; and he walks contrary to us, in fearfully punishing us for our sin. Lev. xxvi. 27, 28. The ceremonial law was contrary to men; it laid heavy burdens on them, presented their guilt to them, and of itself could do them no good, and was a means of excluding the Gentiles from the Church of God. Col. ii. 14.

CONTRITE. This word signifies beaten or bruised as with hard blows, or a heavy burden; and so in Scripture language imports one whose heart is broken and wounded for sin, in opposition to the heart of stone. Isa. lxvi. 2, lvii. 15; Psal. li. 17. The evidences of a broken and contrite spirit are—1. Deep conviction of the evil of sin. 2. Humiliation under a sense of it. Job xlii. 5, 6. 3. Pungent sorrow for it. Zech. xii. 10. 4. Ingenuous confession of it. 1 John i. 9. 5. Prayer for deliverance from it. Psal. li. 10; Luke xviii. 13. 6. Susceptibility of good impressions. Ezek. xi. 19.

CONTROVERSY. Different opinions have been entertained among professing Christians, as to the effects of controversy in matters of religion. Some are inclined to discourage all dispute in sacred matters, while others, of a more argumentative spirit, delight in eager disputation. But it is quite plain, that if the truth be attacked, it must be defended; and in every age of the Church there has been room for the apostolic exhortation, to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints." "However unhappily," says the celebrated Robert Hall, "controversies have too often been conducted, the assistance they have afforded in the discovery of truth is not light or inconsiderable. Not to mention the Reformation, which was principally effected by controversy, how many truths have by this means been set in a clearer view! and, whilst the unhappy passions it has awakened have subsided, the light struck out in the collision has been retained and perpetuated."

"As the physical powers are scarcely ever exerted to their utmost extent, but in the ardour of combat, so intellectual acumen has been displayed to the most advantage, and to the most effect, in the contests of argument. The mind of a controversialist, warmed and agitated, is turned to all quarters, and leaves none of its resources unemployed in the invention of arguments, tries every weapon, and explores the hidden recesses of a subject with an intense vigilance, and an ardour which it is next to impossible in a calmer state of mind to command. Disingenuous arts are often resorted to, personalities are mingled, and much irritative matter is introduced; but it is the business of the attentive observer to separate these from the question at issue, and to form an impartial judgment of the whole. In a word, it may be truly affirmed that the evils of controversy are transient, the good it produces is permanent."

CONVENT. See ABBEY—MONASTERY—MONK.

CONVENTICLE. A diminutive of convent, denoting properly a cabal or secret assembly of a part of the monks of a convent, to make a party in the election of an abbot. It is the term used in England to denote any place of worship used by dissenters. In 1664, what was called the Conventicle Act was passed, prohibiting meetings of dissenters under heavy penalties. This Act was revived in 1669, but repealed by the 1st of William and Mary, unless such meetings be held in a house locked, barred, or bolted.

CONVERSATION. Social intercourse is carried on in Eastern countries, not so much by visiting one another's houses, as by resorting to some common place of meeting, generally the gate of the city, where seats are provided for the accommodation of the people. Accordingly, in Gen. xix. 1, Lot is said to have been sitting in the gate of Sodom when he was accosted by two angels. The gate of the city being the place where business was usually transacted, was the place of frequent resort to those who took pleasure in conversation. The same practice is still followed in Oriental countries; and travellers tell us that groups of natives may be often seen seated on the ground under the shade of a tree, engaged for hours in idle talk. The Orientals seldom contradict one another, but conduct themselves in conversation with great mildness and gentleness. The Hebrews were accustomed, when assenting, to use the phrase, "Thou hast said," or, "Thou hast rightly said." Hence the answer of our Redeemer to the question of Caiaphas, Matt. xxvi. 64. If any remark was made to which assent could not be given, the reply was generally, "Let it suffice thee," Deut. iii. 26; or, "It is enough," Luke xxii. 38.

The English word "conversation" had in former times a much more extensive meaning than is now attached to it. Hence in our translation of the Bible it is frequently employed to denote the whole deportment and behaviour. Thus in Phil. iii. 20, "For our conversation is in heaven."

CONVERSION, that all-important change which is wrought in the soul by the effectual operation of the Holy Spirit, and which consists in turning the sinner from darkness to light and from Satan to God. The necessity of conversion arises from the fallen state of man; and therefore it must take place in every man before he can be prepared to dwell with a holy God. The efficient agent in conversion is the Spirit of God; and the instrumental agent is the Word of God. "This change," says Dr Buchanan, "is often preceded by a process of instruction, and conviction, and is always followed by a progressive course of sanctification; but it properly consists in our being made willing to comply with the gospel call, by embracing Christ for salvation, and surrendering ourselves up to him, to be taught, and pardoned, and governed, according to his revealed will; and as soon as it is accomplished in the experience of any sinner, his whole relation to God, his prospects for eternity, his views and feelings, his prevailing dispositions and habits, are totally changed; insomuch, that he who formerly sat in darkness is introduced into marvellous light—he who was at a distance from God is brought nigh—he who was in a state of enmity is translated into a state of peace—he who was exposed to a sentence of condemnation, is forgiven and accepted—he who was lost, is saved." "Conversion," says the great Charnock, "is to be distinguished from regeneration thus:—Regeneration is a spiritual change; conversion is a spiritual motion: in regeneration there is a power conferred; conversion is the exercise of this power: in regeneration there is given us a principle to turn; conversion is our actual turning. In the covenant, God's putting his Spirit into us is distinguished from our walking in his statutes from the first step we take in the way of God, and is set down as the cause of our motion. Ezek. xxxvi. 27. In renewing us, God gives us a power; in converting us, he excites that power. Men are naturally dead, and have a stone upon them: regeneration is a rolling away the stone from the heart, and a raising to newness of life; and then conversion is as natural to a regenerate man as motion is to a lively body. A principle of activity will produce action. In regeneration, man is wholly passive; in conversion, he is active. The first reviving us is wholly the act of God, without any concurrence of the creature; but after we are revived, we do actively and voluntarily live in his sight. Regeneration is the motion of God in the creature; conversion is the motion of the creature to God, by virtue of that first principle: from this principle all the acts of believing, repenting, mortifying, quickening, do spring. In all these a man is active; in the other he is merely passive." Conversion evidences itself by ardent love to God (Psal. lxxiii. 25); delight in his people (John xiii. 35); attendance on his ordinances (Psal. xxvii. 4); confidence in his promises (Psal. ix. 10); abhorrence of self, and renunciation of the world (Job xliii. 5, 6; James iv. 4); submission to his authority, and uniform obedience to his Word. Matt. vii. 20. See CALLING—REGENERATION.

CONVICTION, in general, is the assurance of the truth of any proposition. In a religious sense, it is the first degree of repentance, and implies an affecting sense that we are guilty before God; that we can do nothing of ourselves to gain his forfeited favour; that we deserve and are exposed to the wrath of God; that sin is very odious and hateful, yea, the greatest of evils.

There is a natural conviction, which arises from natural conscience, fear of punishment, moral suasion, or alarming providences, but which is not of a permanent nature. Saving conviction is a work of the Spirit, as the cause; though the conscience, the law, the gospel, or affliction, may be the means. John xvi. 8–11.

Convictions of sin differ very much in their degree and pungency in different persons. It has been observed, that those who suffer the most agonizing sensations are such as never before enjoyed the external call of the gospel, or were favoured with the tuition of religious parents, but have neglected or notoriously abused the means of grace. To these conviction is often sudden, and produces that horror and shame which are not soon overcome; whereas those who have sat under the gospel from their infancy have not often such alarming convictions, because they have already some notion of these things, and have so much acquaintance with the gospel as administers to a believing heart immediate comfort. As it is not, therefore, the constant method of the Spirit to convince in one way, it is improper for any to distress themselves because they are not, or have not been, tormented almost to despair: they should be rather thankful that the Spirit of God has dealt tenderly with them, and opened to them the genuine source of consolation in Christ. It is necessary, however, to observe, that, in order to repentance and conversion to God, there must be real and lasting conviction, which, though it may not be the same in degree, is the same in nature.

Evangelical conviction differs from legal conviction thus:—legal arises from a consideration of the Divine law, God's justice, power, or omniscience—evangelical, from God's goodness and holiness as seen in the cross of Christ, and from a disaffection to sin; legal conviction still imagines there is something remaining good—but evangelical is sensible there is no good at all; legal wishes freedom from pain—evangelical from sin; legal hardens the heart—evangelical softens it; legal is only temporary—evangelical lasting.

The following very important remarks on the true nature of conviction occur in Dr Buchanan's Work on the Holy Spirit:—"Conviction occupies the first place in the process of conversion; for it is by convicting that the Spirit converts; but when it is thus used, the term must be understood in a large and comprehensive sense, as including a great deal more than is usually implied in mere remorse on account of sin. It is chiefly of their sin because they do not believe in Christ, and of their misery and danger as Christless sinners, that the Spirit convicts transgressors; for the whole work of conviction, as well as the work of illumination and persuasion, has reference to Christ as the great subject of the Spirit's witness. It is important to bear this in mind; for many, under the mere natural operation of conscience, are sensible, at least occasionally, of very bitter and poignant remorse, when they have never seriously thought of Christ, or felt their need of a Saviour; whereas the conviction which is spoken of in the gospel has a direct relation to Christ, and implies not only a sense of guilt on the conscience, but a sense of the sin and misery of remaining in a Christless state. It presupposes, therefore, some general knowledge of Christ and the gospel, as well as a sense of guilt, and a feeling of remorse; and it cannot be produced without an impression being first made on the mind of the certain truth, the awful authority, and the transcendent importance of the gospel. In this comprehensive sense, conviction presupposes some measure of the enlightening grace of the Spirit—imparting a general view of the truth as it is in Jesus, and enabling the mind to perceive the Divine evidence of that truth, so as to feel that it is deeply criminal in slighting or rejecting it; and when it is said, therefore, that, in the order of nature and experience, conviction is the first part of the Spirit's work, or the first stage in that process by which he brings a sinner to the Saviour, it is not meant that the Spirit operates directly and only on the conscience, so as to awaken in it a sense of sin, but that he operates on the conscience by imparting such light to the understanding as reaches the conscience, and quickens its perception, and enables it to see and feel that there is sin and danger in not believing in Christ. Such conviction embraces, indeed, the guilt of every sin; and the Spirit recalls to the recollection of the transgressor many sins, both of omission and commission, which he had long overlooked or forgotten; for at that solemn hour God says to him, 'Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself; but I will reprove thee, and set thy sins in order before thy face;' and when his transgressions start up, and pass in dark array before him, he is surprised and startled by the discovery of their number, and magnitude, and manifold aggravations—insomuch, that he is ready to exclaim with the Psalmist, 'My transgressions have gone up over mine head, and have become a burden too heavy for me.' Any one sin may thus become the occasion of conviction; and it is by revealing sin to the conscience that the Spirit awakens it; but conviction is not complete, nor is it effectual as a means towards conversion, unless it amount to a persuasion that without Christ our case is desperate, and that we have sinned, as in other respects, so in this especially, because we have not believed in him."

CONVOCATION, an assembly of persons for the worship of God (Lev. xxiii.; Numb. xxviii.; Exod. xxii. 16); an assembly of the clergy of the Church of England, for consultation upon matters ecclesiastical. As the parliament in England consists of two distinct houses, so does this convocation. The one called the upper house, where the archbishops and bishops sit severally by themselves; the other, the lower house, where all the rest of the clergy are represented by their deputies. The inferior clergy are represented by their proctors, consisting of all the deans and archdeacons—of one proctor for every chapter, and two for the clergy of every diocese—in all, one hundred and forty-three divines, viz., twenty-two deans, fifty-three archdeacons, twenty-four prebendaries, and forty-four proctors of the diocesan clergy. The lower house chooses its prolocutor, who is to take care that the members attend, to collect their debates and votes, and to carry their resolutions to the upper house. The convocation is summoned by the king's writ, directed to the archbishop of each province, requiring him to summon all bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c. The power of the convocation is limited by a statute of Henry VIII. They are not to make any canons, or ecclesiastical laws, without the king's license; nor, when permitted, can they put them in execution but under several restrictions. They have the examining and censuring all heretical and schismatical books and persons, &c.; but there lies an appeal to the king in Chancery, or to his delegates. The clergy in convocation, and their servants, have the same privileges as members of parliament. In 1665, the convocation of the clergy gave up the privilege of taxing themselves to the House of Commons, in consideration of their being allowed to vote at the election of members for that house. Since that period, they have been seldom allowed to do any business; and are generally prorogued from time to time till dissolved, a new convocation being generally called along with a new parliament. Of late an attempt has been made to obtain a revival of the convocation, not as a mere form, but for the purpose of taking synodical action, and managing ecclesiastical affairs, by reforming abuses which have crept into the Church. The Tractarians have been more especially urgent to secure this object. But the most violent opposition is made to the proposal on various grounds, but chiefly in consequence of the divided state of opinion in the Church of England on doctrinal points, and the likelihood that were convocation to meet for the despatch of business and the government of the Church, there being no laity admitted to take part in its deliberations, the Church might be rent asunder. There is no probability, therefore, even though government should advise the sovereign to revive convocation, that its decrees would be sanctioned by parliament and the country. The limits to the power of convocation were laid down by a statute of Henry VIII., and are as follow:—

1. That a convocation cannot assemble without the consent of the sovereign.
2. That after their assembling they cannot confer, to constitute any canons, without license of the sovereign.
3. When they upon conference conclude any canons, yet they cannot execute any of their canons without the royal assent.
4. That they cannot execute any after the royal assent, but with these four limitations:—(1.) That they be not against the prerogative of the sovereign; nor (2.) against the common law; nor (3.) against the statute law; nor (4.) against any custom of the realm. Such being the limitations under which any convocation could assemble, little good could be expected to accrue from its revival.

COOKERY. The various processes of cookery required in the domestic establishment among the Hebrews, were all of them performed by the matron, however high in rank she might be. Gen. xviii. 6. From the nature of the climate, a very short interval elapsed between the killing and the cooking of an animal. Vegetables, especially lentils, were the principal food of the Jews, and they are still much esteemed in the East. Pottage of lentils was the simple food for which the "profane Esau" sold his birthright. Cakes, mixed with honey, were frequently used; but animal food was rarely presented at table, except on the occasion of a feast. As luxury increased, the flesh of animals came more into use. The flesh of sheep and goats, particularly of lambs and kids, was held in high regard. The flesh, when cooked, was divided into small pieces, and a sauce was prepared for it of broth and vegetables, called in Hebrew, merak. See BROTH.

COOS, an island in the Ægean Sea, in which was a city of the same name. It abounded in rich wines. Paul appears, from Acts xxxi. 1, to have sailed past the island, and Christianity was not professed in it till a considerable time afterwards.

COPPER. Anciently copper was employed for all the purposes for which we now use iron. Arms, and tools for husbandry and the mechanic arts, were all of this metal for many ages. Job (xx. 24) speaks of bows of copper, rendered in our version "steel;" and when the Philistines had Samson in their power, they bound him with fetters of copper. Our translators, indeed, say "brass;" but under that article their mistake is pointed out. In Ezra (viii. 27) are mentioned "two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold." It is probable that this brass was a metal from Persia or India, which Aristotle describes in these terms:—"It is said that there is in India a brass so shining, so pure, so free from tarnish, that its colour differs nothing from that of gold. It is even said that, among the vessels of Darius, there were some respecting which the sense of smelling might determine whether they were gold or brass." Bochart is of opinion that this is the chasmal of Ezek. i. 27, the chalkolibanon of Rev. i. 15, and the electrum of the ancients. Mr Harmer quotes from the manuscript notes of Sir John Chardin a reference to a mixed metal in the East, and highly esteemed there; and suggests that this composition might have been as old as the time of Ezra, and be brought from those more remote countries into Persia, where those two basins were given to be conveyed to Jerusalem. Ezekiel (xxvii. 13) speaks of the merchants of Javan, Jubal, and Meshech, as bringing vessels of nehesh (copper) to the markets of Tyre. According to Bochart and Michaëlis, these were people situated towards Mount Caucasus, where copper mines are worked at this day. "From the Greek word, which means mountain copper, a natural mineral may be intended, the same with ore of Mount Lebanon. It is, however, generally thought to be a compound substance, and those who speak of it as such, distinguish it into three kinds: in the first, gold was the prevailing metal; in the second, silver; in the third, gold, silver, and copper were equally blended. This composition was very famous; extolled for its beauty, its solidity, its rarity; it was even preferred to gold itself. It was capable of receiving an exquisite polish; and might be the metal used for the mirrors mentioned, Exod. xxxviii. 8; Job xxxvii. 18, "Hast thou with him spread out the sky, which is strong, and as a molten looking-glass?" In these qualities platina, which is a native mineral, much resembles it. The Syriac version of the Bible affirms that the vessels which Hiram gave Solomon for the temple were made of this composition. Esdras is mentioned by Josephus as delivering up to the priests, among other treasures, vessels of brass that were more valuable than gold. Upon which Dr Hudson takes notice that this kind of brass or copper, or rather mixture of gold and copper, was called aurichalcum; and was of old esteemed the most precious of metals." "The rust of copper is a solution or corrosion of the metal by some kind of salt; and it is remarkable that whereas other metals have their peculiar solvents, copper is dissolved by all. Even the salts floating in the common air are sufficiently powerful to corrode it. This remark is made in order to explain Ezek. xxiv. 6, 11, 12, where the word rendered 'scum' must mean rust; which not being removable by any other means, was to be burnt off by the fire; and so was a dreadful emblem of Jerusalem's punishment."

COPTI, or COPTS, the name which is usually given to the original natives of Egypt. Descended from Christians of the Jacobite or Monophysite sects, they still retain a profession of Christianity.

The Copts have a patriarch, who resides at Cairo; but he takes his title from Alexandria. He has no archbishop under him, but eleven or twelve bishops. The rest of the clergy, whether secular or regular, are composed of the orders of St Anthony, St Paul, St Macarius, who have each their monasteries. Besides the orders of priests, deacons, and subdeacons, the Copts have likewise archimandrites, or abbots, the dignity whereof they confer with all the prayers and ceremonies of a strict ordination. By a custom of six hundred years' standing, if a priest elected bishop be not already archimandrite, that dignity must be conferred on him before episcopal ordination. The second person among the clergy, after the patriarch, is the titular patriarch of Jerusalem, who also resides at Cairo, and to whom belongs the government of the Coptic Church during the vacancy of the patriarchal see. To be elected patriarch, it is necessary that the person have lived all his life in continence. To be elected bishop, the person must be in the celibate; or, if he have been married, it must not be above once. The priests and inferior ministers are allowed to be married before ordination; but not forced to it, as some have observed. They have a great number of deacons, and even confer the dignity frequently on their children. None but the lowest rank among the people commence ecclesiastics, whence arises that excessive ignorance found among them; yet the respect of the laity towards the clergy is very extraordinary. The monastic life is in great esteem among them. To be admitted into it, there is always required the consent of the bishop. The religious Copts, it is said, make a vow of perpetual continence, renounce the world, and live with great austerity in deserts. They are obliged to sleep in their clothes and their girdle, on a mat stretched on the ground, and to prostrate themselves every evening one hundred and fifty times with their face and breast on the ground. They are all, both men and women, of the lowest class of the people, and live on alms. The nunneries are properly hospitals, and few enter but widows reduced to beggary.

COR, or CHOMER, a measure equal to ten ephahs, or seventeen thousand four hundred and sixty-eight solid inches, which is forty-four solid inches more than the English quarter. Ezek. xlv. 14.

CORAL (ramuth, Job xxviii. 18; Ezek. xxvii. 16), a hard, cretaceous, marine production, resembling in figure the stem of a plant, divided into branches. It is of different colours—black, white, and red. The last is the sort emphatically called coral, as being the most valuable, and usually made into ornaments. This, though no gem, is ranked by the author of the Book of Job (xxviii. 16, 18) with the onyx and sapphire. Dr Good observes: "It is by no means certain what the words here rendered 'corals and pearls,' and those immediately afterwards rendered 'rubies and topaz,' really signify. Reiske has given up the inquiry, as either hopeless or useless; and Schultens has generally introduced the Hebrew words themselves, and left the reader of the translation to determine as he may. Our common version is, in the main, concurrent with most of the Oriental renderings, and I see no reason to deviate from it." Coral was formerly supposed to be a vegetable production; but it is now known to be simply a congeries of animals. Each coral insect appears to consist of a sac, serving for a stomach, and eight tentacula or arms disposed around the orifice or mouth, which are employed in conveying food to it; and they also form a calcareous covering into which the animal can withdraw itself from external danger. Corals are generally attached to marine bodies during the whole of their growth; but some, as the sea-mushroom and the sea-slug, only when young, and by a short stem. As the coral enlarges, the crown separates from the stem by a natural absorption, and at length is quite free. The coral islands, found more especially in the Pacific Ocean, are the work of the minute animals which inhabit these kinds of coral.

CORBAN, a gift presented to God or to his temple. The scribes taught the people that it was quite lawful to swear by the temple, as being the house of God; and by the gold that was presented as an offering in the temple, because it was consecrated to the service of God. But they endeavoured, for selfish and covetous purposes, to establish what they regarded as a very important distinction between one class of oaths and another. Anxious to encourage the people to bring gifts to the altar, and to present gold in abundance for the service of the temple, they inculcated upon them that an oath by the temple or the altar was comparatively trifling, and might be considered as nothing, having little or no force to bind the party to the fulfilment of a promise; but that an oath by the gold of the temple, or by the gift that was presented on the altar, was so important and so strictly binding, that the man who made such an oath was bound to fulfil it to the very letter. Thus were the scribes guilty of sapping the very foundations of public morality, by weakening in the estimation of the people the obligation of an oath. Jesus repelled such false and unscriptural doctrine. The scribes taught that it was not, in all cases, binding upon a child to maintain his parents, even though he was quite able to do so: he had only to say of his property or of that portion of his property which had hitherto gone to support his parents, "It is Corban," or a gift dedicated to the Lord, or devoted to the treasury of the temple, in which the scribes had a direct interest, and from that moment, whether he ever carried his vow into effect or not in reference to the temple, he was free, at all events, from his obligation to support his parents. His money, the scribes alleged, was consecrated now to a sacred purpose, and it would be nothing short of sacrilege to devote the money to any other purpose whatever. Thus did the scribes render the plain commandment of God of none effect by their tradition.

CORD. To put cords about one's reins, to gird one's self with a cord, was a token of sorrow and humiliation. Job xii. 18; 1 Kings xx. 31, 32. "The cords of sin" (Prov. v. 22), are the consequences of crimes and bad habits; bad habits are, as it were, indissoluble bands, from which it is almost impossible to extricate ourselves. To stretch a line or cord about a city, signifies, to ruin it—to destroy it entirely—to level it with the ground. Lam. ii. 8. The cords extended in setting up tents furnish several metaphors in the prophetic books. Isa. xxxiii. 20; Jer. x. 20.

CORDELIER, a Franciscan, or monk of the order of St Francis. The denomination Cordelier is said to have been given in the war of St Louis against the infidels, wherein the fratres minor having repulsed the barbarians, and that king having inquired their name, it was answered, they were people cordeliez, "tied with ropes;" alluding to the girdle of rope or cord, tied with three knots, which they wore as part of their habit.

CORIANDER (Exod. xvi. 31; Numb. xi. 7), a strongly aromatic plant. It bears a small round seed, of a very agreeable smell and taste. The manna might be compared to the coriander seed in respect to its form or shape, as it was to bdellium in its colour. The plant here alluded to is termed by Moses gad, and is generally supposed to be the common or great coriander, or coriandrum sativum of botanists. It was an annual root, strong scented. The stem is twelve or eighteen inches high, smooth, branched. It is of the umbelliferous tribe of plants, and is common all over the south of Europe, Asia, China, and Cochin-China. The seeds are the only part used in medicine, and for culinary purposes. When green they have a strong, unpleasant smell, which they lose in drying, and become sweet and aromatic. In umbelliferous plants, such as hemlock, the seeds split into two halves or hemispheres, but in coriander they remain permanently united.

CORINTH, a celebrated city of Greece, situated on an isthmus of the same name, and termed by some ancient writers, from its commanding position, one of the gates of Greece. It was remarkable for the splendour of its public buildings, which were adorned with beautiful columns, now styled in architecture Corinthian. The inhabitants of Corinth were distinguished by their genius and learning, while they were unhappily characterised by a proverbial laxity of morals. The origin of the city is lost in the most remote antiquity. It is represented as having been one of the most populous and wealthy cities of Greece. It was captured and burned by the Romans, B.C. 146, after which it continued for a hundred years deserted and in ruins, until Julius Cæsar planted a Roman colony there. From that time the city gradually increased in size and splendour, and, when visited by Paul, it had become the chief city of the Roman province of Achaia. In A.D. 268 it was burnt by the Goths; and destroyed by an earthquake, A.D. 525.

Corinth now forms a small town of the kingdom of Greece, under the name of Gortho. The meanness of its present state forms a melancholy contrast to its ancient splendour. All travellers unite in describing it as a wretched, unhealthy town, and as, in fact, a mere heap of ruins.

CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE. Christianity was first planted at Corinth by Paul himself, who resided there a year and six months, between the years 51 and 53. The Church consisted partly of Jews and partly of Gentiles, but chiefly of the latter. On Paul's departure from Corinth, he was succeeded by Apollos, "an eloquent man, mighty in the Scriptures," who preached the gospel with great success. Acts xviii. 24-28. Soon after Paul quitted this Church, however, its peace was disturbed by the intrusion of false teachers, who sought to undermine his influence and the credit of his ministry. The occasion on which the First Epistle was written to the Church at Corinth, appears from its whole tenor to have been twofold. First, The information which the apostle had received from some members of the family of Chloe, while he was at Ephesus, concerning the disorders that prevailed in the Church; such as, 1. Schisms and divisions; 2. Many notorious scandals; 3. Idolatrous communion with the heathens at their idol-feasts; 4. Want of decorum and order in their public worship; 5. Gross profanation of the Lord's Supper; and 6. The denial of the resurrection and eternal life. Second, The apostle's receiving a letter from the Church at Corinth by the hands of Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, in which the Corinthian Christians requested his advice concerning some particular cases : as, 1. Concerning marriage; 2. Things sacrificed to idols; 3. Spiritual gifts; 4. Prophecys, or teaching and instructing others; and 5. Concerning the making of charitable collections for the poor brethren in Judea.

Paul having learned from Titus that his first Epistle to the Corinthians, written from Ephesus about the year 57, had been attended with good effects, addressed to them a Second Epistle, probably from Philippi in Macedonia. In this epistle he expresses satisfaction with their conduct, justifies himself, and comforts them. He glories in his suffering, and exhorts them to liberality. Of the effects produced by this second letter we have no circumstantial accounts; but we learn from Acts xx. 2, 3, that Paul made a second journey to Corinth, where he remained three months; in the course of which time he is supposed to have written his Epistle to the Romans.

CORMORANT (Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv. 17), a large sea-bird. It is about three feet four inches in length, and four feet two inches in breadth from the tips of the extended wings. The bill is about five inches long, and of a dusky colour; the base of the lower mandible is covered with a naked yellowish skin, which extends under the throat, and forms a kind of pouch. It has a most voracious appetite, and lives chiefly upon fish, which it devours with unceasing gluttony. It darts down very rapidly upon its prey; and its Hebrew and Greek names are expressive of its impetuosity. The word which in our version of Isaiah (xxxiv. 11), is rendered cormorant, is the pelican.

CORN. The generic name for grain in the Old Testament is dagen, corn; so called from its abundant increase. In the first ages they parched or roasted their grain; a practice which the Israelites long continued, as Orientals still do in the present day, with whom parched corn is a frequent dish at table. They were accustomed to use corn when it was full-grown, though not ripe; for the people of Israel were commanded (Lev. xxiii. 14), not to eat parched corn, nor green ears, until the self same day they had made an offering to the Lord. In the Bible it is never termed parched meal or flour, but always parched corn; and, consequently, seems to remain after the roasting, and to be eaten in the state of corn. To this kind of food there is a reference in Ruth ii. 14: "And Boaz said unto her, At meal-time come thou hither, and eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar. And she sat beside the reapers: and he reached her parched corn, and she did eat, and was sufficed, and left;" and 2 Sam. xvii. 28: "Brought beds, and basins, and earthen vessels, and wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn, and beans, and lentiles, and parched pulse." The first instruments used for grinding corn were only pestles and mortars, of wood or stone. This was succeeded by mills; the smaller wrought by men or women, and commonly by slaves condemned to this hard labour as a punishment; the larger wrought by oxen or camels, horses or asses. The corn for the use of the family was ground every morning at break of day. In Gen. xxvi. 12, and Matt. xiii. 8, grain is spoken of as yielding a hundred-fold, and to the ancient fertility of Palestine all authorities bear witness.

CORNELIUS, centurion of a cohort, belonging to the legion surnamed Italian. Acts x. He was a Gentile; one who feared God; of constant devotion, and much charity. His whole family served God, and it pleased God to favour him, in a miraculous manner, with a knowledge of the gospel, through Peter, from whom he received instruction. As the apostle was speaking, the Holy Spirit fell upon Cornelius and his family, and they were added to the Christian Church, as the first-fruits of the Gentiles. It deserves notice, that Julian the apostate reckons only two persons of consideration, who were converted to Christianity on its first promulgation—Sergius Paulus the proconsul, and Cornelius the centurion. From this reference, it is probable that Cornelius was a person of greater distinction than he is usually supposed to be.

CORNER, the extremity of anything, according to the Hebrews. "Ye shall not round the corners of your heads, neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard." Lev. xix. 27. "Draw ye near hither, all the chief (Heb. corners) of the people." 1 Sam. xiv. 38. "They have also seduced Egypt, even they that are the stay (corner) of the tribes thereof." Isa. xix. 13. And: "I have cut off the nations, their corners are desolate." Zeph. iii. 6. The corner sometimes signifies the most distinguished place, that part of an edifice which is most in sight. Zechariah (x. 4), speaking of Judah, after the return from captivity, says: "Out of him came forth the corner, out of him the nail." This tribe shall afford corners, heads; it shall produce the corner-stone, the Messiah. Corner is taken likewise for the most retired part of a house. Prov. xxi. 9. The corner of a bed or divan is the place of honour. It was a mark of greater distinction to sit in the corner than upon a seat. This may serve to explain a passage in Amos iii. 12: "Thus saith the Lord, As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear; so shall the children of Israel be taken out that dwell in Samaria in the corner of a bed, and in Damascus in a couch."

CORNET, a wind instrument shaped like a horn, for sounding in war, or at religious solemnities; but as sophar is commonly rendered trumpet, and only in one passage rendered cornet (Hos. v. 8), the keren, or karnah, is very properly rendered cornet. Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10. In 2 Sam. vi. 5, we find cornets spoken of, but the Hebrew word rather applies to the sistrum, which Mr Horne explains to be a rod of iron bent into an oval or oblong shape, square at two corners and curved at the others, and furnished with a number of movable rings; so that, when shaken or struck with another rod of iron, it emitted the sound desired.

CORPUS CHRISTI, FEAST OF, a particular festival instituted in the Romish Church, in honour of the consecrated host, and with a view to its adoration. It was established by Urban IV., in 1264; and the institution was confirmed at a council held in Vienne, in 1311. This is the only day in the year when, in Popish countries, the consecrated host is exposed about the streets to the gaze of the adoring multitude. The whole practice of the adoration of the host is novel, and was unknown to the primitive church and to ancient writers.

CORRUPTICOLÆ, a party of Monophysites in the sixth century, who maintained that the body of Christ was corruptible, like that of other men, before his resurrection; while Halicarnassus and others insisted that it was incorruptible from the moment of his conception.

CORRUPTION.—1. The putrefaction of dead bodies. Psal. xvi. 10. 2. The blemishes which rendered an animal unfit for sacrifice. Lev. xxii. 25. 3. Sinful inclinations, habits, and practices, which are hateful in themselves, and defile and ruin men. Rom. viii. 21; 2 Pet. ii. 12, 19. 4. Everlasting ruin. Gal. vi. 8. 5. Uncomeliness, as of a dead body. Dan. x. 8. 6. Men in their mortal and imperfect state. 1 Cor. xv. 50. The Mount of Olives is called the Mount of Corruption, because there Solomon built high places or temples for abominable idols, to gratify his heathenish wives. 2 Kings xxiii. 13.

COSMOGONY, the science of the original formation of the universe. From the earliest dawn of human inquiry men have speculated upon this subject, and numerous have been the theories which philosophers have devised to explain the origin of all things. The cosmogony of Berosus, preserved by Syncellus, ascribes the formation of the world out of the first chaos, or dark and humid mass, to Belus, or a divine energy; from which also was derived the human mind by emanation. But the subordinate phenomena of nature seem to have been attributed to the peculiar agency of demons or spirits, of which various orders were supposed to exist. The Egyptians, as far as we can gather from the obscure accounts of their philosophy which have come down to us, regarded matter as the first principle of all things. Chaos, or the material principle, the ancient Egyptians appear to have worshipped under the name of Athor, a word which in the Coptic language signifies night; and Aristotle informs us that chaos and night were one and the same, and denoted the first principle from which, in the ancient cosmogonies, all things were derived. Besides the material principle, we have the authority of Plutarch for asserting that the Egyptians admitted an active principle or intelligent power, eternally united with the chaotic mass, by whose energy the elements were separated and bodies were formed. The fragment of Sanchoniathon preserved by Eusebius, contains a cosmogony or supposed origin of the universe, according to which all things have been produced by the necessary energy of an eternal principle, active, but without intelligence, upon an eternal passive chaotic mass. There is some probability that such a cosmogony as this was in reality taught by the ancient Phœnician philosophers. According to Posidonius, the system of philosophy which ascribes every phenomenon to a fortuitous concourse of atoms, and which was afterwards matured by Leucippus, Democritus, and Epicurus, originated with Moschus the Phœnician. The philosophers of Greece may be considered, in reference to cosmogony, as divided into two great classes. By the first, every change in nature was ascribed to the operation of essentially active and intelligent principles, the soul of the world, the supreme intelligence, genii, demons or spirits. By the second, the existence or at least operation of all such principles was formally denied, and every thing was accounted for by the impulse of the original particles of matter or atoms upon one another; set in motion, not by an intelligent cause, but by the control of invincible necessity. The three great theories of cosmogony which have been proposed, are—1. The eternity of the world; 2. The eternity of the matter of which the world is composed; and 3. The scriptural doctrine that “in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.” The two first are regarded by Dr Chalmers as one and the same.

“To us,” says he, “it marks far more intelligibly the voice of a God, to have called forth the beautiful and beneficent order of our world from the womb of chaos, than to have called forth the substance of our world from the chamber of nonentity.” The argument in favour of the non-eternity of the present order of the world, as stated by Dr Chalmers, is of a twofold character:—1. Historical; 2. Observational. The historical is summed up in the following quotation: “In tracing the course upwards from the present day, we arrive, by a firm and continuous series of authors, at that period when not only the truth of the Christian story is guaranteed by thousands of dying martyrs, but when the Old Testament Scriptures, those repositories of the Jewish story, obtained a remarkable accession to their evidence, which abundantly compensates for their remoteness from our present age. We allude to the split that took place between two distinct and independent, or, stronger still, two bitterly adverse bodies of witnesses at the outset of the Christian economy. The publicity of the New Testament miracles—the manifest sincerity of those who attested them, as evinced by their cruel sufferings in the cause, not of opinions which they held to be true, but of facts which they perceived by their senses—the silence of inveterate and impassioned enemies, most willing, if they could, to have transmitted the decisive refutation of them to modern times—these compose the main strength of the argument for our later Scriptures. And then, beside the references in which they abound to the former Scriptures—and by which, in fact, they give the whole weight of their authority to the Old Testament—we have the superadded testimony of an entire nation, now ranged in zealous hostility against the Christian faith, and bent upon its overthrow. They who are conversant in the practice, or who have reflected most on the philosophy of evidence, know well how to estimate the strength which lies in a concurrence of testimonies where collusion is impossible; and still more, where one of the parties, inflamed with hatred and rivalry against the other, could almost choose to disgrace themselves for the sake of involving their adversaries in disgrace and discredit along with them. It is this which stamps a character and a credit on the archives of the Jewish history, whereof it were vain to seek another exemplification over again in the whole compass of erudition. These memorials of our race, which they had no interest in preserving—for, mainly, they were but the records of their own perversity and dishonour—had been handed down to them by uncontrolled tradition from former ages; and were now embodied in the universal faith of the people. And when the two great parties diverged, however widely asunder in every other article of belief, they held a firm agreement in this, the perfect integrity of at least the historical Scriptures. Had there been a juggle here, why did not an enraged priesthood stand forth to expose it—that along with it they might expose the weakness of that alleged prophecy which formed one great pillar of the Christian argument? How, in the fierce conflicts of this heated partizanship, did not the secret break out of an imposition on the credulity of mankind, if imposition there was?—and out of this fell warfare among the impostors, who were for palming upon the world the miracles of the present or the memorials of the past, ought not that very effervescence to have arisen which would have swept the imposture of both religions from the face of the earth? It says every thing for the truth both of the Christian story and of the Hebrew records, that they survived this hurricane; and more especially that, ere the observances of the Mosaic ritual were done away, so strong a demonstration should have been given of the national faith in those documents by which the solemnities of the Jewish religion were incorporated with the facts of the Jewish history. The virtue of an institution like the pass-over to authenticate the narrative in which it took its professed origin, and of which it is the standing memorial, has been ably expounded by Leslie and others. It is thus that we are carried upwards through a medium of historic light to the times of the patriarchs—or even though we ascend not the ladder, but abide as it were at the bottom of it, we shall find in the Jews of the present day, the characteristics of a singular race which bespeak them to be a monument of old revelations. They have maintained their separate identity, as no other nation ever did, among the tempests and the fluctuations in which they have been cradled for two thousand years; and now stand before us as a living evidence of their past story—and an evidence along with it, that throughout the long succession of those fitful turmoils which have taken place in the wars and politics of our world for so many centuries, there has been indeed the controlling agency of a God mixed up with the history of human affairs.

“Now, the truth of the continuous narrative which forms the annals of this wondrous people would demonstrate a great deal more than what we at present are in quest of—that the world had a beginning, or rather, that many of the world’s present organizations had a beginning, and have not been perpetuated everlastingly from one generation to another by those laws of transmission which now prevail over the wide extent of the animal and vegetable kingdoms. We hold the Jewish Scriptures to be authentic memorials of this fact; and although we might afterwards find a better place for the contents both of the Jewish and Christian revelations—yet we cannot forbear, amid all that is imagined about the sufficiency of the natural argument, to offer our passing homage to these greater and lesser lights of our moral hemisphere, which have both of them together poured a flood of radiance over the field of natural religion, and so as to have manifested many objects there which would have been but dimly seen by the eye of nature. Believing as we do that the surest of all philosophy is that which rests on the basis of well accredited facts, in justice to our views on the strict science of the question, we must state the information even of the Old Testament to be far more satisfying to ourselves than all the vaunted theorems of academic demonstration. There is a great reigning spirit by which the varied authorship of this book is so marked and harmonised—there is such a unity of design and contemplation in writings that lie scattered over the tract of many centuries—there is such a stately and consistent march from the first dawns of this singular history, towards that great evolution in which the whole prophecy and priesthood of that consecrated land converged and terminated—there is withal such an air of simple and venerable greatness over this earlier record—such loftiness in its poetry—such obvious characters of truth and sanctity and moral earnestness throughout all its compositions, as super-add the strongest weight of internal testimony to the outward and historical evidence by which it is supported.”

The observational part of the argument may be also stated in the words of Dr Chalmers himself:—“In the reasoning for a God from the mere existence of matter, we certainly do not remark any strong point of argument whatever. And then, when this argument from the existence of matter is given up, there remains another obscure and indeterminate controversy about its properties, as to which of them may be essential, and which of them must have been communicated at the will and by the appointment of a devising and purposing and intelligent Being. Now, so long as the argument carries either at the existence or at the laws of matter, we do not think that we have yet come to any lucid or effective conclusion upon the subject. We hold that at this part of the question the cause of natural theology has suffered from the confidence joined with the obscurity of those reasonings which have been made use of by its supporters; and that it were therefore a mighty service to the cause did we separate what in it is decisive and what in it is doubtful from each other.

“They are the collocations, then, which form by far the most unequivocal tokens of a Divinity that the material world has to offer. We understand the term in a more comprehensive sense than that which is conveyed by its mere etymology. We mean not only that the parts of matter have been placed in right correspondence to each other, but that these parts, so placed, have been rightly sized and rightly shaped, for some obviously beneficial end of the combination in question; and moreover that forces of a right intensity and direction have been made to meet together, so as to be productive of some desirable result. The world is full of such collocations; and the strong circumstance is, that there is nothing in the yet ascertained laws of matter that could have given rise to them—insomuch that if at this moment any of them were destroyed, there appears nothing in these laws which could possibly replace them. It is true, that in astronomy, the argument founded on these is all the less impressive that it requires but the concurrence of few independent circumstances to complete the astronomical system. Such a concurrence, however, is indispensable; and in virtue of this it is, that the planetarium has been so exquisitely formed as never to deviate far from a mean state, but only to oscillate a little way on either side of it—else the system would have contained within itself the elements of its own destruction. It marks what the atheistical tendency is, that La Place should have ascribed this beautiful result to a law, and not to the collocations. He seems to have felt throughout his reasonings, wherein it was that the plausibility of Atheism chiefly lay. But this also carries in it an intimation to us, wherein it is that the main strength lies of the argument for a Divinity. No doubt, the law is indispensable, and enters as one element into the calculation. But we have already noticed that the collocations are equally indispensable; and they enter as other elements into the calculation. So that if ever a time was when these collocations were not, if the present order of the heavens has had a commencement, there seems nothing in any of the discovered laws or forces of matter which could have originated them. They seem only referable to the fiat and finger of a God.”

COTES. This word occurs only in 2 Chron. xxxii. 28, and implies "stables" or "mangers."

COTTAGE, a kind of hut or tent made of boughs or branches of trees interlaced together, and offering shelter from the heat by day, and cold dews of night, to the watchman that kept the garden or vineyard when the fruit was ripening. Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne describe it as "a small erection of four upright poles, roofed over with branches and leaves; under the shadow of which a solitary person may sit and watch the garden." This is what the prophet refers to in Isa. i. 8: "And the daughter of Zion is left as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, as a besieged city." In our version of Zeph. ii. 6, the word "cottages," which occurs, is supposed by some to refer to folds which the shepherds had made. Archbishop Newcome thinks it might be rendered "caves for shepherds," referring to the rocky caverns which abound on the Syrian coast.

COUCH. This word, which occurs in Gen. xlix. 4; Job vii. 13; Ps. vi. 6, implies an article of furniture in Oriental houses which served for rest or sleep. In early times they served the purposes of a bed, and were furnished with supports or rests for the head. See BED.

COUNCIL, an assembly of ecclesiastical persons met together for the purpose of consultation on ecclesiastical matters. The council referred to in several passages of the New Testament, as in Matt. v. 22; Luke xxii. 66; Acts vi. 12, is the great council of the Jews, usually called the SANHEDRIM (which see), composed of seventy or seventy-two members, under the presidency of the high priest. Besides the Sanhedrim the Talmudical writers tell us that there were smaller councils, each consisting of twenty-three persons, to hear and determine petty causes. Two of these were established at Jerusalem and one in every place containing one hundred and twenty inhabitants. Our Lord seems to allude to them in the striking passage: "But I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire." Matt. v. 22.

COUNCIL, ECUMENICAL or GENERAL, is an assembly which has been supposed to represent the whole body of the Christian Church. Many writers, both Protestant and Popish, have regarded the assembly of the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, of which we read in Acts xv., as the first ecclesiastical council. But it is plain the councils in after times were assemblages of a quite different nature from that of the apostles and elders. It is obvious, however, that there is room for considerable diversity of opinion as to what constitutes a general council in the ecclesiastical sense of the expression; and it is no less clear that, in the proper sense of the phrase, such a council has never been held. The Romanists reckon eighteen of them, the Greek Church seven, Bullinger six, Dr Prideaux seven, and bishop Beveridge eight, which, he says, are all the general councils which have ever been held since the time of the first Christian emperor. They are as follow:—1. The council of Nice, held in the reign of Constantine the Great, on account of the heresy of Arius. 2. The council of Constantinople, called under the reign and by the command of Theodosius the Great, for much the same end that the former council was summoned. 3. The council of Ephesus, convened by Theodosius the younger, at the suit of Nestorius. 4. The council at Chalcedon, held in the reign of Marcianus, which approved of the Eutychian heresy. 5. The second council of Constantinople, assembled by the Emperor Justinian, which condemned the three chapters taken out of the book of Theodorus of Mopsuestia, having first decided that it was lawful to anathematise the dead. Some authors tell us that they likewise condemned the several errors of Origen about the Trinity, the plurality of worlds, and pre-existence of souls. 6. The third council of Constantinople, held by the command of Constantius Pogonatus, the emperor, which received the definitions of the first five general councils, and particularly that against Origen and Theodorus of Mopsuestia. 7. The second Nicene council. 8. The fourth council of Constantinople, assembled when Louis II. was Emperor of the West."

In addition to these eight Eastern Councils, the Roman Catholics reckon ten Western Councils, which are as follow:—"Lateran I., in 1123; Lateran II., in 1139; Lateran III., in 1170; Lateran IV., in 1215; Lyons I., in 1245; Lyons II., in 1274; Vienne, in 1311; Constance, in 1414; Florence, in 1438; Lateran V., in 1512; Trent, from 1545 to 1563. This list of eighteen is given by Dens. That general councils are infallible, is maintained in the creed of Pope Pius IV., and believed by Romanists generally. Some, however, maintain that the confirmation of the Pope is necessary to constitute infallibility; and others, that the decisions of councils are infallible, whether confirmed by the Pope or not.

Some Roman Catholics, especially the Gallican Church, who reject the infallibility of the Pope, contend for the infallibility of the Romish Church, and maintain that it is deposited with each General Council, regularly called as the representative and organ of the Church.

"1. It is a question among them what makes a council general, and what is a regular call. Some reckon eighteen General Councils, and some at most but seven or eight. And indeed they might well doubt whether there was ever such an one in the world. They are also divided about the Council of Carthage. The Italians deny that it was œumenical in all its sessions, while the French Church vigorously maintain the opposite opinion. The fifth of Lateran is also questioned. Yet both these councils are required to make up the number eighteen. There is also considerable controversy respecting the proper calling or assembling of a council. The Popes, for many centuries, convened them, and claim it as a matter of right. The first at Nice, the second at Constantinople, the third at Ephesus, the fourth at Chalcedon, and the fifth at Constantinople, were not summoned by Popes, but by Emperors: several of them being summoned contrary to the will of Popes, and therefore, according to some, not legally convoked. Moreover, there is much controversy, amidst the great number of forgeries, which of the canons are reputed genuine and which are not. Besides, the meaning of some of the most important is much disputed.

"2. We learn from indisputable testimony, that councils, both in doctrines and morals, have decided frequently contrary to one another.

"The Council of Nice, A.D. 325, and of Ephesus, A.D.

431, decree with an anathema, 'that no new article for ever shall be added to the creed or faith of Nice.' But the Council of Trent, more than twelve hundred years after, added twelve new articles to this creed, pronouncing an anathema on all who will not embrace them.

"The Council of Laodicea, A.D. 360, or A.D. 370, and the Council of Trent, A.D. 1545, decided in direct opposition to each other respecting the canon of Scripture. The former decreed on the canon which Protestants acknowledge, rejecting the Apocrypha; and the latter pronounced the Apocrypha canonical.

"The Council of Constantinople, A.D. 754, unanimously decreed the removal of images, and the abolition of image-worship; but the second Council of Nice, A.D. 787, decreed that image-worship should be established.

"The General Councils, like the Roman Pontiffs, were a stigma on religion and man. Many of these conventions, in point of respectability, were inferior to a modern cock-fight or bull-baiting. Gregory Nazianzen, who is a Roman saint, has described these scenes with the pencil of truth, and with the hand of a master. 'I never,' says the Grecian bishop, 'saw a synod which had a happy termination. These conventions, instead of diminishing, uniformly augment the evil which they were intended to remedy. Passion, jealousy, envy, prepossession, and the ambition of victory, prevail and surpass all description. Zeal is actuated rather by malignancy to the criminal, than aversion to the crime.' He compares the dissension and wrangling exhibited in the councils, to the quarrels of geese and cranes, gabbling and contending in confusion; and represents such disputation and vain jangling as calculated to demoralise the spectator, rather than to correct or reform. This portrait, which is taken from life, exhibits in graphic delineation, and in true colours, the genuine features of all the general, infallible, apostolic, holy Roman Councils.

"The General Synods of Constantinople, Nicæa, Lyons, Constance, and Basil are, in a particular manner, worthy of observation. These conventions were composed of the lowest rabble, and patronised the vilest abominations. The Byzantine assembly, which was the second General Council, has been described by Nazianzen. This convention the saint characterises as 'a cabal of wretches fit for the house of correction; fellows newly taken from the plough, the spade, the oar, and the army.' Such is a Roman saint's sketch of a holy, apostolic, unerring Council.

"Respecting the supremacy of the Pope, councils have differed. The first Council of Nice, canon sixth, decreed that the Bishop of Constantinople should possess equal privileges with the Bishop of Rome. Every one knows how this has since been contradicted, both by councils and popes.

"Some Roman Catholics are of opinion that a council is not infallible, unless its decrees are approved by the Pope. And hence some have argued, that as the fourth Council of Constantinople did not receive the confirmation of the Pope, its decrees are not infallible. This opinion, however, is comparatively modern among Roman Catholics. But before it can be of weight, it ought to be shown that the Pope lawfully possesses, by scriptural authority, the power of passing a reto upon, or of confirming, decrees of councils.

"1. That infallibility resides in a council confirmed by the Pope, can never be supported; for according to this system, the council of itself is fallible, and so also is the Pope. But how these two fallibles united can constitute an infallible body, and promulgate infallible decisions, is inexplicable.

"2. The decrees of the Councils of Constance and Basil declare the supremacy and infallibility to be in General Councils; that these are above Popes, and that they are heretics who deny this doctrine. On the other hand, Pope Leo and the fifth Lateran Council assert, that it is necessary to salvation that all Christ's faithful people should be subject to the Bishop of Rome, and that the Pope has authority over councils. Here, then, is a palpable contradiction." In short, the decisions of even the recognised General Councils of the Church have so differed from one another, that it is impossible for Romanists themselves to frame out of them a consistent body of truth."

COUNCIL, PROVINCIAL. Those councils which were held in a particular province were so named. They had their commencement in the second century, and assumed their peculiar form at a later date. The Metropolitan usually presided.

COUNSEL. God's counsel is—1. His purpose or decree. Acts iv. 28; Isa. xlv. 10; Psal. xxxiii. 11. 2. His will and doctrine concerning the way of salvation to sinful men. Luke vii. 30. 3. The direction of his Word, the teaching of his Spirit, and the guidance of his providence. Psal. lxxiii. 24; Rev. iii. 18. To stand in God's counsel, is to be familiar with him, and know his revealed will and purpose. Jer. xxiii. 18, 22.

COUNSELLOR. Christ is called the Counsellor; with him his Father from eternity fixed the whole plan of our salvation; and he, possessed of infinite wisdom and knowledge, directs and admonishes his people in every case. Isa. ix. 6. God's statutes are the saints' counsellors, which they consult, and from which they receive direction in every hard and difficult case. Psal. cxix. 24.

COUNTENANCE. As by the countenance we manifest our love, hatred, grief, joy, pleasure, and anger, the lifting up or shining of God's countenance denotes the manifestation of his favour and love; and the hiding, frown, or rebuke of his countenance, denotes the manifestation of his anger in just judgments. Psal. xlv. 3, lxxx. 16. Christ's countenance as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars, is his whole appearance, in person, office, relations, and work, which is ever delightful and glorious. Song v. 15. The saints cause Christ to see their countenance, when, in the confident exercise of faith and hope, they come with boldness to his throne of grace. Song ii. 14. "Thou shalt not countenance a poor man in his cause;" thou shalt not unjustly pity and favour him on account of his poverty. Exod. xxiii. 3.

COUNTRY. Heaven is called a country, in allusion to Canaan; how extensive its limits—how wholesome its air of divine influence—how wide its prospect—how numerous its privileges and inhabitants! And it is a better country, as its inhabitants, privileges, and employments, are far more excellent than any on earth. Heb. xii. 14, 16. It is a far country, very distant from, and unknown in, our world. Matt. xxi. 33, xxv. 14; Luke xix. 12. A state of apostasy from God, whether of men in general, or of the Gentile world, is called a far country; it is distant from that in which we ought to be; in it we are ignorant of God, exposed to danger, and have none to pity or help us. Luke xv. 13. A state or place of gross ignorance and wickedness, is called the "region and shadow of death." Matt. iv. 16.

COURAGE is that quality of the mind that enables men to encounter difficulties and dangers. Natural courage is that which arises chiefly from constitution; moral or spiritual is that which is produced from principle, or a sense of duty. Courage and fortitude are often used as synonymous; but they may be distinguished thus: fortitude is firmness of mind that supports pain; courage is active fortitude that meets dangers, and attempts to repel them. (See FORTITUDE.) Courage, says Addison, that grows from constitution, very often forsakes a man when he has occasion for it; and when it is only a kind of instinct in the soul it breaks out on all occasions, without judgment or discretion; but that courage which arises from a sense of duty, and from a fear of offending Him that made us, always acts in a uniform manner, and according to the dictates of right reason.

COURIERS. Persons of distinction in Eastern countries had always couriers running before them, or alongside their chariot. This office Elijah performed to Ahab immediately after his triumph over the priests of Baal. It is probable that the prophet, in acting as a courier, intended simply to do an act of homage to his sovereign, and to testify his joy on the occasion; which, degrading though it may appear to us, was often done by people of rank.

COURT, an entrance into a palace or house. It is the quadrangular area in Eastern houses, called in Luke v. 19, "the midst." It was sometimes paved with marble of various kinds, with fountains playing in the middle. The court was generally surrounded on all sides with a covered walk, over which, if the house had more than one storey, was a gallery of the same dimensions, supported by columns. Large companies were sometimes received into the court, and, on such occasions, an awning of thick cloth was extended by ropes over the whole, to exclude the heat of the sun. This awning is called a covering, or "roof," in Mark ii. 4; Luke vii. 6. See HOUSE.

The great courts belonging to the temple of Jerusalem were three; the first called the court of the Gentiles, because the Gentiles were allowed to enter so far, and no farther; the second was the court of Israel, because all the Israelites, provided they were purified, had a right of admission into it; the third was that of the priests, where the altar of burnt-offerings stood—where the priests and Levites exercised their ministry. Common Israelites, who were desirous of offering sacrifices, were at liberty to bring their victims as far as the inner part of the court; but they could not pass a certain line of separation, which divided it into two; and they withdrew as soon as they had delivered their sacrifices and offerings to the priests, or had made their confession, with the ceremony of laying their hands upon the head of the victim, if it were a sin-offering. Before the temple was built, there was a court belonging to the tabernacle, but not nearly so large as that of the temple, and encompassed only with pillars, and veils hung with cords. See TEMPLE.

COURT, SPIRITUAL, a seat of ecclesiastical judgment for the administration of justice in ecclesiastical matters. In England there are six spiritual courts; the Archdeacons' Court; the Consistory Courts; the Prerogative, and the Archbishop's Court; the Court of Peculiars, and the Court of Delegates. These courts conduct their proceedings according to the civil and canon laws.

COVENANT, a contract, or agreement, between two or more parties on certain terms. The terms made use of in the Scriptures for covenant are ברית and διαθήκη. The former signifies choosing, or friendly parting, as in covenants each party, in a friendly manner, consented and so bound himself to the chosen terms; the latter signifies testament, as all the blessings of the covenant are freely bequeathed to us. The word covenant is also used for an immutable ordinance, Jer. xxxiii. 20; a promise, Exod. xxxiv. 10, Isa. lix. 21; and also for a precept, Jer. xxxiv. 13, 14. In Scripture we read of various covenants; such as those made with Noah, Abraham, and the Hebrews at large. Anciently covenants were made and ratified with great solemnity. The Scriptures allude to the cutting of animals asunder, denoting that, in the same manner, the perjured and covenant-breaker should be cut asunder by the vengeance of God. Jer. xxxiv. 18.

The covenants which more especially relate to the human race, are generally called the covenant of works and the covenant of grace.

The covenant of works is that whereby God requires perfect obedience from his creatures, in such a manner as to make no express provision for the pardon of offences committed against the precepts of it on the repentance of such offenders, but pronounces a sentence of death upon them. Gen. ii.; Gal. iv. 24; Ps. lxxxix. 3, 4. The covenant of grace is generally defined to be that which was made with Christ, as the second Adam, and in him with all the elect as his seed. Isa. xlii. 1-6; 1 Pet. i. 20; Isa. lii. 13.

I. The covenant of works was made with Adam, the condition of which was, his perseverance during the whole time of his probation: the reward annexed to this obedience was the continuance of him and his posterity in such perfect holiness and felicity as he then had upon earth, and everlasting life with God in heaven. The penalty threatened for the breach of the command was condemnation; terminating in death temporal, spiritual, and eternal. The seals of this covenant were, the tree of knowledge and the tree of life; and, perhaps, the Sabbath and Paradise. Gen. ii. 3; Gal. iv. 24; Rom. v. 17, 21. This covenant was broken by Adam's eating of the forbidden fruit, whereby he and his posterity were all exposed to ruin, Gen. iii.; Rom. v. 12, 19; and without the intervention of the divine grace and mercy, would have been lost for ever. Rom. iii. 23. The Divine Being foreseeing this, in infinite wisdom and unspeakable compassion planned the covenant of grace: by virtue of which his people are reinstated in the blessings of purity, knowledge, and felicity, and that without a possibility of any further defalcation.

II. The covenant of grace. Some divines make a distinction between the covenant of redemption and that of grace; the former, they say, was made with Christ in eternity; the latter, with believers in time. Others object to this, and suppose it a needless distinction; for there is but one covenant of grace, and not two, in which the Head and members are concerned; and, besides, the covenant of grace, properly speaking, could not be made between God and man; for what can man stipulate with God, which is in his power to do or give him, and which God has not a prior right unto? Fallen man has neither inclination to yield obedience, nor power to perform it. The parties, therefore, in this covenant, are generally said to be the Father and the Son; but Dr Gill supposes that the Holy Ghost should not be excluded, since he is promised in it, and, in consequence of it, is sent down into the hearts of believers; and which must be by agreement, and with his consent. If we believe, therefore, in a Trinity, it is more proper to suppose that they were all engaged in this plan of the covenant, than to suppose that the Father and Son were engaged exclusive of the Holy Spirit. 1 John v. 6, 7. As to the work of the Son, it was the will and appointment of the Father that he should take the charge and care of his people, John vi. 39; Heb. ii. 13; redeem them by his blood, John xvii.; Heb. x.; obey the law in their room, Rom. x. 4; justify them by his righteousness, Dan. ix. 24, &c.; and, finally, preserve them to glory, Isa. xl. 11. Jesus Christ, according to the divine purpose, became the representative and covenant head of his people, Eph. i. 22, 23; Col. i. 18. They were all considered in him, and represented by him, Eph. i. 4; promises of grace and glory made to them in him, Tit. i. 2; 1 Cor. i. 20; he suffered in their stead, 2 Cor. v. 21. He is also to be considered as the mediator of the covenant, by whom justice is satisfied, and man reconciled to God. (See MEDIATOR.) He is also the surety of this covenant (Heb. vii. 22), as he took the whole debt upon him, freed his people from the charge, obeyed the law, and engaged to bring his people to glory, Heb. ii. 13; Isa. xlix. 5, 6. He is called the testator of the covenant, which is denominated a testament, Heb. vii. 22; Heb. ix. 15. He disposes of his blessings according to his will or testament, which is unalterable, signed by his hand and sealed by his blood. In this covenant, as we before observed, the Holy Spirit also is engaged. His assent is given to every part thereof; he brings his people into the enjoyment of its blessings, 1 Pet. i. 2; 2 Thes. ii. 13. He was concerned in the incarnation of Christ, Matt. i. 18, and assisted his human nature, Heb. ix. 14. He takes of the things of Christ and shows them unto us; cleanses, enlightens, sanctifies, establishes, and comforts his people, according to the plan of the covenant. Rom. viii. 15, 16. See HOLY GHOST.

III. The properties of this covenant are such as these:— 1. It is eternal, being made before time, Eph. i. 3, 4; 2 Tim. i. 9. 2. Divine as to its origin, springing entirely from free grace, Rom. xi. 5, 6; Ps. lxxxix. 2, 3, 28. 3. It is absolute and unconditional, Eph. ii. 8, 9. 4. It is perfect and complete, wanting nothing, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. 5. It is sure and immovable, Isa. liv. 10; Isa. lv. 3. 6. Called new, in opposition to the old, and as its blessings will be always new, Heb. viii. 6, 8.

IV. These two covenants above mentioned agree in some things, in others they differ. 1. "In both," says Witsius, "the parties concerned are God and man. 2. In both, there is the same promise of eternal life. 3. The condition of both is the same—perfect obedience to the law prescribed: for it is not worthy of God to admit man to a blessed communion with him but in the way of holiness. 4. In both is the same end—the glory of God. But they differ in the following respects:—1. In the covenant of works, the character or relation of God is that of a supreme lawgiver and the chief good, rejoicing to communicate happiness to his creatures. In the covenant of grace, he appears as infinitely merciful, adjudging life to the elect sinner, agreeably to his wisdom and justice. 2. In the covenant of works there was no mediator: the covenant of grace has a mediator, Christ. 3. In the covenant of works, the condition of perfect obedience was required to be performed by man himself in covenant. In the covenant of grace the same condition is proposed, but to be performed by a mediator. 4. In the covenant of works, man is considered as working, and the reward as to be given of debt. In the covenant of grace, man in covenant is considered as believing; eternal life being given as the merit of the mediator, out of free grace, which excludes all boasting. 5. In the covenant of works, something is required as a condition, which being performed, entitles to reward. The covenant of grace consists not of conditions, but of promises: the life to be obtained, faith by which we are made partakers of Christ, perseverance, and, in a word, the whole of salvation, are absolutely promised. 6. The special end of the covenant of works was the manifestation of the holiness, goodness, and justice of God; but the special end of the covenant of grace, is the praise of the glory of his grace, and the revelation of his unsearchable and manifold wisdom." 7. The covenant of works was only for a time, but the covenant of grace stands sure for ever.

V. The administration of the covenant of grace. The covenant of grace under the Old Testament, was exhibited by promises, sacrifices, types, ordinances, and prophecies. Under the New it is administered in the preaching of the gospel, baptism, and the Lord's Supper; in which grace and salvation are held forth in more fulness, evidence, and efficacy to all nations, 2 Cor. iii. 6–18; Heb. viii.; Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. But in both periods, the mediator, the whole substance, blessings, and manner of obtaining an interest therein, by faith, are the very same, without any difference, Heb. xi. 6; Gal. iii. 7, 14.

COVENANT. This term is frequently employed in the ecclesiastical history of Scotland. The FIRST COVENANT was that by which the lords and chief gentry, devoted to the reforming interests, bound themselves to defend each other and the gospel. It was subscribed at Edinburgh on the 3d of December 1557. From the repeated recurrence of the word congregation in this document, the chief subscribers were after this called Lords of the Congregation; and the people who adhered to them were called the Congregation. The SECOND COVENANT, which was similar in its nature and design, was subscribed at Perth on the 31st of May 1559. The FIRST NATIONAL COVENANT OF SCOTLAND was drawn up in 1581, and forms the first part of every subsequent national covenant entered into by the Church and people of Scotland. This covenant, which was directed against Popery and Episcopacy, was subscribed by James VI., his household, and the greater part of the nobility throughout the kingdom, and ratified by the General Assembly. This covenant was renewed with additional force in 1638.

COVENANTING, PERSONAL. It has been a frequent custom among pious persons to draw out and subscribe a solemn dedication of themselves to God. Such an exercise ought not to be entered upon without calm deliberation, serious self-examination, and earnest prayer. Some have rashly written and signed such a document, and yet, by their departure from the vows and resolutions under which they had come, they have brought upon themselves heinous sin. The utmost caution is necessary, therefore, before taking a step so solemn and important.

COVENANT, SOLEMN LEAGUE AND. A very important document, which was prepared at Edinburgh in 1643, and which formed a bond of union between Scotland and England. This covenant was written by Alexander Henderson, approved of by the General Assembly, and ratified unanimously by the Convention of Estates. It was subsequently sent to London, where it was accepted and subscribed by the English Parliament and the Westminster Assembly of Divines. This Solemn League and Covenant bound the nation to endeavour the preservation of the reformed religion in the Church of Scotland, and the reformation of religion in England and Ireland, according to the Word of God, and the example of the best reformed Churches—the extirpation of Popery and Prelacy—the defence of the King's person, authority, and honour—and the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdom in peace and unity. "Perhaps no great international transaction," says Dr Hetherington in his 'History of the Church of Scotland,' "has ever been so much misrepresented and maligned as the Solemn League and Covenant. Even its defenders have often exposed it and its authors to severe censures by their unwise modes of defence. There can be no doubt in the mind of any intelligent and thoughtful man, that on it mainly rests, under Providence, the noble structure of the British Constitution. But for it, so far as man may judge, these kingdoms would have been placed beneath the deadening bondage of absolute despotism; and in the fate of Britain, the liberty and civilization of the world would have sustained a fatal paralysing shock. This consideration alone might bid the statesman pause before he ventures to condemn the Solemn League and Covenant. But to the Christian we may suggest still loftier thoughts. The great principles of that sacred bond are those of the Bible itself. It may be that Britain was not then, and is not yet, in a fit state to receive them, and to make them her principles and rules of national government and law. But they are not on that account untrue, nor even impracticable; and the glorious predictions of inspired Scripture foretell a time when they will be more than realised, and when all the kingdoms of this earth shall become the kingdoms of Jehovah and of his Anointed, and all shall be united in one Solemn League and Covenant under the King of kings and Lord of lords. And though that time may be yet far distant, who may presume to say that the seemingly premature and ineffectual attempt to realise it by the heavenly-minded patriarchs of Scotland's Second Reformation was not the first faint struggling day-beam piercing the world's thick darkness, and revealing to the eye of faith an earnest of the rising of the Sun of Righteousness? True, the clouds soon darkened down and hid that herald day-beam; but not less certainly does the day approach, although its dawning hour be shaded in the deepest gloom. A sacred principle was then infused into the heart of nations, which cannot perish; a light then shone into the world's darkness, which cannot be extinguished; and generations not remote may see that principle quickening and evolving in all its irresistible might, and that light bursting forth in its all-brightening glory." Dr M'Crie, in his 'Sketches of Scottish Church History,' thus describes and defends this remarkable document:—"In this covenant our fathers bound themselves and their posterity, first, To endeavour the preservation of the Reformed religion in the Church of Scotland, the reformation of religion in England and Ireland, 'according to the Word of God and the example of the best Reformed Churches,' and the bringing of the three Churches to the nearest possible conjunction and uniformity in religion; secondly, To the extirpation of Popery and Prelacy; thirdly, To the preservation of the rights of Parliament, of the liberties of the kingdoms, and of his Majesty's person and authority; and, lastly, They pledged themselves to personal reformation, and a holy life. It is hardly necessary to expose the vulgar prejudice, which, taking advantage of an obnoxious term, would identify the extirpation of Popery and Prelacy with the extirpation of the persons of Papists and Prelatists. The only points of objection worthy of notice, are the mixture of things sacred and civil in the same bond, and the enjoining of it under civil penalties. The same answer may suffice for both, and is to be found in the extraordinary circumstances in which our ancestors were placed. A combined attack having been made upon their civil rights and their religious liberties, it became war-ratable, and even necessary, to unite both in their means of defence. So far as it can be shown that, in any case, they resorted to violence or compulsion to enforce the Covenant, we do not vindicate them; but indeed it cannot be proved that it was forced upon any, or that civil injury was incurred by any for simply refusing it. The truth is, that the great body of the people of all ranks entered with heart and soul into the solemn pledge; and the acts of the Church and the State enjoining it, if candidly interpreted and compared with the commentary of their practice, will be found to have been nothing more than a judicial sanction of the measure, with a formal intimation that the Church would hold its opponents as enemies to religion, and that the State would regard them as enemies to the liberties of the country."

COVER. God covers himself with a cloud when he withholds the favourable smiles of his providence and presence, and manifests his just wrath and indignation. Lam. iii. 44. God covered the Jewish prophets, rulers, and seers, when he rendered them stupid, wretched, and contemptible. Isa. xxix. 10. God covers with a robe of righteousness, and covers sin, when, through the imputation of the Saviour's obedience and suffering, he fully and irrevocably forgives it. Isa. lxi. 10; Psal. xxxii. 1; Rom. iv. 7. Men cover their own sin when they deny, excuse, extenuate, or defend it. Prov. xxviii. 13. Men cover the sins of others when they forgive injuries done them, and hinder others' faults from being publicly known. Prov. x. 12. One's covering his own head, face, or lips, imports shame, grief, and perplexity. Jer. xiv. 3; 2 Sam. xix. 4, xv. 30. To have one's face covered by another, imports condemnation to death. Esth. vii. 8. Seraphim covering their faces and feet with their wings, are angels and ministers unable to behold the divine glory that shines in the person and office of Christ, and blushing at their best works before him. Isa. vi. 2. To be covered with a cloud of anger, shame, confusion, horror, ashes, violence, is, through the anger of the Lord, to be reduced to a most wretched and shameful condition, and to be punished for oppression of others. Lam. ii. 1; Ezek. vii. 18; Hab. ii. 17; Obad. 10; Psal. lxxxix. 45. The Jews covered with a covering not of God's Spirit; they depended on the assistance of the Egyptians, contrary to the will of God. Isa. xxx. 1. The face covering and veil spread over all nations, is the gross ignorance and sentence of condemnation which lay on the Gentile world. Isa. xxv. 7.

COVERT. Jesus Christ is a covert to his people; by his blood, his love, his power, and providence, he covers their crimes and infirmities, protects them from the wrath of God, the dominion of sin, and the rage of devils and men. Isa. iv. 6, xxxii. 2. In 2 Kings xvi. 18, we read that Ahaz, when spoiling the temple, took down "the covert for the Sabbath that they had built in the house, and the king's entry without, turned he from the house of the Lord for the king of Assyria." Bishop Patrick imagines that the word "covert," in this passage, implies "a covered place where the king sat, in the porch of the temple, or at the entrance of it, upon the Sabbath, or other great solemnities. Ahaz took this away, intending probably not to trouble himself with coming to the temple any more, but to sacrifice elsewhere."

COVETOUSNESS, an unreasonable desire after that which we have not, with a dissatisfaction with what we have. It may further be considered as consisting in,—1. An anxious carking care about the things of this world. 2. A rapacity in getting. 3. Too frequently includes sinister and illegal ways of obtaining wealth. 4. A tenaciousness in keeping. It is a vice which marvellously prevails upon, and insinuates into, the heart of man; and, for these reasons, it often bears a near resemblance to virtue, brings with it many plausible reasons, and raises a man to a state of reputation on account of his riches. "There cannot be," as one observes, "a more unreasonable sin than this. It is unjust; only to covet, is to wish to be unjust. It is cruel; the covetous must harden themselves against a thousand plaintive voices. It is ungrateful; such forget their former obligations and their present supporters. It is foolish; it destroys reputation, breaks the rest, unfits for the performance of duty, and is a contempt of God himself; it is unprecedented in all the examples of virtue mentioned in the Scripture. One, indeed, spoke unadvisedly with his lips; another cursed and swore; a third was in a passion; and a fourth committed adultery; but which of the saints ever lived in a habit of covetousness? Lastly, it is idolatry (Col. iii. 5), the idolatry of the heart, where, as in a temple, the miserable wretch excludes God, sets up gold instead of him, and places that confidence in it which belongs to the great Supreme alone." Let those who live in the habitual practice of it consider the judgments that have been inflicted on such characters (Josh. vii. 10-26; Acts v. 1-11); the misery with which it is attended; the curse such persons are to society; the denunciations and warnings respecting it in the Holy Scripture; and how effectually it bars men from God, from happiness, and from heaven.

CRACKLING OF THORNS. See THORNS.

CRACKNELS. This word occurs only in 1 Kings xiv. 3: "And take with thee ten loaves, and cracknels, and a cruse of honey, and go to him: he shall tell thee what shall become of the child." Some difference of opinion exists in regard to the meaning of the word. Buxtorf supposes that the original term signifies biscuits, either because they were formed into little buttons, or because they were pricked full of holes in a particular manner. The word, however, says Professor Paxton, "is derived from a participle which nowhere signifies pierced with holes, or formed into network, but spotted or speckled. It is, accordingly, used by Moses to signify those cattle in the flocks of Laban which were marked with spots. In the Book of Joshua, it denotes those mouldy spots on the bread of the Gibeonites, which they pretended the length of their journey had occasioned. The idea of Mr Harmer is, therefore, to be preferred—that it denotes cakes or loaves strewed, and, by consequence, spotted, with coriander and other seeds; a sort of bread which is still quite common in Syria and many other countries of the East." The Talmud says, that cracknels are of a circular form, about the size of half an egg.

CRANE, a tall and long necked fowl, which, according to Isidore, takes its name from its voice, which we imitate in mentioning it. The Prophet Jeremiah (viii. 7) mentions this bird as intelligent of the seasons, by an instinctive and invariable observation of their appointed times of migration: "Yea, the stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle and the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord." The same thing is noticed by Aristophanes and Hesiod; the latter of whom says: "When thou hearest the voice of the crane, clamouring annually from the clouds on high, recollect that this is the signal for ploughing, and indicates the approach of showery winter." Cranes belong to the heron tribe, and their varieties are numerous. They are chiefly found in temperate and hot climates, but many of them are migratory.

CREATION. See COSMOGONY.

CREATURE. By the creature (or, more properly, the creation) which waits for deliverance from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. viii. 19-23), the apostle has by some been supposed to mean the unrenewed heathen world; by others, the new creature in Christ, or Christians in general; by others, all mankind, of all generations. By others still, it is supposed not to include mankind at all, but only the irrational tribes of creation, who are now subjected to degradation and suffering in consequence of the sins of men. But, from the context, it appears rather to mean the whole material globe, which constitutes man's present residence, which is now subjected to imperfection, change, and decay, but is to undergo, at the last day, a transmutation of qualities similar to that of the bodies of just men, and become for ever incorruptible. 1 Cor. xv. 50, 54; 2 Cor. v. 1-4; 2 Pet. iii. 10-13; Rev. xxi. If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature (2 Cor. v. 17); that is, if any man becomes a Christian, a new disposition is produced within him, which transforms his whole character.

CREDITOR. God is represented as our creditor; to him we, as creatures, owe our existence, and all we have; to him, as sinners, we owe satisfaction for our infinite offences; and the more he forgives us, the more we ought to love him. Luke vii. 41-43.

CREED, a form of words in which the articles of faith are comprehended. It is derived from the Latin credo (I believe), with which the Apostles' Creed begins. In the Eastern Church, a summary of this sort was called mathema (the lesson), because it was learned by the catechumens; called also the writing or the rule. But the most common name in the Greek Church was symbol; which term has also passed into the West. Hence creeds and confessions are commonly called symbolical books.

The most ancient form of creeds is that which goes under the name of the APOSTLES' CREED (see next article); besides this, there are several other ancient forms and scattered remains of creeds to be met with in the primitive records of the Church; as—1. The form of apostolical doctrine collected by Origen. 2. A fragment of a creed preserved by Tertullian. 3. A remnant of a creed in the works of Cyprian. 4. A creed composed by Gregory Thaumaturgus, for the use of his own Church. 5. The creed of Lucian, the martyr. 6. The creed of the "Apostolical Constitutions." Besides these scattered remains of the ancient creeds, there are extant some perfect forms, as those of Jerusalem, Cæsarea, Antioch, and others.

CREED, APOSTLES', is a formula or summary of the Christian faith, drawn up, according to Rufinus, by the apostles themselves; who, during their stay at Jerusalem, soon after our Lord's ascension, agreed upon this creed as a rule of faith. Baronius and others conjecture that they did not compose it till the second year of Claudius, a little before their dispersion; but there are many reasons which induce us to question whether the apostles composed any such creed. For—1. Neither Luke nor any other writer before the fifth century, makes any mention of an assembly of the apostles for composing a creed. 2. The fathers of the first three centuries, in disputing against the heretics, endeavour to prove that the doctrine contained in this creed was the same which the apostles taught; but they never pretend that the apostles composed it. 3. If the apostles had made this creed, it would have been the same in all Churches and in all ages, and all authors would have cited it after the same manner. But the case is quite otherwise. In the second and third ages of the Church, there were as many creeds as authors; and the same author sets down the creed after a different manner in several places of his works; which is an evidence that there was not, at that time, any creed reputed to be the apostles'. In the fourth century, Rufinus compares together the three ancient creeds of the Churches of Aquileia, Rome, and the East; which differ very considerably. Besides, these creeds differed not only in the terms and expressions, but even in the articles, some of which were omitted in one or other of them; such as those of the descent into hell, the communion of the saints, and the life everlasting. From all which it may be gathered, that though this creed may be said to be that of the apostles, in regard to the doctrines contained therein, yet it cannot be referred to them as the authors of it. Its great antiquity, however, may be inferred from hence, that the whole form, as it now stands in the English liturgy, is to be found in the works of Ambrose and Rufinus; the former of whom flourished in the third, and the latter in the fourth century. Christians did not publicly recite the creed, except at baptisms; which, unless in cases of necessity, were only at Easter and Whitsuntide. The constant repeating of it was not introduced into the Church till the end of the fifth century; about which time the Bishop of Antioch prescribed the recital of it every time divine service was performed.

CREED, ATHANASIAN. See ATHANASIAN CREED.

CREED, NICENE, a formulary of Christian faith; so called because it is a paraphrase of that creed which was made at the first General Council of Nice. This latter was drawn up by the second General Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, and therefore might be more properly styled the Constantinopolitan Creed. The creed was carried by a majority, and was admitted into the Church as a barrier against Arius and his followers.

CRESCENS a companion of Paul (2 Tim. iv. 10), who is thought by Enschiuss and others to have preached in Gaul, and to have founded the Church of Vienne, in Dauphiné.

CRETE, a large island in the Mediterranean Sea, now called Candia. It was remarkably fruitful, and is said to have formerly contained a hundred towns or cities, from which it was called by Homer Hecatompolis. It once bore the name of The happy island, but since it fell into the hands of the Turks in 1669, it has lost its ancient grandeur and luxuriance. Its inhabitants were remarkable for falsehood and deceit; and to this character the apostle alludes (Tit. i. 12), where he speaks of them as "always liars." The same description is given by Epimeuides, from whom Paul quotes, and Callimachus.

CRIME, a voluntary breach of any known law Faults result from human weakness, being transgressions of the rules of duty; crimes proceed from the wickedness of the heart, being actions against the rules of nature and the laws of God. See PUNISHMENT—SIN.

CRISPUS, chief of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth, was converted and baptized by Paul (Acts xviii. 8), about A.D. 52. 1 Cor. i. 14. Some affirm that Crispus was bishop of Ægina, an island near Athens. The Greeks observe his festival.

CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

CROCODILE. See LEVIATHAN.

CROISADES. See CRUSADES.

CROISIERS, a religious order, founded in honour of the fabulous discovery of the cross by the Empress Helena. They were, till of late, dispersed in several parts of Europe, particularly in the Low Countries, France, and Bohemia; those of Italy were suppressed even before the late revolutions. These monks follow the rule of St Augustine. They had in England the name of Crouched Friars.

CROOKED. A crooked nation or generation are such as rebel against God, have their qualities, inclinations, and practices, quite at variance with the even rule of his law, and unanswerable to their own profession. Phil. ii. 15; Deut. xxxii. 5. Crooked ways are practices and customs inconstant, uncandid, unlovely, and opposed to the law of God. Prov. ii. 12-15. God makes men's lot or path crooked when he inflicts on them changes from prosperity to adversity, or from one trouble to another, and renders their condition unsightly and disagreeable. Lam. iii. 9; Eccl. i. 15, vii. 12. He makes crooked places straight when he removes every impediment, and renders a work easy to his agents. Isa. xlv. 2.

CROSIER, the pastoral staff of an archbishop, which is distinguished from that of a bishop. The latter terminates in an ornamented crook, while the former always terminates in a cross.

CROSS, an ancient instrument of capital punishment, particularly among the Romans. It consisted of two large beams placed across each other, generally in the form of the letter T. These beams were carried separately to the place of execution and serewed together on the ground; and the criminal being stript of all his dress except a covering about his loins, was fastened either with cords or nails driven through his hands and feet. When the individual had been thus placed upon the cross, it was raised aloft by four soldiers and let fall with violence into the cavity prepared for it. This gave the person nailed to it a most dreadful, convulsive shock, and agitated the whole frame. These particulars the Romans observed in the crucifixion of our Lord; and "when it is considered," says Dr Jamieson, "that the body was not only bound so firmly that the swollen veins must, even in the absence of all other causes of suffering, have occasioned most acute anguish, but violently stretched out in a most unnatural position, not the slightest movement to relieve which it was possible to make; when it is considered, that the nails were driven generally through parts of the hands and feet where the nerves and tendons are most numerous and irritable; when, moreover, it is considered, that the deep wounds were increased tenfold in painfulness by the increased pressure of the body, and inflamed by the piercing influence of the midnight air; that the loss of blood produced an extreme thirst—itself a source of intolerable misery; and that the slow oozing out of the vital fluid, before the eyes and over the person of the wretched sufferer, threw a heavy sickness into his heart, scarcely less poignant than his physical agonies—we shall be prepared to say, in the words of Cicero, that crucifixion is the most horrible of all species of tortures which ever were devised." "Before crucifixion, the criminal was generally scourged with cords; sometimes little bones, or pieces of bones, were tied to these scourges, so that the condemned person might suffer more severely. It was also a custom, that he who was to be crucified should bear his own cross to the place of execution. After this manner, we find Christ was compelled to bear his cross; and as he sunk under the burden, Simon the Cyrenian was constrained to bear it after him and with him. But whereas it is generally supposed that our Lord bore the whole cross, i. e., the long and transverse part both, this seems to be a thing impossible; and therefore Lipsius (in his treatise De Supplicio Crucis) has set the matter in a true light, when he tells us that Jesus only carried the transverse beam; because the long beam, or the body of the cross, was either fixed in the ground before, or made ready to be set up as soon as the prisoner came: and from hence he observes, that painters are very much mistaken in the description of our Saviour carrying the whole cross. There were several ways of crucifying; sometimes the criminal was fastened with cords to a tree, sometimes he was crucified with his head downwards; (this way, it is said, Peter chose, out of respect to his Master, Jesus Christ, not thinking himself worthy to be crucified like him;) though the common way of crucifying was by fastening the criminal with nails, one through each hand, and one through both feet, or one through each of them—for this was not always performed in the same manner. The ancients sometimes represent Jesus Christ crucified with four nails, and sometimes with three. The criminal was fixed to the cross quite naked; and, in all probability, the Saviour of sinners was not used with any greater tenderness than others upon whom this punishment was inflicted. The text of the gospel shows clearly that Jesus Christ was fastened to the cross with nails; and the Psalmist (Ps. xxii. 16) had foretold long before, that they should pierce his hands and his feet; but there are great disputes concerning the number of these nails. The Greeks represent our Saviour as fastened to the cross with four nails; in which particular Gregory of Tours agrees with them, one in each hand and foot. But several are of opinion that our Saviour's hands and feet were pierced with three nails only, viz. one in each hand, and one through both his feet: and the custom of the Latins is rather for this last opinion; for the generality of the old crucifixes made in the Latin church have only three nails. Nonnus thinks that our Saviour's arms were besides bound fast to the cross with chains; and St Hilary speaks of the cords wherewith he was tied to it. Sometimes they who were fastened upon the cross lived a good while in that condition. St Andrew is believed to have continued three days alive upon it. Eusebius speaks of certain martyrs in Egypt who were kept upon the cross till they were starved to death. Pilate was amazed at Jesus Christ dying so soon, because naturally he must have lived longer, if it had not been in his power to lay down his life and to take it up again. The legs of the two thieves who were crucified with our Saviour were broken, in order to hasten their death, that their bodies might not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath day, John xix. 31, 33; and to comply with the law of Moses, which forbids the bodies to be left there after sunset. But, among other nations, they were suffered to remain upon the cross a long time. Sometimes they were devoured alive by birds and beasts of prey. Guards were appointed to observe that none of their friends or relations should take them down and bury them. The Roman soldiers who had crucified Jesus Christ and the two thieves, continued near the crosses till the bodies were taken down and buried." The cross is frequently used to express the whole propitiatory work of Christ. Thus Paul says, Gal. vi. 14, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world."

CROSS, THE SIGN OF THE. The cross was used emblematically before the Christian era. Upon a multitude of medals and ancient monuments are to be found crosses placed in the hands of statues of Victory, and of figures of emperors. It was also placed upon a globe; which, ever since the days of Augustus, has been the sign of the empire of the world, and the image of Victory. The shields, the cuirasses, the helmets, the imperial cap, were all thus decorated. The cross is now the universal Christian emblem, being used upon the arms and banners of the soldier, the vestments of the priest, and in the armorial bearings of nobles. The forms of cathedrals, and often the patterns of their pavements, are adapted to the representation of the cross, which is also sculptured and elevated upon tombs and sepulchres. In order to understand the meaning of the sign of the cross among the first Christians, it must be kept in mind, that the cross was in their eyes an instrument of infamous punishment, like the gallows at present, and that they assumed this sign to show that they gloried in being the followers of Christ, notwithstanding the infamy which had been attempted to be thrown upon him by the manner of his execution. It was used by them, accordingly, on every occasion, and in a variety of different ways. The most common mode of doing it, was by drawing the hand rapidly across the forehead, or by merely tracing the sign in the air; in some cases it was worn close to the bosom in medals of gold, silver, or bronze, suspended from the neck; in others it was engraven on the arms, or some other part of the body, by a coloured drawing, made by pricking the skin with a needle. In times of persecution the sign of the cross was the watchword by which Christians recognised one another. Some of the abuses of this custom are thus noticed by Dr Jamieson:—"To the sacred form of the cross were ascribed peculiar powers of protecting from evil; and hence it was frequently resorted to as a secret talisman, to disarm the vengeance of a frowning magistrate, or counteract the odious presence and example of an offerer of sacrifice. It was the only outward means of defending themselves, which the martyrs were wont to employ when summoned to the Roman tribunals on account of their faith. It was by signing himself with the cross that Origen, when compelled to stand at the threshold of the temple of Serapis, and give palm branches, as the Egyptian priests were in the habit of doing, to them that went to perform the sacred rites of the idol, fortified his courage, and stood uncontaminated amid the concourse of profane idolaters. But, perhaps, the most remarkable instance on record of the use of this sign by the primitive Christians, and of the sense they entertained of its potent virtues, occurs in the reign of Diocletian, when that timorous and superstitious prince, in his anxiety to ascertain the events of his Eastern campaign, slew a number of victims, that, from their livers, the augurs might prognosticate the fortunes of the war. During the course of the sacrifice, some Christian officers, who were officially present, put the immortal sign on their foreheads, and forthwith, as the historian relates, the rites were disturbed. The priests, ignorant of the cause, searched in vain for the usual marks on the entrails of the beasts. Once and again the sacrifice was repeated with a similar result; when at length, the chief of the soothsayers observing a Christian signing himself with the cross, exclaimed, 'It is the presence of profane persons that has interrupted the rites.' Thus common was the use, and thus high the reputed efficacy, of this sign among the primitive Christians." When the true spirit of Christianity began to decay, this superstition spread rapidly. Constantine the Great had crosses erected in public places, in palaces and churches. It was customary, in his time, to paint a cross at the entrance of a house, to denote that it belonged to a Christian. Subsequently, the churches were, for the greater part, built in the form of a cross. But it did not become an object of adoration until the Empress Helena (Constantine's mother) found a cross in Palestine, which was believed to be the one on which Christ suffered, and conveyed a part of it to Constantinople. This is the origin of the festival of the finding of the cross, which the Romish Church celebrates on the 3d of May. Standards and weapons were now ornamented with it; and the Emperor Heraclius thought he had recovered the palladium of his empire, when he gained possession, as he imagined, of a piece of the true cross, in 628, which had fallen into the hands of the Persians in 616. In memory of this event, the festival of the exaltation of the cross was instituted, Heraclius having caused the cross to be erected at Jerusalem, on Mount Calvary. This festival is celebrated on the 14th of September. It is remarkable how this holy relic became multiplied. Numberless Churches possessed some part of it, the miraculous power of which was said to have been proved by the most astonishing facts; and many persons actually believed that it could be infinitely divided without decreasing! It was in vain that the Iconoclasts, who condemned the worship of images, attempted to overthrow the adoration of the cross. The crucifix was considered as a principal object of worship, in preference to the images of the saints; and, in compliance with the teachings of John of Damascus, was adored, during the seventh century, in all the Churches of the East. That the West also ascribed a mysterious power to this symbol, is evident from the use which was made of it in the trials "by the judgment of God" in the middle ages. There never has existed any sign which has been so often repeated in works of art as the cross. This may be ascribed, in part, to its form being applicable to many more purposes than those of other emblems; such, for instance, as the crescent. Crosses have been the badge of numberless orders, military and civil. To make the sign of the cross, is thought by many people, in Roman Catholic countries, a defence against evil spirits, evil influences, &c. The Greeks make this sign constantly. In Russia, the common people never commit any act of gross wickedness without doing the same! Romish bishops, archbishops, abbots, and abbesses wear a small golden cross. The Popish benediction is generally performed by making the sign of the cross over the object.

In the administration of the ordinance of baptism, the practice of making the sign of the cross on the forehead of the person baptized was adopted at an early period, though not enjoined by any command, or sanctioned by any example in Scripture. The first Christian writer who mentions it, in connection with baptism, is Tertullian, who wrote after the middle of the second century. How melancholy are the effects of human superstition!

CROSS-BEARER, in the Romish Church, the chaplain of an archbishop, who bears a cross before him on solemn occasions.

CROWN. In primitive times when the dress even of monarchs partook of the simplicity of the age, the crown was nothing more than a wreath formed of the leaves of ivy or of laurel. As luxury increased, regal diadems were formed of metal with a horn projecting from the forehead as an emblem of power. These appear to have sometimes been worn on the battle-field. Thus Saul was equipped at the battle of Gilboa, 2 Sam. i. 10: "So I stood upon him, and slew him, because I was sure that he could not live after that he was fallen: and I took the crown that was upon his head, and the bracelet that was on his arm, and have brought them hither unto my lord." At a more advanced period, the crown of gold and precious stones was introduced. Sometimes the crown was of great magnitude and immense weight. Thus 1 Chron. xx. 2, we read of one which weighed a talent of gold, supposed to amount to one hundred and twenty-five pounds. The victor in the games of Greece was generally rewarded with a crown. The crown in the Olympic games was of wild olive; in the Pythian, of laurel; in the Isthmian or Corinthian, of pine-tree; and in the Nemæan, of smallage or parsley. The perishing nature of such rewards is finely contrasted by the apostle with the imperishable character of the Christian's reward—"Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible." Among the Romans, the noblest reward which a soldier could receive was the civic crown, given to him who had saved the life of a citizen, made of oak leaves, and, by order of the general, presented by the person who had been saved to his preserver, whom he ever after respected as a parent. Alluding to this high distinction, the apostle says to his son Timothy:—"I have fought a good fight, . . . henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. And lest any one should imagine that the Christian's crown is perishable in its nature, and soon fades away, like a crown of oak leaves, the Apostle Peter assures the faithful soldier of Christ, that his crown is infinitely more valuable and lasting:—‘Ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.’ 1 Pet. v. 4. And this account is confirmed by James:—‘Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him.’ Jas. i. 12.

The military crowns were conferred by the general in presence of the army; and such as received them after a public eulogium on their valour, were placed next his person. The Christian also receives his unmerited reward from the hand of the Captain of his salvation:—‘Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.’ Rev. ii. 16. And like the brave veteran of ancient times, he is promoted to a place near his Lord:—‘To him that overcometh, will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne.’ Rev. iii. 21. The saints must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, who will produce the proofs of their fidelity before assembled worlds. Among the Hebrews, both the bridegroom and the bride on nuptial occasions wore bridal crowns or garlands upon their foreheads. Cant. iii. 11. Hence God, when he enters into covenant with his people, is said to put a crown upon their head. Ezek. xvi. 12. In Rev. iv. 16, the elders, in token of submission, are said to cast their crowns before the throne.

CRUCIFIX, a cross, upon which the body of Christ is fastened in effigy; used by the Roman Catholics, to excite in their minds a strong idea of our Saviour’s passion.

CRUCIFIXION. See CROSS.

CRUEL. The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel; even their kindness ensnares and murders men’s souls. Prov. xii. 10. To breathe out cruelty, is to utter threatenings, and to delight in want of tender sympathy, and in doing mischief. Ps. xxvii. 12.

CRUSE, a small vessel for holding water and other liquids. 1 Sam. xxvi. 11. Our translators have rendered by the word cruse no less than three words, which occur in the Hebrew, and which, no doubt, describe different utensils, though perhaps all may be taken as vessels used for the purpose of containing liquid. 1 Sam. xxvi. 11; 1 Kings xiv. 3; 2 Kings ii. 20. The cruse of water mentioned in 1 Sam. xxvi. 11, is sometimes alleged to have been a eupsydra, which was an instrument used for measuring time by the falling of water from one vessel into another, the undermost vessel containing a piece of cork, the different altitudes of which, as it gradually rose upon the rising water, marked the progress of time. It is not likely, however, that this instrument was known at such an early period.

CRYPT. The subterranean vaults under cathedrals and some churches, used generally as places of burial.

CRYSTAL. The Hebrew kerech is rendered by our translators crystal (Ezek. i. 22); frost (Gen. xxxi. 40, &c.); and ice. Job vi. 16, &c. The word primarily denotes ice, and it is given to a perfectly transparent and hyaline gem, from its resemblance to this substance.

CUBIT, a measure used among the ancients. The Hebrews call it ammah—the mother of other measures. A cubit originally was the distance from the elbow to the extremity of the middle finger; this is the fourth part of a well-proportioned man’s stature. The common cubit is eighteen inches. The Hebrew cubit, according to Bishop Cumberland and M. Pelletier, is twenty-one inches; but others fix it at eighteen inches. The Talmudists observe, that the Hebrew cubit was larger by one quarter than the Roman. Cappellus and others have asserted that there were two sorts of cubits among the Hebrews—one sacred, and the other common; the sacred containing three feet, the common containing a foot and a half. Moses assigns to the Levites a thousand sacred cubits of land round about their cities (Numb. xxxv. 4); and in the next verse he gives them two thousand common ones. The opinion, however, is very probable, that the cubit varied in different districts and cities, and at different times.

CUCKOW, an unclean bird. Lev. xi. 16. We are not certain of the bird intended by Moses under this name; the strength of the versions is in favour of the sea-mew, or gull. Geddes renders it the “horn-owl,” but Shaw understands it of the rhaad, or saf-saf, a granivorous and gregarious bird, which wants the hinder toe. The true nature of this bird is enveloped in the greatest uncertainty; and it is next to an impossibility to speak with anything like definiteness on the subject.

CUCUMBER (Numb. xi. 5), the fruit of a plant very common in our gardens. Tournefort mentions six kinds, of which the white and green are most esteemed. They are very plentiful in the East, especially in Egypt, and much superior to ours. Maillet, in describing the vegetables which the modern Egyptians have for food, tells us that melons, cucumbers, and onions, are the most common; and Celsus and Alpinus describe the Egyptian cucumbers as more agreeable to the taste, and of more easy digestion than the European. The species of cucumber most common in Egypt and Syria, is the Cucumis chate of Linnæus, the fruit of which is oblong and green, and of a sweet taste. Perhaps the Cucumis sativus, or common cucumber, may be also included in the Scripture term. Cucumbers are eaten in abundance in hot weather, in the East.

CULDEES, an ancient religious body in Scotland. It is uncertain where the Culdee system first originated, but it is generally supposed to owe its institution to Columba, about the middle of the sixth century. “The doctrinal opinions of Columba appear to have possessed much of the purity of the apostolic age of Christianity; and his successors seem to have kept fast hold of this noble feature of distinction, even after the moral and religious atmosphere of the Christian world had been contaminated by the pestilence of Papal supremacy. For although Popery had established its sway, and although much that was impure, and more that was absurd, had become interwoven into its texture, as part of the creed by which its votaries were to be regulated;—although, we say, Europe had thus stooped to receive the degrading fetters of a foul and foolish superstition;—in Scotland its ascendancy was long checked by the firm intrepidity of the Culdees; nor did the Papal power, while rearing its throne in Scotland, find any engine, except its favoured instruments of unprincipled duplicity and exterminating persecution, sufficient for quenching their zeal in the cause of truth, or quieting their struggles in defence of religious freedom.

“Columba had, from the first, recommended to his disciples THE WORD OF GOD as the great rule of faith.

It was to be their only infallible director; to it they were to refer in all their difficulties; by it they were to abide in all their decisions; it was to be the source of all their knowledge; and however numerous and diversified might be the channels whereby the streams of this knowledge were to be communicated, yet were the Holy Scriptures ever to be regarded as the great well-spring, whence the refreshing waters should emanate: Even Bede, when he censures them for their non-conformity to the Romish ritual, admits that 'Columba and his disciples would receive those things only which are contained in the writings of the prophets, evangelists and apostles; diligently observing the works of piety and virtue.'

"It was this rigid adherence to a one infallible standard which, coupled with a determined opposition to the grasping ambition of the Romish Church, led in the end to their overthrow; and an honourable overthrow it was, seeing it was endured in defence of that 'faith once delivered to the saints!'—an overthrow which was preferred to an acknowledgment of such unscriptural innovations as the doctrine of the Real Presence, the idolatrous worship of saints, prayers for the dead, the doctrine of good works as opposed to justification by faith, the infallibility of the Pope, absolution, confession, and others of the Romish tenets, which they resisted with a faithfulness and a firmness that extorted, even from their adversaries, a tardy testimony to their zeal, their prudence, their piety, and their learning.

"But not only did the Culdees differ from the votaries of the Romish Church in these most vital points of faith and doctrine, they also dissented from them on the subject of ecclesiastical discipline, and in their habits as a body of Christian teachers. They disclaimed all right, on the part of the Papal chair, to interfere with their management, or form of government; and adhered, in their capacity as members of the same order, to none of the unsocial restrictions of a monastic rule." Long did this interesting body of men hold out against the crushing tyranny of the Church of Rome. Their submission to Rome, indeed, seems only to have been extorted after the body had been so stunned by the violence and duration of the contest, as to be almost on the point of expiring; and after the close of the thirteenth century, they ceased altogether to be spoken of as a distinct and separate society.

CUMMIN (Isa. xxviii. 25, 27; Matt. xxiii. 23). This is an umbelliferous plant, in appearance resembling fennel, but smaller. Its seeds have a bitterish warm taste, accompanied with an aromatic flavour, not of the most agreeable kind. An essential oil is obtained from them by distillation. The Jews sowed it in their fields, and, when ripe, thrashed out the seeds with a rod. Isa. xxviii. 25, 27. The Maltese sow it, and collect the seeds in the same manner. It is the Cuminum sanctivum of Linnæus. The mode in which cummin was sown in the East is thus referred to by the Prophet Isaiah (xxviii. 25, 26): "When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and cast in the principal wheat, and the appointed barley, and the rye, in their place? For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him." And, in the verse immediately following, the prophet speaks of the mode of thrashing it: "For the fitches are not thrashed with a thrashing-instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod." It appears, then, that the mode of thrashing out the cummin was with a rod, and that it was sown broad-cast in the fields.

CUP. This word is taken in a two-fold sense—proper, and figurative. In a proper sense, it signifies a vessel such as people drink out of at meals. Gen. xl. 13. We find Joseph's silver cup to have been one of peculiar value, and probably a token of his official dignity. Hence the astonishment and terror of his brethren when they found it in Benjamin's sack. It was customary among the Hebrews, and the same custom also prevailed among the Greeks, to give malefactors a cup of wine, often medicated, with the design of stupifying them, and rendering them incapable of feeling pain. To this the Prophet Jeremiah alludes (xxv. 15, 16): "For thus saith the Lord God of Israel unto me, Take the wine cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations, to whom I send thee, to drink it. And they shall drink, and be moved, and be mad, because of the sword that I will send among them." Hence the Jews gave our Lord, at his crucifixion, wine mingled with myrrh. But, besides the medicated draught in derision of his kingly character, they offered him vinegar mingled with gall, instead of sweet wine, which was the drink of Oriental sovereigns. The Greeks called the cup of medicated wine prepared for criminals, the cup of indignation. The same language was employed by the Jews; hence, in Rev. xiv. 10, the mystical Babylon, portrayed as an abandoned woman, is made to drink of the wine of the cup of God's indignation. It was anciently the custom, at great entertainments, for the governor of the feast to appoint to each of his guests the kind and proportion of the wine which they were to drink, and what he had thus appointed them it was deemed a breach of good manners either to refuse or not to drink up; hence a man's cup, both in sacred and profane authors, came to signify the portion, whether of good or evil, which happens to him in this world. Thus, to drink "the cup of trembling," or of "the fury of the Lord," is to be afflicted with sore and terrible judgments. Isa. li. 17; Jer. xxv. 15–29; Psal. lxxv. 8. What Christ means by the expression, we cannot be at a loss to understand, since, in two remarkable passages (Luke xxii. 42; John xviii. 11), he has been his own interpreter. "To drink the deadly cup," or cup of death, was a common phrase among the Jews.

There is considerable difficulty connected with the cup of Joseph, which he seems to have used in DIVINATION (which see.) Cups of wine appear to have been used liberally by the Jews on special occasions, whether of feasting or mourning. A Jewish writer tells us that at their funerals ten cups were drank at the house of the deceased—two before the funeral banquet, five amidst the banquet, and three after it was finished. In solemn services, a "cup of blessing" was used; to which our Saviour refers when, at the institution of the Lord's Supper, he blessed the cup, and handed it to the apostles, saying, "Drink ye all of it." At special festivals, also, the Jews offered "cups of salvation" or of thanksgiving; and to this the Psalmist alludes in Ps. cxvi. 13:—"I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord." The Jews at this day, in their feasts at the circumcision of their children, use cups of thanksgiving. Some commentators think that "the cup of salvation" was a libation of wine poured on the victim sacrificed on thanksgiving occasions, according to the law of Moses. Exod. xxix. 40.

The "cup of blessing" spoken of in 1 Cor. x. 16, denotes the sacramental cup, which contains symbolically all the blessings of the new covenant, and which Jesus blessed before presenting it to his disciples.

CURATE, the lowest degree among the clergy in the Church of England; he who represents the incumbent of a church, parson, or vicar, and officiates in his stead. He is to be licensed and admitted by the bishop of the diocese, or by an ordinary having Episcopal jurisdiction; and when a curate hath the sanction of the bishop, he usually appoints the salary too. A curate having no fixed estate in his curacy, not being instituted and inducted, may be removed at pleasure by the bishop or incumbent. But there are perpetual curates as well as temporary, who are appointed where tithes are inappropriate, and no vicarage endowed; these are not removable, and the impropiators are obliged to find them; some whereof have certain portions of the tithes settled on them. Curates must subscribe the declaration according to the act of uniformity, or are liable to imprisonment.

CURIOSITY, a propensity or disposition of the mind which inclines it to inquire after new objects, and to delight in viewing them. Curiosity is proper when it springs from a desire to know our duty, to mature our judgments, to enlarge our minds, and to regulate our conduct; but improper when it wishes to know more of God, of his decrees, the origin of evil, the state of men, or the nature of things, than it is designed for us to know. The evil of this is evident. It reproaches God's goodness; it is a violation of Scripture (Deut. xxix. 29); it robs us of our time; it often makes us unhappy; lessens our usefulness, and produces mischief. To cure this disposition, let us consider the divine command Phil. iv. 6; that everything essential is revealed; that God cannot err; that we shall be satisfied in a future state. John xiii. 7. Curiosity concerning the affairs of others is exceedingly reprehensible. "It interrupts," says an elegant writer, "the order, and breaks the peace of society. Persons of this disposition are dangerous troublers of the world. Crossing the lines in which others move, they create confusion, and awaken resentment. Hence many a friendship has been broken; the peace of many a family has been overthrown; and much bitter and lasting discord has been propagated through society. Such a disposition is entirely the reverse of that amiable spirit of charity our Lord inculcates. Charity, like the sun, brightens every object on which it shines; a censorious disposition casts every character into the darkest shade it will bear. It is to be further observed, that all impertinent curiosity about the affairs of others tends greatly to obstruct personal reformation. They who are so officiously occupied about their neighbours, have little leisure, and less inclination, to observe their own defects, or to mind their own duty. From their inquisitive researches, they find, or imagine they find, in the behaviour of others, an apology for their own failings; and the favourite result of their inquiries generally is, to rest satisfied with themselves. We should consider, also, that every excursion of vain curiosity about others is a subtraction from that time and thought which are due to ourselves and to God. In the great circle of human affairs, there is room for every one to be busy and well employed in his own province, without encroaching upon that of others. It is the province of superiors to direct—of inferiors to obey; of the learned to be instructive—of the ignorant to be docile; of the old to be communicative—of the young to be advisable and diligent. In all the various relations which subsist among us in life, as husband and wife, masters and servants, parents and children, relations and friends, rulers and subjects, innumerable duties stand ready to be performed; innumerable calls to activity present themselves on every hand, sufficient to fill up, with advantage and honour, the whole time of man."

CURSE. In Scripture language, it signifies the just and lawful sentence of God's law, condemning sinners to suffer the full punishment of their sin, or the punishment inflicted on account of transgression. Gal. iii. 10.

God denounced his curse against the serpent which had seduced Eve (Gen. iii. 14); and against Cain, who had imbrued his hands in his brother Abel's blood (iv. 11). He also promised to bless those who should bless Abraham, and to curse those who should curse him. The divine maledictions are not merely imprecations, nor are they impotent wishes; but they carry their effects with them, and are attended with all the miseries they denounce or foretell. See ANATHHEMA.

Holy men sometimes prophetically cursed particular persons (Gen. ix. 25, xlix. 7; Deut. xxvii. 15; Josh. vi. 26); and history informs us that these imprecations had their fulfilment, as had that of our Saviour against the barren fig tree. Mark xi. 21. But such curses are not consequences of passion, impatience, or revenge; they are predictions, and therefore not such as God condemns. Our Lord pronounces blessed those disciples who are (falsely) loaded with curses, and requires his followers to bless those who curse them—to render blessing for cursing. Matt. v. 11. It was customary among the idolatrous nations of Syria and Palestine, before they attacked their enemies in war, to endeavour to bring down a curse upon them, and thus secure their overthrow. With this view, and under the false idea that some men had this power of themselves, Balak sent for Balaam to curse Israel: "Come now, therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people; for they are too mighty for me: peradventure I shall prevail, that we may smite them, and that I may drive them out of the land: for I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed." Numb. xxii. 6.

CURTAIN. The tabernacle, as we are informed in Gen. xxvi. 1, was hung with ten curtains, of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet. It was covered with eleven curtains of goats' hair. An outer curtain was suspended before the door, and an inner between the holy place and the holy of holies.

CUSH, the eldest son of Ham and grandson of Noah. The sons of Cush were, Seba, who settled on the south-west part of Arabia; Havilah, who gave name to a country on the river Pison, where it leaves the Euphrates to run into the Arabian Gulf; Sabtah, who lived on the same shore, but a little more northward; Raamah, who, with his two sons, Sheba and Dedan, occupied the same coast, but a little more eastward; and Sabtechah, who probably placed himself among the rest of his brethren. But among all the sons of Cush, Nimrod was the person who in those early days distinguished himself by his bravery and courage, at length raising himself to the dignity of a king. Having made Babylon the seat of his empire, he laid the foundation of three other cities, namely, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, in the neighbouring provinces; and passing into Assyria, and enlarging his territories, there he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen, situated upon the Tigris. The descendants of Cush there seem to have settled on the borders of the Arabian Gulf; but the term Cush, or Ethiopia, seems in Scripture language to have had an extensive signification, including all the southern and eastern borders of Egypt. Bruce tells us that the Abyssinians have a tradition that Cush with his family settled in Abyssinia and built the city of Axum, in the days of Abraham. The land of Cush, properly, speaking, corresponds to the modern Chusistan or Susiana. See ETHIOPIA.

CUSTOM. By custom we mean a frequent reiteration of the same act; and by habit, the effect that custom has on the mind or the body. (See HABIT.) "Viewing man," says Lord Kaimes, "as a sensitive being, and perceiving the influence of novelty upon him, would one suspect that custom has an equal influence? And yet our nature is equally susceptible of both; not only in different objects, but frequently in the same. When an object is new, it is enehanting; familiarity renders it indifferant; and custom, after a longer familiarity, makes it again desirable. Human nature, diversified with many and various springs of action, is wonderful, and, indulging the expression, intricately constructed. Custom hath such influence upon many of our feelings, by warping and varying them, that we must attend to its operations if we would be acquainted with human nature. A walk upon the quarter-deck, though intolerably confined, becomes, however, so agreeable by custom, that a sailor, in his walk on shore, confines himself commonly within the same bounds. I knew a man who had relinquished the sea for a country life. In the corner of his garden he reared an artificial mount with a level summit, resembling, most accurately, a quarter-deck, not only in shape, but in size; and here was his choice walk." Such, we find, is often the power of custom.

CUTHITES, a people who dwelt beyond the Euphrates, and were thence transplanted into Samaria, in place of the Israelites, who had before inhabited it. 2 Kings xvii. 24. They came from the land of Cush or Cutha, on the Araxes—their first settlement being in the cities of the Medes, subdued by Shalmaneser and his predecessors. (See CUSH.) Josephus informs us, that they did not build a temple on Mount Gerizim till the reign of Alexander the Great. See SAMARITANS.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH. It is said concerning the priests of Baal, 1 Kings xviii. 28:—"And they cried aloud, and cut themselves after their manner, with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them." This custom, however, was not limited to the heathen, for we find that even the Israelites are warned against the practice. "Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you: I am the Lord." Lev. xix. 28. And the warning is repeated Lev. xxi. 5: "They shall not make baldness upon their head, neither shall they shave off the corner of their beard, nor make any cuttings in their flesh." The same custom prevails at this day among the idolatrous tribes, on occasion of the death of relatives. God is supposed to be propitiated by these self-inflicted cruelties. Hence the allusions which we find in some of the Old Testament prophets to such cuttings. Thus Jer. xvi. 6: "Both the great and the small shall die in this land: they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them." Chap. xli. 5, "There came certain from Shechem, from Shiloh, and from Samaria, even fourscore men, having their beards shaven, and their clothes rent, and having cut themselves, with offerings and incense in their hand, to bring them to the house of the Lord." Chap. xlvii. 5, "Baldness is come upon Gaza; Ashkelon is cut off with the remnant of their valley: how long wilt thou cut thyself?" In Eastern countries, the relations of the deceased often testify their sorrow by cutting and slashing their naked arms with daggers. To this custom Jeremiah (xlviii. 37) alludes: "For every head shall be bald, and every beard clipped: upon all the hands shall be cuttings, and upon the loins sackcloth." And not only did the ancient Israelites imitate the heathen in cutting their arms, but also their faces. They not unfrequently, in token of grief, cut off and even shaved their hair. When Job was informed of the death of his children and the destruction of his property, he arose and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground and worshipped. Shaving the hair, however, was sometimes a sign of joy, and to let the hair grow long a sign of mourning. Thus Joseph (Gen. xli. 14) shaved himself before he went into the palace; and Mephibosheth let his hair grow during the time David was banished from Jerusalem, but shaved himself on his return.

CYAXARES. See DARIUS.

CYMBALS. These were circular pieces of metal, more or less hollowed in the centre, and producing a sound by being struck together. The Egyptians made them of a small size; but Josephus says that the cymbals of the Jews were broad and large instruments, made of brass. In Psal. cl. 6, it is said: "Praise him upon the loud cymbals; praise him upon the high sounding cymbals." It is probable, from this passage, that there were great varieties of sizes among the cymbals, and that thus a diversity of tone might be obtained by the employment of a large band of performers.

CYNICS, a philosophical sect founded by Antisthenes, a disciple of Socrates, who chose for his school "the Cynosargum," or temple of the "white dog; whence many have supposed the sect derived their name, though, in later times, it is more likely they were called dogs from their snarling disposition. The fundamental principle of Antisthenes was, that "virtue alone is a sufficient foundation for a happy life." From this principle, he despised all speculative and scientific studies, and affected poverty of appearance and coarseness of manners. This his master, Socrates, remarked; and one day observing him in a thread-bare cloak, of which he took pains rather to display than to conceal the rags, said to him, "Why so ostentatious? through your vanity I see your rags." Diogenes, however, the disciple of Antisthenes, exceeded his master both in coarseness of manners and a snarling disposition, which subsequent ages have considered as the characteristic of a Cynic.

CYPRESS (Isa. xlv. 14), a large evergreen tree. The wood is fragrant, very compact, and heavy. It scarcely ever rots, decays, or is worm-eaten; for which reason the ancients used to make the statues of their gods with it. The imperishable chests which contain the Egyptian mummies were formed of cypress. The gates of St Peter's Church, at Rome, which had lasted from the time of Constantine to that of Pope

Eugene IV.—that is to say, eleven hundred years—were of cypress, and had in that time suffered no decay. But Celsius thinks that Isaiah speaks of the ilex, a kind of oak; and Bishop Lowth, that the pine is intended. The cypress, however, was more frequently used, and more fit for the purpose which the prophet mentions, than either of these trees. The tree referred to is the Cupressus sempervirens of Linnaeus. It is so strong and durable, that it has been supposed to yield the gopher wood, from which the ark was made by Noah.

CYPRUS, a large island in the Mediterranean, situated between Cilicia and Syria. Its inhabitants were plunged in all manner of luxury and debauchery. It was famous in heathen times for the worship of Venus; but a higher honour was paid to this island by the visit of Paul and the planting of Christianity in it. Acts xiii. Cyprus, originally governed by several petty kings, after having shared in most of the fortunes of the East, by passing through the hands of the Persians, Greeks, Romans, and Saracens, is at present in possession of the Turks; and, like most others of their possessions, from having been a populous and flourishing country, is reduced to a barren desert. Cyprus was the birthplace of Barnabas, who accompanied Paul in his travels. Barnabas is considered as the principal apostle and first bishop of Cyprus, where it is said he was martyred, being stoned to death by the Jews of Salamis.

CYRENAICS, a sect of philosophers, founded by Aristippus of Cyrene, a disciple of Socrates, whose sentiments seem to have corresponded with those of Epicurus—that pleasure is the supreme good, interpreted in the grossest sense; for Cicero speaks of the school of Aristippus as fruitful in debaucheries.

CYRENE, a city of great note, in the province of Libya in Africa, and once so powerful as to rival Carthage itself. From this city the province received the name of Cyrenaica, and by Luke it is called "Libya about Cyrene." Acts ii. 10. Cyrene was the birthplace of that Simon whom the Jews compelled to bear the Saviour's cross; and certain Jews from this place were among the first who preached the gospel at Antioch. Acts xi. 20. Originally this city was a Greek colony, founded B.C. 631; afterwards it was annexed to Egypt, and B.C. 97, passed into the hands of the Romans. It was destroyed in the fourth century, and is now a mass of ruins tenanted by the wild beasts of the desert, and occasionally by the wandering Arabs, who pitch their tents in the neighbourhood.

CYRENIUS, a governor of Syria, mentioned in Luke ii. 2. This person is the same who was called in the Latin language, Quirinius; his full name was Publius Sulpitius Quirinius. Considerable difficulty has arisen in connection with Cyrenius, from the circumstance that it is manifest, from Josephus and other authors, that he was not president of Syria till a considerably later period than that which chronologists fix for the birth of Christ. The explanation given by Prideaux and Campbell is that which is generally approved. They think that the first verse of the second chapter of Luke refers to an enrolling or register of the people which was made in Herod's time, and that the second verse refers to the actual levying of a tax in consequence of the previous census; which tax was not raised till about twelve years after, and which occasioned great dissatisfaction and insurrections among the Jews. They think, too, that this is the decree for the census which was issued by Augustus, according to other historians, three years before the birth of Christ; and that it need not be reckoned surprising that so long time should have elapsed before it reached the distant province of Syria, and was carried through that very extensive country. Saturnius was the person to whom this census was intrusted. Lardner solves the difficulty in another way, by alleging that Cyrenius was sent with an extraordinary commission indeed, but into Judea only, which was not then annexed to Syria, to assist Herod in making the census; that the decree for registering the whole world extended no farther than the country over which Herod ruled.

CYRUS. The son of Cambyses the Persian and of Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes. He was born about the year B.C. 599, and it is remarkable that Isaiah, who lived about a century before the birth of Cyrus, mentions him by name (xliv. 28.) While yet a youth, he signalled himself in an expedition against the Babylonians. It was not, however, till his fortieth year, that by the appointment of his uncle Cyaxares, king of the Medes, he became general of the whole Median army, and succeeded in giving a fatal blow to the power of the Chaldeans. When, on the death of his grandfather, Cyrus ascended the throne, one of the first acts of his reign, B.C. 536, was to issue a decree granting to the Jews liberty to return from Babylou to Judea, and to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem. He gave every facility to the Jewish exiles to return to their own land, and restored to them the sacred vessels which Nebuchadnezzar had carried away, besides ordering the expense of erecting the temple at Jerusalem to be defrayed from the royal treasury. Josephus says that Daniel showed Cyrus the prophecies of Isaiah which related to him; and the language of the decree would seem to sanction this assertion,—“Jehovah, the God of heaven, hath given to me all the kingdoms of the earth, and hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah.” Scripture makes no mention of the death of Cyrus. Xenophon states that he died in the seventh year of his reign, while on a journey into Persia, and that he was buried at Persepolis. Niebuhr seems to have discovered his tomb among the ruins of that once famous city. Plutarch, in his life of Alexander the Great, records the following inscription, as having been found upon the tomb:—“O man, whoever thou art, and whenever thou comest (for come I know thou wilt), I am Cyrus, the founder of the Persian empire. Envy me not the little earth that covers my body.” Alexander, as may be easily imagined, was deeply affected with this inscription. The following remarks of Dr Hales are worthy of quotation. “This,” says he, “is a most signal and extraordinary epitaph. It seems to have been designed for a useful memento mori for Alexander the Great in the full pride of conquest, whose coming it predicts with a prophetic spirit—‘For come I know thou wilt.’ But how could Cyrus know of his coming? Very easily. Daniel, his venerable friend, who warned the haughty Nebuchadnezzar, ‘that head of gold,’ or founder of the Babylonian empire, that it should be subverted by ‘the breast and arms of silver,’ Dan. ii. 37, 39, (or ‘the Mede and the Persian’ Darius and Cyrus, as he more plainly told the impious Belshazzar, Dan. v. 28), communicated to Cyrus also the symbolical vision of the goat with the horn in his forehead, Alexander of Macedon, coming swiftly from the West, to overturn the Persian Empire.”

D.

DAGGER. This warlike weapon was seldom used in battle, but on all occasions supplied the want of a knife. Ehud, however, we find, had a dagger with two edges, of a cubit length, hid under his raiment, upon his right thigh, and with this formidable weapon he slew Eglon, king of Moab, the oppressor of Israel. It is to be observed, that Ehud, contrary to the usual custom, wore his dagger upon his right thigh; but this is easily explained by the statement which is given—that he was a Benjamite, a man left-handed. See ARMS.

DAGON (from dag, a fish), god of the Philistines. It is the opinion of some that Dagon was represented like a woman with the lower parts of a fish, like a triton. Scripture shows clearly that the statue of Dagon was human, at least the upper part of it. 1 Sam. v. 4. It is not a little remarkable, that Layard has discovered, in his researches in Assyria, an ancient god exactly answering to the description here given of Dagon. A temple of Dagon at Gaza was pulled down by Samson. Judg. xvi. 23–30. In another, at Ashdod, the Philistines deposited the ark of God. 1 Sam. v. 1–3. A city in Judah was called Bethdagon; that is, the house, or temple, of Dagon (Josh. xv. 41); and another on the frontiers of Asher. Josh. xix. 27.

DALMANUTHA. Mark says that Jesus Christ embarked with his disciples on the Lake of Tiberias, and came to Dalmanutha (Mark viii. 10); but Matthew calls it Magdala (Matt. xv. 39); it seems that Dalmanutha was near to Magdala, on the western side of the lake.

DALMATIA, a part of Illyricum, or old Illyria, lying along the Gulf of Venice. Titus preached here. 2 Tim. iv. 10.

DAMASCUS. In ancient times this was one of the most famous cities in Asia, and entitled by Julian the Apostate, the Eye of all the East. It is the capital of Syria, and situated in a valley watered by the Barrada, of which the Abana and Pharpar are supposed to have been branches. Its great antiquity is universally acknowledged, Bochart attributing its foundation to Uz, son of Aram. At all events, it evidently existed as a city of some importance in the days of Abraham, whose steward is described as having been Eliezer of Damascus. For three centuries it was the residence of the Syrian kings. Hadad, however, is said by Josephus to have been the first king of Damascus; and we know from Scripture that this prince was conquered by David. In the reign of Ahaz, Benhadad is mentioned to have been king of Syria; and its last king, Rezin, was taken by Tiglath-Pileser, who added Damascus to the kingdom of Assyria, carrying its citizens to Kir in Media. 2 Kings xvi. 5–9. This conquest of Damascus was predicted both by Isaiah and Amos. From these calamities the city seems to have recovered, and was afterwards plundered by Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, the generals of Alexander the Great, and finally by the Romans, in the war between Pompey and Tigranes. We find Damascus mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and Aretas spoken of as its king or governor. From the Romans it passed into the hands of the Saracens about the year 634, and became the seat of their princes before they settled in Bagdad. The city was afterwards taken and destroyed by Tamerlane, A.D. 1400, but restored by the Mamelukes, who surrendered it to the Turks in 1506. In consequence of the war between Turkey and the Pacha of Egypt in 1832, Damascus has, by treaty, been ceded to the latter, in whose hands it now remains. The city of Damascus, as beheld from an elevated position, is thus described by Dr King, an American missionary:—"You see a great city thickly set with houses of a whitish appearance, which have very little to distinguish them from each other. The minarets, of which there may be seventy or eighty, with here and there a tall cyprus rising above the houses, are the only things which break in upon the uniformity. This whitish city you see in the midst of a large wood about fifty miles in circumference, with little variety except what arises from the dark green of the chestnuts and the dark, mournful appearance of the poplars and olives. In the skirts of the wood is to be seen here and there a little village with a mosque. This wood, which actually consists of an immense number of gardens and orchards, lies in a great plain surrounded by chains of hills and mountains." The beautiful situation of Damascus has been described in the most exaggerated language by travellers. Lamartine speaks of it as "one of those sites pointed out by the hand of God for a city—a site predestined to sustain a capital like Constantinople." "There are few objects upon earth," says Mr Hardy, a Wesleyan missionary, "that come nearer to the ideal form that the mind gives to the New Jerusalem." The number of Jews in this city must have been great in the time of the apostles, but at present their number is calculated not to exceed 5000.

Damascus continues to be one of the finest cities of Syria. The population is estimated at from one hundred and twenty thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand. "The city," says Otto von Richter, "has certainly an imposing appearance. I traversed streets of very great length, where the richly stocked bazaars were intermingled with elegant khans, and baths, and neatly adorned coffee-houses. The public edifices are generally splendid; and among these, the church of the Monastery of St Paul's Conversion, which belongs to the Spaniards of Palestine, well deserves to be particularised."

DAMIANISTS, disciples of Damian, bishop of Alexandria, in the sixth century. Their opinions were similar to those of the ANGELITES (which see), and chiefly differed from the orthodox in explaining the doctrine of the Trinity in a way peculiar to themselves. They admitted each of the Sacred Three to be God, as partaking of the Godhead—"a common divinity;" but, perhaps, denied the Athanasian doctrines of an eternal generation, and the procession of the Holy Spirit.

DAMNATION (condemnation). This word is used to denote the final loss of the soul; but it is not always to be understood in this sense in the Sacred Scriptures. Thus it is said, in Rom. xiii. 2: "They that resist shall receive to themselves damnation;"

that is, condemnation from the "rulers," who "are not a terror to good works but to the evil." Again, in 1 Cor. xi. 29: "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself;" that is, condemnation—exposes himself to severe temporal judgments from God, and to the judgment and censure of the wise and good. Again, Rom. xiv. 23: "He that doubteth is damned if he eat;" that is, is condemned both by his own conscience and the Word of God, because he is far from being satisfied that he is right in so doing.

DAN, the fifth son of Jacob, and eldest by Bilhah, the handmaid of Rachel. Gen. xxx. 1-6. Nothing particular is known of the life of this person. From his only son Hushim descended a numerous posterity. Num. i. 38, 39. The district of Canaan allotted to the tribe of Dan was very fruitful, including the vineyards of Timnath and of the valley of Eshtaol. Dan was also the name of a city previously called Laish, in the north of Palestine, and its being situated towards the extremity of the land, gave rise to the proverb, "From Dan to Beersheba," signifying from one end of the country to the other. It was situated at the foot of Mount Libanus. This was one of the cities in which Jeroboam set up a golden calf. By the Romans the city was afterwards called Paneas, and by Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod, it was called Cesarea Philippi.

DANCERS, a sect which sprung up about 1373, in Flanders. It was their custom, all of a sudden, to fall a dancing, and, holding each other's hands, to continue thereat till, being suffocated with the extraordinary violence, they fell down breathless together. During these intervals of vehement agitation, they pretended to be favoured with wonderful visions. Like the Whippers, they roved from place to place, begging their victuals, holding their secret assemblies, and treating the priesthood and worship of the Church with the utmost contempt. Thus we find, as Dr Haweis observes, that the French Convulsionists and the Welsh Jumpers have had predecessors of the same stamp. There is nothing new under the sun.

DANCING. The inhabitants of Eastern countries have been in all ages very partial to dancing, and their feasts are generally enlivened with music and the dance. Both among the Greeks and Romans this was reckoned one of the liberal arts. Among the Jews, also, dancing was practised, chiefly, however, by the females. The only occasion on which men and women seem to have mingled in the dance, was when the Israelites worshipped the golden calf. In the Oriental dances, in which the women engage by themselves, the lady of highest rank in the company takes the lead, and is followed by her companions, who imitate her steps, and if she sings, make up the chorus. The tunes are extremely gay and lively, yet with something in them wonderfully soft. The steps are varied according to the pleasure of her who leads the dance, but always in exact time. This statement may enable us to form a correct idea of the dance which the women of Israel performed, under the direction of Miriam, on the banks of the Red Sea. The prophetess, we are told, "took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her, with timbrels and dances." She led the dance, while they imitated her steps, which were not conducted according to a set, well-known form, as in this country, but extemporaneously. The conjecture of Mr Harmer is extremely probable, that David did not dance alone before the Lord, when he brought up the ark, but, as being the highest in rank, and more skilful than any of the people, he led the religious dance of the men.

In later periods of the Jewish history professional dancers were engaged on festive occasions, for the entertainment of the guests. At these times the dances were a kind of pantomime, intended to exhibit by gesture some connected story. On one festive occasion, however, in the New Testament, we find a lady of rank agreeing to dance in the presence of Herod and his assembled court. The high estimation in which the performances of Salome were held may be seen from Herod's promise to give her whatever she might ask. Similar instances of munificent presents, conferred upon favourite dancers, are often to be found in the courts of Asiatic princes even at the present day.

DANIEL, a prophet raised up by God during the captivity of the Jews in Chaldea. At an early age he was carried prisoner to Babylon, B.C. 606, where he soon became eminent for wisdom and piety. Ezekiel classes him with Noah and Job, as one of those whose prayers were most effectual. The Jews suppose him to have been of royal birth. At the court of Babylon he was soon raised to offices of trust and honour, and even became first minister to the king. In this exalted situation, surrounded with idolaters, he firmly maintained the religion of his fathers, and thus exposed himself to the wrath of the Babylonian monarch. By the special protection of God he was preserved from all danger, and by the special illumination of heaven he was enabled to interpret the prophetic dream of Nebuchadnezzar. Daniel survived the captivity; but being very far advanced in life, it is supposed that he never returned to his native land, but died in Susa in the third year of the reign of Cyrus, B.C. 534. The Book of Daniel consists partly of history and partly of prophecy. From the clearness with which he predicts the time of the Messiah's coming, the Jews dislike strongly the writings of this prophet. Josephus, however, speaks of him as one of the most eminent of the ancient prophets. The last six chapters of his book contain a series of prophecies relating to the great monarchies of the world, the time of the coming and death of the Messiah, the restoration of the Jews, and the conversion of the Gentiles. A portion of the book is written in Chaldee, from the fourth verse of the second chapter to the end of the seventh chapter. It is remarkable, that the prophecies which relate to the successive monarchies are so clear, that Porphyry the sceptic alleges that they must have been written after the events, and could not have been composed by Daniel, but must have been written by some person who lived in Judaea about the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. The genuineness and authenticity of this book have never been doubted by the Jewish Church and our blessed Lord quotes from it, styling the writer "Daniel the prophet."

DARIUS. This name was applied to several Persian kings, three of whom are mentioned in Old Testament history. I. Darius the Mede, spoken of in Dan. v. 31; ix. 1; xi. 1. The name which he bears in profane history is Cyaxares II. He was brother to Mandane, mother of Cyrus, and son of Astyages, king of the Medes. He is called by the Septuagint Artaxerxes, and by Xenophon, Cyaxares. This Darius succeeded Belshazzar, king of Babylon. II. Darius, the son of Hystaspes, supposed by Cal-met to be the Ahasuerus of Scripture (whom see.) He followed out the decree of Cyrus in reference to the building of the second temple, and ordered that it should be carried forward at the royal expense. The edifice was accordingly erected without further obstruction, and finished in the sixth year of Darius. This prince also recovered Babylon after a tedious blockade of nineteen months, and throwing down two hundred cubits from the height of the wall, and carrying away the one hundred brazen gates of the city, he fulfilled the express prediction of Jeremiah li. 58: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken, and her high gates shall be burned with fire; and the people shall labour in vain, and the folk in the fire, and they shall be weary." III. Darius Codomannus, a prince of the royal family of Persia, but very remote from the crown. When governor of Armenia, he was raised to the throne by Bagoas the Eunuch, who had murdered Ochus, and his youngest son Arsēs. Darius did not long enjoy his royal dignity, when his life also was endangered by the plots of Bagoas; but having discovered the design of the traitor, he compelled him to swallow the poison which he had prepared for himself. Scarcely had he secured himself upon the throne when Alexander the Great invaded Persia, and defeated Darius in three successive battles. After the third battle, Darius fled towards Media in the hope of raising another army. He was seized, however, by Bessus, governor of Bactria, and Nabazanes, and carried towards Bactria. The traitors being pursued by Alexander, put Darius to death. When the conqueror came up and beheld the dead body of the Persian monarch, he wept, and throwing his own cloak over the mangled corpse, sent the body to his wife Sysigambis, that it might be buried in the tombs of the kings of Persia. Thus were fulfilled the predictions of Daniel in his eighth chapter.

DARTS. Missiles of this kind are sometimes mentioned in the Sacred Writings; but the most remarkable of them are those styled by the Apostle Paul "fiery darts," which are also alluded to in various profane writers among the ancients. They seem to have been small slender spicula of cane, made use of to set wooden buildings or tents on fire. Thucydides says, that the Plateans covered their wooden wall with raw hides, to defend it from the fiery darts of the enemy. Herodotus makes mention of a yet earlier use of them by the Persians against the wooden walls of the Areopagus, at Athens. Now, shields among the ancients were usually coated over with brass or other metal, for the purpose of extinguishing these burning darts. The Psalmist alludes to these weapons when he says: "He ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors;" or, as the words may be literally rendered, "He maketh his arrows burning." The arrows of this kind were covered over with pitch and other combustibles, and set on fire, when they were launched in a burning state against the enemy.

DATE, the fruit of the palm tree. See PALM.

DATHAN, one of the leaders mentioned in Numb. xvi., who, along with Korah and Abiram, conspired against Moses, and were swallowed up by an earthquake.

DAUGHTER, sometimes used for female offspring, and at other times for more remote descendants.

DAVID, the second king of Israel. He was the youngest son of Jesse, sprung from the tribe of Judah, and a native of Bethlehem. From him descended the Messiah, who was declared to be the son of David. After the rejection of Saul, the Lord commissioned Samuel the prophet to anoint David, who was then a young man, tending his father's flocks in the capacity of a shepherd. Though thus privately anointed, some time elapsed before, in the course of Providence, David openly ascended the throne. He signalled himself, meanwhile, as a soldier, particularly by putting to death Goliath, the champion of the Philistines. From this time Saul became jealous of the young warrior, and sought his destruction. Providence, however, mercifully preserved his life; and at the death of Saul, B.C. 1056, he succeeded to the throne. Seven years and six months he reigned in Hebron over the tribe of Judah only; but in the eighth year of his reign, at the invitation of the eleven tribes, he assumed the general government of the kingdom. His reign was characterised by many successful wars, by means of which the ancient prophecies were fulfilled, that the land of Israel should extend from Euphrates to the sea. After having reigned forty years and six months, David, a few months before his death, surrendered his government into the hands of Solomon, his son. A full account of the history of David is to be found in the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles. As a man, he was distinguished for his piety and devotional feeling, as exemplified in the Psalms; and though his character was marked by many blemishes, and even sins, yet so powerfully did the grace of God work in him, that he is termed "a man after God's own heart." As a warrior, his valour and martial courage entitle him to be ranked among the most eminent of ancient heroes. As a poet, he holds so high a place, that his psalms have never been equalled, far less excelled. As a king, such was the wisdom, and the firmness, and the success of his government, that instead of a weak and distracted kingdom, such as he had received at his accession, he left behind him a powerful, a prosperous, a compact, and united state.

DAY. The day is distinguished into natural, astronomical, civil, and artificial; and there is another distinction, which may be termed prophetic, the prophets being the only persons who call years days—of which there is an example in the explanation given of Daniel's seventy weeks. The natural day is one revolution of the earth round its own axis. The astronomical day is one revolution of the equator, added to that portion of it through which the sun has passed in one natural day. The civil day is that the beginning and end of which are determined by the custom of any nation. The Hebrews began their day in the evening (Lev. xxiii. 32); the Babylonians from sun-rising. The artificial day is the time of the sun's continuance above the horizon, which is unequal according to different seasons, on account of the obliquity of the sphere. The sacred writers generally divide the day and night into twelve hours. The sixth hour is always noon throughout the year, and the twelfth hour is the last hour of the day. But in summer, the twelfth hour, as all the others were, was longer than in winter. See HOURS.

A day is often used, both in sacred and profane writers, for an indeterminate portion of time. "The day of temptation in the wilderness" was forty years. "The day of the Lord," in the Old Testament, generally signifies a day of calamity and distress; but, in the New Testament, it denotes the day of judgment.

DAY OF ATONEMENT. See ATONEMENT, THE DAY OF.

DAYS MAN, an umpire or arbitrator, referred to in Job ix. 33: "Neither is there any daysman betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both." The Patriarch Job having been a native of Arabia, the following passage from Herodotus, describing a custom formerly prevailing among the Arabians, throws light upon the allusion now quoted:—"When they made a covenant or agreement with each other, it was customary for a third person to stand in the middle between them both, who, with a sharp stone, made a slight incision in the inside of the hands of the contracting parties, near the larger fingers. This done, he took a piece out of each of their garments, and anointed, with their blood, seven stones that were also placed between them, putting up, during this operation, some ejaculatory prayers to Heaven; and when the whole ceremony was finished, this individual accompanied his friends to a neighbour or citizen of public character, whom he apprized of the contract, which was then considered final and obligatory."

DAY-SPRING. The dawn of the morning—break of day—is rendered in Job xxxviii. 12, "day-spring." This portion of time was, at a later period, in imitation of the Persians, divided into two parts, the first of which began when the eastern, the second when the western portion of the horizon was illuminated. The rising of the Sun of Righteousness, the appearance of the Messiah, is termed in Luke i. 78, the "day-spring."

DEACON. The original word means, generally speaking, a servant, a minister. In the Acts of the Apostles (vi. 1-6), however, we find a set of ecclesiastical officers bearing this name, expressly appointed in the Christian Church. To convey to our readers a clear and distinct account of the true nature and design of the office of deacon, we cannot do better than quote the following remarks from a treatise by the Rev. Dr Lorimer on the "Deaconship:"—"The Church of Rome and the Church of England have considered the deaconship as an order—the first and the lowest in the priesthood; and some Congregationalists have considered it as synonymous with presbyter; and, therefore, so far spiritual in its nature. But there is no foundation for either idea. The office solely regards what may be termed the ecclesiastico-secular interests of the Christian Church. It is expressly distinguished from the spiritual, properly so called; and was originally instituted to set the spiritual free from secular occupation. There may be diversity of opinion about some offices in the Christian Church—such as that of the ruling elder—though even as to that, Presbyterians may wonder that other Christians can have any hesitation; but there is no scope for difference of judgment in regard to the deacon. The fact that there is any such difference is a striking illustration of the power of party and interested prejudice. It is not unnatural to suppose that, as Christianity, though spiritual in itself, deals with men still in the body, and affects, while it is so far dependent for its propagation upon, temporal interests, there should be some office in connection with it to take charge of its secular concerns; and this, accordingly, is precisely the design of the office of deacon. There would have been an obvious defect—at least an unnecessary, and, it may be, injurious blending of the secular and the sacred—had there been no such office.

"Though the original institution rose out of a particular emergency—a murmuring as to the provision made for the Hellenist as distinguished from the Hebrew widows at Jerusalem, yet it is plain, though this case had not occurred, there would have been others which would soon have rendered such an appointment indispensable. The progress of Christianity would have demanded it. It was more accordant, however, with the free and unsystematic character of the early Christian Church, to create the office when it was plainly needed, than to set out with an original formal platform comprehending it. This also commended the institution the more to the acceptance of the humble followers of the cross.

"The original institution, I have said, was designed to meet the case of a particular class of widows; but the office was not created to meet this or all classes of widows exclusively, or even of the whole Christian poor alone. It contemplated a wider sphere—even the separation of the spiritual office of the apostleship and ministry from all unnecessary secular occupation. The care of poor widows came first, but there would soon have been the care of the general poor; and even though these might have been otherwise provided for, yet the collection of means for the maintenance of the ministry and places of worship, and to defray the expenses of the administration of ordinances, would have required such an order of office-bearers as the deacon. The principle which governed the appointment was: 'It is not fit, it is not proper or becoming, for the ministers of the gospel to leave the Word of God, and to serve tables:' whether the tables be those of the poor, or for receiving and paying away money for any cause connected with the Christian Church—such as Christian missions—still they involve work more or less secular, which others can attend to, and from which it is most desirable that the ministers of religion should be set free. Besides unnecessary occupation, there is another reason. The Spirit of God foreseeing how mercenary the Christian Church would one day become, and how injurious this would prove to its character, manifested a remarkable delicacy in regard to all money matters in connection with the ministry. Hence, under his teaching, the care of the apostles to avoid everything which savoured of the mercenary, or exposed to its temptations and imputations. Doubtless it was from this cause that Paul would receive no provision from some of the Churches among which he laboured, and preferred to earn his bread by tent-making—probably working at this employment over night, after preaching during the day—rather than be indebted to those who would misapprehend his standing upon his undoubted rights as a minister. It was doubtless for the same reason that, in sending the contributions of the Church of Corinth to the poor saints in Judea, the apostle would not go alone, nor take charge of the collection himself; but stated to the Corinthians, 'When I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality to Jerusalem: and if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.' 1 Cor. xvi. 3, 4. Here was delicacy, one would say almost to excess; but the apostle acted upon it to the full. Accordingly Titus, the evangelist, was sent with the collection, or rather he offered his services on the occasion. And Paul adds: 'And we have sent with him the brother whose praise is in the gospel through all the Churches; and not only so, but who was also chosen of the Churches to travel with us with this gift, which is mi- nistered by us to the glory of the same Lord.' And then Paul adds, showing the source of his extreme caution: 'Avoiding this, that no man should blame us in this abundance, which is ministered by us; providing for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men.' 2 Cor. viii. 18-21. We cannot doubt that it was from the same fine delicacy—the gift of the Spirit—that while the bishop or minister of each congregation was one, the deacons were numerous; at least were more than one. In the Church at Jerusalem, even at the outset, there were seven. The duties of deacons being often private, almost confidential, hid from general publicity, it was the more necessary that the trust should not be committed to a single individual. It was chiefly by having a board or court of officers that the Church could have confidence that the funds would be properly applied.

"As the office of deacon was restricted to the temporal interests of the Church, so it was permanent in its nature. It was designed to form a part of the constitution of the Church in all countries and in all ages. Some of the offices, such as those of apostle, evangelist, prophet, &c., were obviously extraordinary—intended to last, like the miraculous spiritual gifts, but for a season, till the Church was brought into a condition to sustain itself, with God's blessing on the use of outward and ordinary means. But it was otherwise with the office of deacon. Designed as it was to separate what was secular from what was spiritual, and to relieve the spiritual from whatever was suspicious, as well as provide for the poor, it is manifest that this was equally essential in all times and places. If the office of deacon was a good thing at Jerusalem in the first century, it must, on the same ground, be not less important in Scotland in the nineteenth century. Indeed, the reasons which prevail now for having such an office, are superior to those which existed in the first age of Christianity. The temptations to secularity, in connection with the management of the affairs of the Church have increased, while the high spiritual tone of the infancy of the gospel has declined. What a rebuke does this anxiety of the apostles to be relieved from even the care of widows, administer to those of their professed successors who leave the Word of God, and unnecessarily and systematically involve themselves in matters tenfold more secular! If the management of the provision for widows is to be abandoned to a separate and secular officer—a provision which, in some respects, may be called religious—what would they have thought of the almost entire occupation of their time with the mere government of the Church, apart from the grand objects of a Church; or the conduct of the civil affairs of the State; or the cultivation of a taste for the classics of ancient heathenism? Assuredly no apostle could look upon such a state of things with approbation. It appears, then, that the office of deacon in the Christian Church is a permanent one, and that it is intended so to draw off and exhaust the secular, in its different forms, as to leave the other offices—those of the pastor and ruling elder—free to their appropriate spiritual duties. The same reasons which call for the abandonment of a part of the secular, call for the abandonment of the whole; and the same reasons which demand the separation between the secular and directly religious in the first age, demand it with enlarged force in the artificial and mercenary age in which we live. So much for the nature of the office." The importance of such an office cannot fail to commend itself to every thinking mind; and the more that the cause of missions, the temporal provision for the support of the ministry, and the clamant demands of the poor, call for the attention of the Christian Church, so much the more indispensable does the office of deacon become.

DEACONESS, a female deacon. It is generally allowed that, in the primitive Church, there were deaconesses; that is, pious women, whose particular business it was to assist in the entertainment and care of the itinerant preachers, visit the sick and imprisoned, instruct female catechumens, and assist at their baptism, then more particularly necessary, from the peculiar customs of Eastern countries, the persecuted state of the Church, and the speedier spreading of the gospel. Such an one, it is reasonable to think, Phebe was (Rom. xvi. 1), who is expressly called a deaconess, or stated servant, as Doddridge renders it. They were usually widows, and, to prevent scandal, generally in years. 1 Tim. v. 9. The "Apostolic Constitutions," as they are called, mention the ordination of a deaconess, and the form of prayer used on that occasion. Lib. viii., cap. 19, 20. Pliny also, in his celebrated Epistle to Trajan, is thought to refer to them: when speaking of two female Christians whom he put to the torture, he says, "Who were called deaconesses." But as the primitive Christians seem to have been led to this practice from the peculiarity of their circumstances, and the Scripture is entirely silent as to any appointment to this supposed office, or any rules about it, it has fallen into disuse, at least as an office. "Probably," says Dr Lorimer, speaking of the office of deaconess, "it was intended to meet the peculiar circumstances of some Gentile Church, in which, as in the East generally, strong jealousies prevailed in connection with the female sex. It is well known how anxious the heathen were to disparage the claims of Christianity, by misrepresenting the character of its professors. The discharge of the duty of a deacon, in giving money to poor females, might, in such circumstances, be open to misrepresentation; and hence the wisdom and delicacy of appointing females to minister to their relief."

DEAD. (See EMBALMING—BURIAL—MOURNING.) Let the dead bury their dead; let men dead in sin bury those naturally dead; or, let the dead lie unburied, rather than the preaching of the gospel be hindered. Dead faith is that persuasion of divine truth which flows not from spiritual life, and is not productive of good works. James ii. 17-20. Dead works are those that flow not from a principle of true holiness, but from corrupt nature, which is in a state of moral death. Heb. ix. 14. To be dead to the law as a covenant, is to be delivered from the obligations of it, and from a reigning inclination to be under it (Rom. vii. 4); and it is dead to us, when it, through Christ, can exercise no condemning power over our conscience. Gal. ii. 19. Sin is dead relatively, when it lies undiscovered and unregarded in the soul (Rom. vii. 8); it is dead really, when it is mortified and slain by the Word, Spirit, and blood of Christ. Rom. vi. 6. To die to sin, or be dead to it, is to be freed from the dominion of it, and the curse due to it, by the blood of Christ, and to be by his grace drawn from the love and service of it. Rom. vi. 7. The saints are dead both to the law and to sin. Col. iii. 3.

DEAD SEA. This was anciently called the Sea of the Plain (Deut. iii. 17, iv. 49), from its situation in the great hollow or plain of the Jordan; the Salt Sea (Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xv. 5), from the extreme saltiness of its waters; and the East Sea (Ezek. xlvii. 18; Joel ii. 20), from its situation relative to Judea, and in contradistinction to the West Sea, or Mediterranean. By the Greek and Roman writers it was called the "Lake Asphaltites." Among the Arabs it is known as the "Bahr Loot," the Sea of Lot; but the name Dead Sea, is as old as the days of Galen. Dr Robinson estimates the length of the sea to be thirty-nine geographical miles, and its breadth about nine or ten such miles. In his learned work, 'Lands of the Bible,' Dr Wilson thus describes his visit to this sea:—"Unlike the superstitious pilgrims who dislike to bathe in the Sea of Death, lest they should neutralize the effects of their purification in the Jordan, we stripped and plunged ourselves into its waters as soon as we reached them. We found them quite as buoyant as universal accounts led us to expect; and even one of the Messrs Vaudrey, who had not ventured before to make the experiment of swimming, found himself able to float upon them like a block of wood. Most of us made an inadvertent potation, as well as a philosophical tasting of the waters; and salt and acrid indeed we found them to be." Dr Wilson says that on coming out of the sea, their bodies appeared as if they had been bathing in oil, and their skin had a leathery thickness when dried.

The water of the Dead Sea now occupies what was formerly the Vale of Siddim; a rich and fruitful valley, in which stood the five cities, called the Cities of the Plain, namely, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Bela or Zoar: the four first of which were destroyed, while the latter, being "a little city," was preserved at the intercession of Lot; to which he fled for refuge from the impending catastrophe, and where he remained in safety during its accomplishment.

Large masses of bitumen or pitchy matter float about in the lake, and when driven on shore by the winds, they are collected by the natives. Josephus tells us that the Dead Sea "casts up black clods of bitumen." Lavoisier analysed its water, and found that 100 lbs. contain 45 lbs. 6 oz. of salt. The water is perfectly transparent, and so heavy that persons who never learned to swim will float on its surface. Some writers suppose the Dead Sea to be the crater of a volcano. But this opinion is entirely unfounded. One of the most remarkable circumstances connected with this lake is, that although receiving the waters of the Jordan at the daily rate, according to Dr Shaw, of more than six million tuns, besides those of various other streams, it has no outlet, and yet has never been known to overflow. It was long supposed that there must be some subterraneous passage by which it communicates, either with the Mediterranean or the Red Sea; but it is now fully established, that this phenomenon is accounted for by the immense evaporation arising from it, which was seen, as Captains Irby and Mangles inform us, "in broad transparent columns of vapour, not unlike water-spouts in appearance, but much larger."

DEAL—1. To act, to behave. Jesus deals prudently in the work of our redemption, always employing the most proper means to gain the most noble end. Isa. lii. 13. 2. To distribute by parts (Isa. lviii. 7; Rom. xii. 3); and a DEAL signifies a part. Exod. xxix. 40; Numb. xv. 4-9. God deals bountifully and in mercy, when he graciously bestows his favours on men worthless and miserable. Psal. cxvi. 7, cxix. 7, 124, cxlii. 7. He deals bitterly and in fury, when he sorely afflicts and punishes men. Ruth i. 21; Ezek. viii. 18, xvi. 59, xxii. 14.

DEAR, precious, eminently beloved. Jer. xxxi. 20; Col. i. 13. Dearly beloved; loved in the most tender manner, and highest degree. Rom. xii. 19. The Jewish nation were the dearly beloved of God's soul. He had taken great delight to do them good, and brought them into covenant with him as his peculiar people. Jer. xii. 7.

DEATH is generally defined to be the separation of the soul from the body. It is styled, in Scripture language, a departure out of this world to another (2 Tim. iv. 6); a dissolving of the earthly house of this tabernacle (2 Cor. v. 1); a going the way of all the earth (Josh. xxiii. 14); a returning to the dust (Eccl. xii. 7); a sleep. John xi. 11, 13. Death may be considered as the effect of sin (Rom. v. 12); yet, as our existence is from God, no man has a right to take away his own life, or the life of another. Gen. ix. 6. Satan is said to have the power of death (Heb. ii. 14); not that he can at his pleasure inflict death on mankind, but as he was the instrument of first bringing death into the world (John viii. 44); and as he may be the executioner of God's wrath on impenitent sinners, when God permits him. Death is but once (Heb. ix. 27); certain (Job xiv. 1, 2); powerful and terrific, called the king of terrors (Job xviii. 14); uncertain as to the time (Prov. xxvii. 1); universal (Gen. v. 1-31); necessary, that God's justice may be displayed, and his mercy manifested; desirable to the righteous. Luke ii. 28-30. The fear of death is a source of uneasiness to the generality, and to a guilty conscience it may indeed be terrible; but to a good man it should be obviated by the consideration that death is the termination of every trouble; that it puts him beyond the reach of sin and temptation; that God has promised to be with the righteous, even to the end (Heb. xiii. 5); that Jesus Christ has taken away the sting (1 Cor. xv. 54-57); and that it introduces him to a state of endless felicity. 2 Cor. v. 8. Death, however, is not applied only to the dissolution of the body, but we find a spiritual death spoken of, when it is said that we are "dead in trespasses and sins." The term "second death" (Rev. ii. 11), denotes eternal punishment.

DEBATE, to dispute. A man ought to debate his cause with his neighbour; he ought privately and meekly to reason the point of difference between them. Prov. xxv. 9. God debates in measure with his people, when he reproves and corrects them, as they are able to bear it. Isa. xxvii. 8. DEBATE signifies contention, especially in words. Rom. i. 29.

DEBIR, a city situated in the tribe of Judah, about ten miles west of Hebron. We find it mentioned in Josh. xv. 15 by the name of Kirjath-sepher; and in verse 49 it is called Kirjath-sannah. From the circumstances that the word Debir signifies a "word" or "oracle," and Kirjath-sepher signifies "the city of a book," some commentators have supposed that this city was a seat of learning, or a repository of the records of the ancient inhabitants. Mr Taylor, the editor of Calmet, thinks that it must have been a university for the training of priests. At all events, it seems to have been an ancient city. Joshua took it, and slew its king. Josh. xii. 13. It fell by lot to Caleb; and Othniel first entering the place, Caleb gave him his daughter Achsah (Josh. xv. 16). It subsequently belonged to the Levites. Josh. xxi. 15; 1 Chron. vi. 58.

There were two other cities of this name; one belonging to Gad, beyond Jordan (Josh. xiii. 26), the other to Benjamin, though originally to Judah. Josh. xv. 7.

DEBLATHAIM, or BETH-DIBLATHAIM, a town situated in the country of the Moabites on the east of the river Jordan. The ruin of this city was predicted by the prophet Jeremiah in chap. xlviii. 22.

DEBORAH, a prophetess, wife of Lapidoth, judged the Israelites, and dwelt under a palm tree between Ramah and Bethel. Judg. iv. 4, 5. She sent for Barak, directed him to attack Sisera, and, in the name of God, promised him victory; but Barak refusing to go, unless she went with him, she told him that the honour of this expedition would be given to a woman, and not to him. After the victory, Deborah and Barak sung a fine thanksgiving song, the composition, probably, of Deborah alone, which is preserved. Judg. v. This was the name, also, of the nurse of Rebekah, who attended her into Canaan. She continued to reside in the family of Isaac until her death, which occurred in the vicinity of Bethel, where she was buried, with much lamentation, under an oak, which was called, from that circumstance, "Allon Bachuth," or the oak of weeping.

DEBTORS. As an explanation of the peculiar regulations of the Jewish law in regard to debtors, we may quote the following remarks of Mr Horne, in his 'Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures.'

"The Mosaic laws respecting debtors were widely different from those which obtain in European countries: the mode of procedure sanctioned by them, though simple, was very efficient. Persons, who had property due to them, might, if they chose, secure it either by means of a mortgage, or by a pledge, or by a bondsman or surety.

"1. The creditor, when about to receive a pledge for a debt, was not allowed to enter the debtor's house and take what he pleased; but was to wait before the door, till the debtor should deliver up that pledge with which he could most easily dispense. Deut. xxiv. 10, 11. Compare Job xxii. 6; xxiv. 3, 7-9.

"2. When a mill or mill-stone, or an upper garment, was given as a pledge, it was not to be kept all night. These articles appear to be specified as examples for all other things with which the debtor could not dispense without great inconvenience. Exod. xxii. 26, 27; Dent. xxiv. 6, 12.

"3. The debt which remained unpaid until the seventh or sabbatic year (during which the soil was to be left without cultivation, and consequently a person was not supposed to be in a condition to make payments), could not be exacted during that period. Deut. xv. 1-11. But, at other times, in case the debt was not paid, the creditor might seize, first, the hereditary land of the debtor, and enjoy its produce until the debt was paid, or at least until the year of jubilee; or, secondly, his houses. These might be sold in perpetuity, except those belonging to the Levites. Levit. xxv. 14-32. Thirdly, in case the house or land was not sufficient to cancel the debt, or if it so happened that the debtor had none, the person of the debtor might be sold, together with his wife and children, if he had any. This is implied in Lev. xxv. 39; and this custom is alluded to in Job xxiv. 9. It existed in the time of Elisha (2 Kings iv. 1); and on the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, some rich persons exercised this right over their poor debtors. Neh. v. 1-13. Our Lord alludes to the same custom in Matt. xviii. 25. As the person of the debtor might thus be seized and sold, his cattle and furniture were consequently liable for his debts. This is alluded to by Solomon, in Prov. xxii. 27. It does not appear that imprisonment for debt existed in the age of Moses, but it seems to have prevailed in the time of Jesus Christ. Matt. xviii. 34.

"4. If a person had become bondsman, or surety for another, he was liable to be called upon for payment in the same way with the original debtor. But this practice does not appear to have obtained before the time of Solomon. It seems that the formality observed was, for the person who became surety to give his hand to the debtor, and not to the creditor, to intimate that he became, in a legal sense, one with the debtor; for Solomon cautions his son against giving his hand to a stranger, to a person whose circumstances he did not know: and entreats him to go and urge the person to whom he had given his hand, or for whom he had become surety, to pay his own debt: so that it must have been to the debtor that the hand was given. See Prov. xi. 15; xvii. 18; and xxii. 26."

DECALOGUE. See LAW.

DECAPOLIS, a district in Palestine, which contained ten principal cities, on both sides of Jordan. Matt. iv. 25; Mark v. 20, vii. 31. According to Pliny, they were—1. Scythopolis; 2. Philadelphia; 3. Raphana; 4. Gadara; 5. Hippos; 6. Dion; 7. Pella; 8. Galasa; 9. Canatha; 10. Damascus. Josephus inserts Otopos, instead of Canatha. Though within the limits of Israel, the Decapolis was probably inhabited by foreigners; and hence it retained a foreign appellation. This may also contribute to account for the numerous herds of swine kept in the district (Matt. viii. 30), a practice which was forbidden by the Mosaic law.

DECEIT consists in passing anything upon a person for what it is not; as when falsehood is made to pass for truth. See HYPOCRISY.

DECEITFUL. Our hearts and their lusts are deceitful above all things; they, in unnumbered ways, beguile multitudes out of their present and eternal happiness for mere trifles, and render them persuaded of the innocence or goodness of things the most abominable and wicked; fill them with views of God, of Christ, of time, and eternity, of themselves the most contrary to truth. Jer. xvii. 9; Heb. iii. 13; Eph. iv. 22. Men handle the Word of God deceitfully, when they wrest it to please the corrupt humours of themselves or others; when they mingle it with their own inventions, and use it to promote or protract passion, pride, covetousness, &c. 2 Cor. iv. 2, ii. 17.

The Lord deceives false prophets, when he gives them up to the delusions of their own hearts, and frustrates their expectations and predictions. Ezek. xiv. 9. "Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived; thou hast, contrary to my inclinations, persuaded me to undertake this office of prophesying, and hast disappointed me of the success and comfort I expected in it. Jer. xx. 7. Heretics "deceive and are deceived"; they are persuaded of the goodness or innocence of error and wickedness, and endeavour to persuade others of it. 2 Tim. iii. 13.

DECISION, VALLEY OF, a name applied to the Valley of Jehoshaphat. See JEHOSEPHAT, VALLEY OF.

DECLAMATION OF THE PULPIT. See ORATORY—PULPIT—ELOQUENCE.

DECREES OF COUNCILS are the laws made by them to regulate the doctrine and policy of the Church. Thus the acts of the Christian council at Jerusalem are called decrees. Acts xvi. 4.

DECREES OF GOD, a phrase used in theological writings to express the comprehensive and glorious designs of divine wisdom in the creation and government of the universe. They are defined to be his settled purposes, whereby he fore-ordains to perform, permit or suffer, whatsoever comes to pass. Dan. iv. 24; Acts xv. 18; Eph. i. 11. This doctrine has been the subject of one of the most perplexing controversies that has occurred among mankind, owing chiefly to misapprehension of its real nature and consequences. It is not, as some seem to think, a novel doctrine. The opinion, that whatever occurs in the world at large, or in the lot of private individuals, is the result of a previous and unalterable arrangement by that Supreme Power which presides over nature, has always been held, not only by many of the vulgar, but by the vast majority of cultivated and philosophic minds. Traces of it in a crude form are found in the philosophy of all nations, who have attained any just notions of the Deity. It is, in fact, but a fuller development of the admitted doctrine of divine providence. The ancient stoics, Zeno and Chrysippus, whom the Jewish Essenes seem to have followed, asserted the existence of a Deity, who, acting wisely, but, as they supposed, necessarily, contrived the general system of the world; from which, by a series of causes, whatever is now done in it unavoidably results. Mohammed introduced into his Koran the doctrine of an absolute predestination of the course of human affairs. He represented life and death, prosperity and adversity, and every event that befalls a man in this world, as the unavoidable result of a previous determination of the one God, who rules over all. Augustine, and the whole of the chief reformers, but especially Calvin, favoured this doctrine in a better digested form, embracing, not excluding, human responsibility and the use of means. In this form it was generally asserted, and publicly owned, in most of the Confessions of Faith of the Reformed Churches; and to this we may add, that it has been maintained by the chief orthodox divines in the last two centuries.

As to the nature of these decrees, it must be observed that they are real designs; not, indeed, the result of deliberation, or the Almighty's debating matters within himself, reasoning in his own mind about the expediency or in expediency of things, as creatures do; nor are they merely contingent and fluctuating ideas of things future, but settled determinations, founded on his comprehensive views and sovereign pleasure. Isa. xl. 14. 1. They are to be considered as eternal. This is evident; for if God be eternal, his purposes must be of equal duration with himself. To suppose otherwise, would be to suppose that there was a time when he was undetermined and mutable; whereas no new determinations or after-thoughts can arise in his mind. Job xxiii. 13, 14. 2. They are free, without any compulsion, and not excited by any motive out of himself. Rom. ix. 15. 3. They are infinitely wise, displaying his glory, and promoting the general good. Rom. xi. 33. 4. They are immutable, for this is the result of his being infinitely perfect; for if there were the least change in God's understanding, it would be an instance of imperfection. Mal. iii. 6. 5. They are universal, relating to all creatures and things in heaven, earth, and hell. Eph. i. 11; Prov. xvi. 4. 6. They are secret, or, at least, only so far known as God is pleased to discover them. It is, therefore, presumption for any to attempt to enter into or judge of his secret purpose, or to decide upon what he has not revealed. Dent. xxix. 29. Nor is an unknown or supposed decree of God at any time to be the rule of our conduct. His revealed will alone must be considered as the rule by which we are to judge of the event of things, as well as of our conduct at large. Rom. xi. 34. 7. Lastly, they are effectual; for whether they relate to things simply suffered, or things executed by himself, as he is infinitely wise to plan, so he is infinitely powerful to perform. His counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure. Isa. xlv. 10.

"This subject," says Dr Brewster, speaking of the divine decrees, "is, doubtless, attended with many deep thoughts, and things hard to be understood, or rather incapable of being understood, by our finite faculties. This, however, is no reason for doubting or disputing the doctrine itself. It would be a strange supposition, that we may be able to comprehend the depths of the divine counsels and operations—that any thing finite can contain what is infinite; more absurd than to imagine that we may hold the waters of the ocean in the hollow of our hand. These deep things of God it is not necessary for us to comprehend, and we are not required to comprehend them; but, nevertheless, they are things which both reason and Scripture plainly teach us to believe concerning God, and which convey much precious instruction to all who receive them as the truth of God with the humility of faith. The decrees of God, indeed, are neither the rule of our conduct nor the cause of our actions. 'The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but the things which are revealed belong to us.' He hath plainly made known to us the way of our duty and happiness, and left us free to 'refuse the evil and choose the good.' His foreknowledge of what we will do—of what we will refuse, and of what we will choose—does not force us in either case, and we ourselves are conscious of our acting without constraint. He presents motives to persuade us, and points out means to be employed by us; and, while he knows assuredly whether we will follow his counsel or reject it against ourselves, whether we will use the means in our power or neglect them, we ourselves are, all the while, acting from our own choice, and are answerable for all that we do.

"These two truths, namely, that God knoweth certainly, yet that we act freely, we may not be able to reconcile together, and to see their consistency the one with the other; but yet both are so clearly demonstrated by reason and Scripture, that it is impossible to question them, or really to shake off the belief of them; and we may easily believe that they are quite compatible with each other, though we yet know not how they are so. 'The two adverse propositions,' says an ingenious writer, 'must both be admitted as positively true, though our reason is insufficient to reconcile them together. The point where they meet and are reconciled is alone hidden from us. Except in this particular, the double proof of the respective truth of each is complete. The two truths seem to be two great chains of human destiny, the extreme ends of which descend to earth, while their summits reach to heaven, and the link that unites them is covered by the upholding hand of God.'" See NECESSITY—PREDESTINATION.

DEDAN, or DADAN, the son of Raamah, mentioned Gen. x. 7. Josephus, adverting to this text, instead of Dedan, reads Judah, and says, that this Judah was the father of certain Jews inhabiting the western part of Ethiopia. It is not fully agreed among the learned whether Dedan and Dedanim, names often mentioned by the prophets (see Isa. xxi. 13; Jer. xxv. 23, xlix. 8; Ezek. xxv. 13, xxvii. 15, 20, xxxviii. 13), are the same with Dodanim, a person spoken of (Gen. x. 4) among the descendants of Japheth; or whether he is the same with Dedan mentioned (ver. 7) among the descendants of Ham; or whether he is not rather a descendant of Dedan, the son of Jokshan, and grandson of Abraham by Keturah. Gen. xxv. 3. Ezekiel speaks of the Dedanites as trading with the Tyrians in ivory, ebony, and fine cloths for chariots; and as he classes them with the people of Sheba, Eden, Asshur, and Chilmad, it is concluded that they must have dwelt in Mesopotamia or Syria; and it is said there exists at this day a city which goes by the name of Dedan, situated in Arabia Felix, on the west of the Persian Gulf.

DEDICATION, a religious ceremony, whereby any person or thing is solemnly consecrated or set apart to the service of God and the purposes of religion. There is a feast mentioned in John x. 22, called the Feast of Dedication, which was instituted by Judas Maccabæus, as a grateful memorial of the cleansing of the second temple and altar, after they had been profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes. It commenced on the 25th of the month Chisleu, corresponding with our December, and lasted eight days. It was also called the Feast of Lights, because the Jews illuminated their houses in token of their joy and gladness. The time was spent in singing hymns and offering sacrifices, as indications of the return of peace and happiness. The modern Jews observe this season as a kind of holidays.

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. This title was conferred by Leo X. on King Henry VIII. for writing against Martin Luther; and the bull for it bears date October, 1521. It was afterwards confirmed by Clement VII.; but the Pope, on Henry's suppressing the monasteries, at the time of the Reformation, not only deprived him of his title, but deposed him from his crown also; though, in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, his title was confirmed by Parliament, and has continued to be used by all his successors. Chamberlayne says, the title belonged to the kings of England before that time; and for proof hereof appeals to several charters granted to the University of Oxford; so that Pope Leo's bull was only a renovation of an ancient right.

DEFILEMENT. In this respect there is a marked contrast between the law and the gospel. Under the law of Moses, outward defilement might be contracted both by persons and things; but under the gospel there is nothing which can be considered as imparting ceremonial defilement or uncleanness. The only defilement which the gospel recognises is that of the heart and of the life, the pollution which sin imparts, and which renders us defiled in the sight of a holy and heart-searching God.

DEGENERATE, inferior to its former state. The Jews were turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine, when, leaving the example of their pious ancestors, they gradually became almost as wicked as heathens. Jer. ii. 21. If mankind universally were not degenerate, they would not need regeneration.

DEGRADATION, ECCLESIASTICAL, is the deprivation of a priest of his dignity. We have an instance of it in the eighth century, at Constantinople, in the person of the Patriarch Constantine, who was made to go out of the church backwards, stripped of his pallium, and anathematized. In England, Cranmer was degraded, by order of the bloody Queen Mary. They dressed him in episcopal robes, made only of canvass; put the mitre on his head, and the pastoral staff in his hand, and in this attire showed him to the people, and then stripped him piece by piece.

DEGREES, PSALMS OF, the name or title prefixed in our translation to fifteen of the psalms—that is, from the 120th to the 134th inclusive. Various are the explanations that have been given of this title by the learned. Gesenius thinks it a denomination of a certain rhythm common to these fifteen songs. Junius and Tremellius translate the Hebrew word, “a song of excellences,” or an excellent song, in reference to the subject; as eminent persons are called “men of high degree.” 1 Chron. xvii. 17. Some call them “Psalms of Elevation;” because, say they, they were sung with an exalted voice. But the most probable opinion is, and indeed it corresponds with the literal translation of the Hebrew, that instead of “Psalms of Degrees,” the words should be translated “Odes of Ascensions;” that is, odes which were sung when the Israelites came up to worship in Jerusalem at the annual festivals, or, perhaps, from their state of captivity at Babylon. Their return home on this latter occasion is certainly called “the ascension, or coming up from Babylon.” Ezra vii. 9. And the old Syriac translator, who explains the subject of the Psalms by apposite titles, refers to this circumstance almost all the psalms that bear this inscription; some of them perhaps on insufficient grounds, but many of them certainly have a manifest relation to it. Theodoret indiscriminately explains them all as relating to the Babylonish captivity, and thus illustrates the title: “Odes of the Ascensions.” Theodotion calls them “Songs of the Ascensions;” and Symmachus, “Odes or Songs on the Returns.”

DEHAVITES, the people of Ava; perhaps inhabitants of that part of Assyria which was watered by the River Diaba. See Ezra iv. 9; 2 Kings xvii. 24.

DEISM, a system of belief which is properly limited to the single point of recognising the existence of a Supreme Being, but rejecting revelation and the whole system of Christian doctrine, in so far as it is not identical with the light of nature. It is a species of heathenism, which, somewhat refined in its views, discards idolatry, owns a god of nature and of providence, while it denies the inspiration of the Bible. The term Deism is of recent origin, never having been assumed as the name of a party before the middle of the sixteenth century, when Viret mentions a sect in France and Italy who called themselves Deists. The first deistical writer of any note that appeared in this country was Herbert, Baron of Cherbury, who wrote in the seventeenth century. He lays down these five points as the foundation of his system of Deism:—1. There is one supreme God. 2. That he is chiefly to be worshipped. 3. That piety and virtue are the principal part of his worship. 4. That we must repent of our sins, and if we do so, God will pardon them. 5. That there are rewards for good men and punishments for bad men, both here and hereafter.

Some have divided all Deists into two classes—those who admit a future state, and those who deny it. But Dr S. Clarke, taking the term in the most extensive sense, arranges them under four classes:—1. Those who admit a Supreme Being, but deny that he concerns himself with the conduct or affairs of men. 2. Those who admit not only the being but the providence of God, with respect to the natural world; but who allow no difference between moral good and evil, nor that God takes any notice of our moral conduct. 3. Such as believe in the natural attributes of God, and his all-governing providence, yet deny the immortality of the soul, or any future state. 4. Such as admit the existence of God, his providence, and the obligations of natural religion; but so far only as these things are discoverable by the light of nature, without any divine revelation.

There is a remarkable difference between the state of this country, in reference to Deism, at present, from its state in the last century. Hume, Bolingbroke, and Gibbon, reduced their beliefs to an intellectual system, which was adopted chiefly among the more polished classes of society. But the principles of Deism in the present day are almost solely to be found among the Socialists and Infidels of the lowest classes of society. The practical effects of such a system upon the lives of those who profess their belief in it are of the most melancholy description, leading them to lay aside all ordinary restraints, and to plunge into the most odious and detestable vices. A virtuous Deist is now seldom to be found. The high and holy motives which the gospel presents, being despised and disregarded, the man rapidly sinks in the scale of moral principle. Mere worldly influences are found not to be sufficiently powerful to restrain the workings of unhallowed passions and desires. The laws of society alone prevent him from rushing into the most horrid crimes. He acknowledges that God exists; but with him the belief of the Divine existence is a mere theoretical, inoperative principle, which has no effect upon his outward conduct. He has no fear of God before his eyes, no dread of hell, no desire of heaven. He is like a ship without a rudder, drifted by every wind and wave of worldly policy and low, carnal-minded expediency.

It has been well remarked by the late Mr Hall of Leicester, in reference to Deism, that "it does not seize the mind at once; it advances by the progressive stages of Socinianism and dissipation. Men first lose their relish for what is vital and distinguishing in Christianity, before they dispute its evidences, or renounce its authority. Lax notions of the person of Christ, a forgetfulness of his mediation, place the mind in a Deistical state, and prepare it for the most licentious opinions."

DEITY OF CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST.

DELILAH, a woman who dwelt in the Valley of Sorek, belonging to Dan, near the land of the Philistines. Samson abandoned himself to her, and, as some think, married her. Judg. xvi. 4. The princes of the Philistines, by bribes, prevailed on her to betray Samson. He eluded her first demands; but at length she succeeded, and reduced his strength to weakness, by cutting off his hair. See SAMSON.

DELOS, one of the Cyclades, a number of islands in the Ægean Sea. It was much celebrated, and held in the highest veneration, for its famous temple and oracle of Apollo.

DELUGE, the flood which overflowed and destroyed the earth. This flood forms one of the most considerable epochs in chronology. Its history is given by Moses. Gen. vi.—ix. Its time is fixed by the best chronologers to the year A.M. 1656, answering to the year B.C. 2348. From this flood, the state of the world is divided into diluvian and antediluvian.

Men who have not paid that regard to sacred history which it deserves, have cavilled at the account given of a universal deluge. Their objections principally turn upon three points:—1. The want of any direct history of that event by the profane writers of antiquity. 2. The apparent impossibility of accounting for the quantity of water necessary to overflow the whole earth to such a depth as it is said to have been. And, 3. There appearing no necessity for a universal deluge, as the same end might have been accomplished by a partial one.

To the above objections we oppose the plain declarations of Scripture. God declared to Noah that he was resolved to destroy everything that had breath under heaven, or had life on the earth, by a flood of waters. Such was the threatening—such was the execution. The waters, Moses assures us, covered the whole earth—buried all the mountains; everything perished therein that had life, excepting Noah and those with him in the ark. Can a universal deluge be more clearly expressed? If the deluge had only been partial, there had been no necessity to spend so many years in the building of an ark, and shutting up all sorts of animals therein, in order to restock the world. They had been easily and readily brought from those parts of the world not overflowed into those that were; at least, all the birds never would have been destroyed, as Moses says they were, so long as they had wings to bear them to those parts where the flood did not reach. If the waters had only overflowed the neighbourhood of the Euphrates and the Tigris, they could not rise fifteen cubits above the highest mountains. There was no rising that height, but they must spread themselves, by the law of gravity, over the rest of the earth; unless, perhaps, they had been retained there by a miracle—in that case, Moses, no doubt, would have related the miracle, as he did that of the waters of the Red Sea. It may also be observed, that in the regions far remote from the Euphrates and Tigris—viz., Italy, France, Switzerland, Germany, England, the United States, &c.—there are frequently found, in places many scores of leagues from the sea, and even in the tops of high mountains, whole trees sunk deep under ground, as also teeth and bones of animals, fishes entire, sea-shells, ears of corn, &c., petrified; which the best naturalists are agreed could never have come there but by the deluge. That the Greeks and Western nations had some knowledge of the flood, has never been denied; and the Africans, Chinese, and Americans, have traditions of the deluge. The ingenious Mr Bryant, in his "Mythology," has very clearly proved that the deluge, so far from being unknown to the heathen world at large, is, in reality, conspicuous throughout every one of their acts of religious worship. In India, also, Sir William Jones has discovered, that in the oldest mythological books of that country, there is such an account of the deluge as corresponds sufficiently with that of Moses. See ARK OF NOAH.

Various have been the conjectures of learned men as to the natural causes of the deluge. Some have supposed that a quantity of water was created on purpose, and, at a proper time, annihilated by divine power. Dr Burnet supposes the primitive earth to have been no more than a crust, investing the water contained in the ocean, and in the central abyss which he and others suppose to exist in the bowels of the earth, at the time of the flood; this outward crust broke in a thousand pieces, and sunk down among the water, which thus spouted up in vast cataracts, and overflowed the whole surface. Others, supposing a sufficient fund of water in the sea and abyss, think that the shifting of the earth's centre of gravity drew after it the water out of its channel, and overwhelmed the several parts of the earth successively. Others ascribe it to the shock of a comet; and Mr King supposes it to arise from subterranean fires bursting forth with great violence under the sea. But are not most, if not all these hypotheses quite arbitrary, and without foundation, from the words of Moses? It is, perhaps, in vain to attempt accounting for this event by natural causes, it being altogether miraculous and supernatural, as a punishment to men for the corruption then in the world. Let us be satisfied with the sources which Moses gives us, namely, the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven opened; that is, the waters rushed out from the hidden abyss of the bowels of the earth, and the clouds poured down their rain incessantly. Let it suffice us to know, that all the elements are under God's power; that he can do with them as he pleases, and frequently in ways we are ignorant of, in order to accomplish his own purposes.

The objections once made to the fact of a general deluge have, indeed, been greatly weakened by the progress of philosophical knowledge; and may be regarded as nearly given up, like the former notion of the high antiquity of the race of men, founded on the Chinese and Egyptian chronologies and pretended histories. Philosophy has even at last found out that there is sufficient water in the ocean, if called forth, to overflow the highest mountains to the height given by Moses—a conclusion which it once stoutly denied. Keill formerly computed that twenty-eight oceans would be necessary for that purpose; but we are now informed “that a farther progress in mathematical and physical knowledge has shown the different seas and oceans to contain, at least, forty-eight times more water than they were then supposed to do; and that the mere raising of the temperature of the whole body of the ocean to a degree no greater than marine animals live in, in the shallow seas between the tropics, would so expand it as more than to produce the height above the mountains stated in the Mosaic account.” As to the deluge of Noah, therefore, Infidelity has almost entirely lost the aid of philosophy in framing objections to it.

DELUSIONS, errors and influences of Satan, calculated to deceive men. God chooses men's delusions, and sends them strong delusions, when, in his righteous judgment and infinite wisdom, he permits Satan, their own lusts, and false teachers, effectually to seduce them; and gives them up to the very errors and abominations which they relish. Isa. lxvi. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 11.

DEMAS, a Thessalonian mentioned by Paul (2 Tim. iv. 10), who was at first a most zealous disciple of the apostle, and very serviceable to him at Rome during his imprisonment, but afterwards (about A.D. 65) forsook him, having loved this present evil world.

DEMETRIUS, a goldsmith of Ephesus, who made niches, or little chapels, or portable models of the famous temple for Diana of Ephesus, which he sold to foreigners. Acts xix. 24. A person of this name mentioned by John as an eminent Christian (3 John 12), is by some believed to be Demetrius the goldsmith, who had renounced heathenism to embrace Christianity; but this wants proof.

DEMONS, a name applied by the ancients to certain spirits, which they supposed to appear to men either for good or evil. Sometimes, as in the case of Socrates, individuals were supposed to be habitually attended by their own demons, who, as guardian angels, ministered to their advantage. It has been generally thought that by demons, in New Testament language, we are to understand devils, who were permitted, in the mysterious providence of God, to exert an unseen but powerful influence over the souls and even bodies of men. By the Christian fathers, the word demons is used in the same sense as by the heathen philosophers, especially the later Platonists. Mr Farmer, in his “Essay on Demoniacs,” attempts to show that demons were invariably human spirits. But in 1 Cor. x. 20, the gods of the Gentiles are styled demons. The word is used in Acts xvii. 18, where the heathen philosophers are represented as supposing that demons, or inferior gods, were preached by Paul, seeing he preached Jesus the Saviour of men, and the resurrection of the dead.

DEMONIAC, a person possessed by one or more demons. The subject of demoniacal possession has given rise to no little discussion. Some have regarded the demoniacs of the New Testament as simply lunatics or madmen; others as unhappy individuals who were actually possessed and controlled by evil spirits. The arguments for and against demoniacal possession have been well stated by Mr Buck in his “Theological Dictionary:”—

“I. Demoniacs, arguments against the existence of.—Those who are unwilling to allow that angels or devils have ever intermeddled with the concerns of human life, urge a number of specious arguments. The Greeks and Romans of old, say they, did believe in the reality of demoniacal possession. They supposed that spiritual beings did at times enter into the sons and daughters of men, and distinguish themselves in that situation by capricious freaks, deeds of wanton mischief, or prophetic enunciations. But in the instances in which they supposed this to happen, it is evident no such thing took place. Their accounts of the state and conduct of those persons whom they believed to be possessed in this supernatural manner, show plainly that what they ascribed to the influence of demons were merely the effects of natural diseases. Whatever they relate concerning the lartati, the cerriti, and the lymphatici, shows that these were merely people disordered in mind, in the same unfortunate situation with those madmen, idiots, and melancholy persons, whom we have among ourselves. Festus describes the lartati as being furiosi et mente moti. Lucian describes demoniacs as lunatic, and as staring with their eyes, foaming at the mouth, and being speechless. It appears still more evident that all the persons spoken of as possessed with devils in the New Testament, were either mad or epileptic, and precisely in the same condition with the madmen and epileptics of modern times. The Jews, among other reproaches which they threw out against our Saviour, said, ‘He hath a devil, and is mad; why hear ye him?’ The expressions ‘he hath a devil’ and ‘is mad’ were certainly used on this occasion as synonymous. With all their virulence, they would not surely ascribe to him at once two things that were inconsistent and contradictory. Those who thought more favourably of the character of Jesus asserted concerning his discourses, in reply to his adversaries, 'These are not the words of him that hath a demon;' meaning, no doubt, that he spoke in a more rational manner than a madman could be expected to speak. The Jews appear to have ascribed to the influence of demons, not only that species of madness in which the patient is raving and furious, but also melancholy madness. Of John, who secluded himself from intercourse with the world, and was distinguished for abstinence and acts of mortification, they said, 'He hath a demon.' The youth, whose father applied to Jesus to free him from an evil spirit, describing his unhappy condition in these words, 'Have mercy on my son, for he is lunatic, and sore vexed with a demon; for oftentimes he falleth into the fire, and oftentimes into the water,' was plainly epileptic. Every thing, indeed, that is related in the New Testament concerning demoniacs proves that they were people affected with such natural diseases as are far from being uncommon among mankind in the present age. When the symptoms of the disorders cured by our Saviour and his apostles as cases of demoniacal possession correspond so exactly with those of diseases well known as natural in the present age, it would be absurd to impute them to a supernatural cause. It is much more consistent with common sense and sound philosophy to suppose that our Saviour and his apostles wisely, and with that condescension to the weakness and prejudices of those with whom they conversed, which so eminently distinguished the character of the Author of our holy religion, and must always be a prominent feature in the character of the true Christian, adopted the vulgar language in speaking of those unfortunate persons who were groundlessly imagined to be possessed with demons, though they well knew the notions which had given rise to such modes of expression to be ill-founded, than to imagine that diseases which arise at present from natural causes were produced in days of old by the intervention of demons, or that evil spirits still continue to enter into mankind in all cases of madness, melancholy, or epilepsy. Besides, it is by no means a sufficient reason for receiving any doctrine as true, that it has been generally received through the world. Error, like an epidemical disease, is communicated from one to another. In certain circumstances, too, the influence of imagination predominates, and restrains the exertions of reason. Many false opinions have extended their influence through a very wide circle, and maintained it long. On every such occasion as the present, therefore, it becomes us to inquire, not so much how generally any opinion has been received or how long it has prevailed, as from what cause it has originated, and on what evidence it rests. When we contemplate the frame of nature, we behold a grand and beautiful simplicity prevailing through the whole: notwithstanding its immense extent, and though it contains such numberless diversities of being, yet the simplest machine constructed by human art does not display greater simplicity, or a happier connection of parts. We may therefore infer by analogy, from what is observable of the order of nature in general to the present case, that to permit evil spirits to intermeddle with the concerns of human life would be to break through that order which the Deity appears to have established through his works; it would be to introduce a degree of confusion unworthy of the wisdom of Divine Providence.

"II. Demoniacs, arguments for the existence of.—In opposition to these arguments, the following are urged by the Demonianists: In the days of our Saviour, it would appear that demoniacal possession was very frequent among the Jews and the neighbouring nations. Many were the evil spirits whom Jesus is related in the Gospels to have ejected from patients that were brought unto him as possessed and tormented by those malevolent demons. His apostles, too, and the first Christians, who were most active and successful in the propagation of Christianity, appear to have often exerted the miraculous powers with which they were endowed on similar occasions. The demons displayed a degree of knowledge and malevolence which sufficiently distinguished them from human beings; and the language in which the demoniacs are mentioned, and the actions and sentiments ascribed to them in the New Testament, show that our Saviour and his apostles did not consider the idea of demoniacal possession as being merely a vulgar error concerning the origin of a disease or diseases produced by natural causes. The more enlightened cannot always avoid the use of metaphorical modes of expression; which, though founded upon error, yet have been so established in language by the influence of custom that they cannot be suddenly dismissed. But in descriptions of characters, in the narration of facts, and in the laying down of systems of doctrine, we require different rules to be observed. Should any person, in compliance with popular opinion, talk in serious language of the existence, dispositions, declarations, and actions, of a race of beings whom he knew to be absolutely fabulous, we surely could not praise him for integrity: we must suppose him to be either exulting in irony over the weak credulity of those around him, or taking advantage of their weakness, with the dishonesty and selfish views of an impostor. And if he himself should pretend to any connection with this imaginary system of beings, and should claim, in consequence of his connection with them, particular honours from his contemporaries, whatever might be the dignity of his character in all other respects, nobody could hesitate to brand him as an impostor. In this light must we regard the conduct of our Saviour and his apostles, if the idea of demoniacal possession were to be considered merely as a vulgar error. They talked and acted as if they believed that evil spirits had actually entered into those who were brought to them as possessed with devils, and as if those spirits had been actually expelled by their authority out of the unhappy persons whom they possessed. They demanded, too, to have their professions and declarations believed in consequence of their performing such mighty works, and having thus triumphed over the powers of hell. The reality of demoniacal possession stands upon the same evidence with the gospel system in general. Nor is there any thing unreasonable in this doctrine. It does not appear to contradict those ideas which the general appearances of nature and the series of events suggest, concerning the benevolence and wisdom of the Deity, by which he regulates the affairs of the universe. We often fancy ourselves able to comprehend things to which our understanding is wholly inadequate; we persuade ourselves, at times, that the whole extent of the works of the Deity must be well known to us, and that his designs must always be such as we can fathom. We are then ready, whenever any difficulty arises to us in considering the conduct of Providence, to model things according to our own ideas; to deny that the Deity can possibly be the author of things which we cannot reconcile; and to assert that he must act on every occasion in a manner consistent with our narrow views. This is the pride of reason; and it seems to have suggested the strongest objections that have been at any time urged against the reality of demoniacal possession. But the Deity may surely connect one order of his creatures with another. We perceive mutual relations and a beautiful connection to prevail through all that part of nature which falls within the sphere of our observation. The inferior animals are connected with mankind, and subjected to their authority, not only in instances in which it is exerted for their advantage, but even where it is tyrannically abused to their destruction. Among the evils to which mankind have been subjected, why might not their being liable to demoniacal possession be one? While the Supreme Being retains the sovereignty of the universe, he may employ whatever agents he thinks proper in the execution of his purposes; he may either commission an angel or let loose a devil, as well as bend the human will or communicate any particular impulse to matter. All that revelation makes known, all that human reason can conjecture, concerning the existence of various orders of spiritual beings, good and bad, is perfectly consistent with, and even favourable to, the doctrine of demoniacal possession. It is mentioned in the New Testament in such language, and such narratives are related concerning it, that the Gospels cannot be well regarded in any other light than as pieces of imposture, and Jesus Christ must be considered as a man who took advantage of the weakness and ignorance of his contemporaries, if this doctrine be nothing but a vulgar error. It teaches nothing inconsistent with the general conduct of Providence.

The most plausible objection to the orthodox view of demoniacal possession is, that no such appearances are exhibited in modern times. In reply to this objection, we may quote the following apposite remarks by the Rev. Dr Esdaile:—"But it may be asked, how comes it that no instances of such possessions occur in modern times? To this it might be answered, that our Lord so thoroughly subverted the influence of the evil spirit in the world, that he never has been able to re-establish his visible empire over the bodies of men. It was, indeed, essential to the character of the Messiah, that he should 'destroy the works of the devil;' and it was necessary, for the faith and consolation of all who trusted in his name, that he should give a visible demonstration of his power to accomplish this arduous achievement. It may, therefore, be true, what has been alleged by some, that the devil was permitted to exert extraordinary power at that period, that the sovereignty of the Conqueror might be more apparent in the visible discomfiture of the adversary of God and man. And this would only be in conformity with all the other proceedings of the Almighty, who, of his abundant mercy, has given to men ocular proofs and sensible demonstrations of all the most important and most profound articles which they are required to believe. The doctrine of life and immortality, and of God's acceptance of Christ's atonement, was clearly demonstrated by his resurrection from the dead; the abiding influence of the Holy Ghost with all the people of God, was proved by his visible descent on the apostles, and his perceptible influence on the conduct of the first converts to the Christian faith; and it appears to be in perfect conformity with the whole of this marvellous scheme of mercy, that Christ should give a visible demonstration of his power over the great invisible enemy of man.

"But if there be any who are not satisfied with this reasoning, I would ask them what absolute assurance they have that demoniacal affections on the body have yet ceased? We see all the same symptoms exhibited in modern times which are stated as characteristic of possessions in Scripture; and we see perversions of feeling which it would be difficult to account for on any other principle than the actual possession by a demon of the springs and motives of action. Do we not see a diabolism, a devilishness, in many persons of alienated understanding, which appears quite unaccountable? It is not so much a subversion of the understanding as a perversion of the will and affections; and they exhibit such decided features of the transforming power of demonism, that evil has become their good, cruelty their pastime, mischief their delight: most certainly the devil is there; for there we see the incarnation of evil; the very reverse and opposite of holiness, manifested in the incarnation of the Son of God. In the one case, we see the devil; in the other, we see God manifested in the flesh. Fatuity and idiocy we can easily refer to an original deficiency in intellect, or moral perception; but how shall we account for cunning contrivance, nay, the most profound and ingenious resources, all applied with consummate art to the perpetration of the most diabolical purposes? I cannot conceive a more decided proof of the existence of a spirit of evil, acting with undeviating constancy in opposition to the plans and purposes of divine goodness and wisdom. If any one, then, is disposed to ask, When did demoniacal possession cease? I would be inclined to ask, in return, Has it yet ceased? This question I will not presume to answer; only this I will say, that they would hold a more tenable ground of argument, who should maintain that it has not yet ceased, than they who affirm that it never existed."

"Though we cannot discover," says Dr Campbell, in his Dissertations prefixed to his "Translation of the Gospels," "with certainty, from all that is said in the gospel concerning possession, whether the demons were conceived to be the ghosts of wicked men deceased, or lapsed angels, or (as was the opinion of some early Christian writers) the mongrel breed of certain angels (whom they understood by 'the sons of God,' mentioned in Genesis vi. 2), and of 'the daughters of men,' it is plain they were conceived to be malignant spirits. They are exhibited as the causes of the most direful calamities to the unhappy persons whom they possess, dumbness, deafness, madness, palsy, epilepsy, and the like. The descriptive titles given them always denote some ill quality or other. Most frequently they are called 'unclean spirits,' sometimes 'malign spirits.' They are represented as conscious that they are doomed to misery and torments, though their punishment be for a while suspended. 'Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?' Matt. viii. 29."

DENARIUS, a Roman coin, worth four sesterces, generally valued at sevenpence three farthings of our money. In the New Testament, it is taken for a piece of money in general, or a shekel, which was the common coin among the Hebrews before they were subjected to the Romans. Matt. xxii. 19; Mark xii. 15; Luke xx. 24.

DENY. God cannot deny himself. He cannot possibly act or speak unlike his own nature, or unlike the gracious character he has displayed, the promises he has made, or the threatenings he has denounced. 2 Tim. ii. 13. Men deny God, or Christ, or his name, when, in their profession or practice, they disown his being the true God, Saviour, portion, ruler, and last end of their souls. Job xxxi. 28; Acts iii. 13, 14. They deny the faith, when they embrace error, indulge themselves in a slothful and wicked practice, and so manifest their unbelief of, and opposition to, the truths of Scripture. Rev. ii. 13; 1 Tim. v. 8. Men deny themselves, when they refuse to depend on their own righteousness as the ground of their happiness, or to be led by their own wisdom, or ruled by their own will and affections, or to attempt performance of good works in their own strength, but receive Jesus Christ, as the free gift of God, for their all and in all, and undervalue their own ease, profit, or pleasure, for the sake of Christ. Matt. xvi. 24. See SELF-DENIAL.

DEPART. God departs from men, when he ceases to bestow his favours, hides the smiles of his countenance, and pours out his wrath on them (Hos. ix. 12), or when he ceases to afflict. Job vii. 19. Men depart from God, when they follow sinful lusts instead of holiness, and seek created enjoyment for their portion instead of his fulness (Jer. xxxii. 40); and especially when they break their vows to him, and cease from serving him, as once they did. Hos. i. 2. Men depart from evil, or from hell, when they cease the love and practice of sin, and so from walking in the way to hell. Prov. xv. 24, xvi. 6.

DEPRAVITY, HUMAN. This is a painful, but interesting and momentous subject. Perhaps there is no one truth in the Scriptures more strictly fundamental. The whole scheme of Christianity presupposes and recognises its existence, and all its provisions of grace and truth are adapted to its relief. It may be considered, therefore, as the basis of the evangelical system, inasmuch that the practical conviction of its truth is the first step towards the reception of the mercy of the gospel. "The Son of man came to save that which was lost." "I never knew a person," says Andrew Fuller, "verge towards the Arminian, the Arian, the Socinian, or the Antinomian schemes, without first entertaining diminutive notions of human depravity or blameworthiness." •

Human depravity essentially consists in a state of mind the opposite of that which is required by the divine law. The sum of the divine law being love, the essence of depravity consists in the want of love to God and our neighbour; or, in other words, the preference of some other object or objects to the exclusion of those required in the divine law. Where this preference prevails, the creature usurps the place of the Creator, and all the moral powers of the soul are disorganized, perverted, and corrupted. Yet this, however awful, is the natural condition of the whole human race. "For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." Rom. iii. 24. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Rom. v. 12. THE SCRIPTURE HATH CONCLUDED ALL UNDER SIN, THAT THE PROMISE BY FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST MIGHT BE GIVEN TO THEM THAT BELIEVE. Gal. iii. 22. So decisive, indeed, is the language of divine revelation on this point, that John does not hesitate to affirm: "If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us." 1 John i. 10.

That the depravity of man is universal may be further confirmed and brought home to every man's conscience, by the following considerations: In all nations it has been recognised by their forms of religion—coerced as far as possible by laws—recorded by biography and history—investigated by philosophy—acted in the drama—depicted by poets, and acknowledged and reproved by moralists. Few dare deny that they are partakers of it, and those few are evidently blinded by its power, since the best of men have always been the most ready to confess it. No man, Christ excepted, was ever yet produced as an example of moral perfection. Every man who examines himself by his own acknowledged rule of duty, finds he is continually coming short of it; and yet who can understand his errors? No man is willing to disclose every action of his life to his dearest friend. No one, in solemn prayer to God, dare profess his freedom from sin, or could be informed that God would judge him according to his deserts, without alarm. Every one feels that, by nature, sin is more easy to him than duty—that virtue requires effort, while vice steals on him unawares; whereas a disposition perfectly conformed to the law of God would render sin abominable and duty a delight. In fine, that human depravity is universal, is clear from the universal prevalence of death—the universal necessity of regeneration—the impossibility of justification by the works of the law—the death of Christ proposed as a universal remedy—and the universal requisition of repentance and faith in the Redeemer.

Although the depravity of man be, in the strictest sense, moral depravity, or the sinfulness of creatures who are intelligent, free, and voluntary, who sin against conscience, and are therefore justly accountable, it is yet frequently denominated natural; because it is found to be the universal characteristic of men by nature; that is to say, the state in which they are born. Eph. ii. 1–3; John iii. 6; Rom. viii. 5–9. For the same reason, it is sometimes called constitutional; not that it forms any essential part of the original constitution of the species as it came from the hands of the Creator, but because, in consequence of the sin of the first man, a predisposition to evil seems to inhere in all his descendants, and to develop itself in a series of voluntary transgressions, either internal or external, from the commencement of their moral agency. Hence, also, it has been called hereditary, native, innate, inbred depravity, or original sin. Rom. v. 12–19. See SIN—FALL OF MAN.

In regard to the degree of human depravity, though its forms and stages in social life are various, yet that essential element of all depravity which is common to the species, divines of the evangelical class have united in representing as total—meaning by that term, that unrenowned men, universally, are entirely destitute of the genuine principle of holy obedience; that is, of the love of God and man required in the divine law. This was manifestly the doctrine generally embraced at the Reformation, and which has been maintained by the advocates of sovereign grace in every age. It has been objected to this language, however, that the phrase, total depravity, conveys the idea of all men being as bad as they can be. As this is a sentiment which no one maintains, it were well, perhaps, if some happier terms could be found to express the great truth intended by total depravity. "ALL I MEAN BY THE TERMS," says Andrew Fuller, "IS THIS: THAT THE HUMAN HEART IS BY NATURE TOTALLY DESTITUTE OF THE LOVE OF GOD, OR LOVE TO MAN AS

THE CREATURE OF GOD, AND CONSEQUENTLY IS DESTITUTE OF ALL TRUE VIRTUE. A creature may be totally destitute of good, and therefore totally depraved (such, it will be allowed, is Satan), and yet be capable of adding iniquity to iniquity without end."

To elucidate this point, and remove the possibility of mistake, Dr Dwight remarks, "1. That the human character is not depraved to the full extent of its powers. 2. That there are certain characteristics of human nature which, considered by themselves, are innocent. 3. That some of the natural human characteristics are amiable; as natural affection, the simplicity and sweetness of childhood, the modesty of youth, compassion, generosity, social integrity; to which may be added, friendship, patriotism, and the sense of honour. 4. That these, and all other qualities of the mind, are, however, MEANS EITHER OF VIRTUE OR SIN, ACCORDING TO THE NATURE OF THAT CONTROLLING DISPOSITION OR ENERGY WHICH CONSTITUTES THE MORAL CHARACTER. 5. That there is not in the mind, by nature, or in an unregenerated state, any real moral excellence, or evangelical virtue. Lastly, That the heart of man, after all the abatements are made which can be made, is set to do evil in a most affecting and dreadful manner, as is evident from the Scriptures, from every man's examination of the state of his own heart and life, and from the whole course of human conduct, both private and public, especially in the family, in the place of business, in the haunts of amusement, in insurrections, oppressions, wars, and religious impostures, in every age of the world.

"Unhappily, nothing is more common than misrepresentations of the doctrine of total depravity by those who undertake to oppose it. Almost every objection advanced by them may be resolved into a misconception of terms, a wrong standard of judgment, or the prejudices naturally arising from supposed difficulties, self-ignorance, mistaken tenderness, pride of character, or fear of consequences. From these causes, men refuse to give proper attention to the decisive evidence of its truth, supplied by every page of Scripture, and every legitimate induction of facts. Few, indeed, are aware of the amount of evidence which God has given in his Word, for the conviction of men that such is their ruined state by nature:—1. All those passages of Scripture which expressly teach it as true not of one age only, but of all. Gen. vi. 5, 12, viii. 21; Psal. xiv. 2, 3; Eccl. ix. 3; Jer. xvii. 9; Rom. iii. 9–19; Eph. ii. 3. 2. All those passages which declare the utter impossibility of carnal men doing anything to please God. Heb. xi. 6; Rom. viii. 5–8. 3. All those which speak of goodness and virtue as comprehended in love—that is, the love of God and our neighbour. Matt. xxii. 37–39; Rom. xiii. 8–10; John v. 42; 1 John iv. 10. 4. All those which teach the necessity of regeneration in order to love God and our neighbour, as well as to eternal life. 1 John ii. 29, iii. 14; 2 Cor. v. 17; 1 John iv. 7, ii. 9; John iii. 3–8, i. 13; Rom. v. 5; Gal. v. 22. 5. All those passages which promise the blessings of salvation to repentance, faith in Christ, love to God, or a course of well-doing; that is, to the existence of holiness or true virtue, and not to a certain degree of it. 2 Cor. ii. 10; Heb. v. 9; Acts xvi. 31; Rom. viii. 28; James ii. 5; John v. 29; Rom. ii. 7. 6. All those which teach that men must love God supremely, or be his enemies—that all are either with Christ or against him. Matt. vi. 24, x. 37;

1 John ii. 15; James iv. 4; Rom. v. 10. Lastly, All those which represent mankind without the gospel, and the cordial reception of it, as in a perishing condition. John iii. 16; Rom. x. 1–15; 2 Thess. i. 7, 8; 2 Cor. ii. 15.

"Hence it appears—1. That the fundamental principle of both moral and political science, so far as it relates to man, is his depravity. 2. That the peculiar provisions of the gospel, in the gracious offices of Christ and of the Holy Spirit, are indispensable to the recovery of mankind to happiness and virtue. 3. That the doctrine of gratuitous personal election may be clearly demonstrated, and proved to be not only true, but reasonable and glorious. 4. That the popular distinction between true religion and true morality is false and deceptive. And, Lastly, That men are either required to be spiritually holy, or are allowed to live in sin, since there can be no medium."

On the proper manner of treating this important subject Dr Chalmers remarks:—"While we assert with zeal every doctrine of Christianity, let us not forget that there is a zeal without discrimination; and that to bring such a spirit to the defence of our faith, or of any one of its peculiarities, is not to vindicate the cause, but to discredit it. Now, there is a way of maintaining the utter depravity of our nature, and of doing it in such a style of sweeping and of vehement asseveration, as to render it not merely obnoxious to the taste, but obnoxious to the understanding. On this subject, there is often a roundness and a temerity of announcement, which any intelligent man, looking at the phenomena of human character with his own eyes, cannot go along with; and thus it is that there are injudicious defenders of orthodoxy, who have mustered against it not merely a positive dislike, but a positive strength of observation and argument. Let the nature of man be ruin, as it certainly is, it is obvious to the most common discernment, that it does not offer one unvaried and unalleviated mass of deformity. There are certain phases, and certain exhibitions of this nature, which are more lovely than others—certain traits of character, not due to the operation of Christianity at all, and yet calling forth our admiration and our tenderness—certain varieties of moral complexion, far more fair and more engaging than certain other varieties; and, to prove that the gospel may have had no share in the formation of them, they, in fact, stood out to the notice and respect of the world before the gospel was ever heard of. The classic page of antiquity sparkles with repeated exemplifications of what is bright and beautiful in the character of man; nor do all its descriptions of external nature waken up such an enthusiasm of pleasure, as when it bears testimony to some graceful or elevated doing out of the history of the species. And whether it be the kindness of maternal affection, or the unweariedness of filial piety, or the constancy of tried and unalterable friendship, or the earnestness of devoted patriotism, or the rigour of unbending fidelity, or any other of the recorded virtues which shed a glory over the remembrance of Greece and of Rome—we fully concede it to the admiring scholar, that they, one and all of them, were sometimes exemplified in those days of heathenism; and that, out of the materials of a period crowded as it was with moral abominations, there may also be gathered things which are pure, and lovely, and true, and just, and honest, and of good report.

"What do we mean, then, it may be asked, by the universal depravity of man? How shall we reconcile the admission now made with the unqualified and authoritative language of the Bible, when it tells us of the totality and the magnitude of human corruption? Wherein lies that desperate wickedness which is everywhere ascribed to all the men of all the families that be on the face of the earth? And how can such a tribute of acknowledgment be awarded to the sages and patriots of antiquity, who yet, as the partakers of our fallen nature, must be outcasts from the favour of God, and have the character of evil stamped upon the imaginations of the thoughts of their hearts continually?

"In reply to these questions, let us speak to your own experimental recollections on a subject in which you are aided, both by the consciousness of what passes within you, and by your observation of the characters of others. Might not a sense of honour elevate that heart which is totally unfurnished with a sense of God? Might not an impulse of compassionate feeling be sent into that bosom which is never once visited by a movement of dutiful loyalty towards the Lawgiver in heaven? Might not occasions of intercourse with the beings around us develop whatever there is in our nature of generosity, and friendship, and integrity, and patriotism; and yet the unseen Being who placed us in this theatre be neither loved, nor obeyed, nor listened to? Amid the manifold varieties of human character, and the number of constitutional principles which enter into its composition, might there not be an individual in whom the constitutional virtues so blaze forth and have the ascendancy, as to give a general effect of gracefulness to the whole of this moral exhibition; and yet, may not that individual be as unmindful of his God as if the principles of his constitution had been mixed up in such a different proportion, as to make him an odious and a revolting spectacle? In a word, might not sensibility shed forth its tears, friendship perform its services, and liberality impart of its treasure, and patriotism earn the gratitude of its country, and honour maintain itself entire and untainted, and all the softenings of what is amiable, and all the glories of what is chivalrous and manly, gather into one bright effulgence of moral accomplishment on the person of him who never, for a single day of his life, subordinates one habit or one affection to the will of the Almighty; who is just as careless and as unconcerned about God, as if the native tendencies of his constitution had compounded him into a monster of deformity; and who just as effectually realizes this attribute of rebellion against his Maker, as the most loathsome and profligate of his species, that he walks in the counsel of his own heart, and after the sight of his own eyes?"

DERBE, a city of Lycaonia, to which Paul and Barnabas fled when expelled from Iconium. Acts xiv. 6. It was the country of Timothy, and the birth-place of the hospitable Gaius.

DESCENT OF CHRIST INTO HELL. See HELL.

DESERT. The Hebrews, by midbar, "a desert," mean an uncultivated place, particularly if mountainous. Some deserts were entirely dry and barren; others were beautiful, and had good pastures. Scripture speaks of the beauty of the desert. Ps. lxxv. 12, 13. Scripture names several deserts in the Holy Land; and there was scarcely a town without one belonging to it; that is, uncultivated places, for woods and pastures, like our commons—common lands. The desert or wilderness in Scripture, is often used as the symbol of temptation, trouble, and persecution. It is also mentioned in Isa. xl. 3, as the symbol of the Jewish Church and people, when they had forsaken their God.

DESERT. Men are judged according to their deserts, and have their deserts rendered to them, when they receive the just punishment of their deeds. Psal. xxviii. 4.

DESERTION, a term made use of to denote an unhappy state of mind, occasioned by the sensible experience of the divine favour being withdrawn. Some of the best men in all ages have suffered a temporary suspension of divine enjoyments. Job xxix. 2; Psal. li. ; Isa. xlix. 14; Lam. iii. 1–22; Isa. l.

DESIRE. In intellectual philosophy, the original spring and fountain of all the affections. It may be directed to a great variety of objects, and is liable to a multitude of modifications. It is often used, in popular language, as equivalent to affection. In theology or morals, desire is either regarded as natural (Deut. xxi. 11), or inordinate (Deut. vii. 25, v. 21), or malignant (Mic. vii. 3), or holy. Psal. lxxiii. 25. The desires of the flesh are sinful lusts and inclinations (Gen. vi. 5)—those of the animal nature in distinction from those of the intellectual. Eph. ii. 3.

DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS, a title of the Messiah. Hag. ii. 7. He is altogether lovely, necessary, and valuable; all that spiritually know him, love him and long for his presence and blessing; and in him at last shall the nations of the earth be blessed, here as well as in the heavenly world. Rev. xx.

DESPAIR, the loss of hope; that distressing state of mind, in which a person loses his confidence in the divine mercy. Some of the best antidotes against despair, says one, may be taken from the consideration,—1. Of the nature of God, his goodness, mercy, &c. 2. The testimony of God: he hath said he desireth not the death of the sinner. 3. From the works of God: he hath given his Son to die. 4. From his promises. Heb. xiii. 5. 5. From his commands: he hath commanded us to confide in his mercy. 6. From his expostulations.

DETRACTION, in the native signification of the word, signifies the withdrawing or taking off from a thing; and as it is applied to the reputation, it denotes the impairing or lessening a man in point of fame—rendering him less valued and esteemed by others. Dr Barrow observes, that it differs from slander, which involves an imputation of falsehood; from reviling, which includes bitter and foul language; and from censuring, which is of a more general purport, extending indifferently to all kinds of persons, qualities, and actions; but detraction especially respects worthy persons, good qualities, and laudable actions, the reputation of which it aimeth to destroy. It is a fault opposed to candour.

DEUTERONOMY (from deuteros, second, and nomos, law), a title prefixed to the fifth book of Moses by the translators of the Septuagint, because it contains a repetition of the law of God given by Moses to the Israelites. The moral, ceremonial, and judicial laws are repeated, with additions and explanations; and that all might be acquainted with the Divine law, Moses commanded that it should be read to all the people at the end of every seventh year. This book comprises a period of five lunar weeks, or, as some think, about two months. The words of Moses evidently conclude with the thirty-third chapter, the thirty-fourth having been added to complete the history. Dr Clarke thinks that the last chapter of the book should constitute the first chapter of the book of Joshua. Only one prophecy in reference to the Messiah is contained in Deuteronomy, viz., Deut. xviii. 15, 18, 19; which was fulfilled fifteen hundred years after it was delivered, and is expressly applied to Jesus Christ, Acts iii. 22, 23, and vii. 37. "The book of Deuteronomy," Dr Clarke remarks, "and the Epistle to the Hebrews, contain the best comment on the nature, design, and use of the law; the former may be considered as an evangelical commentary on the four preceding books, in which the spiritual reference and signification of the different parts of the law are given, and given in such a manner as none could give who had not a clear discovery of the glory which was to be revealed." Very striking predictions of the future fate and fortunes of Israel are contained in chapters xxviii., xxx., xxxii., and xxxiii.

DEVIL, the chief of the fallen angels. The name literally implies calumniator or slanderer, he being emphatically the "accuser of the brethren." Rev. xii. 10. He is called by a great variety of names in the Bible. Thus, "Angel of the bottomless pit," Rev. ix. 11; "Prince of this world," John xii. 31; "Prince of darkness," Eph. vi. 12; "Beelzebub," Matt. xii. 24; "Belial," 2 Cor. vi. 15; and many others. The power which this evil spirit exercises over the minds and hearts of men is represented in Scripture to be so great that he is likened (1 Pet. v. 8) to "a roaring lion going about, seeking whom he may devour." He is spoken of as the Tempter, who either directly, or by the medium of his emissaries, leads men to sin. He was "a murderer from the beginning," for he it was that, under the guise of a serpent, was the origin of the fall of our first parents. From that moment did Satan usurp the government of mankind, becoming "the god of this world," "the spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience." To the subjugation and destruction of this evil spirit, therefore, the first promise of the redemption of man had a direct reference, and was in the first instance directed, Gen. iii. 15, "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." For this express purpose, accordingly, "Jesus was manifested to destroy the works of the devil;" and "by his death he hath destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." To all the people of God, then, Satan is a conquered foe; and though he may often tempt them to sin, they are commanded to "resist the devil, and he will flee from them." The Socinians entertain and inculcate the absurd idea that Satan has no personal existence, but is simply the principle of evil personified. This notion is opposed both to reason and the Word of God. See SATAN.

DEVOTEE, in the primary sense of the word, means a person wholly given up to acts of piety and devotion; but it is usually understood in a bad sense, to denote a bigot or superstitious person.

DEVOTION, a fervent exercise of the private and public offices of religion, or a temper and disposition of the mind rightly affected with such exercises.

DEW. In the months of May, June, July, and August, dew falls in Palestine in great abundance; and accordingly, in Scripture, dew is frequently employed as an emblem of the Divine bounty. Deut. xxxii. 2; Job xxix. 19; Micah v. 7. Mention is made of the refreshing nature of dew in Ps. cxxxiii. 3, and Hos. xiv. 5. To express great multitudes, the numberless drops of dew are referred to in Ps. cx. 3, and the dews of Hermon are used to denote brotherly love and concord in Ps. cxxxiii. 3.

DIADEM. See CROWN.

DIAL. The first mention made of a dial is in 2 Kings xx. 8-11, where the Hebrew word literally implies steps or degrees; and hence the opinion has been maintained by many that the dial of Ahaz was simply a staircase, so constructed that the shadows of the steps showed the hours. Others suppose it to have been a pillar erected in the middle of a level and smooth pavement, on which the hours were engraved. Grotius describes it as a concave hemisphere, and in the midst a globe, the shadow of which fell on the different lines engraven in the concavity of the hemisphere; these lines were twenty-eight in number. The Egyptian obelisks are regarded by many as having served the purpose of sundials. It is probable that the dial of Ahaz had been an invention of the Babylonians or Chaldeans, who are supposed to have been the people who first studied practical astronomy. The Greeks became afterwards acquainted with the dial, which they termed scapha, a boat.

DIAMOND. Exod. xxviii. 18; xxxix. 11; Ezek. xxviii. 13. This has from remote antiquity been considered as the most valuable, or, more properly, the most costly substance in nature. The reason of the high estimation in which it was held by the ancients was its rarity, extreme hardness, and brilliancy. It filled the sixth place in the high priest's breastplate, and on it was engraven the name of Naphtali. The word translated diamond in Jer. xvii. 1, is in other passages rendered adamant. See ADAMANT.

DIANA, a celebrated heathen goddess, referred to in Acts xix. 28, as having been specially worshipped at Ephesus. The temple consecrated to Artemis or Diana in that city, was, from its magnitude and splendour, accounted one of the seven wonders of the world, and more especially as containing "the image which fell down from Jupiter," probably an immense aërolitic stone. Demetrius seems to have been employed in making small models, as Chrysostom thinks, of the temple in silver, which were probably purchased by travellers and pilgrims. The priests of this temple were held in very high esteem and great honour. Some have supposed that Diana is referred to in the Old Testament under the name of Meni.

DIBON, a city of Moab, so called from its softly flowing waters, and thought to be the Dimon of Isa. xv. 9. This city was given to the tribe of Gad by Moses, and afterwards yielded to Reuben. Numb. xxxii. 3, 34; Josh. xiii. 9. It seems to have been again occupied by the Moabites at a later period. Isa. xv. 2; Jer. xlviii. 18, 22. Eusebius says, it was a large town on the northern bank of the River Arnon. Numb. xxxiii. 45. Burekhardt speaks of a place called Diban, about three miles north of the Arnon. See GAD.

It is interesting to notice, in regard to this place, the fulfilment of ancient prophecy, which is thus described by the Rev. Mr Wylie:—"Dibon, in respect of position, was fortunate beyond most of the cities of this land; it was placed in a low part of the Plains of Moab, betwixt two rivers, at no great distance from either; and the fields around it being capable of an easy and abundant irrigation, it is natural to suppose that the rich verdure with which they were clothed would seldom fade; but it was foretold of Dibon, that the streams at which it drank should be dried up, and that a thirsty wilderness should be spread around it: and though the prediction was very improbable at the time it was given, we now behold it fulfilled. The sands of the desert have encroached on that part of Moab in which this town was situated. Barrenness has come in the room of fertility; and the ruins of Dibon, which are of considerable extent, are now found by the traveller lying on a sandy plain. 'Thou daughter that dost inhabit Dibon, come down from thy glory, and sit in thirst.' There is another city of this name, which is the same, perhaps, as Debir, or Kirjath-sepher. Neh. xi. 25. The Seventy call that place Dibon, which in Hebrew is Deber. Josh. xiii. 26.

DIBON-GAD, an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness; which is the same, perhaps, as Dibon, which is said to have been rebuilt by Gad. Numb. xxxiii. 45.

DIDRACHMA, a Greek word, signifying a piece of money, in value two drachmas—about fourpence of our money. The Jews were by law obliged, every person, to pay two drachmas—that is, half a shekel—to the temple. To pay this, our Lord sent Peter to catch a fish, in which miraculously a coin of this value was found. Matt. xvii. 24-27.

DIDYMUS, a twin. This is the signification of the Hebrew or Syriac word THOMAS (which see.)

DIGGERS, a name of reproach applied to some good people, probably Waldenses, who, being persecuted, were obliged to find or dig caverns in which to hold their religious meetings. They were charged with despising the clergy and Church of Rome. The term Diggers was also, in Cromwell's time, applied to a religio-political party, from which the Spencean system is supposed to have been borrowed. See SPENCEANS.

DIGIT (etzba), a measure containing about three-fourths of an inch, or the breadth of a finger. There are four digits in a palm, and six palms in a cubit.

DIKLAH, seventh son of Joktan (Gen. x. 27), whose descendants were placed either in Arabia-Felix, which abounds in palm-trees, called Diklah in Chaldee and Syriac; or in Assyria, where is the town of Degla, and the River Tigris, or Dikkel.

DILIGENCE, CHRISTIAN, is constancy in the performance of all those duties enjoined us in God's Sacred Word. It includes activity and vigour—watchfulness against intruding objects—firmness and resolution—patience and perseverance. The shortness of our time, the importance of our work, the pleasure which arises from discharging duty, the uncertainty of the time of our dissolution, the consciousness that we do not labour in vain, together with the example of our Saviour and all his true followers, should incite us to the most unwearied diligence in the cause of God, of truth, and our own souls.

DIMISSORY LETTER, an expression used by Episcopalians to denote a letter given by a bishop to a candidate for holy orders, having a title in his diocese, directed to some other bishop, and giving leave for the bearer to be ordained by him.

DINAH, daughter of Jacob and Leah (Gen. xxx. 21), born after Zebulun, and about A.M. 2250. When Jacob returned into Canaan, Dinah, then about the age of fifteen or sixteen, attended a festival of the Shechemites, to see the women of the country (Gen. xxxiv. 1, 2), when Shechem, son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the city, ravished or seduced her, and afterwards desired his father to procure her for his wife. Dinah's brothers being informed of what had passed, were much exasperated; and having made insidious proposals to Shechem, to his father Hamor, and to the inhabitants of their city, slew and plundered them, and carried off Dinah. Jacob, when informed of the occurrence, declared concerning them: "Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." Gen. xlix. 7.

DINAITES, a people who opposed the rebuilding of the temple. Ezra iv. 9.

DINNER. The Syrians of the present day dine about eleven o'clock in the forenoon in winter, and rather earlier in summer. Dinner is generally a temperate and frugal meal. Animal food is seldom and sparingly used in Eastern countries—the chief commodities being bread and milk, and fruits and herbs. It is obvious, however, that the Israelites had been accustomed in Egypt to eat freely both of fish and flesh. Indeed, from the Egyptian monuments, it appears that a feast in that country consisted of a considerable number of dishes. Some idea may be formed of a dinner in Oriental countries, from the following account, given by Mr Morier, of a Persian dinner:—"On the ground before us was spread the sofra, a fine chintz cloth, which perfectly intrenched our legs, and which is used so long unchanged, that the accumulated fragments of former meals collect into a musty paste, and emit no very savoury smell. But the Persians are content; for they say that changing the sofra brings ill luck. A tray was then placed before each guest. On these trays were three fine China bowls, which were filled with sherbets—two made of sweet liquors, and one of a most exquisite species of lemonade. There were, besides fruits ready cut, plates with elegant little arrangements of sweetmeats and confectionary, and smaller cups of sweet sherbet; the whole of which were placed most symmetrically, and were quite inviting, even by their appearance. In the vases of sherbet were spoons made of the pear tree, with very deep bowls, and worked so delicately that the long handle just slightly bent when it was carried to the mouth. The pillans succeeded, three of which were placed before each two guests—one of plain rice, called the chillo; one made of mutton, with raisins and almonds; the other of a fowl, and rich spices and plums. To this were added various dishes with rich sauce. Their cooking, indeed, is mostly composed of sweets. The business of eating was a pleasure to the Persians; but it was misery to us. They comfortably advanced their chins close to the dishes, and commodiously scooped the rice or other victuals into their mouths with three fingers and the thumb of their right hand; but in vain did we attempt to approach the dish; our tight-kneed breeches and all the ligaments and buttons of our dress forbade us, and we were forced to manage as well as we could, fragments of meat and rice falling through our fingers all around us."

DIOCESE, the circuit of a bishop's jurisdiction. The ecclesiastical division of England is primarily into two provinces, those of Canterbury and York. A province, which is the circuit of an archbishop's jurisdiction, is divided into dioceses or sees of suffragan bishops, of which Canterbury includes twenty, and York five. Every diocese is divided into archdeaconries, and each archdeaconry into rural deaneries, and every deanery into parishes.

DIONYSIUS, a member of the Areopagus at Athens, who was converted by the Apostle Paul, Acts xvii. 34. According to the Apostolical Constitutions, he was appointed by Paul superintendent of the young church in Athens. This individual is sometimes confounded with Dionysins, first bishop of Paris. Little is known concerning the Areopagite, except that he laboured in the ministry with great fidelity in Athens, and at length crowned his labours with martyrdom in A.D. 95. It has been said of this individual, that he was at Heliopolis when Christ was crucified, and that, observing the miraculous darkness which took place at that time, he declared that either God himself was suffering, or that he was sympathising with one that was suffering. Suidas, by whom this incident is related, is credulous enough to believe the productions which were palmed upon the world by a writer in the fifth century to have been really the writings of the Areopagite. No reference, however, to any such works as having come from the pen of Dionysius is to be found in the early writers; but they seem to belong to a later period.

DIOSPOLIS (the city of Jupiter), or THEBES. Nahum is thought to have intended it under the name of No-Ammon. See AMMON-NO.

DIOTREPES, a professed Christian near Ephesus, who did not receive and kindly aid those missionaries to the heathen whom the apostle John had sent to him, nor would he suffer others to do so. See 3 John 9, 10.

DIRECTORY, a kind of regulation for the performance of religious worship, drawn up by the Westminster assembly of divines, at the instance of the Parliament, in 1644. It was designed to supply the place of the Liturgy, or Book of Common Prayer, the use of which they had abolished. It consisted of some general heads, which were to be arranged and filled up at discretion; for it prescribed no form of prayer, or circumstances of external worship, nor obliged the people to any responses, excepting Amen. The substance of it is as follows:—It forbids all salutations and civil ceremony in the churches; the reading the Scriptures in the congregation is declared to be a part of the pastoral office; all the canonical books of the Old and New Testament (but not the Apocrypha) are to be publicly read in the vulgar tongue; how large a portion is to be read at once is left to the minister, who has likewise the liberty of expounding, when he judges it necessary. It prescribes heads for the prayer before sermon; it delivers rules for preaching the Word; the introduction to the text must be short and clear, drawn from the words or context, or some parallel place of Scripture. In dividing the text, the minister is to regard the order of the matter more than that of the words; he is not to burden the memory of his audience with too many divisions, nor perplex their understanding with logical phrases and terms of art; he is not to start unnecessary objections; and he is to be very sparing in citations from ecclesiastical or other human writers, ancient or modern. The Directory recommends the use of the Lord's Prayer, as the most perfect model of devotion; it forbids private or lay persons to administer baptism, and enjoins it to be performed in the face of the congregation. It orders the communion table at the Lord's supper to be so placed that the communicants may sit about it. It also orders that the Sabbath be kept with the greatest strictness, both publicly and privately; that marriage be solemnized by a lawful minister of the Word, who is to give counsel to and pray for the parties; that the sick be visited by the minister under whose charge they are; the dead to be buried without any prayers or religious ceremonies; that days of fasting are to be observed when the judgments of God are abroad, or when some important blessings are desired; that days of thanksgiving for mercies received be also observed; and also, that singing of psalms together in the congregation is the duty of Christians. In an appendix to this Directory, it is ordered that all festivals, vulgarly called holidays, are to be abolished; that no day is to be kept but the Lord's-day; and that as no place is capable of any holiness under the pretence of consecration, so neither is it subject to pollution by any superstition formerly used; and therefore it is held requisite that the places of public worship now used should still be continued and employed. It is to be regretted that the Directory is not better known than it is both among pastors and people in Presbyterian Churches.

DISCERN. To discern time and judgment, is to know the season proper for such works, and the works proper for such occasions. Eccl. viii. 5. To discern the Lord's body, is, by spiritual knowledge, to understand the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper as representing the person and righteousness of God in our nature, 1 Cor. xi. 29. Christ is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart; he fully knows and can judge of their motions, manner, and ends; the Scripture is a discerner of them; when powerfully applied, it makes men truly to understand them. Heb. iv. 12, 13. Discerning of spirits was either a miraculous power of discerning men's state or secret conduct, or a spiritual ability to discern true apostles and ministers from false ones. 1 Cor. xii. 10.

DISCIPLE, properly a scholar, or one who learns from another. Hence the term has been applied to the followers of any teacher, and is applied in the New Testament to those who were converted to the belief of the gospel, and became the professed followers of Jesus Christ. Many followed after Jesus while he dwelt upon the earth from a variety of motives; but he lays down in very striking language the character of his true disciples: "And there went great multitudes with him: and he turned, and said unto them, If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. And whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple. So likewise, whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." Luke xiv. 25-27, 33. From this searching passage it is quite plain that a mere outward profession does not constitute a faithful disciple of the Lord Jesus. He must be a sincere, devout, devoted follower of the Redeemer, habitually sitting at his feet and learning the law at his mouth; submitting to Christ alone as the Lord of his conscience; counting the Word of Christ his rule and the will of Christ his law; and following steadily, consistently, and perseveringly in the footsteps of the Redeemer. Hence the necessity on the part of every man to examine the ground of his discipleship. It is hoped that the vital interest which every professor has in that inquiry will be admitted as an apology for submitting to the reader's consideration the following general reflections on the subject:—

1. A teachable disposition is essential to the character of a true disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ. Matt. xviii. 1-4; John vi. 45; Prov. iv. 18; 2 Pet. iii. 18; 1 Cor. viii. 2; Phil. iii. 8-14.

2. A genuine disciple of Christ can admit no human teacher to be the Lord of his conscience. Matt. xxiii. 8-10; James iii. 1; 2 Cor. i. 24; 1 Pet.

v. 3; Luke iv. 44; John iv. 42; James i. 18; 1 Pet. i. 22, 23; 1 Thess. ii. 13; Mark xiv. 24; Luke viii. 18; James i. 21; 2 Pet. ii. 1-3; John xvii. 17; 2 Cor. iii. 18.

3. A disposition to obey all the will of God, so far as he has the means of doing it, is essential to the character of a real disciple of Christ. Luke vi. 46; Acts ix. 6; Matt. v. 19, vii. 24, 25; James i. 22-25; John xv. 14, vi. 60; Luke ix. 23; Phil. ii. 14, 15; Luke xvii. 10.

4. A steady, consistent, and uniform perseverance in the ways of Christ, is another characteristic of discipleship. Hos. vi. 4; Eph. iv. 14; Matt. xvi. 24-26; Mark viii. 34-38; Luke ix. 23-26, x. 38; Matt. vi. 33; 1 Cor. xv. 58; Rev. iii. 21. See LOVE.

DISCIPLINARIANS, those in Baxter's time who advocated the cause of pure communion. "Those that pleaded for discipline were called by the new name of Disciplinarians, as if it had been a kind of heresy to desire discipline in the Church."

DISCIPLINE, BOOKS OF. Immediately after the first meeting of the first General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in 1560, the Scottish Reformers, rightly conceiving that the power of discipline was essential to the wellbeing of a Church, resolved to draw up a book in which there should be a complete system of ecclesiastical government. The plan was drawn from the Sacred Scriptures. After the whole had been carefully drawn up, it was laid before the General Assembly, and approved by them. It was also laid before the Privy Council; and though not formally ratified by them, it was subscribed by the greater part of the nobility and barons, members of the council, and thereby virtually ratified. Such was the FIRST BOOK OF DISCIPLINE, in which are embodied the fundamental principles of the Church of Scotland, as designed by John Knox and the other Reformers. Another similar document, which bears the name of the SECOND BOOK OF DISCIPLINE, was prepared, and formally sanctioned by the General Assembly in 1578; and from that time it has been recognised as the authorized standard of the Church of Scotland in respect of government and discipline. For the information of those who may be unacquainted with this document, we may quote the following abstract of it as given by Dr Hetherington in his "History of the Church of Scotland:"—"It begins by stating the essential line of distinction between civil and ecclesiastical power. This it does by declaring, that Jesus Christ has appointed a government in his Church, distinct from civil government, which is to be exercised by such office-bearers as he has authorized, and not by civil magistrates, or under their direction. Civil authority has for its direct and proper object the promoting of external peace and quietness among the subjects; ecclesiastical authority, the direction of men in matters of religion, and those which pertain to conscience. The former enforces obedience by external means, the latter by spiritual means; yet 'as they be both of God and tend to one end, if they be rightly used, to wit, to advance the glory of God, and to have good and godly subjects,' they ought to co-operate within their respective spheres, and fortify each other. 'As ministers are subject to the judgment and punishment of the magistrate in external matters, if they offend, so ought the magistrates to submit themselves to the discipline of the Church, if they transgress in matters of conscience and religion.' The government of the Church consists in three things—doctrine, discipline, and distribution. Corresponding to this division, there are three kinds of church-officers—ministers, who are preachers as well as rulers; elders, who are merely rulers; and deacons, who act as distributors of alms and managers of the funds of the Church. The name bishop is of the same meaning as that of pastor or minister: it is not expressive of superiority or lordship; and the Scriptures do not allow of a pastor of pastors, or a pastor of many flocks. There should be elders who do not labour in word and doctrine. The eldership is a spiritual function, as is the ministry. These functionaries ought to assist the pastor in examining those who come to the Lord's table, and in visiting the sick; but their principal office is to hold assemblies with the pastors and doctors, who are also of their number, for establishing good order and execution of discipline. The office-bearers of the Church are to be admitted by election and ordination. None are to be intruded into any ecclesiastical office 'contrary to the will of the congregation to which they are appointed.' Ecclesiastical assemblies are either particular (consisting of the office-bearers of one congregation or of a number of neighbouring congregations), provincial, national, or ecumenical and general. The presbytery, or eldership as it is called, has the inspection of a number of adjoining congregations in everything relating to religion and manners; and has the power of ordaining, suspending, and deposing ministers, and of exercising discipline within its bounds. The provincial synod possesses the power of all the presbyteries within a province. The General Assembly is composed of commissioners, ministers and elders, from the whole churches in the realm, and takes cognizance of everything connected with the welfare of the National Church. Appeals for redress of grievances may be taken from every subordinate court to its next superior one, till they reach the General Assembly, whose decision, in all matters ecclesiastical, is final. All the ecclesiastical assemblies have lawful power to convene for transacting business, and to appoint the times and places of their meeting. The patrimony of the Church includes whatever has been appropriated to her use, whether by donations from individuals, or by law and custom. To take any part of this by unlawful means, and apply it to the particular and profane use of individuals, is simony. It belongs to the deacons to receive the ecclesiastical goods, and to distribute them according to the appointment of presbyteries. The purposes to which they are to be applied are the four following:—The support of ministers; the support of elders where that is necessary, and of a national system of education; the maintenance of the poor and of hospitals; and the reparation of places of worship, and other extraordinary charges of the Church or commonwealth. Among the remaining abuses which ought to be removed, the following are particularly specified:—The titles of abbots, and others connected with monastic institutions, with the places which they held, as Churchmen, in the legislative and judicial courts; the usurped superiority of bishops, and their acting in Parliament and Council in the name of the Church, without her commission; the exercise of criminal jurisdiction and the pastoral office by the same individuals; the mixed jurisdiction of commissaries; the holding of pluralities; and patronages and presentations to benefices, whether by the prince or any inferior person, which lead to intrusion, and are incompatible with 'lawful election and the assent of the people over whom the person is placed, as the practice of the apostolical and primitive Kirk and good order crave.”

DISCIPLINE, CHURCH. This term is sometimes applied to the admission of members into Christian Churches, and to the treatment of those members who offend against the laws of Christ. It is usually limited, however, to the latter branch of ecclesiastical order, although, generally speaking, all that regards the purity, order, peace, usefulness, and efficiency of the members of the Church, comes within the range of its discipline. As to the character of those who may be admitted into the communion of the visible Church, they must obviously be such as make a creditable profession of their faith in Christ, and obedience to his commands. But to maintain the purity of the Church, it is necessary that discipline be strictly maintained. “It ought to be regarded,” Dr Miller well remarks, “as one of the most precious means of grace, by which offenders are humbled, softened, and brought to repentance; the Church purged of unworthy members, offences removed, the honour of Christ promoted, real Christians stimulated and improved in their spiritual course, faithful testimony borne against error and crime, and the professing family of Christ made to appear holy and beautiful in the view of the world. Without wholesome discipline for removing offences, and excluding the corrupt and profane, there may be an assembly, but there cannot be a Church. The truth is, the exercise of a faithful watch and care over the purity of each other, in doctrine, worship, and life, is one of the principal purposes for which the Christian Church was established, and on account of which it is highly prized by every enlightened believer.” The discharge of this important duty with the necessary mildness, prudence, and wisdom, is one of the most delicate and difficult parts of ecclesiastical administration. In Episcopal churches, the great duty of Church discipline is almost, if not entirely, unknown. Congregationalists allege that it belongs to the whole members of the Church to exercise discipline; and in support of this opinion, they refer to such passages as Rom. xvi. 17; Gal. vi. 1, 2; 1 Thess. v. 14; 2 Thess. iii. 6; Heb. x. 25, xii. 13–16. In Presbyterian churches, discipline is exercised by kirk-sessions, subject to the review of presbyteries, and synods, and General Assemblies. The advantages of this plan are thus enumerated by Dr Miller:—“1. It is founded essentially on the principle of representation, which, in a greater or less degree, pervades all human society. 2. It presents one of the finest conceivable barriers against the ambition and encroachments of the clergy. 3. It furnishes one of the best securities for preserving the rights of the people. 4. It secures to ministers of the Word and sacraments counsel and support, in all their official proceedings, of the best possible kind. 5. It has the advantage of despatch and energy, as well as of wisdom, and the security of equal rights. 6. By means of a succession of judicatories, admitting of appeal, it provides for redressing many grievances which do not appear otherwise to admit of a remedy. 7. It is most friendly to the spread of the gospel, and furnishes peculiar facilities for union and efficiency of action in promoting the great objects of Christian benevolence.”

DISCONTENT, uneasiness at our present state. Man never appears in a worse light than when he gives way to this disposition. It is at once the strongest proof of his pride, ignorance, unbelief, and rebellion against God. Let such remember, that discontent is a reflection on God's government; that it cannot alter the state of things, or make them better; that it is the source of great misery; that it is an absolute violation of God's law (Heb. xiii. 5); and that God has often punished it with the most signal judgments. Numb. xi.; Ps. cvi. See CONTENTMENT.

DISCRETION, prudent behaviour, arising from a knowledge of, and acting agreeably to, the difference of things. “There are,” says Addison, “many more shining qualities in the mind of man, but there is none so useful as discretion: it is this, indeed, which gives a value to all the rest; which sets them at work in their proper times and places, and turns them to the advantage of the person who is possessed of them. Without it, learning is pedantry, and wit impertinence; virtue itself looks like weakness; the best parts only qualify a man to be more sprightly in errors, and active to his own prejudice.”

DISEASES. Many kinds of disease are mentioned in Scripture. Diseases and death are consequences of sin; and the Hebrews, not much accustomed to recur to physical causes, often imputed them to evil spirits. See Luke xiii. 16. If their infirmities appeared unusual, and especially if the cause were unknown to them, they concluded it to be a stroke directly from the avenging hand of God; and to him the wisest and most religious had recourse for cure. King Asa is blamed for placing his confidence in physicians. 2 Chron. xvi. 12. Job's friends ascribed all his distempers to God's justice. Paul delivers the incestuous Corinthian to Satan “for the destruction of the flesh,” that the evil spirit might afflict him with diseases. 1 Cor. v. 5. (See SATAN.) The same apostle attributes the diseases and death of many Corinthians to their communicating unworthily. 1 Cor. xi. 30. He also elsewhere ascribes the infirmities with which he was afflicted to an evil angel: “A thorn in the flesh—a messenger of Satan.” 2 Cor. xii. 7. An angel of death slew the first-born of the Egyptians; a destroying angel wasted Sennacherib's army; an avenging angel smote the people of Israel with a pestilence, after David's sin. Saul fell into a fit of deep melancholy—hypochondriacal depression; and it is said “an evil spirit came upon him.” Abimelech, king of Gerar, for taking Sarah, the wife of Abraham, was threatened with death (Gen. xx. 3); and the Philistines were smitten with an ignominious disease, for not treating the ark with adequate respect. 1 Sam. v. 6, 7. These diseases, and others that we read of, were evident interpositions of Providence, by whatever agency they were produced. (See DEMONIACS.) Pliny says that the Egyptians claimed the honour of having invented the medical art; and there is no doubt that in Scripture the first mention of physicians is in connection with Egypt, as early as the time of Joseph (Gen. l. 2); and other allusions occur in Exod. xxi. 19, and in Job xiii. 4. That drugs were abundantly used in Egypt, is obvious from Jer. xlvi. 11: “Go up into Gilead, and take balm, O virgin, the daughter of Egypt: in vain shalt thou use many medicines; for thou shalt not be cured.” The art of healing among the Hebrews, as well as among the Egyptians, was chiefly in the hands of the priests, who, indeed, were obliged by law to take cognizance of leprosy; but reference is occasionally made to physicians who were not priests. The various diseases mentioned in Scripture, such as leprosy, blains, and others, will be found under their separate articles.

DISH. This word occurs in Exod. xxv. 29, and is rendered, in the Arabic version, "a deep dish;" which agrees with the appearance of the Egyptian dishes as found on the monuments. Among the Arabs, the dishes of the common people are of wood, and those of the chiefs are often of copper, neatly tinned. Mr Harmer supposes that the vessel in which Jael presented the butter-milk to Sisera, which Deborah in her song calls "a lordly dish," or, literally, "a dish of nobles," was of this sort. But Professor Paxton inclines to the idea that it was more probably a large basin of wood, which even in modern times, he tells us, is often presented on the table of Arabian emirs, and accords better with that simple mode of life for which the Kenites were so distinguished. Many of the Arabs, and other Eastern people, dip their hand into the milk, which is placed before them in a wooden dish, and lift it to their mouth in their palm. D'Arvieux says that they eat their pottage in the same way; and Jowett informs us that it is no uncommon thing to see the hands of four or five Arabs in the dish at one time. This circumstance affords a clear illustration of the saying of our Lord: "He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me." "This manner," says Mr Lane, in his account of the modern Egyptians, "is more delicate than may be imagined by those who have not witnessed it. Each person breaks off a small piece of bread, dips it in the dish, and conveys it to his mouth; or he merely sops his morsel in the dish, and hands a particular morsel to his next neighbour."

DISMOUNT. It is reckoned a mark of respect shown to a superior in rank or station, for a rider to dismount. In Palestine, the Jews, who are not permitted to ride on horseback, are compelled to dismount from their asses and pass by a Mohammedan on foot. In accordance with a similar custom we find Achsah, the daughter of Caleb, and Abigail, the wife of Nabal, alighting from their asses. Rebecca also alighted from her camel on the approach of Isaac; and Naaman the Syrian alighted from his chariot at the approach of Gehazi, the servant of Elisha.

DISPENSATION, the mode of the divine administration at different eras of the history of the Church and the world. In carrying forward, progressively, his great designs, the Almighty has adapted his course of procedure to the varied circumstances of man. Thus, in his primeval state of innocence and purity, God treated with him on the footing of a friend, and yet a subject. Man was morally good; but his goodness was subjected to a trial. He fell, and the divine dispensation was forthwith changed. He now treated with man as a sinner, and graciously revealed his promise of mercy through the "seed of the woman." Then, again, after the flood, a covenant was made with Noah, of which the rainbow was the appointed sign; and that covenant secured forbearance, on the part of God, to the world "all the days of the earth," and grace and salvation to the Church and people of God. The calling of Abraham was a still further development of the divine purposes. But the dispensations which are chiefly spoken of as opposed to each other, are the Christian and the Mosaic. "What, then," asks Dr Henderson, treating of this subject, "was the dispensation of Moses? It was a peculiar form of administering the affairs of the Church of God while it was in a state of pupilage and servitude, and by which both the Church and the world were prepared for the establishment of a better and more enduring economy. In it God appeared chiefly in the character of a lawgiver; and the system of his administration was a species of tutorage and discipline adapted to the condition of weak, carnal, and worldly people. Under that form of God's government men became members of his kingdom by birth and parentage—entitled to its privileges by external conformity to its prescribed ritual—and enjoyed, under a theocracy, peculiar immunities, while they were subject to special and severe penalties.

"The law made nothing perfect, being intended only as the introduction of a better hope. Its sacrifices, and the priesthood which was founded on them, were only shadows, and not even the images, of the good things which were to come. The tabernacle and vessels of the ministry—the temple and all its glory—the Land of Canaan, and the Jerusalem that was on earth—were but figures to the time then being of the great transactions of the world to come, of which we speak. Unfitted, by its very nature and enactments to be a universal and permanent dispensation, the seeds of dissolution were implanted in its constitution, and preparation was made for its abrogation long before it took place. Adapted to the locality of Palestine, and never designed to extend far beyond it, the spirit of propagation and enterprise was neither recommended by its Author, nor congenial with its institutions. Limited to place, temporary in duration, and preparatory in its whole design, it gradually decayed and waxed old, and was ready to vanish away, even without a positive act of dissolution—when He, whose voice shook Sinai to its foundation, once more shook, not the earth only, but also heaven; removing, by one sweeping blow, the things that were shaken, and establishing in their place the kingdom which cannot be moved.

"This is the kingdom which we have received—the dispensation to which we belong—which the apostle enjoins us to hold fast, that thus we may have grace to serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear. In contrast, therefore, with the old dispensation, its character may be summed up in three words—SPIRITUAL, UNIVERSAL, PERPETUAL. It is spiritual in its nature, universal in its adaptation and design, and destined for no temporary or subordinate purpose, but to last while the world itself shall endure—till the suffering kingdom on earth be exchanged for God's unsuffering kingdom in heaven."

DISPERSION OF MANKIND. This was occasioned by the confusion of tongues at the overthrow of Babel. Gen. xi. 9. As to the manner of the dispersion of the posterity of Noah from the Plain of Shinar, it was undoubtedly conducted with the utmost regularity and order. The sacred historian informs us that they were divided in their lands; every one according to his tongue, according to his family, and according to his nation. Gen. x. 5, 20, 31. The ends of this dispersion were, to people the earth, to prevent idolatry, and to display the divine wisdom and power. See BABEL—CONFUSION OF TONGUES—DIVISION OF THE EARTH.

DISPUTATION. See CONTROVERSY.

DISRUPTION. This term has been usually applied to that solemn event which will ever be memorable in the ecclesiastical history of Scotland—the separation from the Established Church of that country in one day (the 18th of May 1843) of no fewer than four hundred and seventy ministers, several thousands of her elders, and hundreds of thousands of her people. The cause of this important event, and the consequent setting up of the FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND (which see), has been already referred to under the article ASSEMBLY, GENERAL, OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND; and it may here be generally stated to have been the unwarranted and unscriptural encroachments of the civil courts upon the spiritual independence of the Church, and the sanctioning of these encroachments by the supreme civil legislature of the country. What may be the ultimate consequences of the Disruption it is, of course, impossible to foresee; but in the meantime its beneficial influence, in the wider and more effective extension of the gospel, both at home and abroad, cannot be overlooked. The circumstances attending the Disruption itself are thus eloquently stated by one who was himself a spectator of the scene:—

“The day had now come—the day big with the fate of the Church of Scotland, and without presumption it may be added, with the spiritual welfare of Christendom. It was a bright and lovely day of May—the memorable 18th—when nearly all that Scotland could produce of aristocratic grandeur, and civic authority, and legal dignity, and clerical aspiration, and ministerial worth, and upright integrity, and fervent piety, and eager curiosity, thronged the ancient capital, and poured their countless multitudes along her streets, and to every point of peculiar importance. The reign of silence in grey Holyrood was interrupted, for the annual glitter and noisy bustle of reflected royalty was there; the sombre aspect of the Old Town was changed into the brightness of a gorgeous procession, as her Majesty’s commissioner proceeded to the cathedral church of St Giles; and a close-pent crowd had already, from an early hour, filled St Andrew’s Church, where the Assembly was ere long to meet. Slowly the hours wore past till the levee terminated, and the sermon had been preached by Dr Welsh, the moderator of the preceding Assembly—a sermon distinguished alike by clearness of thought, loftiness of principle, and emphatic energy of expression. Then began the active interest of the day. The streets were filled by a dense mass of human beings; and it required the utmost exertions of a large body of police to open an avenue through the multitude, such as to permit the processional movement of the commissioner to advance. As the brilliant train swept past, it was regarded with utter indifference—their beloved Church was on her trial, and what was shadowed royalty compared to that? When the slow procession passed, the vast crowd closed behind it, as the departed ocean-wave closes behind the gliding ship. Within the Assembly Hall, in St Andrew’s Church, the tramp of steeds, the clash of military accoutrements, and the ringing swell of martial music was heard; the languor of long hours was at once thrown off, and all prepared, with sharpened eye and mind, to notice and to treasure up in memory’s most retentive tablets the even awfully important events of each next trembling moment. All were keenly alive, yet all were deeply still, in the intense eagerness of curiosity, or the solemn earnestness of prayer.

“The members of Assembly came thronging in by either door. On the Moderate side, there was the appearance of uncertainty and care, and somewhat perhaps of gloomy fear, lest after all their victory should prove more disastrous than defeat; and on the Evangelical side, there was that grave and settled seriousness of aspect, that chastened awe of mien and bearing, which men wear when engaged in some great and sacred enterprise. The commissioner, the Marquis of Bute, entered, and was received with the usual ceremonies of respect. The moderator opened the meeting with prayer. Then followed a pause of brief duration, but of dead silence, unbroken save by the quickened beatings of a thousand hearts. Again the moderator spoke, uttering slowly, articulately, and firmly, the following words: ‘According to the usual form of procedure, this is the time for making up the roll; but, in consequence of certain proceedings affecting our rights and privileges—proceedings which have been sanctioned by her Majesty’s government, and by the legislature of the country; and more especially in respect that there has been an infringement on the liberties of our constitution, so that we could not now constitute this Court without a violation of the terms of the union between Church and State in this land, as now authoritatively declared; I must protest against our proceeding further. The reasons that have led me to this conclusion are fully set forth in the document which I hold in my hand, and which, with permission of the House, I shall now proceed to read.’ He then read the Protest, laid it on the table before the clerk, and bowing to the throne where sat the commissioner, attended by the law officers of the crown, withdrew, closely followed by all the men of distinguished genius, and talent, and learning, and piety, and faithfulness, and energy, and zeal—by all whose lives and labours had shed fresh grace and glory on the Church of Scotland, as honoured servants of her Head and King. A long-drawn, sobbing sigh, a suppressed cheer, at once of admiration and deep sympathy, swept round the Church as the crowded spectators gazed intently on the strangely solemn scene. As man by man rose and joined the retiring band, and seat by seat was emptied on the left side of the throne, the Moderate party, the attendants of the commissioner, and the commissioner himself, gazed on with countenances expressive of astonishment and dismay. They were beginning to learn that religious liberty was a reality which the powers of the world might assail, but could not conquer; that faith and truth had yet a home upon the earth; and that there existed a class of men to whom stainless integrity of character, and a conscience void of offence, and spiritual independence, and the glory of the Redeemer’s crown, were more precious than all that the world could give or take away. In some instances the excited aspect of boasting and baffled scorn was even fearful—some who but a few hours before had sent intimation to government that not thirty ministers would leave the Establishment, and whose faces, as they marked the event, grew livid and ghastly with agitation.

“At the door of the church, and in the street immediately in front of it, there had been some excitement among the crowd, from their closeness to the scene, and yet the impossibility of knowing what was going on within. ‘When will they come?’—‘They will not come’—‘They will come’—had been the abruptly interchanged exclamations, when the door opened, and ‘Here they come!’ announced to the vast multitude that the deed was done, and that the Evangelical Church of Scotland was free! Instantly the whole mass of people was in motion; hats and handkerchiefs were waved aloft, and a shout, not loud nor long, but deep and earnest—a shout, the voice of the heart rather than of the lip—burst from the countless thousands that thronged street, and door, and window, and even house-top—wherever a foot could be perched and a view obtained. And how were the ministers to work their way through that dense crowd? No civic force was there to clear a path; the military had retired; but with one simultaneous impulse the mass divided right and left, and opened an avenue in the middle of the street so broad that four might walk abreast, and through that living lane the venerable defenders of religious liberty moved calmly and steadily on along the line of the street leading to their appointed place of meeting at Tanfield Hall, on the north side of the city, in the valley formed by the Water of Leith. Never, perhaps, was there a more signal instance beheld of the power which tried and trusted moral worth and religious dignity exercises over the mind of man, than in that marvellous spectacle; and frankly did many strangers, natives of other lands, who were present, declare, that in no country but Scotland could such a moral and religious triumph have been displayed. Not one single jarring incident occurred; no haste, no confusion disturbed the great and grave solemnity of the Church of Scotland's exodus; her friends were stilled from tumultuary applause, her enemies were restrained from wrathful violence, and the presiding care of her divine Head and King rendered her path one of serenity and peace. Yet when the protesting ministers and elders took their places in the space reserved for them in the spacious Hall, within which already at least three thousand spectators had assembled, and when Dr Welsh opened the meeting with a prayer, remarkable for solemnity of tone, comprehensiveness of thought, and even sublime fervour of devotional spirit, many a bosom could no longer restrain its full and bursting emotions, and many a grave and manly countenance was copiously bathed in tears. It was not sorrow, still less was it regret; it was the outpouring of unutterable gratitude to God for that grace which had enabled them to maintain their integrity, and to bear an unshaken testimony to the truth of Christ's mediatorial sovereignty, and for that providential goodness which had watched over them, preserved them from all strife and confusion, and given to all their proceedings that air of calm untroubled dignity which so well becomed the sacred nature and the vast importance of the event. Another mode of relief to the full heart was obtained when that great multitude stood up to sing the praises of the Lord, in such a strain of rejoicing and adoring melody as human ears have seldom heard, and human voices seldom raised to heaven. But enough; the whole scene was far beyond description—a scene such as to share in and behold, might have amply rewarded the toils and sorrows of a lifetime—a scene worth living to witness, worth dying to realize."

DISSENTERS, a term applied to those who dissent or separate from the Established Church, and are opposed to its principles. The Dissenters in England are a numerous body, more especially if under the term be included the Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodists, who, although they are in a state of separation from the Church of England, refuse to be called Dissenters. A Dissenter, properly speaking, differs from a Seceder in this, that he objects on principle to the very existence of an Established Church, repudiating, as he does, all connection between the Church and the State. If this distinction be maintained, the Methodists in England and the Free Church in Scotland ought rather to be ranked as Seceders than Dissenters. It must be admitted, however, that the number of those who conscientiously hold the principles of Dissent from the Established Churches both of England and Scotland, form a very large and influential body in the country.

DISSIMULATION, the act of dissembling. It has been distinguished from simulation thus: Simulation is making a thing appear which does not exist; dissimulation is keeping that which exists from appearing. Moralists have observed, that all dissimulation is not hypocrisy. A vicious man, who endeavours to throw a veil over his bad conduct, that he may escape the notice of men, is not in the strictest sense of the word a hypocrite; since a man is no more obliged to proclaim his secret vices than any other of his secrets. The hypocrite is one who dissembles for a bad end, and hides the snare that he may be more sure of his prey; and, not content with a negative virtue, or not appearing the ill man he is, makes a show of positive virtue, and appears the man he is not. See HYPOCRISY.

DISSOLUTION, death, or the separation of the body and soul. The "dissolution of the world" is an awful event which we know, both from the Old Testament and New, will certainly take place. 1. It is not an incredible thing, since nothing of a material nature is formed for perpetual duration. 2. It will doubtless be under the direction of the Supreme Being, as its creation was. 3. The soul of man will remain unhurt amidst this general dissolution. 4. It will be an introduction to a greater and nobler system in the government of God. 2 Pet. iii. 13. 5. The consideration of it ought to have a great influence on us while in the present state. 2 Pet. iii. 11, 12. See CONFLAGRATION.

DISTAFF. This word occurs only in Prov. xxxi. 19; and, according to the best Hebrew commentators, it implies the staff on the extremity of which the tow or hemp is fastened for spinning; an art which engages the time of Eastern ladies as well as their maidens.

DIVAN. See BEDS.

DIVERSION. See RECREATION.

DIVINATION, the art of foretelling future events by previously recognised signs. It appears to have been early reduced to a kind of system, and we find it expressly prohibited in Deut. xviii. 10, 11: "There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer." The first time any reference is made to divination is in the history of Joseph: "Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth? ye have done evil in so doing." Gen. xlv. 5. This is an instance of what is called Cupellomancy or Berylomancy—divination by the cup or jewel. Divination by the arrow, or Rhabdomancy, has already been noticed under the article ARROW. Besides these, we find references in Scripture to Necromancy, or divination by the dead (see WITCHCRAFT); Splanchnomancy, divination by inspecting the entrails of victims; Oneiromancy, divination by dreams; Cleromancy, divination by lot; Idolomancy, divination by teraphim; and Phonomancy, divination by voices. See BATH-KOL.

The Jews were permitted in Old Testament times to consult prophets and seers, or Urim and Thummim; but stoning to death was the punishment denounced against diviners or those who consulted them. Notwithstanding this, however, we find the above-mentioned eight kinds of divination resorted to by the Jews for the discovery of future events. Among the Pagan nations of antiquity, it was a favourite custom to regard the writings of their poets as oracles, from which they could draw omens of success, or counsels for direction, or warnings of danger. For this purpose the Greeks resorted to the poems of Homer, and the Romans to those of Virgil: and the mode in which this was done, was, after some religious observances, to open the book at random, and to consider the first passage which presented itself to the eye as an intimation of the divine will. This superstitious practice was not unknown among professing Christians, more especially in the dark ages, with the single modification, that they used the Sacred Scriptures for purposes of divination. Sometimes in their private houses these diviners consulted the Psalms, opening them at random, adding also occasionally the Gospels and Epistles; and at other times they repaired on a set day to church, and regarded the first words of the Psalm which was singing on their entrance as the answer of Heaven. It is astonishing to what an extent this sinful and superstitious custom prevailed in the middle ages, not only among the ignorant, but among those who were accounted the educated classes. With the gradual advance of knowledge, divination by the Scriptures has disappeared, and we suspect is scarcely known at the present day to have ever existed.

DIVINER, one who uses divination, such as Balaam appears to have been. See DIVINATION.

DIVINITY, the science of theology. See THEOLOGY.

DIVISION OF THE EARTH. "The prophecy of Noah," says Dr Hales, "was uttered long after the deluge. It evidently alludes to a divine decree for the orderly division of the earth among the three primitive families of his sons, because it notices the 'tents of Shem,' and the 'enlargement of Japheth.' Gen. ix. 20-27. This decree was probably promulgated about the same time by the venerable patriarch. The prevailing tradition of such a decree for this threefold division of the earth is intimated both in the Old and New Testaments." We find Moses referring to this decree in Deut. xxxii. 7-9: "Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations: ask thy father, and he will show thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee. When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance." Paul also, addressing the Athenians, evidently refers to the same decree: "And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation." Acts xvii. 26. The mode in which this decree was actually accomplished has given rise to much speculation. The arrangement and distribution of the earth is related in Gen. x.; and the following ingenious explanation, given by Dr Candlish, in his "Contributions towards the Exposition of the Book of Genesis," may serve to unravel the intricacies of this much-contested subject:—"Let two lines be drawn; the one from the northern, the other from the southern extremity of Palestine, almost due eastward, through central Asia. Between these two lines lies the portion of Shem; northward of the north line, partly in Asia, partly in Europe, lies the portion of Japheth; southward of the south line, partly also in Asia, and partly in Africa, lies the portion of Ham. In these several portions, we are to look for the nations whose names occur in this chapter, and from whom have issued the colonies that have peopled all the rest of the world.

"Japheth is mentioned first, as being the elder brother. His portion embraces a considerable district or tract of northern Asia—the original seats of the Medes and Persians—together with Asia Minor and the adjacent parts of Europe, called by the Jews 'the isles of the Gentiles,' as they gave that name to all lands to which they were wont to go by sea. Ver. 2-5. Next comes Ham, whose lot is cast to the south of the Mediterranean sea, both in Asia and in Africa (ver. 6-20); while Shem lies between, and is appointed to occupy the good and fertile regions, of which the Holy Land is the crown (ver. 21-31); an extent of territory very nearly corresponding to the grant subsequently made to Abraham. Such is the arrangement which, in the main, is to be traced in the tenth chapter of Genesis.

"But there are two remarkable exceptions, evidently noted as such, in this geographical chart or sketch, which indicates, not only the original scheme of the division of the earth, as it was proposed by God, and published in the days of Peleg (ver. 25), but also the variations which in fact it underwent, through the wilfulness and ambition of man. Ver. 10, 11, and 18, 19. For the Divine plan, although it cannot be supposed to be finally frustrated, but, on the contrary, must ultimately be realised, was not faithfully carried out at first by the tribes and nations to whom it was made known. The expressions used respecting Nimrod, that 'he went forth'—and respecting the families of the Canaanites, that 'they were spread abroad'—seem to mark a roving disposition, and a transgression of the allotted limits: and it is singular that both these deviations from the general arrangement which we have traced, should occur in the line of Ham, who thus, in two instances, encroaches on the portion of Shem.

"1. Nimrod still holds on in his ambitious trade. 'Out of that land,' namely Babel, in the land of Shinar, 'he went forth into Assyria;'—for such is the marginal reading of the eleventh verse, which, by almost universal consent, is here to be preferred. Babel then is, for a season, abandoned; and no wonder, after the dreadful miracle there witnessed; but in the spirit of lawless ambition, other towns are built, and in particular, the great city Nineveh. Ver. 11. Thus this mighty hunter lays the foundation of two mighty empires; the Assyrian, whose seat is to be Nineveh, and the Babylonian, whose vast metropolis is again to be erected beside the gigantic and unfinished tower of Babel. Both enterprises are encroachments and usurpations by the grandson of Ham on the portion of Shem, to whose race has been assigned the plain of Shinar, and indeed the whole of the region watered by the rivers of Paradise—the great streams that empty themselves into the Persian Gulf.

"That this was properly the inheritance of Shem is inferred from various considerations. Thus, it is believed that the primeval language was preserved in the line of Arphaxad, the son of Shem, and ancestor of Abraham; and that his family, accordingly, were appointed to continue in the original seat where

Noah after the flood had settled. More particularly, the description given (ver. 30) of the region assigned to Shem's posterity, as reaching from Mesha, a mountain in the west of Mesopotamia, to mount Sephar, far eastward, in Susia, including the whole land in question,—and the circumstance of Abraham, when he was called, being found settled on that very spot, in Ur of Chaldea, evidently near the vale of Shinar itself,—make it certain that the countries in which the empires of Babylon and Assyria took their rise, formed part of what was assigned, in God's division of the earth, to Shem; and that Nimrod laid the foundation of these empires in acts of unwarrantable aggression on territories which were not his own.

“But his ill-omened ambition has had signal mockery put on it by God. For many ages, indeed, the empires thus founded were allowed to flourish; and their founder received divine honours, in both his capitals, probably as the idol Bel. But long since they have been swept from the face of the earth; and of the trophies of Nimrod's greatness, the towers and cities which he built to outtop the heavens, and to outlast the world, scarce a vestige now remains. Nor is it an improbable anticipation, that the domains, of which he and his posterity usurped unlawful possession, may yet be handed over, in the providence of God, to their rightful owners of the race of Shem, when the way of the kings of the East is prepared, and the dominion is set up of which Solomon's wide extent of empire was the type and pledge.

“2. Another son of Hain, Canaan the cursed, intrudes into the lot of Shem, and into that part of it too which was most sacredly his, where Jehovah was to be blessed as the God of Shem; the spot above all others in the whole earth to which, in his scheme of division, God had special respect—reckoning beforehand the numbers of the children of Israel, his people, who, in that holy land, were to be his portion and the lot of his inheritance. Deut. xxxii. 8, 9. This very corner of Shem's allotted possession we find Canaan quietly preoccupying (ver. 19); not, however, to the frustrating of God's sovereign purpose, according to the election of grace, but to his own worse ruin when the time comes. Long, indeed, was the race of Shem to wait, before being put in possession of that pleasant region, in which Canaan's family might seem to have fully established themselves. Years of Egyptian exile and bondage were to intervene; and when at last the land was handed over to Israel, it teemed with powerful hosts of foes, whom he could not venture to encounter. Numb. xiii., xiv. But the fault in their original title, and their iniquity, which was now full, made the nations of Canaan an easy prey. God himself dispossessed them,—as he is manifestly dispossessing more recent intruders,—that the land, which is his own, rescued from vile pollution and idolatry, might be given to the people whose God is the Lord.”

Thus were the descendants of Noah scattered. What an additional impulse was thus given to the ingenuity of man to overcome the difficulties of his position and to avail himself of the many advantages arising from intercourse with the other portions of the human family, from whom he had thus by Providence been separated!

DIVISIONS, ECCLESIASTICAL. See SCHISM.

DIVORCE is the dissolution of marriage, or separation of man and wife. Divorce may be a mensa et thoro; that is, from bed and board. In this case the wife has a suitable maintenance allowed her out of her husband's effects. Divorce a vinculo matrimonii, that is, from the bond of matrimony, is strictly and properly divorce. This happens either in consequence of criminality, as in the case of adultery, or through some essential impediment; as consanguinity, or affinity within the degrees forbidden, pre-contract, &c., of which impediments the canon law allows no less than fourteen. In these cases, the woman receives again only what she brought. Sentences which release the parties a vinculo matrimonii, on account of impuberty, frigidity, consanguinity or affinity within the prohibited degrees, prior marriage, or want of the requisite consent of parents or guardians, are not properly dissolutions of the marriage contract, but judicial declarations that there never was any marriage; such impediment subsisting at the time as rendered the celebration of the marriage rite a mere nullity. And the rite itself contains an exception of these impediments.

The law of Moses, says Dr Paley, for reasons of local expediency, permitted the Jewish husband to put away his wife; but whether for every cause, or for what cause, appears to have been controverted amongst the interpreters of those times. Christ, the precepts of whose religion were calculated for more general use and observation, revokes his permission, as given to the Jews for their hardness of heart, and promulgates a law which was thenceforward to confine divorces to the single cause of adultery in the wife.—Matt. xix. 9. Inferior causes may justify the separation of husband and wife, although they will not authorize such a dissolution of the marriage contract as would leave either at liberty to marry again; for it is that liberty in which the danger and mischief of divorces principally consist. The law of England, in conformity to our Saviour's injunction, confines the dissolution of the marriage contract to the single case of adultery in the wife; and a divorce even in that case can only be brought about by an act of Parliament, founded upon a previous sentence in the spiritual court, and a verdict against the adulterer at common law; which proceedings, taken together, compose as complete an investigation of the complaint as a cause can receive.

DOCETÆ, an early sect of heretics who arose in the Christian Church, whom Ignatius opposed, and probably even the Apostle John in the outset of his gospel. They may be considered as the forerunners of the Gnostics. They maintained the divinity of Christ, but denied that he possessed a real body. Ebionitism and Docetism form, according to Schleiermacher, natural heresies, and complete each other, as far as this can be the case with one-sided opinions.

DOCTORS, a name given to the teachers of the law of Moses, who were held in great repute among the Jews. They were accustomed to sit on a raised circular bench in the courts of the temple, while their scholars were seated on the floor. From their great learning the Doctors were usually consulted in reference to the interpretations which were to be put upon the law. They were generally of the sect of the Pharisees, and were accustomed to receive from their scholars the title of Rabbi.

DOCTRINE, whatsoever is taught—the principles or positions of any master or sect. As the doctrines of the Bible are the first principles and the foundation of religion, they should be carefully examined and well understood. The Scriptures present us with a copious fund of precious truth, which, though it has not the form of a regular system, yet its parts are such that, when united, they make the most complete body of doctrine that we can possibly have. Every Christian, but divines especially, should make this their study; because all the various doctrines should be insisted on in public, and explained to the people. It is not, however, as some suppose, to fill up every part of a minister's sermon; but to be considered as the basis upon which the practical part is to be built. Some of the divines of the seventeenth century overcharged their discourses with doctrine, overlooking often its practical bearings. It was common in that day to make thirty or forty remarks before the immediate consideration of the text, each of which was just introduced, and which, if enlarged on, would have afforded matter enough for a whole sermon. A wise preacher will join doctrine, experience, and practice together.

Doctrines, though abused by some, yet, properly considered, lie at the very foundation of religious experience, and will influence the heart and life. Thus the idea of God's sovereignty excites submission; his power and justice promote fear; his holiness, humility and purity; his goodness, a ground of hope; his love excites joy; the obscurity of his providence requires patience; his faithfulness, confidence.

DODANIM, the youngest son of Javan (Gen. x. 4). The Samaritan text and Septuagint read Rhodanim, and it has been alleged that he peopled the Island of Rhodes. See DEDAN.

DOG. This useful, sagacious animal was very abundant in the East. To such an extent do they abound in Oriental cities, that they are an almost intolerable nuisance. Fierce, savage, and intractable, they often hunt in bands, and attack men, and even beasts of prey. To this the Psalmist alludes when, speaking of the sufferings of Christ, he says: "For dogs have compassed me: the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me: they pierced my hands and my feet." Ps. xxii. 16. That the dog is naturally a beast of prey, is evident from Exod. xxii. 31: "And ye shall be holy men unto me: neither shall ye eat any flesh that is torn of beasts in the field; ye shall cast it to the dogs." Hence they are spoken of as executing divine justice on rebellions and impenitent nations: "And I will appoint over them four kinds, saith the Lord: the sword to slay, and the dogs to tear, and the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the earth, to devour and destroy." Jer. xv. 3. A disgusting peculiarity of this animal is more than once referred to in the Sacred Volume. Thus: "As a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly." Prov. xxvi. 11. The lapping of dogs when they drink is sometimes imitated in the East; and by this custom the forces of Gideon were tried: "So he brought down the people unto the water: and the Lord said unto Gideon, Every one that lappeth of the water with his tongue, as a dog lappeth, him shalt thou set by himself; likewise every one that boweth down upon his knees to drink." Judg. vii. 5. The irritable temper of the dog is referred to in Prov. xxvi. 17: "He that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears." The term "dog" is often applied in the Bible by way of reproach, and to express contempt. Thus it is applied to the Gentiles: "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs." Matt. xv. 26. It was accounted an unclean animal under the Mosaic law. Isaiah, speaking of corrupt prophets and teachers, says: "The watchmen of Israel are blind: they are all ignorant, they are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark; sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber: yea, they are greedy dogs which can never have enough." This description exactly answers to the account which Oriental travellers give us of the habits of the dog in tropical climates. Instead of barking, they utter only a melancholy howl, and often are completely dumb. The Egyptians worshipped the dog under the name of Anubis.

DOGMA, the doctrine of a particular party or sect; a doctrine propounded for belief.

DOGMAS, HISTORY OF, "that branch of theological science," according to Dr Hagenbach, who has written a work upon the subject, "which exhibits the gradual development of the doctrines of the Christian Church, the various aspects they have assumed in the course of time, and the changes they have undergone through the influence of civilization in different ages of the world." This properly constitutes a part of ecclesiastical history; but, on account of its wide extent, it is now, especially in Germany, treated as a particular science, forming the natural transition from ecclesiastical history to dogmatic theology, properly so called. This department of study takes in the Symbolik of the Church, since it has respect not only to the general formation and import of public confessions of faith, but also to the distinguishing principles set forth in them. Dr Kitto, in his very valuable Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, proposes the term Doctrine History, "since," he says, "we have no corresponding term in the English language." The history of doctrines is useful, both when viewed in a moral and practical aspect. "On the one hand," says Hagenbach, "it exerts a beneficial influence upon the mind of man, by placing before him the efforts and struggles of others in relation to their most important concerns. On the other, it is of special use to the student of theology, for it will preserve him both from that one-sided and rigid adherence to the letter which may be styled false orthodoxy, and from the adoption of daring, superficial, and hastily formed opinions."

DOGMATIC THEOLOGY. See THEOLOGY.

DOMINICANS, an order of preaching friars (sometimes called Jacobins), founded by Dominic de Gusman, a Spaniard, early in the twelfth century. They adopted first the rule of St Augustine, but afterwards that of St Benedict, with great alterations. Preaching was professed to be a great object with them, and from thence they were called preaching friars. They were also called Black Friars, from their habit; and are rendered infamous in history, by pretended apparitions and miracles, in opposition to the Franciscans. As the tool of their impositions, they employed a weak brother named Jetzer, whom they afterwards attempted to poison; but he discovered the whole plot, and brought great disgrace upon the order.

The mother of this saint (for he has been canonized), when pregnant with him, dreamed that she gave birth to a dog with a flambeau or firebrand in his mouth; which received a remarkable accomplishment; for he has had the honour of founding the Inquisition, by which thousands, perhaps millions, of innocent persons have been destroyed. See INQUISITION.

DOMINION OF GOD. See GOVERNMENT OF GOD.

DONATISTS, a body of Christians in Africa, so denominated from their leader, Donatus. They had their origin in the year 311, when, in the room of Mensurius, who died in that year, on his return to Rome, Cecilian was elected Bishop of Carthage, and consecrated, without the concurrence of the Numidian bishops, who disputed the principles of Mensurius, and in these circumstances the people opposed to him Majorinus; who accordingly was ordained by Donatus, bishop of Casæ Nigræ. They were condemned, in a council held at Rome, two years after their separation; and afterwards in another at Arles, the year following; and again at Milan, before Constantine the Great, in 316, who deprived them of their churches, and sent their venerable bishops into banishment, and punished some of them with death. Their cause was espoused by another Donatus, called the Great, the principal bishop of that sect, who, with numbers of his followers, was exiled by order of Constantine. Many of them were punished with great severity. However, after the accession of Julian to the throne in 362, they were permitted to return, and restored to their former liberty. Gratian published several edicts against them, and, in 377, deprived them of their churches, and prohibited all their assemblies. But, notwithstanding the severities they suffered, it appears that they had a very considerable number of churches towards the close of this century; but at this time they began to decline, on account of a schism among themselves, occasioned by the election of two bishops, in the room of Parmenian, the successor of Donatus. One party elected Primian, and were called Primianists; and another Maximian, and were called Maximianists. Their decline was also precipitated by the zealous opposition of Augustine, and by the violent measures which were pursued against them by order of the Emperor Honorius, at the solicitation of two councils held at Carthage—the one in 404, and the other in 411. Many of them were fined, their bishops were banished, and some put to death. This sect revived and multiplied under the protection of the Vandals, who invaded Africa in 427, and took possession of this province; but it sunk again under new severities, when their empire was overturned, in 534. Nevertheless, they remained in a separate body till the close of this century, when Gregory, the Roman pontiff, used various methods for suppressing them. His zeal succeeded, and there are few traces to be found of the Donatists after this period. They were distinguished by other appellations, as Circumcelliones, Montenses, or Mountaineers, Campetes, Rupites, &c. They held three councils—that of Cita in Numidia, and two at Carthage.

They conceived the whole Christian world contaminated by their communion with the African traditors—those who delivered up the Sacred Writings. They held that, on this account, they had fallen into a deep and deadly corruption; and hence, that their baptism was invalid. They considered the Church of Christ, as far as the catholic societies were concerned, as extinct. Donatus seems likewise to have embraced the doctrine of the Arians; though Augustine affirms that the Donatists in this point kept clear of the errors of their leader.

DONATIVE, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, is a benefice given by the patron to a priest, without presentation to the ordinary, and without institution and induction.

DORT, SYNOD OF. This famous synod was convoked by the authority of the States-General of Holland, and consisted not only of deputies from the Belgic Churches, but an earnest application was made to all the Reformed Churches of Europe to commission pious and learned theologians, lovers of peace, to attend, and assist in restoring order and harmony to the agitated Churches of Holland. The occasion of these dissensions and disturbances was the prevalence of the new opinions vented by James Arminius and his followers. Various efforts, for ten years and more, had been made to reconcile the contending parties, and restore peace to the disturbed Churches; but all these efforts proved ineffectual.

At length, under the auspices of Maurice, prince of Orange, letters of convocation were issued, and a committee appointed, selected from both parties, to settle all the preliminaries of time, place, &c. Accordingly, in November, 1618, the synod met at the ancient city of DORDRECHT or DORT, and sat until the end of April, 1619. Prefixed to the published "Acts" of this synod there is an exact and authentic history of Arminianism from its origin, and of all the conferences held between the parties, and of the steps taken to bring about the meeting of the synod. This history is far more authentic than the partial accounts of individuals; for it was not only approved by the Belgic Churches, but also by the States-General.

The character and conduct of this venerable body have been variously represented by writers, according to their partialities in favour of the one side or the other in the controversy. The Arminians complained loudly of having been treated with injustice. They demanded that before the synod Remonstrants and Contra-Remonstrants should be placed on the same ground; but the synod determined, almost unanimously, that the Arminians should appear before them to explain and defend their peculiar opinions, in which they had deviated from the standards of the Belgic Church, and from the doctrines of the Reformed Churches. But all their efforts to induce the Remonstrants to take this ground were unavailing; and accordingly they left the synod in a body, and went home, and never returned. The synod then resolved to proceed to the examination of the FIVE ARTICLES, which had been published by the Arminians in a paper entitled "A REMONSTRANCE"—from which they took their name. These Articles were taken up in order, and the foreign divines requested first to deliver their judgment; which they did in writing. The foreign Churches represented in this synod were those of England, Scotland, Geneva, Switzerland, Embden, Bremen, the Palatinate, and Hesse. The Reformed Churches of France deputed two eminent theologians to the synod, but they were prevented from attending, by an order from the French Government. The papers read before the synod furnish a rich body of sound theology, and are all preserved in the journal or minutes of the body, the whole of which have been published. After the foreign divines had expressed their opinion, the deputies of the Belgic Churches, in order, delivered their judgment on the FIVE ARTICLES. See ARMINIANISM.

The proceedings of the synod, if we may judge from their minutes, and from the testimony of such men as Bishop Hall and Bishop Davenant, were characterized by order, dignity, and a zeal for evangelical truth. Although the Belgic Churches had acknowledged standards of doctrine, yet they were not made the rule of judgment on the points brought before this synod; but every member, rising from his seat, took a solemn oath that he would determine all points on which he gave a judgment by no other authority than the WORD OF GOD, contained in the Holy Scriptures

The harmony of the sentiments of these eminent theologians, from different countries, on the great vital doctrines of Christianity, is truly wonderful, and must be highly satisfactory to the friends of evangelical truth. Not that there was a perfect unanimity in the mode of explaining every point: for in regard to the extent of the atonement there was a difference in their views; for while a majority argued in favour of particular redemption, the English divines and a few others maintained that Christ died for all men. But they all agreed in condemning the Arminian doctrine on this point, as well as on all others: and the general CONFESSION was so drawn up that all could subscribe it; which they did, as far as appears, without exception. This became, in consequence, the public CONFESSION of the Belgic Churches. The doctrine taught in this document is moderate, sound Calvinism. The intercourse between the members of the synod was of the most fraternal and delightful kind. Bishop Hall somewhere says, that the society which he there enjoyed was more like a heaven upon earth than anything which he had ever experienced.

DOSITHEANS, an ancient sect among the Samaritans, in the first century of the Christian era, so called from Dositheus, who endeavoured to persuade the Samaritans that he was the Messiah foretold by Moses.

DOTHAN, a town at the distance of twelve miles northward of Samaria, in the tribe of Ephraim, near to which Joseph was sold by his brethren to the Ishmaelitic merchants. Gen. xxxvii. 17. This was the town, also, where Elisha was surrounded by the troops of Benhadad, king of Syria, who were sent to apprehend him, but were smitten with blindness, by which the prophet escaped. 2 Kings vi. 13. According to the description of Burckhardt, the pit of Joseph is about three feet in diameter, and at least thirty in depth. Its sides are lined with masonry, its bottom is hewn in the rock, and its waters are said never to dry up—a circumstance which rather militates against the supposition that this was the pit into which Joseph was cast, Gen. xxxvii. 24.

DOUBLE has several shades of signification in Scripture. "A double garment" may mean a lined habit, such as the high priest's pectoral; or a complete habit or suit of clothes, a cloak, and a tunic, &c. Double heart, double tongue, double mind, are opposed to a simple, honest, sincere heart, tongue, and mind. Double, the counterpart to a quantity which is proposed as the exemplar. Gen. xliii. 12, 15.

For the right understanding of Isa. xl. 2, "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins," Mr Taylor says, read, the counterpart—that which is adequate, all things considered, as a dispensation of punishment. But if this be the sense, how could it be said, "Her iniquity is pardoned," since punishment and pardon, in the very nature of things, seem opposed to each other. Others observe, therefore, that the expression alludes to a common custom in the East, of doubling down a leaf in an account book, whenever an account was settled. In this sense, "the double" is equivalent to the discharge. If this be correct, we may read the passage: "Her warfare is accomplished, her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand a discharge for all her sins;" that is, a complete settlement has taken place. The same seems to be the meaning of this word in other places (Isa. lxi. 7), unless, indeed, it alludes to a double portion; that is, blessings twice as great as were enjoyed before.

DOUBTS AND FEARS are terms frequently used to denote the uncertainty of mind we are in respecting our interest in the divine favour. The causes of our doubts may be such as these: personal declension; not knowing the exact time, place, or means of our conversion; improper views of the character and decrees of God; the fluctuation of religious experience as to the enjoyment of God in prayer, hearing, &c.; the depth of our affliction; relapses into sin; the fall of professors; and the hidings of God's face. "It is a sin," says one, "for a believer to live so as not to have his evidences clear; but it is no sin for him to be so earnest and impartial as to doubt, when in fact his evidences are not clear." Let the humble Christian, however, beware of an extreme. Prayer, conversation with experienced Christians, reading the promises, and consideration of the divine goodness, will have a tendency to remove unnecessary doubts.

DOUGH. When the Israelites left Egypt they carried with them dough in their kneading-troughs upon their shoulders. Exod. xii. 34. These troughs among the modern Arabs are wooden bowls; but Dr Boothroyd supposes it to refer to the bags in which the wandering Arabs carry their bread when on a journey.

DOVE. This beautiful genus of birds is very numerous in the East. In the wild state they generally build their nests in the holes or clefts of rocks, or in excavated trees; but they are easily taught submission and familiarity with mankind; and, when domesticated, build in structures erected for their accommodation, called "dove-cots." They are classed by Moses among the clean birds; and it appears, from the sacred as well as other writers, that doves were always held in the highest estimation among the Eastern nations. Rosenmüller, in a note upon Bochart, derives the name from the Arabic, where it signifies mildness or gentleness. The dove is mentioned in Scripture as the symbol of simplicity, innocence, gentleness, affection, and fidelity. Hos. vii. 11; Matt. x. 16.

The first mention of the dove in the Scripture is Gen. viii. 8–12, where Noah sent one from the ark to ascertain if the waters of the deluge had assuaged. She was sent forth thrice. The first time she speedily returned; having, in all probability, gone but a little way from the ark, as she must naturally have been terrified at the appearance of the waters. After seven days, being sent out a second time, she returned with an olive leaf plucked off, whereby it became evident that the flood was considerably abated, and had sunk below the tops of the trees; and thus relieved the fears and cheered the hearts of Noah and his family. And hence the olive branch has ever been among the forerunners of peace, and chief of those emblems by which a happy state of renovation and restoration to prosperity has been signified to mankind. At the end of other seven days the dove, being sent out a third time, returned no more; from which Noah conjectured that the earth was so far drained as to afford sustenance for the birds and fowls; and he therefore removed the covering of the ark, which probably gave liberty to many of the fowls to fly off; and these circumstances afforded him the greater facility for making arrangements for disembarking the other animals. Doves might be offered in sacrifice, when those who were poor could not bring a more costly offering.

The following extract from Morier's Persian Travels illustrates a passage in Isaiah: "In the environs of the city, to the westward, near the Zainderood, are many pigeon-houses, erected at a distance from habitations, for the sole purpose of collecting pigeons' dung for manure. They are large round towers, rather broader at the bottom than the top, and crowned by conical spiracles, through which the pigeons descend. Their interior resembles a honey-comb, pierced with a thousand holes, each of which forms a snug retreat for a nest. More care appears to have been bestowed upon their outside than upon that of the generality of the dwelling-houses; for they are painted and ornamented. The extraordinary flights of pigeons which I have seen alight upon one of these buildings afford, perhaps, a good illustration of the passage in Isa. lx. 8: 'Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?' Their great numbers, and the compactness of their mass, literally look like a cloud at a distance, and obscure the sun in their passage."

The word dove is often applied in Eastern language as a term of endearment. Thus: "I sleep, but my heart waketh: it is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled: for my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night;" and: "My dove, my undefiled, is but one; she is the only one of her mother, she is the choice one of her that bare her. The daughters saw her, and blessed her; yea, the queens and the concubines, and they praised her." Cant. v. 2, vi. 9. In Cant. ii. 14, the bride is called a dove, from her lovely appearance and amiable manners: "O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock, in the secret places of the stairs, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; for sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely." When the dove is absent from its mate it utters a mournful sound, alluded to by Hezekiah: "Like a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter: I did mourn as a dove: mine eyes fail with looking upward: O Lord, I am oppressed; undertake for me." Isa. xxxviii. 14. The dove is employed as an emblem of the Holy Ghost. Thus we find the Spirit descending upon Jesus at his baptism in the form of a dove. In the time of our Lord, doves were sold in the porch of the temple, that they might be used in sacrifice.

DOVES' DUNG. It is said (2 Kings vi. 25) that during the siege of Samaria, "the fourth part of a cab [little more than half a pint] of doves' dung was sold for five pieces of silver;" about six shillings and threepence of our money. It is well known that doves' dung is not a nourishment for man, even in the most extreme famine; and hence Josephus and Theodoret were of opinion that it was bought instead of salt, to serve as a kind of manure for the purpose of raising esculent plants of quick vegetation. The Rabbins affirm that it was not the dung of pigeons, but the corn of their crops, which they brought back well filled out of the fields, not being trammelled by the siege, but allowed to roam at large. Bochart thinks that it means a vegetable substance—probably vetches or pulse. Mr Morier tells us, that "the dung of pigeons is the dearest manure which the Persians use; and as they apply it almost entirely to the rearing of melons, it is probable on that account that the melons of Ispahan are so much finer than those of other cities." The general opinion, since Bochart, is, that it was a kind of chick-pea, or tare, which has very much the appearance of doves' dung, whence it might be named.

DOWRY. Nothing distinguishes more the married state among us from the same connection when formed in the East, than the different methods of proceeding between the father-in-law and the intended bridegroom. Among us, the father usually gives a portion to his daughter, which becomes the property of her husband; and which often makes a considerable part of his wealth; but in the East, the bridegroom offers to the father of his bride a sum of money, or value to his satisfaction, before he can expect to receive his daughter in marriage. Of this procedure we have instances from the earliest times. When Jacob had nothing which he could immediately give for a wife, he purchased her by his services to her father, Laban. Gen. xxix. 18. So we find Shechem offers to pay any value as a dowry for Dinah. Gen. xxxiv. 12. In this passage is mentioned a distinction still observed in the East: 1. "A dowry" to the family, as a token of honour, to engage their favourable interest in the desired alliance. 2. "A gift" to the bride herself,—as, for example, of jewels and other decorations—a compliment of honour, as Abraham's servant gave to Rebecca. See MARRIAGE.

DOXOLOGY, a hymn of great antiquity, in which glory is ascribed to God. It is distinguished by the titles of the greater and the less. Both the doxologies are used in the Church of England. The greater doxology, which is also called the angelic hymn, is used at the conclusion of the liturgy, beginning with "Glory be to God on high." This hymn was used in the time of Athanasius, in the beginning of the fourth century. The lesser doxology is used at the end of every psalm, beginning "Glory be to the Father, to the Son," &c.

DRACHMA. This coin was equal to a Roman denarius, or sevenpence three farthings of our money; and the didrachma, or tribute-money mentioned in Matt. xvii. 24, was equal to fifteenpence halfpenny. It is said to have been stamped with a lyre on one side, and a vine on the other.

DRAG, a kind of net used by Eastern fishermen, and referred to by the Prophet Habakkuk (i. 15, 16). It was also an agricultural implement for threshing out the grain, consisting of strong planks made rough at the bottom with hard stones or iron. It was drawn by oxen or horses over the corn sheaves spread on the floor, the driver sitting upon it. This instrument, used in Syria, not only forced out the grain, but also cut the straw in pieces, which is used in this state all over the countries of the East as fodder for the cattle.

DRAGON. This word our translators seem to have rendered in a variety of ways, sometimes using the terms crocodiles, whales, sea-monsters, and serpents. Its precise meaning cannot now be ascertained. Mr Taylor understands it as including the whole class of lizards, and also the seal. The Rev. J. Hurdis again considers it as the crocodile. The word "dragons" in Job xxx. 29, Dr Boothroyd renders by "sea-monsters." The serpent which is usually understood to be referred to in Scripture when dragons are spoken of, is the boa-constrictor, the largest and most powerful of the serpent tribe, being frequently from thirty to forty feet in length, and of proportionate thickness. Bishop Pococke is persuaded that the Hebrew word translated "dragons" means "jackals." From the Apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon, Mr Harris thinks it is evident that the idol was a living crocodile.

DRAGON WELL. This place, which lay east of Jerusalem, and is referred to in Neh. ii. 13, appears to have received its name from a dragon or snake having fixed its residence there during the long desolation of that city.

DRAM. This word, which occurs in Ezra ii. 69, and Neh. vii. 70-72, is a Daric or Persian coin of pure gold, which was also in circulation among the Jews under the Persian government. It is usually valued by modern authors at fifteen shillings. According to Dr Bernard, its weight was two grains more than the English guinea, and worth about twenty-five shillings.

DRAUGHT HOUSE. This word occurs only in 2 Kings x. 27. Jehu, to show his contempt for the worship of Baal, ordered his temple to be destroyed, and the place converted to a vile purpose—that of receiving offal or ordure.

DRAWERS OF WATER. This term occurs in Deut. xxix. 11; Josh. ix. 21, 23. It was accounted a very hard, servile employment; and accordingly we find the Gibeonites doomed to it. In Asiatic cities water is carried from the wells by persons who make a trade of it, and who may often be seen passing along the streets with their goat-skin bags slung over their shoulders.

DREAD, a high degree of fear. See FEAR.

DREAM, the excited state of the imagination in sleep, whether from natural or supernatural causes. From a very early period we find much importance attached to dreams, as being one of the modes in which God was pleased to reveal his will to man. Hence the interpretation of dreams was eagerly sought for. Thus in Gen. xl. we read remarkable instances of dreams in the case of Pharaoh's butler and baker. All interpretations of dreams, unless by prophets authorised by God, were expressly prohibited. It was highly sinful in Saul, therefore, to consult the Witch of Endor before the battle of Gilboa.

The Lord frequently discovered his will in dreams, and enabled persons to explain them. The Midianites gave credit to dreams, as appears from that which a Midianite related to his companion, and from whose interpretation Gideon took a happy omen. Judg. vii. 13-15. The prophet Jeremiah (xxiii. 25-28) exclaims against impostors who pretended to have had dreams, and abused the credulity of the people. The prophet Joel (ii. 28) promises from God that, in the reign of the Messiah, the effusion of the Holy Spirit should be so copious, that the old men should have prophetic dreams, and the young men should receive visions.

The word signifies, likewise, those vain images beheld in imagination while asleep, which have no relation to prophecy. Job xx. 8; Isa. xxix. 7; see also Eccl. v. 3, 7. And it ought not to be overlooked that we now have in the Holy Scriptures a complete revelation of divine truth; so that to be expecting new revelations by dreams or visions is to be carried away with the spirit of error and delusion. 1 John iv. 1-6. The wisest use Christians now can make of dreams is to be admonished by them to attend to the Word of God. Jer. xxiii. 28.

Dreams should be carefully distinguished from visions: the former occurred during sleep, and therefore were liable to much ambiguity and uncertainty; the latter when the person, being awake, retained possession of his natural powers and faculties.

DREAMER is used as a word of reproach of Joseph by his brethren (Gen. xxxvii. 19); and of Shemaiah. Jer. xxix. 24. See Jer. xxvii. 9; Jude 8. See also Isa. lvi. 10.

DREGS. The best wines of the East are commonly mixed with dregs, so that they are strained for use. Accordingly we are told, in Ps. lxxv. 8: "In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture; and he poureth out of the same: but the dregs thereof all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them;" which denotes that the pure wine would be given as a wine of blessing to the righteous, while the wicked should be doomed to drink the impure dregs.

DRESS. So many and so rapid are the changes which take place in the dress of modern European nations, that it is impossible to give any description of it which can for any length of time be regarded as faithful and true. It is quite otherwise, however, with oriental nations. Travellers inform us that in the East the dress of the natives has undergone little or no change from the earliest ages. Long flowing garments thrown loosely about the body form the chief dress of the Asiatics; and their beauty is considered as consisting, not in the shape and structure of the garment, but in the fineness and colour of the stuff from which it is made. In Canaan, people of rank were dressed in the fine linen of Egypt. For mourning, sackcloth of black goats' hair was used. Hence the frequent figurative expression in Scripture, "sackcloth and blackness." The colour in most general use among the Israelites was white. Hence the exhortation of Solomon, "Let thy garments be always white." Eccles. ix. 8. This colour was regarded as the emblem of purity; and accordingly the saints in heaven are represented as dressed in white robes. Blue was also a favourite colour among the Jews, who were commanded to put a fringe of blue to the border of their garments. It is probable that at a very early period the art of dyeing with blue was known among the Tyrians. It was a very prominent colour in the sumptuous hangings of the tabernacle. On solemn and important occasions the Jewish nobles were dressed in scarlet robes. Purple robes were also held in high estimation, and were chiefly worn by persons of distinction. A coat of many colours was, as in the case of Joseph, viewed, even in patriarchal times, as a badge of honour. The Jews were forbidden by the law to wear a garment composed of both woollen and linen. The ancient Jews generally walked bare-headed, except when they were in mourning, or worshipping in the temple, or in the synagogue. But during the captivity in Babylon, they acquired the practice of wearing turbans. The full dress of an ancient Jew is thus described by Professor Paxton:—"A woollen shirt was worn next the skin, although some had shirts of linen in which they slept, because these were more cleanly and wholesome. But this part of their dress is to be distinguished from the cafetan or shirt, which the bridegroom and the bride sent to each other; which they wore over their clothes at their solemn festivals, and in which they were at last buried. Next to it was the coat, which reached to their feet, and was accounted a modest and honourable article of dress. This greatly aggravated the indignity which the king of Ammon offered to the ambassadors of David, by cutting off their garments in the middle to their buttocks; he insulted them by spoiling the most esteemed part of their dress; he exposed them to shame, by uncovering their nakedness, as they seem to have worn no breeches under their upper garment. The tunic was the principal part of the Jewish dress; it was made nearly in the form of our present shirt. A round hole was cut at top, merely to permit the head to pass through. Sometimes it had long sleeves, which reached down to the wrists; at other times, short sleeves, which reached to the elbow; some had very short sleeves, which reached only to the middle of the upper arm, and some had no sleeves at all. The tunic was nearly the same with the Roman stola; and was, in general, girded round the waist, or under the breast with the zona or girdle. Descending to the ground, and floating round the feet, it was, in the days of our Lord, a distinguishing badge of the proud Pharisee: 'Beware of the scribes,' said he, 'who love to walk in long robes,' in tunics at full length, and reaching to the ground. These coats were collared at the neck, and fringed at the bottom. Over the tunic they wore a blanket, which the Arabs call a hyke, and is the very same with the plaid of the Scottish Highlanders." These cloaks or plaids were usually laid aside when any work was to be engaged in which required activity and energy. Thus when our Lord was about to wash the disciples' feet, he threw off his upper garment, and girt his coat or tunic about him with a towel. The girdle, indeed, is an indispensable part of the dress of an Oriental. Dr Paxton, in speaking of the dress of Oriental females, remarks: "The habit of Eastern females was suited to their station, and women of all ages and conditions appeared in dresses of the same fashion; only a married woman wore a veil upon her head, in token of subjection; and a widow had a garment which indicated her widowed state. The daughters of a king, and ladies of high rank, who were virgins, wore a garment of many colours, reaching, as is supposed, to the heels or ankles, with long sleeves down to the wrists, which had a border at the bottom, and a facing at the hands, of a colour different from the garment: it was likewise embroidered with flowers, which, in ancient times, was reckoned both splendid and beautiful. This elegant piece of female attire, which is worn under the tunic, sometimes shaped like a long flowing shirt, oftener in the form of the wide and loose drawers of the East, was wrought by the needle; and as embroidery in ancient times was the occupation or pastime only of ladies of the highest rank, the possession of these party-coloured garments was a mark of distinction, and they were worn exclusively by young women of noble or royal condition, as Tamar was. In after ages, when the art of interweaving a variegated pattern with the simple cloth, or of printing was discovered, dresses of this beautiful description became more common, and are generally worn by ladies in the East in the present day. A common prostitute, among the Jews, was known, as well by the peculiar vesture she wore, as by having no covering upon her head, and her eyebrows painted with stibium, which dilated the pupil and made the eyes look black and beautiful. In the days of Jacob, the harlot seems to have been distinguished by her veil, and by wrapping herself in some peculiar manner; for these are the circumstances that induced Judah to consider Tamar, his daughter-in-law, as a woman of this character:—"She put her widow's garments off from her, and covered her with a veil, and wrapped herself, and sat in an open place, which is by the way to Timnath." When Judah saw her, he thought her to be an harlot, because she had covered her face. It may be justly inferred from this passage, that modest women did not constantly wear a veil in those days. Rebecca, indeed, put a veil on her face when she met Isaac in the field: but it was a part of the marriage ceremony to deliver the bride covered with a veil from head to foot; and Rebecca in this instance only followed the established custom of her country. Had it been the practice of modest women in that age to cover their faces, in the presence of the other sex, she would not have needed to veil herself when her future husband met her in the field. She seems to have had no veil when Abraham's servant accosted her at the well; nor, for any thing that can be discovered, was Rachel veiled at her first interview with Jacob; or, if they did appear in veils, these prevented not a part of the face from being seen. The practice of wearing veils, except at the marriage ceremony, must therefore be referred to a later period, and was perhaps not introduced till after the lapse of several ages." The following extract from 'Forbes' Oriental Memoirs,' quoted by Dr Jamieson in his valuable additions to 'Paxton's Illustrations,' gives a picture of a Mogul lady in full dress, and may serve to enable the reader to form a lively conception of the dress of an Oriental lady, such as is often referred to in sacred Scripture:—"Her age did not exceed fifteen; her form was perfect, her features regular, and her large antelope eyes of a brilliant lustre. Although fairer than the generality of Indian females, neither the rose nor the lily adorned her complexion; yet the brunette tint rather enriched than impaired the softness and delicacy of her skin; and I hastily sketched her as a well-dressed Mogul. Her drawers of green satin, flowered with gold, were seen under a chemise of transparent gauze, reaching to her slippers, richly embroidered; a vest of pale blue satin, edged with gold, sat close to her shape, which an upper robe of striped silver muslin, full and flowing, displayed to great advantage; a netted veil of crimson silk, flowered with silver, fell carelessly over her long braided hair, combed smooth, and divided from the forehead, where a cluster of jewels was fastened by strings of seed-pearl; her ear-rings were large and handsome; that in her nose, according to our ideas of ornament, less becoming—but the Asiatic ladies are extremely fond of the nose-jewel. A necklace, in intermingled rows of pearl and gold, covered her bosom, and several strings of large pearls were suspended from an embroidered girdle set with diamonds; bracelets of gold and coral reached from the wrist to the elbow; golden chains encircled her ankles, and all her toes and fingers were adorned with valuable rings. Like most of the oriental females, of all religions, her eyes were tinged by a black circle, formed with the powder of antimony, which produces a refreshing coolness, gives the eye an additional lustre, and is thought to be a general improvement to Asiatic beauty."

DROMEDARY. See CAMEL.

DRUIDS, the priests or ministers of religion among the ancient Gauls, Britons, and Germans, who resembled, in many respects, the Brahmans of India. They were chosen out of the best families; and the honours of their birth, joined with those of their function, procured them the highest veneration among the people. They were versed in astrology, geometry, natural philosophy, politics, and geography; they were the interpreters of religion, and the judges of all affairs indifferently. Whoever refused obedience to them was declared impious and accursed. We know but little as to their peculiar doctrines, only that they believed the immortality of the soul, and, as is generally also supposed, the transmigration of it to other bodies; though a late author makes it appear highly probable they did not believe this last, at least not in the sense of the Pythagoreans. The chief settlement of the Druids in Britain was in the Isle of Anglesey, the ancient Mona; which they might choose for this purpose, as it is well stored with precious groves of their favourite oak. They were divided into several classes or branches; such as the priests, the poets, the augurs, the civil judges, and instructors of youth. Strabo, however, does not comprehend all these different orders under the denomination of Druids. He only distinguishes three kinds: Bardi, poets; the Vates, priests and naturalists; and the Druids, who, besides the study of nature, applied themselves likewise to morality.

Their garments were remarkably long, and when employed in religious ceremonies, they likewise wore a white surplice. They generally carried a wand in their hands, and wore a kind of ornament, encased with gold, about their necks, called the Druid's egg. They had one chief, or Arch-druid, in every nation, who acted as high priest, or pontifex maximus. He had absolute authority over the rest, and commanded, decreed, and punished at pleasure. They worshipped the Supreme Being under the name of Esus or Hesus, whose symbol was the oak; and had no other temple than a wood or a grove, where all their religious rites were performed. Nor was any person permitted to enter that sacred recess, unless he carried with him a chain, in token of his absolute dependence on the Deity. Indeed their whole religion consisted in acknowledging that the Supreme Being, who made his abode in those sacred groves, governed the universe; and that every creature ought to obey his laws, and pay him divine homage. Mr Bryant, however, maintains that they were idolaters, and that the sun was the grand object of their worship. They considered the oak as the emblem, or rather the peculiar residence, of the Almighty; and accordingly, chaplets of oak were worn, both by the Druids and people, in their religious ceremonies; the altars were strewed with its leaves, and encircled with its branches. The fruit of it, especially the mistletoe, was thought to contain a divine virtue, and to be the peculiar gift of Heaven. It was, therefore, sought for on the sixth day of the moon with the greatest earnestness and anxiety; and when found, was hailed with such rapture of joy as almost exceeds imagination to conceive. As soon as the Druids were informed of the fortunate discovery, they prepared everything ready for the sacrifice under the oak (see Ezek. vi. 13), to which they fastened two white bulls by the horns; then the Arch-druid, attended by a prodigious number of people, ascended the tree, dressed in white, and with a consecrated golden knife, or pruning hook, cropped the mistletoe, which he received in his robe, amidst the rapturous exclamations of the people. Having secured this sacred plant, he descended the tree, the bulls were sacrificed, and the Deity invoked to bless his own gift, and render it efficacious in those distempers in which it should be administered. According to Cæsar, they, in some cases, offered human victims, and that upon the conviction that human blood was required to atone for human guilt.

DRUNKENNESS. The first instance of intoxication on record is that of Noah (Gen. ix. 21), who was probably ignorant of the effects of the expressed juice of the grape. The sin of drunkenness is most expressly condemned in the Scriptures. Rom. xiii. 13; 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10; Eph. v. 18; 1 Thess. v. 7, 8. Men are sometimes represented as drunk with sorrow, with afflictions, and with the wine of God's wrath. Isa. lxiii. 6; Jer. li. 57; Ezek. xxiii. 33. Persons under the influence of superstition, idolatry, and delusion, are said to be drunk; because they make no use of their natural reason. Isa. xxviii. 7; Rev. xvii. 2. Drunkenness sometimes denotes abundance, satiety. Deut. xxxii. 42; Isa. xlix. 26. To "add drunkenness to thirst" (Deut. xxix. 19), is to add one sin to another. See INTEMPERANCE.

DRUSILLA, the youngest daughter of that Herod Agrippa by whom the Apostle James was beheaded. She is said to have been more remarkable for her beauty than for the respectability of her character. She was betrothed to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Comagena; but, on that prince refusing to be circumcised, the negotiation was broken off, and Drusilla was afterwards married to Azizas, king of Emesa. In a short time, however, she abandoned her husband, and married Claudius Felix, the governor of Judea, by whom she had a son named Agrippa. It was in the presence of this Drusilla and her paramour Felix, that the Apostle Paul made his well-known defence. Acts xxiv. 24.

DUKE. This word occurs in Gen. xxxvi. 15-43, and is intended to denote governors, chieftains, princes, an order of rulers inferior to kings, and corresponding to the emirs of the East.

DULCIMER. This, which is the name of a musical instrument, occurs only in the prophet Daniel (iii. 5, 10, 15.) The author of the article MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS in 'Kitto's Cyclopædia' supposes the dulcimer to have been a species of flute or shepherd's pipe, made of two reeds, which is still used in Palestine. The Rabbins describe it as a kind of bagpipe; but the dulcimer, as we now understand it, is an instrument of fifty wires, struck with an iron key. It is possible that the word may have denoted the Syrian syrinx, or Pandæan pipe.

DUMAH, a city of Judah. Josh. xv. 52. It is also a shortened form of speaking and writing Idumea. Gen. xxv. 14; Isa. xxi. 11. See IDUMEA.

DUMB.—1. One unable to speak by reason of natural infirmity. Exod. iv. 11. 2. One unable to speak by reason of want of knowledge what to say, or how to say it; what proper mode of address to use, or what reasons to allege on his own behalf. Prov. xxxi. 8. 3. One unwilling to speak. Ps. xxxix. 9. We have a remarkable instance of this reverential dumbness, or submissive silence, in the case of Aaron (Lev. x. 3) after Nadab and Abihu, his sons, were consumed by fire—"Aaron held his peace!" did not exclaim against the justice of God, but saw the propriety of the divine procedure, and humbly acquiesced in it.

DUNG. In the East, dung is used for fuel when wood is scarce. It is often employed in heating their ovens and baths. This explains the command given to Ezekiel (iv. 12) to prepare his bread with human dung; thereby showing the degraded state to which the captives in Babylon were to be reduced. Even the bread prepared with cow dung as fuel emits a most disagreeable odour. "It is almost inconceivable," says Tournefort, "what a horrid perfume this dung makes in their houses; everything they eat has a stench of this vapour."

DUNGHILL. In Lam. iv. 5, we find it stated, to express the extreme misery of the Jews who escaped from the sword of Nebuchadnezzar: "They that did feed delicately are desolate in the streets: they that were brought up in scarlet embrace dunghills." The dunghill is represented in Scripture as one of the common resorts of the beggar. Hence: "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory: for the pillars of the earth are the Lord's, and he hath set the world upon them." 1 Sam. ii. 8.

DUNKERS, a denomination of Anti-Pædo-Baptists, which took its rise in the year 1724. It was founded by Conrad Beissel, a German, who retired to an agreeable solitude within fifty miles of Philadelphia for the more free exercise of religious contemplation. Curiosity attracted followers, and his simple and engaging manners made them proselytes. They soon settled a little colony, called Euphrate, in allusion to the Hebrews, who used to sing psalms on the borders of the River Euphrates. This denomination seem to have obtained their name from their baptizing their new converts by plunging. They are also called Tumblers, from the manner in which they perform baptism, which is by putting the person, while kneeling, head first under water, so as to resemble the motion of the body in the action of tumbling. They use the true immersion, with laying on the hands and prayer, even when the person baptized is in the water.

Their habit seems to be peculiar to themselves, consisting of a long tunic or coat, reaching down to their heels, with a sash or girdle round the waist, and a cap or hood hanging from the shoulders, like the dress of the Dominican friars. The men do not shave the head or beard. The men and women have separate habitations and distinct governments. For these purposes they have erected two large wooden buildings, one of which is occupied by the brethren, the other by the sisters of the society; and in each of them there is a banqueting-room, and an apartment for public worship; for the brethren and sisters do not meet together, even at their devotions. They used to live chiefly upon roots and other vegetables, the rules of their society not allowing them flesh, except on particular occasions, when they hold what they call a love feast; at which time the brethren and sisters dine together in a large apartment, and eat mutton, but no other meat.

Their church government and discipline are the same with the Baptists in general, except that every brother is allowed to speak in the congregation; and their best speaker is usually ordained to be the minister. They have deacons and deaconesses from among their ancient widows and exhorters, who are all licensed to use their gifts stately. The members of this sect are usually valued among their neighbours as persons of the strictest probity and honour, devotedly attached to their own faith. They are no longer limited to a particular district, but are scattered over a large extent of country.

DURA, a great plain near Babylon, where Nebuchadnezzar erected a colossal image of gold to be worshipped. Dan. iii. 1. See BABYLON.

DURSIANS, or DERUZIANS, a fierce people, formerly inhabiting the wilds of Mount Libanus, and in the eleventh century engaged in the holy war. There is evidence that they understood some of the principles, and perhaps made a general profession, of Christianity; but their peculiar tenets were kept so secret that they cannot now be ascertained with certainty. It is probable, however, from many circumstances, that they were the descendants of the early Druses. This may be inferred from their name, residence, corresponding character, and hatred to the Turks, which was very likely to engage them in such an expedition, though the fact cannot be historically traced. Dr Mosheim suspects them to be Manichæans; but it seems more likely they picked up their loose and imperfect notions of Christianity from some of the fanatics engaged in the crusades.

DUST. The expression "sitting in dust and ashes," is frequently used in Scripture to indicate penitence or mourning. Thus Isaiah xlvii. 1: "Come down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon; sit on the ground: there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate;" and Lam. iii. 29: "He putteth his mouth in the dust, if so be there may be hope." When the apostles were rejected by any people, they were commanded to shake off the dust from their feet as a testimony against them. This was done in the case of Antioch in Pisidia. Acts xiii. 51. In Deut. xxviii. 24, the Lord threatens the Jews that their rain should become powder and dust. The following extract from Sir Thomas Roe's 'Embassy to the Court of the Great Mogul,' may serve to cast light on this: "Sometimes, in India, the wind blows very high in hot and dry seasons, raising up into the air, to a very great height, thick clouds of dust and sand. These dry showers most grievously annoy all those among whom they fall—enough to smite them all with present blindness; filling their eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouths too, if not well guarded; searching every place, as well within as without, so that there is not a little key-hole of any trunk or cabinet, if it be not covered, but receives this dust; add to this, that the fields, brooks, and gardens suffer extremely from these terrible showers."

In almost every part of Asia, those who demand justice against a criminal throw dust upon him, signifying that he deserves to lose his life, and be cast into the grave; and that this is the true interpretation of the action, is evident from an imprecation in common use among the Turks and Persians: "Be covered with earth!" "Earth be upon thy head!" We have two remarkable instances of casting dust recorded in Scripture: the first is that of Shimei, who gave vent to his secret hostility to David, when he fled before his rebellious son, by throwing stones at him, and casting dust. 2 Sam. xvi. 13. It was an ancient custom, in those warm and arid countries, to lay the dust before a person of distinction, and particularly before kings and princes, by sprinkling the ground with water. To throw dust into the air while a person was passing, was therefore an act of great disrespect—to do so before a sovereign prince, an indecent outrage. But it is clear that Shimei meant more than disrespect and outrage to an afflicted king, whose subject he was; he intended to signify by that action that David was unfit to live, and that the time was at last arrived to offer him a sacrifice to the ambition and vengeance of the house of Saul. This view of his conduct is confirmed by the behaviour of the Jews to the Apostle Paul, when they seized him in the temple, and had nearly succeeded in putting him to death; they cried out: "Away with such a fellow from the earth, for it is not fit that he should live. And as they cried out, and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air, the chief captain commanded him to be brought into the castle." Acts xxii. 22-24. A great similarity appears between the conduct of the Jews on this occasion and the behaviour of the peasants in Persia, when they go to court to complain of the governors whose oppressions they can no longer endure. They carry their complaints against their governors by companies, consisting of several hundreds, and sometimes of a thousand; they repair to that gate of the palace nearest to which their prince is most likely to be, where they set themselves to make the most horrid cries, tearing their garments, and throwing dust into the air, and demanding justice. The king, upon hearing these cries, sends to know the occasion of them: the people deliver their complaints in writing; upon which he informs them that he will commit the cognizance of the affair to such an one as he names; and in consequence of this, justice is usually obtained.

DUTY, any action, or course of actions, which flows from the relations we stand in to God or man—that which a man is bound to perform by any natural or legal obligation. The various moral, relative, and spiritual duties are considered in their places in this work.

DWELL. God dwells in light, in respect of his delight in and independent possession of his own glorious excellences, and in respect of his glorious residence amid rays of inexpressible glory in heaven. 1 Tim. vi. 16; 1 John i. 7. He dwells in heaven, in respect of the continued and delightful residence of his presence there. Ps. cxxiii. 1. He dwelt in the tabernacle, temple, and city of Jerusalem; there the symbols of his presence were continued. Ps. exxxii. 13, 14, lxxviii. 16. He dwells in his Church, and in and with his people, in the continued bestowal of his ordinances, and of his gracious, supporting, and comforting influences. Ps. ix. 11; 1 John iv. 12; Isa. lvii. 15. The fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily in Christ; the divine nature personally, perpetually, and truly resides in his human nature, by the closest union with it. Col. ii. 9. Christ dwelt among men in his state of humiliation on earth. John i. 14. He dwells in our heart by faith; he is united to us as our head and husband; his righteousness is imputed to us, and applied to our conscience; his spirit and grace are fixed in our heart; he loves and delights in us, and furnishes our whole soul with his fulness. Eph. iii. 17. The Holy Spirit dwells in us by personal residence and gracious influence. Rom. viii. 9; 2 Tim. i. 14; 1 Cor. iii. 16. The Word of God dwells in us richly, when it is carefully studied, firmly believed, closely applied, and diligently practised. Col. iii. 16; Ps. exix. 11. The saints dwelt in God, and in Christ; they are united to, and nourished, supported, and comforted by him, and have sweet intimacy and fellowship with him. 1 John iii. 24, iv. 15. They dwelt in love, when they live in the faith of God's redeeming love to them, and in the exercise of love to him and his people. 1 John iv. 16. Wickedness, vengeance, or judgment, dwells in or on a person or land, when it long continues there. Job. xi. 14, xviii. 12-15.

E.

EAGLE (nesher). Exod. xix. 4; Lev. xi. 13. The name is derived from a verb which signifies to lacerate, or tear in pieces. The eagle has always been considered as the king of birds, on account of its great strength, rapidity and elevation of flight, natural ferocity, and the terror it inspires into its fellows of the air. Its voracity is so great, that a large extent of territory is requisite for the supply of proper sustenance; and Providence has therefore constituted it a solitary animal: two pairs of eagles are never found in the same neighbourhood, though the genus is dispersed through every quarter of the world. Its sight is quick, strong, and piercing to a proverb. In Job xxxix. 27-30, the natural history of the eagle is finely drawn up: "Doth the eagle mount up at thy command, and make her nest on high? She dwelleth and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock, and the strong place. From thence she seeketh the prey, and her eyes behold afar off. Her young ones also suck up blood: and where the slain are, there is she." Alluding to the popular opinion that the eagle assists its feeble young in their flight, by bearing them up on its own pinions, Moses represents Jehovah as saying: "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself." Exod. xix. 4.

When Balaam delivered his predictions respecting the fate that awaited the nations which he then particularized, he said of the Kenites: "Strong is thy dwelling, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock" (Numb. xxiv. 21), alluding to that princely bird, the eagle, which not only delights in soaring to the loftiest heights, but chooses the highest rocks, and most elevated mountains, as desirable situations for erecting its nest. Obad. 4; Hab. ii. 9. What Job says concerning the eagle, which is to be understood in a literal sense, "Where the slain are, there is she," our Saviour makes an allegory of: "Whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together" (Matt. xxiv. 28); that is, wherever the guilty are, and however intermingled with the good, divine justice, with eagle eye, will not fail to detect them, and execute vengeance upon them. Luke xvii. 37.

The swiftness of the flight of the eagle is alluded to in several passages of Scripture; as: "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth." Dent. xxviii. 49. In the affecting lamentation of David over Saul and Jonathan, their impetuous and rapid career is described in forcible terms: "They were swifter than eagles; they were stronger than lions." 2 Sam. i. 23. Jeremiah, when he beheld in vision the march of Nebuchadnezzar, cried: "Behold, he shall come up as clouds, and his chariots shall be as a whirlwind. His horses are swifter than eagles. Woe unto us! for we are spoiled." Jer. iv. 13. To the wide-expanded wings of the eagle, and the rapidity of its flight, the same prophet beautifully al-

Indes in a subsequent chapter, where he describes the subversion of Moab by the same ruthless conqueror: "Behold, he shall fly as an eagle, and shall spread his wings over Moab." Jer. xlviii. 40. In the same manner he describes the sudden desolation of Ammon in the next chapter; but when he turns his eye to the ruins of his own country, he exclaims, in still more energetic language: "Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of the heaven." Lam. iv. 19. Under the same comparison, the patriarch Job describes the rapid flight of time: "My days are passed away as the eagle that hasteth to the prey." Job ix. 26. The surprising rapidity with which the blessings of common providence sometimes vanish from the grasp of the possessor is thus described by Solomon: "Riches certainly make themselves wings: they fly away as an eagle toward heaven." Prov. xxiii. 5. The flight of this bird is as sublime as it is rapid and impetuous. None of the feathered race soar so high. In his daring excursions he is said to leave the elouds of heaven, and regions of thunder, and lightning, and tempest, far beneath him, and to approach the very limits of ether. There is an allusion to this lofty soaring in the prophecy of Obadiah concerning the pride of Moab: "Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the Lord." Obad. 4. The Prophet Jeremiah pronounces the doom of Edom in similar terms: "O thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock, that holdest the height of the hill: though thou shouldest make thy nest high as the eagle, I will bring thee down from thence, saith the Lord." Jer. xlix. 16. It has been a popular opinion that the eagle lives and retains its vigour to a great age; and may be said, hyperbolically, to become young again. Ps. ciii. 5; Isa. xl. 31. It is remarkable that Cyrus, compared in Isa. xlv. 11 to an eagle (so the word translated "ravenous bird" should be rendered), had an eagle for his ensign, according to Xenophon, who uses, without knowing it, the identical word of the prophet, with only a Greek termination to it; so exact is the correspondence bewixt the prophet and the historian, the prediction and the event! Xenophon and other ancient historians inform us that the golden eagle with extended wings was the ensign of the Persian monarchs long before it was adopted by the Romans; and it is very probable that the Persians borrowed the symbol from the ancient Assyrians, in whose banners it waved till imperial Babylon bowed her head to the yoke of Cyrus.

EAR. The organ of hearing. The term is applied figuratively in Scripture to the Almighty. Thus it is said, Ps. xxxiv. 15, "His ears are open to their cry," implying his readiness to listen to their prayers. In ancient times it was customary among the Jews when a slave declined to avail himself of the privilege of being manumitted on the sabbatical year, to go through the ceremony of boring his ear with an awl to the door of his master's house, thus declaring his readiness to remain in the service of his master. That it might be seen to be an entirely voluntary act, the ceremony was performed in the presence of a magistrate. An allusion is made to this custom in Ps. xl. 6: "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened: burnt-offering and sin-offering hast thou not required." In this passage reference is obviously made to the readiness with which the Messiah submitted to do the Father's will in the great work of man's redemption.

The word ear is sometimes introduced in Scripture to give intensity to an expression. Thus in Job xlii. 5, 6: "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee: wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and in ashes."

The severe and dangerous contests with wild beasts into which shepherds in Eastern countries were often forced in defending their helpless charge, are thus referred to by the prophet Amos (iii. 12): "Thus saith the Lord, As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear; so shall the children of Israel be taken out that dwell in Samaria in the corner of a bed, and in Damascus in a couch:" fragments which the shepherd was required to produce, in order to satisfy his master of the desperate efforts he made to rescue the victim from the grasp of the beast of prey. A piece of an ear is probably mentioned, as Russell suggests in his 'History of Aleppo,' from the circumstance that there is a species of goat very common in Palestine, which has pendent ears, often a foot in length, and broad in proportion.

EARING, an agricultural term. There is a passage (Gen. xlv. 6) which, if it has been occasionally misunderstood," says Calmet, "may be pardoned: "There remain five years, in which shall be neither EARING nor harvest." It seems that earring is an old English word for ploughing; the original word, charish, is that usually rendered "ploughing," and why it should not be so translated here we cannot tell, as earring suggests the idea of gathering ears of corn after they are arrived at maturity; whereas Joseph means to say: "There shall be neither ploughing nor harvest during five years." The reader will perceive that this variation of import implies a totally different course of natural phenomena in Egypt; for the Nile must have risen so little as to have rendered ploughing hopeless; or its waters must have been so abundant as to have overflowed the country entirely, and to have superseded the use of the plough: moreover, if no ploughing, no sowing—that is, harvest was not expected; consequently it was not prepared for, in respect of eorn. No doubt but the Nile was deficient; it did not rise; the peasants, therefore, did not plough: and to this agrees the account of an ancient author that, for nine years together, the Nile did not rise to half a harvest. See also 1 Sam. viii. 12; Exod. xxxiv. 21; Isa. xxx. 24. A writer in the Quarterly Review thus explains the periodical overflow of the Nile: "The winds, from the middle of June to the inundation, are at first variable, but latterly fix themselves to the north, where they become regular, rising and falling with the sun. These winds, in passing over the Mediterranean, are supposed to convey large masses of aqueous vapours to the mountains of Ethiopia and Abyssinia, which the Nile traverses in its way to Egypt. Here these vapours, being condensed, are precipitated in torrents of rain, at and after the summer solstice; producing that gradual, constant, and periodical increase of the Nile to which the people on its banks are indebted for sustenance."

EARNEST, somewhat given in hand as an assurance that what is promised shall be given in due time. It differs from a pledge, as it is not taken back when full payment is made. The Holy Ghost and his influence are the earnest of our inheritance; are of the same nature, though not degree, of signification, with our eternal happiness; and they give us assurance that in due time it shall be bestowed upon us. 2 Cor. i. 22, v. 5; Eph. i. 14.

EAR-RINGS and NOSE JEWELS were the favourite ornaments among the Eastern females. Both are frequently mentioned in Scripture. Sir John Chardin says: "It is the custom in almost all the East for the women to wear rings in their noses, in the left nostril, which is bored low down in the middle. These rings are of gold, and have commonly two pearls and one ruby between them, placed in the ring. I never saw a girl or young woman in Arabia, or in all Persia, who did not wear a ring after this manner in her nostril." On this subject Dr Paxton observes: "The nose-jewel is an ornament peculiar to the East, which the Jewish females were accustomed to wear, and of which the Asiatic ladies are extremely fond. It is mentioned in several parts of Scripture. Thus the prophet Ezekiel: 'And I put a jewel on thy forehead, or, as it should have been rendered, 'on thy nose.' This ornament was one of the presents which the servant of Abraham gave to Rebecca, in the name of his master:—'I put,' said he, 'the ear-ring upon her face;' more literally, 'I put the ring on her nose.' They wore ear-rings besides; for the household of Jacob, at his request, when they were preparing to go up to Bethel, gave him all the ear-rings which were in their ears, and he hid them under the oak which was by Shechem. The difference between these ornaments is clearly stated by the prophet: 'I put a jewel on thy nose, and ear-rings in thine ears.' The nose-jewel, therefore, was different from the ear-ring, and actually worn by the females as an ornament in the East." Ear-pendants may be seen sculptured on the ruins of Persepolis. They were worn by men as well as women among some nations; but this does not appear to have been the case with the Hebrews, among whom they were limited to the females.

EARTH. This word is used in different significations in the Sacred Writings. Thus, in Gen. i. 1, we are told, that "in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." Here the term "earth" is to be understood as denoting that portion of the globe which was afterwards, when reclaimed from the water, so called in contradistinction from "seas." Seldom, if ever, are we to affix to the term "earth," in the Scriptures, the idea of a planetary sphere or component part of the solar system—a sense of the word which is the result of astronomical discoveries made long since the Volume of Inspiration was penned. The Biblical sense of the word "earth" is for the most part merely "a portion of the earth's surface—a country, a territory"—though sometimes used metaphorically for "the inhabitants of the earth." It not unfrequently applies simply to the land of Palestine though, in the 24th psalm, it is used as referring to the whole terraqueous globe. In the New Testament, it is often employed in contrast to heaven, as John iii. 31: "He that cometh from above is above all: he that is of the earth is earthly, and speaketh of the earth: he that cometh from heaven is above all."

EARTHENWARE. Very frequent allusions are made in Scripture to the manufacture of earthenware. Jeremiah gives a very minute description of the ancient mode of making vessels of this kind: "The word which came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, Arise, and go down to the potter's house, and there I will cause thee to hear my words. Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the wheels. And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter; so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it." Jer. xviii. 1-4. The word in the original which is translated "wheels," signifies "stones;" and, to use the words of Dr Blaney, the appellation will appear very proper, if we consider this machine as consisting of a pair of circular stones, placed one over another like millstones, of which the lower was immovable, but the upper one turned upon a spindle or axis, and had motion communicated to it by the feet of the potter sitting at his work. Upon the top of this upper stone, which was flat, the clay was placed, which the potter, having given the stone the due velocity, formed into shape with his hands. This method of forming earthenware vessels is still common in the East.

Jars and drinking vessels were chiefly made of earthenware. Mr Lane tells us that at this day, "in Egypt and Western Asia the inhabitants have in common use vessels of porous clay, lightly baked, and rather thin in proportion to the size of the vessels. They are exclusively employed for the purifying and cooling of water." This enables us to understand the command given in Lev. vi. 28: "But the earthen vessel wherein it is sodden shall be broken; and if it be sodden in a brazen pot, it shall be both scoured, and rinsed in water." From their very porous nature, whatever stain or impurity they received would be at once absorbed into the mass, so that it would be impossible to cleanse them entirely by any common process. This practice of breaking earthen vessels, when they have become defiled, still prevails in the East; while wooden or metallic vessels are cleansed by scouring.

EARTHQUAKE. This word is often used in Scripture for any violent agitation or change, whether in the heavens or the earth. The Scriptures speak of several earthquakes. One occurred in the days of Elijah, and is mentioned in 1 Kings xix. 11. One happened in the twenty-seventh year of Uzziah, king of Judah, A.M. 3221. This is mentioned in Amos i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5. Josephus says that its violence divided a mountain, which lay west of Jerusalem, and drove one part of it four furlongs. A very memorable earthquake is that which happened at our Saviour's death. Matt. xxvii. 51. Many have thought that this was perceived throughout the world. Others are of opinion that it was felt only in Judea, or even in the temple at Jerusalem. Cyril of Jerusalem says, that the rocks upon Mount Calvary were shown in his time, which had been rent asunder by this earthquake. Maundrell and Sandys testify the same, and say that they examined the breaches in the rock, and were convinced that they were the effects of an earthquake. It must have been terrible, since the centurion and those with him were so affected by it, as to acknowledge the innocence of our Saviour. Luke xxiii. 47. Phlegon, Adrian's freedman, relates that, together with the eclipse, which happened at noon-day, in the fourth year of the two hundred and second Olympiad, or A.D. 33, a very great earthquake was also felt, principally in Bithynia. The effects of God's power, wrath, and vengeance, are compared to earthquakes. Ps. xviii. 7, xlv. 2, cxiv. 4. An earthquake signifies also, in prophetic language, the dissolution of governments and the overthrow of states.

EAST, one of the four cardinal points, namely, that particular point of the horizon in which the sun is seen to rise. The Hebrews express the east, west, north, and south, by words which signify before, behind, left, and right, according to the situation of a man who has his face turned towards the east. By the east, they frequently describe not only Arabia Deserta, and the lands of Moab and Ammon, which lay to the east of Palestine, but also Assyria, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea, though they are situated rather to the north than to the east of Judea. Balaam, Cyrus, and also the wise men who visited Bethlehem at the time Christ was born, are said to come from the East. Numb. xxiii. 7; Isa. xlv. 11; Matt. ii. 1.

EASTER. The passover is only once called in our version Easter. Acts xii. 4. This great festival of the Jews was instituted in commemoration of God's sparing the Hebrews, when he destroyed the first-born of the Egyptians. The ecclesiastical festival called Easter originated in the circumstance that Christ was typified by the paschal lamb, ordained by Moses to be slain at the feast of the passover—the feast being considered as a continuation, in its fulfilment, of the Jewish festival. The English name Easter, and the German Ostern, are derived from the name of the Teutonic goddess, Ostera (Anglo-Saxon Eostre), whose festival was celebrated by the ancient Saxons in the month of April, and for which, as in many other instances, the first Romish missionaries substituted the paschal feast.

As early as the second century, there were keen disputes respecting the day on which this feast should be kept—the Eastern Church persisted in observing it on the same day with the Jews—while the Western celebrated it on Sabbath, as the day of Christ's resurrection. The dispute was finally settled at the Council of Nice, in 325, which ordained that it should be kept always on a Sabbath, only, as it was a movable feast, no small difficulty long continued to be felt as to its adjustment. See PASSOVER.

EATING. The times of eating among the ancient Hebrews seem to have differed somewhat from those to which we are accustomed. There is considerable doubt whether they took any regular meal till after the morning sacrifice. Meals, in the early ages, seem to have been of the simplest description, consisting chiefly of bread and milk, of fruits, and herbs. Hagar was dismissed from Abraham's house with bread and a bottle of water. Bread is still the staple article of food in Oriental countries. Parched corn was, as it still is, a frequent dish at table. "And Boaz said unto her, At meal-time come thou hither, and eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar. And she sat beside the reapers: and he reached her parched corn, and she did eat, and was sufficed, and left." Ruth ii. 14. From the time of the deluge animal food has been used, though in Eastern countries sparingly. Roasted meat is a luxury confined to the tables of the great; but meats boiled and cut into small pieces are most common, and these are accompanied with preparations of rice, flour, parsley, and various spices. Butter and honey are frequently referred to in Scripture as Eastern delicacies, and the Arabs at this day use at breakfast cream or new butter mingled with honey. Though the Old Testament Scriptures frequently refer to the custom of sitting at meals, yet it is well known that reclining became, in course of time, the general practice in the East.—(See ACCUBATION.)

The Jews regularly washed their hands and their feet before dinner; a ceremony which they considered as so essential, that they complained of its omission by the disciples of our Lord, Matt. xv. 2: "Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread." "Among the ancient Hebrews," says Professor Paxton, "the master of the family, or chief person in the company, always began the meal with a solemn blessing on the bread and the wine, and then they repeated the twenty-third Psalm. They took care that after meals there should be a piece of bread remaining on the table. The master of the house ordered a glass to be washed, filled it with wine, and elevating it, said, 'Let us bless Him of whose benefits we have been partaking;' the rest answering, 'Blessed be He who has heaped his favours on us, and by his goodness has now fed us.' Thus the Jews, at their meals—both before and after—acknowledged the great Source of all good; it is reserved for countless numbers that bear the Christian name to neglect or condemn this reasonable service."

Eating is frequently used in the Scriptures in a metaphorical sense, to denote the spiritual reception, by faith, of the blessings of salvation through Jesus Christ. A remarkable example of this occurs in John vi. 53-57: "Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father; so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me."

EBAL, the northern part of Mount Ephraim. It is the mount of cursing, and is situated opposite to Mount Gerizim, the mount of blessing, from which it is separated by a deep valley, where stands Nablous, the Shechem or Sychar of Scripture. Ebal is appropriately barren. In the valley below lie the graves of Joseph, of Eleazer, the son of Aaron, and Joshua, "the servant of the Lord." Behind them on the side of the mountain, is a long range of grottos and tombs. The mountain rises 800 feet from the level of the plain, and is steep, rocky, and entirely without verdure.

EBED-MELECH, a eunuch or servant of King Zedekiah, who, being informed that Jeremiah was imprisoned in a place full of mire, informed the king of it, and was the means of his restoration to safety, though not to liberty. For this humanity, he was promised Divine protection, and after the city was taken by Nebuzaradan, he was preserved. Jer. xxxviii. 7-13, xxxix. 15-18.

EBENEZER, the name of that field wherein the Israelites were defeated by the Philistines, when the ark of the Lord was taken (1 Sam. iv. 1); also a memorial stone set up by Samuel to commemorate a victory over the Philistines. The word signifies the stone of help; and it was erected by the prophet, saying: "Hitherto the Lord hath helped us."

EBER. See HEBER.

EBIONITES, ancient heretics, who rose in the church in the very first age thereof, and formed themselves into a sect in the second century, denying the divinity of Jesus Christ. Origen takes them to have been so called from the Hebrew word ebion, which in that language signifies poor; because, says he, they were poor in sense, and wanting understanding. Eusebius, with a view to the same etymology, is of opinion they were thus called, as having poor thoughts of Jesus Christ, taking him for no more than a mere man. It is more probable the Jews gave this appellation to the Christians in general out of contempt; because, in the first times, there were few but poor people that embraced the Christian religion. The Ebionites were little else than a branch of the Nazarenes; only that they altered and corrupted, in many things, the purity of the faith held among the first adherents of Christianity. For this reason, Origen distinguishes two kinds of Ebionites in his answer to Celsus; the one believed that Jesus Christ was born of a virgin; and the other, that he was born after the manner of other men. The first were orthodox in every thing, except that to the Christian doctrine they joined the ceremonies of the Jewish law, with the Jews, Samaritans, and Nazarenes; together with the traditions of the Pharisees. They differed from the Nazarenes, however, in several things, chiefly as to what regards the authority of the sacred writings; for the Nazarenes received all for Scripture contained in the Jewish canon; whereas the Ebionites rejected all the prophets, and held the very names of David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel in abhorrence. They also rejected all St Paul's epistles, whom they treated with the utmost disrespect. They received nothing of the Old Testament but the Pentateuch. They agreed with the Nazarenes in using the Hebrew Gospel of St Matthew, otherwise called the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles; but they corrupted their copy in numerous places, and particularly had left out the genealogy of our Saviour, which was preserved entire in that of the Nazarenes, and even in those used by the Cerinthians. Besides the Hebrew Gospel of St Matthew, the Ebionites had adopted several other books under the titles of St James, John, and the other apostles; they also made use of the Travels of St Peter, which are supposed to have been written by St Clement; but had altered them so, that there was scarce anything of truth left in them. They even made that saint tell a number of falsehoods, the better to authorize their own practices. Dr Semler, a German writer, gives the following opinion: "Those who more rigidly maintained the Mosaic observances, and who were numerous in Palestine, are usually called Ebionites and Nasaræans. Some believe that they ought not to be reckoned heretics; others think that they were united in doctrine, differing only in name; others place them in the second century. It is of little consequence whether we distinguish or not the Nazarenes, or Nasaræans, from the Ebionites. It is certain that both these classes were tenacious of the Mosaic ceremonies, and more inclined to the Jews than to the Gentiles, though they admitted the Messiahship of Jesus in a very low and Judaizing manner. The Ebionites held in execration the doctrine of the Apostle Paul." Dr J. Pye Smith, who quotes this passage from Dr Semler, adds: "Such, it is apprehended, on grounds of reasonable probability, was the origin of Unitarianism—the child of Judaism misunderstood, and of Christianity imperfectly received."

EBONY, an Indian wood; black, hard, heavy, and easily taking a beautiful polish. It was anciently regarded as a valuable article of merchandise, and is mentioned only in Ezek. xxvii. 15. It is probable that the plant alluded to by the prophet is the Diospyros ebenaster of botanists. It is a native of the East Indies; and Koenig and Thunberg allege that it yields the true ebony. The ebenaster is a genus of the class Polygamia, order Diœcia. It is the heart of the tree which produces the ebony. The outer wood is whitish, but towards the middle very black.

ECBATANA, called in Ezra vi. 2, Achmetha, was the capital of Media, and the summer residence of the kings of Persia. It is generally believed to have been built by Dejoces I.; but the author of the apocryphal book of Judith attributes the erection of it to Arphaxad, whom Ussher and Prideaux suppose to be the same with Dejoces. On this spot, where now stands the modern Hamadan, are to be found the tombs of Esther and Mordecai, which a colony of Jews carefully watch. Here, according to Esdras vi. 21, Darius found the decree of Cyrus permitting the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem; and here, also, Antiochus is said (2 Mac. ix. 3) to have been, when he heard of the defeat of his armies in Palestine under Nicanor and Timotheus. The city was surrounded by seven walls, which were painted in seven different colours. The circumference of the city is said to have been nearly two hundred furlongs. The royal palace was built in a style of great magnificence. Josephus mentions that in his time there existed a tower in Ecbatana which had been built by Daniel the prophet. In the apocryphal additions to the book of Esther (x. 12, 13), we are informed of an annual convocation of Jews having been appointed to take place in memorial of the conspiracy of Haman and the preservation of the Jews. This annual pilgrimage to the ancient city of Mordecai and Esther is still observed.

ECCLESIASTES, the name of a canonical book of the Old Testament, usually ascribed to Solomon as its author; but Grotius and several German writers are disposed to date its authorship from a later period than that of Solomon, deriving their arguments in support of this opinion chiefly from the peculiarity of the Hebrew employed. It is difficult, however, to found any certain opinion on so doubtful a basis. The words of the opening verse evidently point to Solomon. "The words of Koheleth (the preacher), the son of David, king of Jerusalem." And the description which the writer gives of his wealth, his works, and his wisdom, establish, beyond all dispute, the real authorship of the book. If Solomon be meant by the Koheleth, Ecclesiastes must plainly have been the composition of his advanced age, when he had come to see the vanity of earthly objects and to repent of the sins of his early life. The conclusion which he draws from the whole argument of the book is singularly instructive: "Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole of man."

ECCLESIASTICAL, an appellation given to whatever belongs to the Church (Ecclesia); thus we say, ecclesiastical polity, jurisdiction, history, &c.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, a narration of the rise and progress, the vicissitudes and character, of that spiritual kingdom which the Almighty has established on the earth under the administration of his Son Jesus Christ. "The science of theology," says the late Dr Welsh, in his 'Elements of Church History,' "is, in the strictest sense, an historical phenomenon; and the knowledge of every particular in past history is of importance in enabling us to explain the present appearances of the Christian community. By this means, also, we are put in circumstances to appreciate the value of different systems. When we have mastered the study of theology as an historical science, when we have made ourselves acquainted with the different systems of divine truth which from age to age have been formed, and of the circumstances which gave them birth, then, and then only, can we be prepared to distinguish in every department of the science between what is essential and what is accidental—between what is divine and what is merely human—between what belongs to the age and country or is individual, and must be laid aside, and what rests upon the essential principles of truth, and must be retained in all ages and countries. Here we obtain sure ground, and from it we may proceed to clearer and more extended views of spiritual things. For, while it must be at once admitted that we cannot hope to find our way to conclusions not involved in the works of our systematic writers, yet, in determining the relation of what is already known in regard to theology to the discoveries of the science of mind in all its departments, political, ethical, metaphysical, there is scope for much that has all the interest and value of novelty, and that is, at least, relatively new. Important advantages also arise from the history of heresy and error. It is of the greatest consequence, for example, in the controversy with unbelievers. The little success that Christianity has met with in the world, the divisions and heresies which have torn and afflicted the Church, and the frequent abuses and flagrant enormities which have often rendered the history of Christianity a melancholy record of the follies and vices of man, have been urged by Infidels as arguments against the idea that our religion could be divine. We are able, in so far, to obviate this difficulty on general grounds, and to argue, that as it forms no valid objection to the doctrines of natural religion, that they have been rejected by multitudes of the human race altogether, and that they have exerted little influence upon many who have professed to receive them; so the doctrines of revelation may be true, notwithstanding the limited extent to which their influence has reached. But we may proceed farther, and draw an argument in support of the truth of Christianity from the very corruptions which have impeded its progress and marred its beauty. Though our Saviour confidently predicted the ultimate triumph of his cause, he was far from declaring that its success would be immediate and universal. And the minute accuracy with which Christ and his apostles described, not only the opposition which the Christian cause was to experience from its enemies, but also the greater evils to which it would be subjected from those who should pretend to embrace it, may be considered as a convincing evidence of the divinity of our religion. But the objections may take another form in the hands of the Infidel and Roman Catholic, as implying an essential defect in the record, and the necessity of an addition to the written Word in the decisions of an infallible Church. To meet these views, an acquaintance with the different sects that have appeared in the world is necessary; as by such acquaintance alone we are enabled to show, that wherever, in any essential question, men have erred from the truth, the cause is never to be found in any obscurity in the Scriptures, while differences upon points of minor moment are not repressed even by an infallible Church. If it be useful to know what errors have existed, in order that we may fully enter into the spirit of the statements opposed to them, it is of still greater importance to know in what circumstance these errors had their origin. It has been remarked by an eminent writer in regard to metaphysical science, that a truth is but half revealed to us when it makes known to us that we have been in the wrong; the chief revelation is that which tells us of some principle within us that rendered the fallacy to us for the time a relative truth. We avoid only one error in knowing that we have been deceived; but we may avoid many errors in knowing how that one has deceived us. The same remark holds in regard to all the sciences; and especially in theology, it may be observed that the principles which lead to heresy are the same in every age—a love of novelty, a spirit of enthusiasm, a passion for notoriety, an ambition of domination, a tendency to accommodate the truths of the Gospel to prevailing systems of philosophy or to the current maxims of morals, a Gnosticizing, or mysticizing, or legalizing spirit.”

ECCLESIASTICAL POLITY, the doctrine of the government of the Church. To the constitution and right conducting of any society laws are necessary, and certain individuals by whom these laws are to be executed. The following remarks on church government are made by Dr Dick: “As we learn from the Scriptures what office-bearers he has instituted, and what laws He has given to regulate the conduct of individuals, it is natural to expect that we shall receive some information from them with regard to the form which this spiritual society should sustain, and the power which should be exercised for the settlement of its concerns. Some have supposed that the government of the Church is ambulatory; by which they mean, that no precise form has been prescribed, and that it is left to the wisdom of men to vary the form according to circumstances; to adapt it to the genius, and habits, and civil constitution of different nations. This is a summary mode of terminating all disputes about the subject. Nothing more is necessary than the exercise of political wisdom, accompanied with due care that the arrangements which are made may be Christian in their general character, and may not interfere with any of the acknowledged purposes which a Church is intended to serve. Episcopacy will be the proper form in one country, Presbytery in another, and Independency in a third. The first will accord best with a monarchical government in the state, and the two latter with a republic.

“Although this opinion has found many patrons, yet most Christians are disposed to think that a particular form of government was appointed by Christ and his apostles; which, consequently, is of divine right, ought to be adopted in all countries, and preserved inviolate to the end of the world. Hence Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Independents advance a claim of preference in favour of their respective models; and the controversy has been carried on with great warmth, and not always with a Christian temper. It is argued that, if no human society can subsist without government, it is incredible that Jesus Christ, to whom the care of the Church is committed, should have left it without this necessary provision for its welfare; that human wisdom was not competent to supply this defect, because it is apt to err even in temporal affairs, and still more in those of a spiritual nature, and experience shows what horrible corruptions it has introduced under various pretexts; that, when the ends of church government are considered, it was evidently of the utmost importance that specific directions should be given, as the credit of religion, the advancement of piety and holiness, the encouragement of the good, and the restraint of the bad, so much depend upon the due administration of it; that a form of government was as necessary to the Christian as it was to the Jewish Church; and we cannot reasonably suppose that, while the government of the latter was so exactly delineated, that of the former has been totally neglected. There is no point, however, about which Christians are more divided in sentiment; and this diversity may be owing partly to prejudices of various kinds, and partly to the fact, which none but furious zealots will deny, that the form of government is not so fully and explicitly taught in Scripture, as the fundamental articles of faith, and the great duties of morality."

ECCLESIASTICUS, an apocryphal book, so called in Latin either to distinguish it from Ecclesiastes or to show that it contains, as well as that book, precepts and exhortations to wisdom and virtue. The Greeks call it "The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach." It contains maxims and instructions, useful in all states and conditions of life. Some of the ancients ascribed this work to Solomon; but the author is much more modern than Solomon, and speaks of several persons who lived after that prince. The translator of it into Greek came into Egypt in the thirty-eighth year of Ptolemy VII. surnamed Energetes, the second of that name, as he says in his preface. The author of the Latin translation from the Greek is unknown. Jerome says, the Church received Ecclesiasticus for edification, but not to authorize any point of doctrine. The Council of Carthage deemed it canonical, under the title of the Fifth Book of Solomon; and their decision was adopted by the Council of Trent. It appears, however, to have been written by a person of the name of Jesus, the son of Sirach, who had travelled in pursuit of knowledge; and who, according to Bretschneider, lived about 180 B.C. The book was written in the Syro-Chaldaic dialect, then in use in Judea, and was translated by his grandson into Greek about the year 130 B.C., for the use of the Alexandrian Jews, who were ignorant of the language of Judea. Anciently this book was put into the hands of catechumens, from the edifying nature of its contents.

ECTHESIS, a confession of faith, in the form of an edict, published in the year 639, by the Emperor Heraclius, with a view to pacify the troubles occasioned by the Eutychian heresy in the Eastern Church. However, the same prince revoked it, on being informed that Pope Severinus had condemned it, as favouring the Monothelites—declaring, at the same time, that Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, was the author of it. See EUTYCHIANS.

ED. This word occurs in Josh. xxii. 34, as the name given by the two tribes and a half who settled beyond the Jordan to the altar which they erected as a witness between them and the Lord their God. This altar, upon which there was probably an inscription, was henceforth to be a witness of the relation in which they stood to God and to Israel, and of their concurrence with the rest of the tribes in the great fundamental truth that "the Lord he is God," and that he was to be worshipped in no other way, and at no other place, than he had himself prescribed. It is remarkable that this word Ed does not occur in the original Hebrew, though it is found in the Arabic and Syriac versions. The reason of its omission in the common editions of the Hebrew is impossible to determine. Our translators have supplied it in italics, as it is the word which the sense evidently requires.

EDAR. This word occurs in Gen. xxxv. 21, and is generally understood to be a watch-tower near Bethlehem. In Eastern countries towers were built for the use of shepherds in watching their flocks by night; and Jerome, who had collected many ancient traditions on the spot, affirms that it was at this place, near Bethlehem, that the shepherds were abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night, when the angels announced the birth of the Messiah. The word is found also in Mic. iv. 8: "And thou, O tower of the flock, the stronghold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion; the kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem." From this passage some consider it a denomination of Jerusalem itself, whither the tribes of Israel were wont to repair three times in the year, as a flock to their fold, or to the tower of their shepherd; or, with Lightfoot, of some place in the immediate vicinity.

EDEN, the garden in which our first parents were placed at their creation, and thus distinguished as the earliest abode of the human race. Considerable difference of opinion has existed in regard to the exact situation of the district or tract of country which once bore the name of Eden. The prevailing idea is that it stood on the banks of the Euphrates. This, indeed, is expressly mentioned in the description given in Gen. ii. 10-14: "And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx-stone. And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that is it which goeth toward the east of Assyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates." The learned author of the article EDEN in 'Kitto's Cyclopædia,' after an elaborate argument on the subject, comes to the conclusion that it was situated in the south of Armenia; and after all that has been said on the subject by the immense host of writers by whom the point has been discussed, this is perhaps the nearest approximation to the truth. The rivers to which the sacred historian refers besides the Euphrates, are the Tigris, (Hiddekel), the Phasis, (Pison), and the Araxes, (Gihon.) "It has been contended," says Professor Paxton, "by some writers, that the four heads cannot with any propriety be understood of four streams into which the river of Eden was divided, but of the four sources from which it issued; and that these four streams united their waters immediately before they entered the country of Eden, and pursued their course in one majestic flood to the Persian Gulf: for the word which is translated 'head,' naturally refers to the beginning, not to any changes in the progress of a river. But, admitting that the term 'head' properly means the source or commencement of a river, it is not inconsistent with the view which has been now taken. To a person ascending the river, the point where the Euphrates and Tigris united their streams, is in reality the beginning or entry of each of these rivers; and, on the contrary, the point of separation is the head or beginning of the Pison and the Gihon. The Seventy Interpreters certainly admit this solution, for they render the original term 'beginnings.' But another solution, still more natural and satisfactory, may be offered. The original term often signifies chief, principal, or most excellent; and, by consequence, the words of Moses may be rendered, 'From thence it was divided into four principal channels,' four noble rivers, excluding, as unworthy of particular notice, other inferior streams which might branch off in their progress to the ocean.

"These statements render it probable that the garden planted by the hand of God in Eden, for the residence of our first father, lay on the single river formed by the united streams of the Tigris and the Euphrates." The reason of the mystery which hangs over the site of Eden, even after the laborious researches of the learned, is thus ingeniously noticed by Dr Candlish: "Many have laboured to ascertain the site of Eden; and so various and doubtful have been the opinions formed, that some have regarded the countries and rivers here named as no longer existing; the deluge, as is supposed, having swept away all the ancient landmarks. But although several of the marks given by the sacred historian may have been obliterated and lost, through convulsions of nature and the hand of man, his description is so circumstantial, that it must be intended to point out, even since the flood, the place where Eden was. It is probable that they who lived before us, for whom Moses wrote, would recognise the spot; and it is not impossible, that they who come after us may be able to recognise it better than we can do now. It may have been the design of the Holy Ghost, by means of his servant, who wrote by his inspiration, not for himself, but for the faithful in after ages, to leave on record a map, by which, when the proper time comes, the exact locality of Paradise may be again identified. Meanwhile, in general, the most learned and laborious researches seem to fix it down to some part of the region which the Euphrates and its kindred streams water, as they fall into the Persian Gulf. Gen. xxv. 18; Dan. x. 4. The Ethiopia, or Cush, spoken of in Gen. ii. 13, is not the country in Africa, so called, but a territory in Asia, embracing the country of the Midianites and part of Arabia. Numb. xii. 1; Exod. ii. 21. Thus, it is not impossible, nor by any means unlikely, that in the latter times, the place where Eden was, bordering on the limits of the promised land, as the original grant to Abraham extended it eastward (Gen. xv. 18, &c.), may be destined yet to come into note, sharing the final fortunes of that land, whatever these may be. Ps. lxxii. 8. And for this end, perhaps, it has pleased God to give this geography of it beforehand, by which it may then be known."

The word Eden which, in its primary acceptance, signifies "pleasure" or "delight," is often used by the writers of the Old Testament to denote places which are either more remarkably fruitful in their soil or pleasant in their situation. See 2 Kings xix. 12, 13; Isa. xxxvii. 12; Amos i. 5. It is a remarkable circumstance that divine revelation opens and shuts with corresponding subjects; it opens with a view of the earthly Eden, and shuts with a description of its glorious antitype, the heavenly Paradise of God. Eden was remarkable for a river which issued from it; in like manner, John sees in the heavenly Eden a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, issuing from the throne of God and the Lamb. Rev. xxii. 1. In each we also find a tree of life, and various other analogies; from which it appears evidently the design of the Spirit of God to teach us, that the second

Adam, the Lord from heaven, will restore all his people to a more perfect state of bliss than their first parent forfeited.

EDIFICATION. This word signifies a building up; hence we call a building an edifice. Applied to spiritual things, it signifies the advancing, improving, adorning, and comforting the mind. A Christian may be said to be edified, when he is encouraged and animated to fresh progress in the ways and works of the Lord. The means to promote our own edification are, prayer, self-examination, reading the Scriptures, hearing the gospel, meditation, attendance on all appointed ordinances. To edify others, there should be love, spiritual conversation, forbearance, faithfulness, benevolent exertions, and uniformity of conduct.

EDOM or IDUMEA, which derives its name from Esau or Edom, the son of Isaac and Rebecca, is situated to the south of Palestine, and partly in Arabia Petræa. In early ages Edom was limited to the range of Mount Seir, but afterwards was greatly enlarged both on the east and west. The first form of government which was established among the Edomites was the patriarchal; hence we read of the dukes or emirs who reigned in the land of Edom; their government was afterwards changed to a monarchy, and there were eight kings in Edom before any prince reigned over Israel. When the Israelites were on their journey from Egypt, the Edomites refused to permit them to pass through their country; but no war seems to have arisen between the kingdoms of Israel and Edom till the time of David, when we read that "all they of Edom became David's servants." Then was the prophecy fulfilled, "The elder shall serve the younger." In the reign of Jehoram they revolted from Israel, and thus fulfilled the prediction, Gen. xxvii. 40: "And by thy sword shalt thou live, and shalt serve thy brother: and it shall come to pass when thou shalt have the dominion, that thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck." From this time the Edomites maintained their independence, and at an after period rose to great prosperity, the commerce of India and Arabia flowing through their country. Petra was at that time the capital of the country, and the centre of commerce. The climate of Edom is varied, and, on the whole, salubrious. The mountains are barren, solitary, and desolate; but Mr Stephens acknowledges that he found so many pleasant valleys among the hills, that he uses the strong language, "Altogether I saw among the stony mountains of Arabia Petræa, more verdure than I had observed since I left the banks of the Nile." Thus the blessing of Isaac seems to have been realized, "And Isaac his father answered and said unto him, Behold, thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above." Gen. xxvii. 39. The Edomites were among the earliest people who prosecuted commerce and cultivated the arts and sciences. It is generally believed that Job resided in the land of Edom, in whose days it was a country distinguished among the nations. But the glory of that land has now passed away. The awful denunciations of the ancient prophets have been fulfilled to the letter. See Isa. xxxiv. 5-13; Jer. xlix. 7-18; Obad. 10, 17, 18. In reference to the fulfilment of these and other prophecies, we may quote the following remarks from Mr Wylie: "In illustrating the predictions concerning this country, the first circumstance to which we shall advert is the desolation of its soil; this forms a prominent part of the prophecy; it is repeatedly in-trodeed, and always in the strongest and most pointed terms: 'Son of man, set thy face against Mount Seir, and prophesy against it, and say unto it, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O Mount Seir, I am against thee, and I will stretch out mine hand against thee, and I will make thee most desolate.' Ezek. xxxv. 2, 3. Also, 'Edom shall be a desolation: every one that goeth by it shall be astonished, and shall hiss at all the plagues thereof.' Jer. xlix. 17. 'Thou shalt be desolate, O Mount Seir, and all Idumea, even all of it; and they shall know that I am the Lord.' It thus appears that it was no ordinary doom which was denounced against this land: it was to be made most desolate, or as it is in the Hebrew text, the desolation of desolations. It was to be pre-eminent in this respect amongst the other countries which were also to be laid desolate, and Edom now enjoys the pre-eminence which the prophet assigned it. The curse pronounced on Judea has in very truth been inflicted; yet here, there are numerous spots of surpassing fertility and beauty; the plains of Ammon and Moab are covered with a fine herbage; but there is neither verdure nor palm-trees to relieve the nakedness of Edom. One part of the country is a boundless expanse of sand, the other is made up of a chain of naked and towering rocks. 'Thou shalt be desolate, O Mount Seir and all Idumea, even all of it.'

"The question here is not, Where shall we find proofs of the desolation of Edom? These proofs are so numerous that the difficulty lies in making a proper selection. 'Here,' says Dr Shaw, 'is no place of sced, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates, but the whole is an evil place, a lonesome, desolate wilderness.' 'Edom,' said the prophet, 'shall be a desolate wilderness.' Joel iii. 19. The scenery of Edom, in many places, is of the most sublime description; the very vastness of its desolation overpowers the mind of the traveller, and fills it with awe. 'As we advanced down the ravine,' say Irby and Mangles, in their approach to Petra, 'a wild and romantic view opened to us, terminated by the peaks of the dark and rugged ridge of Mount Hor, the same that is alluded to in Scripture, and by a boundless extent of desert view, which we have hardly ever seen equalled for singularity and grandeur. . . . The dark ridge of mount Hor, which appears to be altogether composed of a sort of sparry flint, broken into masses and seamed with wide crevices, with scarcely any verdure to vary its deep purple colour, forms the boundary of this hollow to the southward, and also to the westward, with that high peak, upon which is the reputed tomb of Aaron, rearing itself above all the rest in the middle of the picture. This craggy ridge does not, however, terminate the landscape, the mountain from which we viewed it being considerably higher, and commanding a boundless view beyond it, over a whitish expanse of country, which is varied here and there with other coloured ridges rising like islands upon it, or jutting forward into it like promontories.' 'Thus will I make Mount Seir most desolate.' Similar is the testimony of Stephens, given as he was advancing up the valley of Araba, which he describes as varying from four to eight miles in breadth, and having on each side, high, dark, and barren mountains, bounding it like a wall. 'The land of Idumea lay before me in barrenness and desolation; no trees grew in the valley and no verdure on the mountain-tops. All was bare, dreary, and desolate. . . . The next day the general features of the scene were the same, eternal barrenness and desolation; and, moving to the right, at one o'clock we were at the foot of the mountains of Seir; and towering above all the rest, surmounted by a circular dome, like the tombs of the shiekhs in Egypt, was the bare and rugged summit of Mount Hor, the burial place of Aaron, visible in every direction at a great distance from below, and on both sides the great range of mountains, and forming one of the marks by which the Bedouin regulates his wanderings in the desert.' 'If grape-gatherers come to thee, would they not leave some gleanings-grapes? if thieves by night, they will destroy till they have enough. But I have made Esau BARE.' Jer. xlix. 9, 10. One after another has drawn the picture of this country: but every hand which has attempted the task has only reproduced another likeness of that which the prophets exhibited when Edom was a fertile country, and the Edomites a powerful people. To the testimonies we have already adduced we shall only add that of Lord Lindsay: the traveller had left Petra, and was proceeding across the country in a north-west direction to Hebron. 'We entered the low barren ridges that skirt Wady Araba on the west, and, for several hours during this and the following day, traversed a country of the most utter desolation, hills succeeding hills, without the slightest picturesque beauty, covered with loose flints, sand, and gravel; sterility in its most repulsive garb;—it made the very heart ache, and the spirits sink—and such is Edom now.' 'Also Edom shall be a desolation: every one that goeth by it shall be astonished, and shall hiss at all the plagues thereof.' Jer. xlix. 17."

And again:—

"So complete is the desolation of Edom at this day that the traveller would find it difficult to believe that the country had ever been inhabited or cultivated since the creation, did not the voice of all history remind him that it was once the dwelling of a powerful people, and could boast anciently of a salubrious climate, and a soil not infertile. Nothing in Edom is diminutive; every thing is on a grand scale: even her ruin is magnificent. Here the country rises into vast chains of naked mountains, whose pointed summits tower into the air. There it sinks into extensive plains, which are prolonged till they meet the sky, but without a single stream to cool their sands, and scarcely a tree or speck of verdure to relieve the eye. It is difficult, indeed, merely by extracts, to convey a proper idea of the extent and even the grandeur of the desolation of Edom: this can be done only by following the traveller throughout his whole course, and observing how often he pauses to express the feelings of awe and astonishment with which he gazed on her gloomy and boundless wastes. Such incidental notices as the following, may be taken as an example: 'The arid desert,' says Laborde, 'the naked mountains—a broiling sun—our little troop moving through that boundless solitude—and our shouts, which, enthusiastic as they were, made scarcely any impression on the surrounding silence, associated strangely together.' 'We left this place in the afternoon,' says he of Wady Gharandal,—the valley, it will be remembered, by which Burekhardt passed out into that of Araba, in his journey through the mountains of Seir, and where Laborde and his party halted in their march up the same valley,—'and for some hours travelled through a bleak wilderness. Night fell upon this miserable-looking country, as if to veil its desolation, when we halted.'"

"It would seem," says the translator of Laborde, "that the complete and irrecoverable desolation to which the Idumean territory was condemned, was intended to prove to the whole Jewish people, that, notwithstanding their own crimes, their enemies were to be treated as the enemies of the Lord; that he watched over the house of Israel with a jealous eye, which no errors could efface; and that the very ruins which the descendants of that house may now behold in Arabia Petræa, though destitute of hope for Edom, exhibit in letters of light the affectionate promise that Judea is yet to rise from her misery to more than her primeval splendour. The emphatic contrast at this day actually subsisting between these two countries bordering on each other—one sentenced to desolation, from which it is manifestly never to recover, the other chastised by adversity, which is manifestly one day to have an end—becomes one of the clearest as well as the most wonderful evidences of the truth of the holy writings, and of the divinity of the Spirit by whom the prophecies were dictated." Most truly has the prediction uttered by Ezekiel (xxxv. 5, 6, 14, 15) been verified—"Because thou hast had a perpetual hatred, and hast shed the blood of the children of Israel by the force of the sword, in the time of their calamity, in the time that their iniquity had an end; therefore, as I live, saith the Lord God, I will prepare thee unto blood, and blood shall pursue thee," &c.

Thus does Edom, in the magnificence of its ruins, and the melancholy completeness of its desolation, afford a striking attestation to the truth of Scripture prophecy.

EDREI, a town of Manasseh, east of Jordan (Josh. xiii. 31), called likewise Edræa and Adræa, and perhaps Edera in Ptolemy, when speaking of the towns in the Batauea. Eusebius places it about twenty-five miles north from Bostri. It was anciently the capital of Og, king of Bashan (Deut. i. 4), who went out from it with his army against the Israelites, and was defeated and slain, with his sons and all his people. No trace of Edrei is now to be found.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN, president of New Jersey College, a most acute metaphysician and distinguished divine, was born at Windsor, Connecticut, United States, October 5, 1703. He was graduated at Yale College in 1720, before he was seventeen years of age. His uncommon genius discovered itself early; and while yet a boy he read Locke on the Human Understanding with a keen relish. Though he took much pleasure in examining the kingdom of nature, yet moral and theological researches yielded him the highest satisfaction. He lived in college nearly two years after taking his first degree, preparing himself for the office of a minister of the Gospel. In 1722, he went to New York, at the request of a small society of English Presbyterians, and preached a number of months. In 1724, he was appointed a tutor in Yale College, and he continued in that office till he was invited, in 1726, to preach at Northampton, Massachusetts. Here he was ordained as colleague with his grandfather, Mr Stoddard, February 15, 1727. In 1735, his benevolent labours were attended with very uncommon success; a general impression was made upon the minds of his people by the truths which he proclaimed, and the Church was much enlarged. He continued in this place more than twenty-three years. He had been instrumental in cheering many hearts with the joys of religion; and not a few had regarded him with all that affectionate attachment which is excited by the love of excellence and the sense of obligations which can never be repaid. But a spirit of detraction had gone forth, in consequence of his strict views of Christian discipline and purity, and a few leading men of outrageous zeal pushed forward men of less determined hostility, and he was dismissed by an ecclesiastical council, June 22, 1750.

In this scene of trouble and abuse, when the mistakes and the bigotry of the multitude had stopped their ears, and their passions were without control, Mr Edwards exhibited the truly Christian spirit. His calmness, and meekness, and humility, and yet firmness and resolution, were the subjects of admiration to his friends. More anxious for his people than for himself, he preached a most solemn and affecting farewell discourse. He afterwards occasionally supplied the pulpit, at times when no preacher had been procured; but this proof of his superiority to resentment or pride, and this readiness to do good to those who had injured him, met with no return, except a vote of the inhabitants prohibiting him from ever again preaching for them! Still he was not left without excellent friends in Northampton; and his correspondents in Scotland, having been informed of his dismissal, contributed a considerable sum for the maintenance of his family.

In August 1751, he succeeded Mr Sergeant as missionary to the Housatonic Indians, at Stockbridge, in Berkshire county. Here he continued six years, preaching to the Indians and the white people; and, as he found much leisure, he prosecuted his theological and metaphysical studies, and produced works which rendered his name famous throughout Europe. Thus was his calamitous removal from Northampton the occasion, under the wise providence of God, of his imparting to the world the most important instructions, whose influence has been extending to the present time, and whose good effects may still be felt for ages. In January 1758, he reluctantly accepted the office of president of the college in New Jersey, as successor of his son-in-law, Mr Burr; but he had not entered fully upon the duties of this station before the prevalence of the small pox induced him to be inoculated, and this disease was the cause of his death, March 22, 1758, aged fifty-four. A short time before he died, as some of his friends, who surrounded his bed to see him breathe his last, were lamenting the loss which the college would sustain, he said, to their astonishment: "Trust in God, and ye need not fear." These were his last words. He afterwards expired with as much composure as if he had only fallen asleep. He left three sons and seven daughters. His wife Sarah, daughter of Rev. J. Pierpont, New Haven, whom he married in 1727, in her eighteenth year, died also in 1758.

President Edwards was equally distinguished by his Christian virtues and by the extraordinary vigour and penetration of his mind. Though his constitution was delicate, he commonly spent thirteen hours every day in his study. He usually rose between four and five in the morning, and was abstemious, living completely by rule. All his researches were pursued with his pen in his hand, and the number of his miscellaneous writings, which he had left behind him, was above fourteen hundred. They were all numbered and paged, and an index was formed for the whole. He was peculiarly happy in his domestic connections. Mrs Edwards, by taking the entire care of his temporal concerns, gave him an opportunity of consecrating all his powers, without interruption, to the labours and studies of the sacred office.

As a preacher, he was not oratorical in his manner, and his voice was rather feeble, though he spoke with distinctness; but his discourses were rich in thought; and being deeply impressed himself with the truths which he uttered, his preaching came home to the hearts of his hearers.

Mr Edwards was uncommonly zealous and persevering in his search after truth. He spared no pains in procuring the necessary aids, and he read all the books which he could procure that promised to afford him assistance in his inquiries. He confined himself to no particular sect or denomination, but studied the writings of men whose sentiments were the most opposite to his own. But the Bible claimed his peculiar attention. From that book he derived his religious principles, and not from any human system. The doctrines which he supported were Calvinistic; and when these doctrines were in any degree relinquished, or were not embraced in their whole length and breadth, he did not see where a man could set his foot down with consistency and safety, short of Deism or Atheism itself. Yet, with all his strict adherence to what he believed to be the truths of Heaven, his heart was kind and tender. When Mr Whitefield preached for him on the Sabbath, the acute divine, whose mighty intellect has seldom been equalled, wept as a child during the whole sermon.

His Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will is considered as one of the greatest efforts of the human mind. Those who embrace the Calvinistic doctrines have been accustomed to say, that he has forever settled the controversy with the Arminians, by demonstrating the absurdity of their principles. On the other hand, there are those, attached to the general theological doctrines embraced by Edwards, who think that the unavoidable consequences of his metaphysical argument are so contradictory to the common judgment of mankind, as to authorize any one "boldly to cut asunder the knot which he is unable to unloose." However, if the argument of Edwards be a fallacy, "there must be some way to unravel the puzzle." His other works, which are most celebrated, are his book on Original Sin in answer to Taylor, his Treatise on the Affections, his Dissertation on the Nature of True Virtue, and that on the End for which God Created the World. A splendid edition of his works was published in England, and an edition in eight volumes, edited by Dr Austin, was published in 1809. Another edition, with an ample account of his life, edited by his descendant, Srenno Edwards Dwight, was published in ten vols. 8vo, in 1830. Two supplementary volumes have since been published by Ogle & Murray, Edinburgh.

EFFECTUAL, that which actually answers the end intended. A door for preaching the Gospel is effectual, when the opportunity of doing it issues in the conviction and conversion of many. 1 Cor. xvi. 9. God works effectually in ministers, when he enables them zealously to preach the Gospel, and crowns their labours with success. Gal. ii. 8. He works effectually in his chosen people, when he converts them to himself, and causes them to bring forth fruits of holiness to his glory. Eph. iii. 7, iv. 16; 1 Thess. ii. 13. Christ and his cross and promise are said to be of none effect, that is, of no saving use to men, when they do not believe his promise, embrace his person, religion, righteousness, and yield themselves to him as their Lord and Master. Gal. v. 1; 1 Cor. i. 17; Rom. iv. 14.

EGG (bizim, Deut. xxii. 6; Job xxxix. 14; Isa. x. 14, lix. 5; ōon, Luke xi. 12). Eggs are considered as a very great delicacy in the East, and are served up with fish and honey as a luxury. As a desirable article of food, the egg is mentioned in Luke xi. 12: "If a son ask for an egg, will his father offer him a scorpion?" It has been remarked that the body of the scorpion is very like an egg, as its head can scarcely be distinguished, especially if it be of the white kind, which is the first species mentioned by Ælian, Avicenna, and others. Bochart has produced testimonies to prove that the scorpions in Judea were about the bigness of an egg; so the similitude is preserved between the thing asked and the thing given. Among the ancient Egyptians eggs were hatched by artificial means—a practice which is still continued in Egypt, there being in that country at the present time no fewer than four hundred and fifty establishments for the purpose; which, being heavily taxed, produce a large revenue to the Government.

EGLAIM, the same as GALLIM, a city beyond Jordan, to the east of the Dead Sea, in the land of Moab. Isa. xv. 8. It is called Gallim in 1 Sam. xxv. 44.

EGLON, a king of the Moabites, who oppressed the Israelites for eighteen years. Judg. iii. 12–14. Calmet has confounded this servitude of the Hebrews with that under Cushan-rishathaim, making it to subsist only eight years, viz., from 2591 to 2599; whereas the servitude under Eglon lasted eighteen years, and commenced A.M. 2661, which was sixty-two years after they had been delivered by Othniel from their subjection to Cushan-rishathaim. A city of the tribe of Judah bearing the name of Eglon is mentioned in Josh. xv. 39. The King of Eglon formed a confederacy with the neighbouring princes to assist Adoni-zedec, king of Jerusalem, to attack Gibeon, because they had made peace with Joshua and the Israelites. Joshua met the confederated kings near Gibeon, and routed them. In the time of Eusebius, Eglon was merely a village.

EGYPT, the Mizraim of Sacred Scripture, a well-known country in the north of Africa, which derived its name from Mizraim, a son of Ham. Sometimes it is called the Land of Ham, as in Ps. lxxviii. 51; cv. 23. The Arabs still call it Misr. The country is divided into Upper, Central, and Lower Egypt. It owes its fertility to the periodical inundations of the Nile, without which it would be only a sandy desert. The very early history of this country is lost in fable. The first time Egypt is mentioned in the Sacred Writings is by Moses, in narrating the life of Abraham. At that time it seems to have enjoyed a regularly organised government under a race of kings bearing the title of Pharaoh. The special king referred to is supposed to have been one of the Shepherd Kings who about that time seized the government, forming a new dynasty, which, according to Rollin, lasted for two hundred and sixty years. After the time of Abraham nothing more is said of Egypt in the Bible until the time of Joseph, whose history is intimately connected with that of the country. The date of Joseph's going down to Egypt is B.C. 1729; and his advancement to be governor of Egypt, about B.C. 1715. It is at this point that the connection between sacred and profane history in reference to Egypt commences. According to Bible chronology, Joseph died, B.C. 1635, after having governed Egypt for the long period of eighty years, reckoning from the date of his elevation as prime minister. It is unnecessary to detail the important events connected with the history of the Egyptians and the Israelites, which are well known to every reader of the Bible.

There is little doubt that Egypt was the cradle of the arts and sciences. Thither men resorted from all other countries, who wished to become acquainted with the learning of the East. In ancient times there were four colleges in Egypt of great renown: Thebes, which Pythagoras visited; Memphis, where Thales and Democritus consulted the Egyptian priests; Heliopolis, where Plato studied; and Sais, where Solon learned the art of legislation.

In the arts, Egypt seems to have early acquired great eminence. In architecture, particularly, they seem to have excelled, as their monuments at this day attest. The pyramids have always been ranked among the wonders of the world. What was the precise object or design of these stupendous edifices has never been ascertained with any degree of certainty. The various theories are thus rapidly sketched by Dr Duff: "At one time, have these been represented as 'disguised fortresses' for the concealment of treasure; or 'oracular shrines' for the exhibition of 'acoustic phenomena' and other priestly jugglery. At another, they have risen into magnificent fire-temples or astronomical observatories. Then followed the elaborated dissertation on the wealth, the hierophancy, the mythology, or the science of the ancient world. What laborious trifling! That these were ever treasure-citadels or caverns for priestly trickeries is utterly unfounded in history, and wholly contradicted by the form and structure of the fabrics themselves. That they could ever have been designed for fire-altars or astronomical edifices, involves a visible physical impossibility. On either of these latter suppositions, the summits must have been uniformly flat and uniformly accessible. Now, the direct contrary of this is the real fact. When finished, all the pyramids terminated in a sharp culminating point or apex; and some of them so terminate to this day. And those which do not, such as the great pyramid, bear evidence that their tops have been violently dislocated and thrown down. Moreover, when finished, the entire surface of the receding steps was covered over with a smooth casing of flat stone flags. The casing of some of them, in whole or in part, such as that of the upper quarter of the second pyramid, close at hand, is still perfectly entire, and its apex sharp-pointed. So that unless the fire-worshippers and the astronomers of those days could climb up like lizards, or, like the fabled genii of the middle ages, could consociate, as on the point of a needle, these peaks were physically unfitted for any of their operations! Whence, then, the origin of such fanciful hypotheses at all? One of the chief reasons for supposing them to have been fire-temples is, their pyramidal form, which somewhat resembles that of burning flame! By indulgence in such or similar fancies, how many strange ends have these pyramids been made to serve! We have read of their having been designed to represent the soul, which is of 'a fiery nature, and adhereth to the body as a pyramid doth to the basis, or as fire doth to the fuel;'—or, the great cycle of thirty-six thousand years; since a pyramid, 'the top of it standing fixed, and the base being moved about, would describe a circle, and the whole body of it a cone;'—or, the nature of things; because, 'as a pyramid, having its beginning from a point at the top, is by degrees dilated on all parts, so the nature of all things proceeding from one fountain and beginning, viz., from God, the chief workmaster, is diffused into various kinds and species, all which it conjoins to that beginning and point, from whence every thing issues and flows;'—or the 'first and most simple of mathematical bodies;'—or 'the mysteries of pyramidal numbers;'—or 'the emission of rays from luminous bodies;'—or 'the emanation of sensible species from their objects!' But where are such frivolous, far-fetched fancies to terminate? The truth is, that the pyramidal form must have been chosen for the simplest and best of all reasons, viz., that, owing to its gradual contraction, from the very bottom towards the top, and consequent decrease of its own down-bearing weight, as well as diminished liability to cracks and rents, this form is by far the most stable and permanent. As to the supposed astronomical design, one of the principal reasons for the opinion is founded on the direction of the sides, which happen to be turned towards the four cardinal points! If a ground of argument so utterly futile be admitted, there is not an illiterate mountaineer in the Highlands of Scotland who might not be proved an accomplished astronomer, and his cottage an astronomical observatory—since, if he has a freedom of choice, he is sure to erect his hut fronting the sun at right angles, when on the meridian of noon—the sides of his humble abode being thus as exactly turned towards the four cardinal points as the pyramids of Egypt! Besides, is it not one main object of the astronomer to secure, if possible, a clear, unobstructed horizon? Now here, on the top of the great pyramid, a considerable portion of the sky is most gratuitously shut out of view by the second and other smaller ones." The able and intelligent writer by whom these remarks were penned, after reviewing the various opinions given forth by others, declares his own convictions to be in favour of the opinion of Herodotus, that the pyramids are sepulchral monuments reared by the pride and vanity and superstition of tyrant monarchs.

There are various prophecies in the Old Testament which refer to Egypt. Some of them, uttered by Isaiah and Jeremiah when the kingdom was in the height of its splendour and prosperity, were fulfilled in the terrible invasions of Nebuchadnezzar, Cambyses, and the Persian monarchs. During the reign of the Ptolemys, Egypt enjoyed for nearly three hundred years something of its former renown for learning and power. During this period it formed one of the only two ancient kingdoms which had survived the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, and Macedonian Empires. Many of the prophecies regarding Egypt were fulfilled in ancient times, and at this day it affords a striking instance of the accuracy with which Scripture prophecy has been fulfilled. On this subject Dr Duff makes the following striking remarks: "'Where are thy wise men?'—asks the prophet Isaiah—'Where are they?' Where are thy wise men? Where are they?—may echo now mournfully respond from every corner of a land whence all wisdom hath fled, and the very remembrance of it hath perished. The wisdom of its priests and people has, to adopt the emphatic language of a modern writer, given place to 'the decrepitude and imbecility of a second childhood.' No native can now decipher a single inscription in the sacred character; but foreigners from the extremity of Western Europe must be called in, to disinter the monuments, and to unravel the hieroglyphic records of the past.

"I will set fire in Egypt," saith the Spirit of the Lord by the prophet Ezekiel, 'and her cities shall be in the midst of the cities that are wasted.' All the ancient cities of Egypt, without one exception, are now wasted—so wasted, as to be without an inhabitant. Some of them exhibit nought but the promiscuous confusion of broken columns and shattered edifices. The traces of others have become so strangely obliterated, that the precise spot where they stood is still a matter of debate among antiquarians. Many of them have disappeared altogether amid the sands of the desert.

"I will make the rivers [of Egypt] dry," saith the Lord. How many lakes, canals, and large branches of the Nile itself have, in Upper Egypt, been literally dried up and choked with sand! And in Lower Egypt, of the seven mouths of the Nile, five of which were natural and two artificial, is it not memorable that the two latter are the only ones which remain as free outlets of the mighty stream?—and that the five former are now so obstructed, as to be either wholly dried up, or converted into stagnant marshes?

"I will make the land of Egypt desolate, in the midst of the countries that are desolate." And is it not matter of historic fact, that many an immense and flourishing district along the whole extent of Egypt has become irretrievably desolate—the once fertile fields being now turned into a burning desert? Yea, as the necessary consequence of such desolation, is it not also matter of historic fact, that a territory which formerly supplied the necessaries and luxuries of life to upwards of seven millions can now very inadequately support a third part of that number? Nor is the progress of desolation yet ended. Through the repressive energies of a merciless tyranny, the work of destruction is advancing apace—and in many places advancing rapidly and irretraceably.

"I will also destroy the idols, and will cause their images to cease out of Noph," (Memphis.) Where are now the once famed idols and images of Egypt?—Egypt, the very birth-place and cradle of the leading mythologies and idolatries of antiquity! They are hid in the burning sands, buried beneath the rubbish of ruins, strewn in mutilated and dishonoured fragments upon the surface, or transported to replenish the museums and the galleries of every metropolis in Europe with idle curiosities.

"The pomp of her strength shall cease," continues the prophet; 'the pride of her power shall come down. I will sell the lands into the hands of the wicked; it shall be a base kingdom, the basest of the kingdoms; and there shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt.' How singularly minute the verification of every part of this most remarkable prophecy! Where now is the pomp of Egypt's ancient strength—the pride of her ancient power? All, all sepulchred in the dust which covers her temples and palaces, and stupefying monuments. The only visible remaining relic of the 'pomp and pride' of royal Memphis, is the huge bust of the colossal statue of Sesostris, erected by himself, with several others, in front of the temple of Vulcan. It was the practice of this proud conqueror to rear pillars in every subjugated province, invariably bearing the daringly presumptuous inscription, 'Sesostris, King of kings and Lord of lords, subdued this country by his arms.' Now, as if to verify to the very senses of posterity the faithfulness of His word who declares that He 'will stain the pride of all glory,' the most gigantic representation of the hero himself now lies amid the ruins of his own capital—lies shattered and mutilated, in the most humiliating of all postures, even in a deep trench, with its face fast stuck in the mud! And what mere human sagacity could possibly have foreseen, or what stretch of mere human hardihood could possibly have hazarded the remaining parts of the prediction?—and that, too, at a time when Egypt, to human eye, appeared the greatest and most flourishing, as well as, to human estimate, the most stable and permanent of all earthly kingdoms? Yet, is it not the undisputed and indisputable testimony of all history, that, since the days of the prophets, Egypt has been overrun by successive races of foreign conquerors, and literally sold into the hands of wicked oppressors? that since the days of the prophets, there never has been, even amid innumerable scenes of anarchy and change, a single native prince of the land of Egypt? Nor is this all. The insults, indignities, cruelties, and miseries, to which the wretched inhabitants have almost unintermittedly, throughout the long period of two thousand years, passively submitted, almost exceed credibility. So entirely extinct has the spirit of liberty and independence become, that in the present moment, even in the lowest depths of their wo, they never dream of the rise and formation of a native government. No; so crushed have their souls become, that they seem utterly incapable of entertaining a sentiment which has been cherished by the crouching Greek, the degenerate Italian, the submissive Hindu, and the fettered Negro. At this moment, those who have most freely mingled with them and know their mind best, positively assure us, that the height of their ambition, the loftiest aspiration of their shrivelled souls is, that God in his providence may be pleased to permit some other foreign power of a milder character to assume the sceptre; prepared to reckon it the greatest privilege, should only a whip of rods be substituted in place of the present fiercely brandished scourge of scorpions. Thus truly and literally has Egypt gradually become not only 'base,' but 'the basest of the kingdoms.'" Sir Gardner Wilkinson makes the following remarks upon the religion of the ancient Egyptians: "Superstitiously attached to their sacred institutions, and professing a religion which admitted much outward show, the Egyptians clothed their ceremonies with all the grandeur of solemn pomp; and the celebration of their religious rites was remarkable for all that human ingenuity could devise to render them splendid and imposing. They prided themselves on being the nation in whom had originated most of the sacred institutions afterwards common to other people, who were believed to have adopted them from Egypt; and the mysterious nature and attributes of the Deity, though presented under a different form, were recognised by the Egyptians as a direct emanation from the metaphysical philosophy of their priesthood. They claimed the merit of being the first who had consecrated each month and day to a particular deity;—a method of forming the calendar which has been imitated and preserved to the present day; the Egyptian gods having yielded their place to those of another Pantheon, which have in turn been supplanted by the saints of a Christian era;—and they also considered themselves the first to suggest the idea of foretelling from the natal hour the future fortunes of each new-born infant, the life he was destined to lead, or the death he was fated to die; which were boldly settled by astrological prediction.

“‘The Greeks,’ says Herodotus, ‘borrowed the science of astrology from the Egyptians, but that people have invented more prodigies than all the rest of mankind. They observe and note down every occurrence, as well as whatever follows it; and then carefully watching those of a similar nature, they predict the issue from analogy, being persuaded that it will be the same.’ In like manner, observes the historian, to the Egyptians is conceded the honour of teaching mankind the proper mode of approaching the Deity; and Lucian asserts, ‘that they were reputed the first who had a conception of the gods, an acquaintance with religious matters, and a knowledge of sacred names;’ an opinion expressed in the words of an oracle of Apollo quoted by Eusebius, which declares that ‘they, before all others, disclosed by infinite actions the path that leads to the gods.’ And Jamblichus not only considers them ‘the first of men who were allowed to partake of the favour of the gods, but that the gods, when invoked, rejoiced in the rites of Egypt.’

“The inspection of the entrails of victims, the study of omens, and all those superstitious customs which the religions of antiquity so scrupulously observed, were deemed highly important among the Egyptians; and the means adopted for divining future events, or the success of any undertaking, were as varied and fanciful as the derb e’ rummel and other trials of chance used by Oriental people at the present day.”

It may be interesting to our readers to know somewhat of the present aspect of the Coptic population—the only representatives of the once noble, widespread, and flourishing Church of Alexandria and Egypt. On this subject Dr Duff gives the following information, collected on the spot:—“Their very language (the Coptic) has now ceased to exist as a living, spoken tongue—having been supplanted by a jargon of Arabic; and though it is still retained as the language of sacredness in their public services of worship and devotion, like Latin in the Popish churches, it is intelligible to few or none of the hearers. As the litany and liturgy must be recited or repeated without a book, many, even of the priests, can neither read, write, speak, nor understand it. How, then, can their worship be a reasonable, edifying, or soul-reviving service? In all heathenism there is not a form more absolutely profitless and meaningless. Of all real life it is as destitute as any of the mouldering mummies in the catacombs. Almost the only education known amongst them (and that, too, limited to a few), is the humble acquirement of reading and writing the common Arabic, and casting accounts, to enable them to earn a livelihood as copyists in public offices, or head servants in the families of Turkish grandees.” And in regard to the Church of Egypt, the same writer thus remarks: “Over the portals of a Church, once the most celebrated in the world, may now be inscribed in largest characters,—

‘ Fallen, fallen, fallen,
Fallen from its high estate.’

Still, in its unbounded admiration of many of the soundest of the ancient fathers; in its heart-stirring remembrance of bygone ages of persecution and martyrdom; and, above all, in its profound reverence for the authority and majesty of the Word of God—that mightiest of renovating instruments, when wielded by an omnipotent Spirit of grace—we cannot but discern rallying points of revival, the possession of which, in the same proportionate degree, can scarcely be claimed by any other of the fallen Churches of primitive times. Degenerated it has into what is little better than an effete machine of external observances, evacuated of all spirit and of all life; but it has never formally or wholly apostatised from the faith. Even its monophysite error has long been a naked scholastic dogma, rather than an operative principle of evil; and at no time did it lead the Church, as such, to reject from its creed the divinity of the Saviour, or the all-sufficiency of his atonement as the sole ground of the sinner’s justification. To it, perhaps, the apocalyptic description is still applicable, ‘Thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name.’ Oh, that that word may speedily be armed with more than its wonted sharpness in piercing the hearts of sinners; and that name fraught with more than its wonted preciousness; and that ‘little strength’ restored to more than its wonted plenitude!”

EGYPT, BROOK, or RIVER OF. This is frequently mentioned as the southern limit of the Land of Promise. Gen. xv. 18; 2 Chron. vii. 8; Numb. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xv. 4. Calmet is of opinion that this was the Nile; but most modern interpreters take the River of Egypt to be the brook Besor, between Gaza and Rhinocorura. Dr Hales thinks that Sihor and the River of Egypt are the same, and that Sihor is the Nile. Jer. ii. 18.

EHUD, son of Gera, a judge of Israel, who slew Eglon, king of Moab. Judg. iii. 15.

EJACULATION, a short prayer, in which the mind is directed to God on any emergency. See PRAYER.

EKRON, a city of the Philistines, and the seat of government. It was situated near the shore of the Mediterranean, between Azotus and Jamnia. It fell to the tribe of Judah by lot, when Joshua divided the land, but was afterwards given to the tribe of Dan. Josh. xv. 45, xix. 43. The city was strongly fortified; and it does not appear from history that the Jews were ever sole, peaceable possessors of it. The idol Beelzebub was principally worshipped by the inhabitants of Ekron, and a famous temple was there dedicated to him. 2 Kings i. 2.

ELAH, the fourth king of Israel, who succeeded his father Baasha, and reigned two years at Tirzah, where he was assassinated by Zimri, at an entertainment given to him by one of his officers. 1 Kings xvi. 6–10.

ELAH, VALLEY OF, or as it is sometimes termed, the Terebinth Vale, and the scene of David’s victory over Goliath. No one can survey the spot without observing how exactly it answers the description given of it in the Scripture history. “And Saul and the men of Israel were gathered together, and pitched by the Valley of Elah, and set the battle in array against the Philistines. And the Philistines stood on a mountain on the one side, and Israel stood on a mountain on the other side: and there was a valley between them.” 1 Sam. xvii. 2, 3. The outlines of the scene are the same now as they were then, when it daily resounded to the taunts and threats of the Philistines, whose haughty challenge was met by the faithful David, who singly vindicated the liberties of his nation and the honour of the God of Israel.

ELAM, the eldest son of Shem, who settled in a country to which he gave his name. Gen. x. 22. It is frequently mentioned in Scripture as lying to the south-east of Shinar. Susiana, in later times, seems to have been a part of this country (Dan. viii. 2); and before the captivity, the Jews seem always to have intended Persia by the name of Elam. Stephanns takes it to be a part of Assyria; but Pliny and Josephus, more properly, of Persia, whose inhabitants, we learn, sprung from the Elamites.

ELATH, a sea-port town on the eastern coast of the Red Sea. It originally belonged to the Edomites, being situated in the country of Idumea; but when David made a conquest of the latter, and began to establish a commercial intercourse with distant nations, Elath became a place of considerable note. In the reign of Solomon, it was of still more consequence on account of the ships which he there built and fitted out for the purpose of importing gold from Ophir. 2 Chron. viii. 17. It remained in the possession of the Israelites a hundred and fifty years, when, in the reign of Jehoram, the Edomites recovered it. 2 Kings viii. 20. It was, however, retaken by Uzziah, king of Judah, in the beginning of his reign, who fortified it anew, peopled it with his own subjects, and restored the trade to Ophir; which it continued to enjoy until the wicked reign of Ahaz, when Rezin, king of Damascus, took it by surprise, and having banished the Jews that were settled there, supplanted them with Syrians, and made preparations for carrying on the trade by which the kings of Judah had been so enriched. The very next year, however, Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, invaded Damascus, conquered Rezin, took possession of Elath, and reserved the right of trade there to himself; so that the Jews from that time never recovered it, which proved very detrimental to their national interests.

EL-BETH-EL, the name given by Jacob to an altar which he built (Gen. xxxv. 7), and which stood, probably, on the very spot where he had formerly seen the prophetic dream of the ladder. Gen. xxviii. 22. Professor Bush is of opinion that the first El does not belong to the name of the place; but that, according to the distinction of the Hebrew accents, it is separated from the rest of the word, as if the writer meant to say, "And he connected the name of El [God] with the place; to wit, by calling it Beth-el, or the house of God."

ELDAD and MEDAD were appointed by Moses among the seventy elders of Israel, who were to assist in the government. Though not present in the general assembly, they were filled with the Spirit of God equally with those who were there, and began to prophesy in the camp. Joshua would have had Moses forbid them, but he replied, "Enviest thou for my sake? would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them!" Num. xi. 24-29.

ELDER, or PRESBYTER, an overseer, ruler, leader. The reverence paid to the aged in the earliest times was doubtless the origin of this title, it being used as a name of office both among Jews and Christians. Dr Macknight thinks that in the apostolic age it was applied to "all who exercised any sacred office in the Christian Church." Acts xx. 17-28.

Elders, in ancient Jewish polity, were persons the most considerable for age, experience, and wisdom. Of this sort were the seventy men whom Moses associated with himself in the government; such likewise afterwards were those who held the first rank in the synagogue as presidents. Elders, in Church history, were originally those who held the first place in the assemblies of the primitive Christians. The word presbyter is often used in the New Testament in this signification, and as interchangeable with episcopos; hence the first meetings of Christian ministers were called presbyteria, or assemblies or elders.

Elder is the name of a spiritual officer in the house of God. Thus Acts xiv. 23: "And when they had appointed them elders in every city." The officers who in the Scriptures are called by the name of elders, are of several sorts—preaching elders or ministers, teaching elders or doctors, and ruling or governing elders. All these three are often in the New Testament comprised under the general name of elders. In current language, however, when the elder is spoken of, it is the ruling elder who is uniformly meant. In an excellent treatise on ruling elders and deacons by the Rev. James Guthrie, which was lately reprinted by the Rev. John G. Lorimer of Glasgow, the following clear and distinct account is given of the institution of the office of ruling elders:—

"The institution of the office of ruling elders is divine; it is not an ordinance of man, but of God. The Lord Jesus, upon whose shoulder the government is, and who is faithful in all his house, hath, in his eternal wisdom, thought fit to appoint such an officer in his house, for the right and orderly governing thereof. It is true, that by the sloth, or rather by the pride of teachers, whilst they alone would seem to be somewhat, and by the policy of Satan and inadvertence of the Church, these officers were for many ages together out of use in the Christian Church. But certain it is, that both the Jewish Synagogue and afterwards the Christian Church had seniores or elders, without whose counsel nothing was done in the Church. That the Jewish Church had such, appears from 2 Chron. xix. 8; Jer. xxix. 1; Matt. xvi. 21, xxvi. 57, 59; Acts, iv. 5; and that the Christian Church also had them, in the primitive and purest times thereof, appears from the testimony of ancient writers, as may be found by those who will take pains to search into these things. But we have a more sure word for the divine institution of elders in the Christian Church than any testimony of man, to wit, the testimony of God in the Scriptures of the New Testament.

"The first place of Scripture is, 'Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministering: or he that teacheth, on teaching; or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness.' Rom. xii. 6-8. In which text the apostle doth at first comprehend all the several kinds of ordinary standing officers in the Church of God under two general heads; to wit, prophecy, whereby is meant the ordinary faculty of right understanding and expounding the Scriptures; and ministry, under which is comprehended all other Church officers and employments. To each of these the apostle addeth their general duties, namely, that he who prophesieth should do it according to the proportion of faith; that is, according to the measure of knowledge of the word of faith that he hath received of God: and he that ministereth, let him wait on his ministering; that is, let him not do it negligently or slothfully, but faithfully and diligently. Then he subdivides these two generals into the special offices contained under them. He divides him that prophesieth into him that teacheth and him that exhorteth; or into the doctor, to whom the work of teaching or instructing belongs, and the pastor, to whom the word of exhortation is competent. Under him that ministereth, he comprehends, first, him that giveth, by whom is meant the deacon, who is appointed for the supply of the poor; secondly, him that ruleth, by whom can be meant no other than the ruling elder, seeing an ordinary ruling officer in the Church, who is different from the pastor and teacher, is here spoken of by the apostle.

"The second place of Scripture that proves the office of ruling elders is, 'And God hath set some in the Church; first, apostles; secondarily, prophets; thirdly, teachers; after that, miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues.' 1 Cor. xii. 28. Some of the Bibles of the late English translation read 'helps in governments,' but cross to the text in the original language, that bears 'helps, governments,' as two distinct things, and therefore in other editions of that translation this is helped. In this text the apostle reckons several officers of the Church; some extraordinary, which were to continue but for a season, such as apostles, prophets, powers or miracles, gifts of healing, kinds of tongues; some ordinary, which were to continue in the Church to the end of the world, and these are, teachers, or the ordinary Church officers who are exercised in the word; helps, that is, the deacons, who are appointed for the help and relief of the poor; and governments, that is, the governing and ruling elders; for it is clear from the words that the apostle, by governments, doth mean a Church officer whom God hath set in his Church for ruling and governing thereof. Now this cannot be any other of the Church officers, for these he hath named besides, and therefore it remains that it is the ruling elder.

"The third place of Scripture is, 'Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine.' 1 Tim. v. 17. Which text doth hold forth and distinguish two sorts of elders in the Church, to whom the Lord Jesus hath committed the power of ruling. One sort, who do also labour in the word and doctrine, namely, pastors and teachers; another sort who do only rule, and doing it well are accounted worthy of double honour, and these are the ruling elders of whom we speak.

"From this, that the office of the ruling elder is of divine institution, we gather these conclusions:—

"First, That it is not a thing arbitrary and indifferent for such to wait upon their charge, yea or nay as they please, or as their attendance may contribute for their own or their friends' particular advantage, which is the custom of too many elders; but that they are bound in conscience diligently to attend and follow the duties thereof, whether they be such as they owe to the several members of the congregation, or the keeping of session, or presbytery, and other assemblies of the Church, when they are called and desired thereto.

"Secondly, That elders ought to do their office, not formally and hypocritically, for the fashion only, but sincerely and honestly, as in the sight of God, by whom they are called unto this holy calling, and to whom they must render an account for their discharge of this great trust.

"Thirdly, They ought not to domineer over their fellow-brethren and elders, but to carry themselves humbly and serviceably, as those who are appointed of the Lord Jesus for ministering unto and edifying of his body, the Church.

"Fourthly, That they ought to carry themselves with that authority, holiness, gravity, and prudence, that become those who are called of God to bear rule in his house.

"Fifthly, That elders, once lawfully called to the office, and having gifts from God meet to exercise the same, unless they be removed therefrom because of miscarriages, are still elders, though haply, in congregations where many qualified men may be found, some may be permitted for a time to cease from the exercise of the charge, and others be put in their room, as was among the Levites under the law in serving in the temple by courses.

"Sixthly, That people ought to obey such as those who have the rule over them, and to submit themselves, because they wait for their souls as they that must give an account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief. Heb. xiii. 17. Yea, they should know them as those who are over them in the Lord, and do admonish them, and esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. 1 Thess. v. 12, 13."

The ruling elders of each Church are called to attend to public and also to private duties. With regard to the public duties of their office, they form in the Church to which they belong a bench or judicial court, called the "kirk-session," and in some Presbyterian Churches, the "consistory;" both expressions importing a body of ecclesiastical men, sitting and acting together as the representatives, and for the benefit of the Church. This body of elders, with the pastor at their head, and presiding at their meetings, form a judicial assembly, by which all the spiritual interests of the congregation are to be watched over, regulated, and authoritatively determined. To the kirk-session it belongs to bind and loose; to admit to the communion of the Church, with all its privileges; to take cognizance of all departure from the purity of faith or practice; to try, censure, acquit, or excommunicate those who are charged with offences; to consult and determine upon all matters relating to the time, place, and circumstances of worship, and other spiritual concerns; to take order about catechising children, congregational fasts, and thanksgiving days—instructing and examining catechumens in preparation for the Lord's supper; to correct as far as possible everything that may tend to disorder, or is contrary to edification; and to devise and execute plans for promoting a spirit of inquiry, of reading, of prayer, of order, and of universal holiness, among the members of the Church. In the kirk-session, every member has an equal voice. The vote of the most humble and retiring elder is of the same avail as that of his minister; so that no pastor can carry any measure, unless he can obtain the concurrence of a majority of the eldership. But the functions of the ruling elder are not confined to the congregation of which he is one of the rulers. In every presbytery, synod, and General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, ruling as well as teaching elders are entitled to a place. In these several judicatories the ruling elder has an equal vote, and the same power in every respect with the pastors. He has the same privilege of originating plans and measures, and of carrying them, provided he can induce a majority of the body to concur in his views.

The more private duties of the eldership are no less important than its public functions. It is the part of the elder to assist and encourage the pastor as much as possible in the oversight of the congregation, visiting from house to house, dealing with the souls of the people, visiting and praying with the sick and the dying, instructing the young, and in every way advancing the spiritual interests of the congregation.

ELEALEH, a town of Reuben (Numb. xxxii. 37), placed by Eusebius a mile from Heshbon.

ELEAZAR, the third son of Aaron, and his successor in the dignity of high priest. Exod. vi. 23. He entered into the land of Canaan with Joshua, and is supposed to have lived there upwards of twenty years. The high priesthood continued in his family till the time of Eli. He was buried in a hill that belonged to the son of Phinehas. Josh. xxiv. 34. This was the name, also, of the son of Abinadab, to whose care the ark was committed when it was sent back by the Philistines. 1 Sam. vii. 1. He is thought to have been a priest, or at least a Levite, though he is not mentioned in the catalogue of the sons of Levi. Eleazar was the name, besides, of the son of Dodo, the second of David's mighty men, who distinguished himself by his bravery. 1 Chron. xi. 12. He was one of the three warriors who forced their way through the Philistine army, to procure water for David from the well at Beth-lehem. 1 Chron. xi. 17-19.

ELECTION. This word is generally used in Scripture to designate that eternal, gratuitous, sovereign, and immutable purpose of God, whereby he chose some from among mankind to everlasting life. The following clear and distinct account of this much contested doctrine is extracted from Shaw's excellent Exposition of the Westminster Confession of Faith:—

“That there is such a thing as election, in some sense or other, must be admitted by all who believe the Scriptures; but many who retain the word, completely explain away the doctrine which the Bible teaches upon the subject.

“Some will allow of no election but that of nations, or of whole Churches, in their collective capacity. That the Scripture speaks of such a general election is admitted; but this is not inconsistent with a particular and personal election. The Jews were a chosen generation, separated from among the other nations of the world to be, in a peculiar manner, the people of God; but our Lord intimates that among them there was a remnant chosen in a superior sense. Matt. xxiv. 22. The Apostle Paul also saith, ‘Even at this present time there is a remnant according to the election of grace.’ Rom. xi. 5. That it is of the Jews, the chosen nation, the apostle speaks, and that he distinguishes a remnant from the great body of them, is sufficiently manifest; and he plainly intimates, that the former were chosen in such a sense as the latter were not.

“Some allow only of an election to external privileges. Holding that the Scripture speaks solely of an election of communities, they maintain that they are only chosen to the enjoyment of the external means of salvation. But we are assured from Scripture, that they who believe ‘were ordained to eternal life,’ and that they were ‘chosen to salvation.’ Acts xiii. 48; 2 Thess. ii. 13.

“Some, by election, understand no more than a separation of persons from the world, made in time, and thus identify it with their calling, or conversion. But in Scripture, election and calling are clearly distinguished; and the latter is represented as the effect of the former. Persons are said to be ‘called according to God’s purpose;’ and ‘whom he did predestinate, them he also called.’ Rom. viii. 28-30. Now, predestination and the purpose of God must be very different from calling, which proceeds from it, unless the cause and the effect are the same thing. To put such interpretations upon the word ‘election,’ is to wrest the language of Scripture, and to impose upon it a sense contrary to its obvious meaning.

“It would be tedious, and would serve no good purpose, to enumerate the multifarious opinions which have been held on this subject. It will be sufficient to mention the opinion of the Socinians and of the Arminians. The Socinians deny the certain pre-science of future contingencies, such as the determinations of free agents; and, therefore, the only decree respecting the salvation of men which they will admit to have been made from eternity, and to be unchangeable, is a general conditional decree, that such as believe and obey the Gospel shall be saved; and, according to them, a special decree concerning particular persons, is only made in time, when persons perform the condition contained in the general decree. The Arminians, or Remonstrants, as they are also called, are distinguished from the Socinians by admitting that contingent events, such as the determinations and actions of men, are foreseen by God; but they also deny absolute and unconditional election, and maintain, that whatever God has decreed respecting men is founded on the foresight of their conduct. Having foreseen, without any decree, that Adam would involve himself and his posterity in sin and its consequences, he purposed to send his Son to die for them all, and to give them sufficient grace to improve the means of salvation; and knowing beforehand who would believe and persevere to the end, and who would not, he chose the former to eternal life, and left the latter in a state of condemnation. There is, however, a diversity of opinion among the holders of this general system; and some of them coincide with Socinians, in maintaining that the decrees of God respecting men are not eternal, but are made in time; that men are elected to eternal life after they have believed; and that, if they fall into an estate of unbelief and impenitence, the sentence or decree is reversed.

“In opposition to these systems, our Confession teaches that God made choice of, and predestinated a certain and definite number of individuals to everlasting life; that he predestinated them unto life before the foundation of the world was laid; that in so doing he acted according to his sovereign will, and was not influenced by the foresight of their faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them; and that this purpose is immutable, it being impossible that any of the elect should perish. That these doctrines are in accordance with Scripture may be easily evinced.

“1. God made choice of, and predestinated, a certain and definite number of individuals to everlasting life. According to the Socinians, God predestinated to eternal life, not any particular individuals of mankind, but a certain sort or description of men; not persons, but characters. The Scripture, however, clearly teaches that God made choice of a certain determinate number of persons from among the rest of the human race, and ordained them to eternal life. It is said, ‘The Lord knoweth them that are his.’ 2 Tim. ii. 19. He perfectly knows how many, and who in particular, his elect are. Hence their names are said to be enrolled in a book, called the Book of Life; for it is the book in which are registered the names of all the individuals of mankind who were chosen to everlasting life. A person's name is that whereby he is known and distinguished from others; when, therefore, their names are said to be written in a book, it intimates that God has an exact knowledge of all the individuals whom he has chosen.

"2. God predestinated these individuals to life from eternity. According to Socinians, and some Arminians, as has been already noticed, special election only takes place in time, when persons actually believe and obey the Gospel. But an election in time is at direct variance with the doctrine of Scripture. It is said (Eph. i. 4), 'God hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world;' and this emphatical phrase is evidently expressive of eternity. Thus Paul addresses the Thessalonian Christians, 'God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation.' 2 Thess. ii. 13. That the phrase 'from the beginning' denotes eternity, is evident from Prov. viii. 23, where Christ is introduced saying, 'I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, ere ever the earth was.' That the phrase 'from the beginning,' is here equivalent to the phrase 'from everlasting,' is manifest. Indeed, we cannot conceive of any new determinations arising in the divine mind, without supposing the Divine Being defective in knowledge, or mutable in his perfections—suppositions utterly incompatible with the nature of that Being whose name is JEHOVAH.

"3. In making this choice, God acted from his own sovereign will, and was not influenced by any foresight of their faith or other qualifications. According to Arminians, God's decree respecting the salvation of men is founded upon their foreseen faith and good works. Thus, 'the decree of God, although prior in time, is posterior in order, to the actions of men, and is dependent upon the determination of their will.' But to this opinion, so derogatory to the supreme dominion and absolute authority of God, the doctrine of Scripture is directly opposed. Election is ascribed to grace, to the exclusion of works; and these two causes are represented as incompatible and mutually destructive. 'Even so, then, at this present time, there is a remnant according to the election of grace. And if by grace, then is it no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace; otherwise work is no more work.' Rom. xi. 5, 6. How is it possible to reconcile with these words the opinion that the foresight of men's good works was the cause of their election? Besides, it is worthy of particular attention, that faith and holiness, which the advocates of conditional decrees make the causes of election, are expressly said in Scripture to be the effects of it. 2 Thess. ii. 13; Eph. i. 4. In Rom. ix. 10–13, Paul produces the case of Jacob and Esau as an illustration of the subject, and traces the predestination of individuals to happiness or misery to the sovereignty of God, without any consideration of their works. As the lot of the two sons of Isaac was settled prior to their personal conduct, so the apostle signifies that the appointment of particular persons to salvation depends solely upon the good pleasure of God. That election is founded on the good pleasure of God, and not on anything in its objects, is clearly stated, verse 16 of the same chapter: 'It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy;' and also in verse 18: 'Therefore he hath mercy on whom he will,'

&c. Were it otherwise, there would be no shadow of objection to the doctrine. 'How could men say it was unjust, if God chose one and rejected another according to their works? And how could any one object, as in verse 19, 'that as the will of God could not be resisted, men were not to be blamed,' if the decision in question did not depend on the will of God, but on that of men? How easy for the apostle to have answered the objector, 'You are mistaken; the choice is not of God; he does not choose whom he wills, but whom he sees will choose him! It is not his will, but man's that decides the point.' Paul does not so answer, but vindicates the doctrine of the divine sovereignty. The fact, therefore, that Paul had to answer the same objections which are now constantly urged against the doctrine of election, goes far to show that that doctrine was his.

"4. The purpose of God respecting his elect is immutable. As Arminians hold that saints may fall from a state of grace, so they maintain that a person who is one of the elect to-day may become one of the reprobate to-morrow. They affirm that 'men may make their election void'—that 'as they change themselves from believers to unbelievers, so the divine determination concerning them changes.' But the Scripture expressly declares, that 'the counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations.' Ps. xxxiii. 11. Besides this general assurance of the immutability of his counsel, it is affirmed that 'the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his.' 2 Tim. ii. 19. The purpose of God according to election shall stand; so that the number of the elect can neither be increased nor diminished.

"There is one circumstance connected with election that remains to be noticed. The elect are stated to have been 'chosen in Christ'—which, indeed, is the express language of Scripture. Eph. i. 4. This cannot mean that the mediatory work of Christ was the cause of their election; for, as has been already shown, election proceeds from the mere sovereign will of God; and the Scripture represents the mission of our Saviour as the effect of the love of God. John iii. 16. The mediation of Christ was necessary, in order that the effects of electing love might be bestowed upon God's chosen, in a consistency with the rights and honour of his justice; but election itself originated in divine sovereignty, and had no other cause than the good pleasure of God's will. Eph. i. 5. The divine purpose is one embracing the means as well as the end; but according to our conceptions of the operations of the divine mind, the end is first in intention, and then the means are appointed by which it is to be carried into effect. The phrase, 'chosen in Christ,' signifies, therefore, we apprehend, that God had a respect to the mediation of Christ, not as the cause of their election, but as the means by which the purpose of election was to be executed."

ELECT LADY. This was, as is generally believed, a lady of high rank who lived near Ephesus, to whom John addressed his Second Epistle, cautioning her and her children against heretics, who denied the divinity of Christ and his incarnation. Some think Electa, which signifies chosen, is not a proper name, but an honourable epithet, and that the Epistle was directed to a Church. The same apostle salutes Electa and her children in his Third Epistle; but the accounts of this Electa are as perplexed as those of the former.

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL (that is, God the God of Israel"), the name given by Jacob to the altar which he erected in the field at Shalem that he purchased from the children of Hamor. Gen. xxxiii. 20. It was a kind of preliminary dedication of the land of promise to God. It was as if he had taken possession of it in the name of the God of Israel, by setting up his standard in it, and said, Whenever this whole country shall come into the hands of my posterity, let it in this manner be devoted to God. It is the first time, also, in which he is represented as availing himself of his new name, and of the covenant blessing conferred upon him under it. The name given to the altar was no doubt designed to be a memorial of both.

ELEMENTS, first principles. The word is used on several occasions in the New Testament. Thus in Heb. v. 12, it denotes the first principles of Christian doctrine. The Apostle Paul calls the ceremonies of the Mosaic ritual which had been done away in Christ, "weak and beggarly elements" (Gal. iv. 9), when contrasted with the higher and more spiritual truths which they were designed to typify and prefigure.

ELEPHANT. This word does not occur in the authorized version of the Bible; but where the word "ivory" occurs, in 1 Kings x. 22, and 2 Chron. ix. 21, it is given in the margin "elephants' teeth;" and in Job xl. 15, for BEHEMOTH (which see), the margin reads, "or the elephant, as some think." This is the opinion of Calmet, among others. The walls of the palaces of the Egyptian monarchs were inlaid with ivory and ebony. Solomon, in his ode on his marriage with the daughter of Pharaoh, makes reference to the "ivory palaces." Ps. xlv. 8. "These," says Dr Harris, "were named 'houses of ivory,' probably because made in the form of a house or palace; as the silver shrines of Diana, mentioned Acts xix. 24, were in the form of her temple at Ephesus; and as we have now ivory models of the Chinese pagodas or temples. In this sense I understand what is said of the ivory house which Ahab made. 1 Kings xxii. 39: for the Hebrew word translated 'house' is used, as Dr Taylor well observes, for 'a place, or case wherein any thing lieth, is contained, or laid up.' Ezekiel gives the name of house to chests of rich apparel. Chap. xxvii. 24. Dr Durell, in his note on Ps. xlv. 8, quotes places from Homer and Euripides, where the same appropriation is made. As to dwelling-houses, the most, I think, we can suppose in regard to them is, that they might have ornaments of ivory, as they sometimes have of gold, silver, or other precious materials, in such abundance, as to derive an appellation from the article of their decoration; as the Emperor Nero's palace, mentioned by Suetonius, in Nerone, chap. 31, was named golden, because overlaid with gold. This method of ornamenting buildings or apartments was very ancient among the Greeks. Homer mentions ivory as employed in the palace of Menelaus at Lacedæmon." Elephants are mentioned in the Books of Maccabees, and were then, no doubt, well known to the Jews.

ELEUTHERUS, a river in Syria, which rises between Libanus and Anti-Libanus, and falls into the Mediterranean Sea, near the island Aradus. It is mentioned in 1 Mac. xi. 7.

ELI, a high-priest of the Israelites, who acted in the double capacity of a priest and a judge during forty years. The line of the priesthood must have been changed before the time of Eli, he being of the race of Ithamar, not of Eleazar; but what led to this change we have no means of ascertaining. The character of Eli seems to have been deficient in firmness towards his children; and on this account God was displeased with him, in that "his sons had made themselves vile, and he restrained them not." Eli died suddenly, on learning that the Israelites had been conquered by the Philistines, and the ark of God had been taken. 1 Sam. i.-iv. In the reign of Solomon, the predictions in reference to the family of Eli were fulfilled; for the high-priesthood was taken from Abiathar, a descendant of Eli, and given to Zadok, of the race of Eleazar. 1 Kings ii. 26. Eli was also the name of the father of Joseph, the husband of Mary. Luke iii. 23.

ELIAKIM, son of Hilkiah, steward of the household, or keeper of the temple under King Hezekiah. 2 Kings xviii. 18. Calmet thinks that Eliakim was son of Hilkiah the high priest, that he succeeded his father, and was high priest under Manasseh. He is sometimes called Jehoiakim; and there is great probability that he is the Hilkiah mentioned in the reign of Josiah and afterwards.

ELIAS. See ELIJAH.

ELIASHIB, a grandson of Joshua, the high priest. He rebuilt part of the wall of Jerusalem, and was allied by marriage to Tobiah the Ammonite, to whom he gave apartments in the second temple, to the scandal of his religion and the great injury of his country. Neh. iii. 1, xii. 10, xiii. 4-9.

ELIEZER, the favourite steward of Abraham's house. Travellers tell us that even now, in some parts of the East, the master of a family, in default of children, adopts a slave as his heir. Abraham, before the birth of Isaac, seems to have adopted Eliezer to the exclusion of Lot and all the other collateral branches of his family. Such confidence did Abraham put in this servant, that he sent him into Mesopotamia to procure a wife for his son Isaac. The account which Moses gives of this expedition in Gen. xxiv., is a passage of singular beauty, exhibiting the simple piety and exemplary fidelity of the servant, in a manner at once touching and instructive.—Another person, bearing the name of Eliezer, is mentioned in 2 Chron. xx. 37, as having forewarned Jehoshaphat that the fleet which he had fitted out in conjunction with Ahaziah would be wrecked, and thus prevented from proceeding to Tarshish. This Eliezer was the son of Dodavah of Mareshah, and a prophet of the Lord.

ELIHU, one of Job's friends, a descendant of Nahor. Job xxxii. 2. See JOB.

ELIJAH. Elijah or Elias, a prophet, was a native of Thisbe, beyond Jordan, in Gilead. Some think that he was a priest descended from Aaron, and say that one Sabaca was his father; but this has no authority. He was raised up by God, to be set like a wall of brass in opposition to idolatry, and particularly to the worship of Baal, which Jezebel and Ahab supported in Israel. His history may be found in the First and Second Books of Kings.

ELIM. The seventh encampment of the Hebrews, in the northern extremity of the desert, "where there were twelve wells of water, and three score and ten palm trees." Exod. xv. 27. This place is supposed to be near the sea-port town called Tor, on the south-east coast of the Red Sea. Dr Shaw states that there are now about two thousand palm trees. The inhabitants of Tor pointed out to him a place under the shade of these trees called Hammam-Mousa, or the bath of Moses, as the spot where the household of the Hebrew leader had pitched their tent. By the common consent of travellers, the scene of this encampment is laid in Wady Girendel.

ELIPHAZ, the first-born son of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 15. It was also the name of one of the friends of Job, who is said to have been of Teman in Idumea, a city which derived its name, probably, from Teman, grandson of Esau. This Eliphaz appears to have been the oldest of Job's friends, and therefore took the lead in opening the debate which is recorded in the Book of Job.

ELISABETH, the wife of Zacharias and mother of John the Baptist. Luke i. 5. This name, which is now so common, was of very early origin, being the same with Elishaba, which, as we read in Exod. vi. 23, was the name of the wife of Aaron the high-priest. The meaning of the name is "the oath of God." The mother of the Baptist was a descendant of Aaron.

ELISEUS, a name given in the English version of the New Testament to Elisha the prophet.

ELISHA, the son of Shaphat, and a native of Abel-meholah. He succeeded Elijah in the prophetic office. It was by the express command of God that he was anointed by Elijah, whose calling of him is recorded in 1 Kings xix. 19-21. On the ascent of Elijah to heaven, his mantle fell upon Elisha, with a double portion of his blessing. In attestation of his divine authority, he sweetened miraculously the bitter waters of Jericho. 2 Kings ii. 19-22. This was shortly after followed by a marked judgment upon some young persons who mocked him as he entered Beth-el. 2 Kings ii. 23, 24. Various interesting miracles of mercy are mentioned as having been performed by Elisha, such as healing the waters of Jericho by casting in salt, raising to life the child of the Shunammite woman, and the cure of Naaman the Syrian. In his public character, Elisha exposed to Jehoram, the king of Israel, the stratagems of Benhadad, the king of Syria. This led to an attempt, on the part of Benhadad, to seek the prophet's life. By a miracle, however, Elisha was delivered; and some time after, that very king who wished to kill him was glad to consult him in the time of sickness. The death of Benhadad, and the judgments that were to come upon the guilty house of Ahab, were clearly revealed to the prophet. The latter years of his long and useful life appear to have been spent in privacy and retirement. Just before his death, he predicted that Joash, king of Israel, should prevail against the Syrians.

ELISHA, FOUNTAINS OF, now called Ain es Sultan, or Fountains of the Sultan. They are about a quarter of a mile distant from the Karantal or Quarantana mountain, the traditional scene of our Lord's temptation. Of this spring Dr Wilson says in his 'Lands of the Bible': "There can be no doubt that it is rightly associated with the name of Elisha, as no other fount from which Jericho could be watered is to be found in this part of the valley."

ELISHAH, son of Javan (Gen. x. 4), from whom, it is probable, the isles of Elishah are named, which Ezekiel (xxvii. 7) mentions as having brought purple to the markets of Tyre.

ELKANAH, second son of Korah, Exod. vi. 24. This is also the name of the father of Samuel the prophet. 1 Sam. i. 1.

ELKOSII, a very considerable village in Chaldea. The inhabitants, who were formerly pure Chaldeans, have been converted to the Roman Catholic faith. It contains, according to a very general tradition, the tomb of Nahum the prophet—the Elkoshite, as he is called in the introduction to his prophecy. It is a place held in great reverence by Mahometans and Christians, but especially by Jews, who keep the building in repair, and flock thither in great numbers at certain seasons of the year. The tomb is a simple plaster box, according to the description of Mr Layard, covered with green cloth, and standing at the upper end of a large chamber. On the walls of the room are slips of paper, upon which are written, in distorted Hebrew characters, religious exhortations, and the dates and particulars of the visits of various Jewish families. The house containing the tomb is a modern building. There are no inscriptions nor fragments of any antiquity about the place. As Nahum's prophecies were written after the captivity of the ten tribes, and apply exclusively to Nineveh, the tradition which points to the village in Assyria as the place of his death is not improbable.

ELKOTH, or EIKOSII, a village in Galilee, the birthplace of the prophet Nahum. Nah. i. 1. It was shown in Jerome's time, but almost in ruins. Theophylact says it is beyond Jordan.

ELLASAR. There was a city mentioned by Stephanus called Ellas, in Cœlo-Syria, on the borders of Arabia, where Arioch, one of the confederate kings (Gen. xiv. 9), perhaps commanded.

ELM. This word occurs but once in the English Bible (Hos. iv. 13); but the Hebrew aleh is in every other place rendered oak (which see). The tree intended is considered to be the terebinth tree, Pistachia terebinthus of Linnæus, a high tree, common in Palestine, with evergreen leaves, and fruit growing like grapes.

ELNATHAN, son of Achbor, and father of Nehusta, mother of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. He opposed the king's burning of Jeremiah's prophecies; and was sent into Egypt to bring back the Prophet Urijah. Jer. xxvi. 22, xxxvi. 12.

ELON, a grove of oaks; Elon-mamre, Elon-more, Elon-beth-ghanan, the grove or oak of Mamre, &c. This is also the name of a city of Dan. Josh. xix. 43.

ELUL, the sixth month of the Hebrew ecclesiastical year, and the twelfth of the civil year, answering to our August and part of September, containing twenty-nine days.

ELYMAIS, the capital of Elam or the ancient country of the Persians.

ELYMAS. See BAR-JESUS.

EMANATION, EFFLUX (from the Latin emanare, to issue, to flow out, to emanate). Philosophical systems, such as most of the ancient, do not adopt a spontaneous creation of the universe by a Supreme Being, but frequently explain the universe by an eternal emanation from the Supreme Being. This doctrine came from the East. Traces of it are found in the Indian mythology, and in the old Persian or Bactro-Median doctrine of Zoroaster. It had a powerful influence on the ancient Greek philosophy, as may be seen in Pythagoras. In theology, the doctrine of emanation is the doctrine of the Trinity, which regards the Son and Holy Ghost as effluxes from the Deity himself.

EMBALMING, the art of preserving dead bodies from putrefaction. See BURIAL.

EMBER DAYS. These are the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, after the first Sunday in Lent, the Feast of Whitsunday, the 14th of September, and the 13th of December; the Sundays following these days being the stated times of ordination in the Church of England. The weeks in which these days fall are called Ember Weeks. The derivation of the name is uncertain. It has been supposed by some to signify "ashes," and by others "abstinence," in allusion to the ancient custom connected with fasting. In the Western Church they were denominated "the Fasts of the Four Seasons."

EMBRACE, kindly to take into one's bosom. Gen. xxix. 13. To embrace promises, is to trust in them with delight and pleasure. Heb. xi. 13. To embrace Wisdom, is to receive Jesus and his truth into our heart, and to take pleasure in following him. Prov. iv. 8.

EMBROIDER. See BROIDERED.

EMERALD. Exod. xxviii. 18; Ezek. xxvii. 16, xxviii. 13; Rev. xxi. 19. It is one of the most beautiful of all the gems, and is of a bright green colour, without the admixture of any other. Pliny thus speaks of it: "The sight of no colour is more pleasant than green, for we love to view green fields and green leaves; and are still more fond of looking at the emerald, because all other greens are dull in comparison with this. Besides, these stones seem larger at a distance, by tinging the circumambient air. Their lustre is not changed by the sun, by the shade, nor by the light of lamps; but they have always a sensible moderate brilliancy." From the passage in Ezekiel we learn that the Tyrians traded in these jewels in the marts of Syria. They probably had them from India, or the south of Persia. The true Oriental emerald is very scarce, and the best now brought to England come from Peru. Gesenius says the meaning of the Hebrew word translated emerald cannot be more exactly ascertained than that it was some precious stone.

EMERODS. The ark having been taken by the Philistines, and being kept at Ashdod, the hand of God afflicted them with a painful disease. 1 Sam. v. 6: "But the hand of the Lord was heavy upon them of Ashdod, and he destroyed them, and smote them with emerods, even Ashdod and the coasts thereof." Interpreters are not agreed on the signification of the original, ophelim, nor on the nature of the disease. Some suppose it to denote dysentery, others hæmorrhoids, or bloody piles. The latter is the more probable explanation. Jahn thinks that it may have arisen from the bite of a venomous creature of the spider class, mentioned by Pliny, and which was supposed to resemble a mouse, and therefore called by the same name.

EMESA, or HAMATH. See HAMATH.

EMIM, ancient inhabitants of the land of Canaan, beyond Jordan, who were defeated by Chedorlaomer and his allies. Gen. xiv. 5. Moses tells us that they were beaten at Shaveh-kiriathaim, which was in the country of Sihon, conquered from the Moabites. Josh. xiii. 19-21. The Emim were a warlike people, of a gigantic stature, great and numerous, tall as the Anakim, and were accounted giants as well as they. Deut. ii. 10, 11.

EMMANUEL (God with us). Isaiah (xi.), in his celebrated prophecy of the birth of the Messiah from a virgin, says, This child shall be called (that is, really be), "Emmanuel." He repeats this while speaking of the enemy's army, which, like a torrent, was to overflow Judea: "The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Emmanuel." Matthew informs us that this prophecy was accomplished in Jesus Christ, born of the Virgin Mary, in whom the two natures, divine and human, were united; so that he was really Emmanuel, or God with us.

EMMAUS (hot baths), a village seven miles and a half north-west of Jerusalem, celebrated for our Lord's conversation with two disciples who went thither on the day of his resurrection. Josephus says, that Vespasian left eight hundred soldiers in Judea, to whom he gave the village of Emmaus, which was sixty furlongs from Jerusalem. D'Arvieux states that, going from Jerusalem to Rama, he took the right from the high road to Rama, at some little distance from Jerusalem, and "travelled a good league over rocks and flint stones, to the end of the valley of terebinthine trees," till he reached Emmaus. It seems, by the ruins which surround it, that it has since been larger than in our Saviour's time. "The mean and trifling village," says Mr Carne, "all that now exists of Emmaus, stands on an eminence in the midst of hills. The people who live here are poor and wretched; they are chiefly Christians."

EMPTY. Persons are empty when they are poor, without wealth (Ruth i. 21); without reward (Gen. xxxi. 42); without an offering (Exod. xxiii. 15; 1 Sam. vi. 3); and, in fine, without any thing good. Luke i. 53; Ruth iii. 17. To empty, is to pour out (Zech. iv. 12), or to take forth. Gen. xlii. 35. Moab had not been emptied from vessel to vessel; they had not been tossed from place to place, nor their condition changed, as that of the Jews had been. Jer. xlviii. 11. The Medes and Chaldeans are called emptiers, because they drained Nineveh of its inhabitants, power, wealth, and glory. Nah. ii. 2.

EMULATION, a generous ardour kindled by the praise-worthy example of others, which impels us to imitate, to rival, and, if possible, to excel them. This passion involves in it esteem of the person whose attainments or conduct we emulate, of the qualities and actions in which we emulate him, and a desire of resemblance, together with a joy springing from the hope of success. In Gal. v. 20, the word zeloi, rendered "emulations," signifies jealousies, and is classed among the "the works of the flesh." Plato makes Emulation the daughter of Envy; if so, there is a great difference between the mother and the offspring; the one being a virtue, and the other a vice. Emulation admires great actions, and strives to imitate them; Envy refuses them the praises that are their due: Emulation is generous, and only thinks of equaling or surpassing a rival; Envy is low, and only seeks to lessen him. It would, therefore, be more proper to suppose Emulation the daughter of Admiration, admiration being a principal ingredient in the composition of it.

EN (ain) signifies a fountain; for which reason we find it compounded with many names of towns and places.

ENAIM, a town of Judah (Josh. xv. 34), perhaps mentioned in Gen. xxxviii. 14, where the Vulgate reads, that Tamar sat in a place where two ways met. Heb.: She sat at Enaim. Septuagint: She sat at Enan by the way. This translation is favoured by Gesenius. English translation: She sat in an open place which is by the way. Others think Enan, or Enaim, signifies a fountain or well; which is most probable. Perhaps even this might be translated "the two wells," or "the double well;" a very likely place of rendezvous. Rosenmüller prefers this rendering, and translates it "the opening of two fountains;" that is, a place where two fountains burst forth.

ENCAMPMENT. See CAMP.

ENCHANTMENTS. This word frequently occurs in our version of the Old Testament, and with different meanings attached to it. When Moses cast his rod upon the ground and it became a serpent, we are told (Exod. vii. 11) "the magicians of Egypt, they also did in like manner with their enchantments." The Israelites were forbidden to use enchantments. Lev. xix. 26. The same word is found in Numb. xxiv. 1: "And when Balaam saw that it pleased the Lord to bless Israel, he went not, as at other times, to seek for enchantments, but he set his face toward the wilderness." Here it seems to mean a knowledge of the divination of future events. See DIVINATION—MAGIC.

ENCOURAGE, to render one hearty, hopeful, cheerful, and ready for acting. Moses encouraged Joshua, by laying before him the goodness of his work, his supernatural assistance, and undoubted success. Deut. i. 38. David encouraged himself in the Lord, when his warriors threatened to stone him; he considered God's former kind and wonderful interpositions for him, his continued power, wisdom, and mercy, and his faithful promise and gracious relationship to him. 1 Sam. xxx. 6.

ENCRATITES, a sect in the second century who abstained from marriage, wine, and animal food.

END. Jesus Christ is the end of the law for righteousness. The law was given to cause men to seek righteousness in him. He perfected the ceremonial law, as he was the scope and substance of all its types; and therefore abolished it. Through his obedience and death, he fulfilled the moral law, in its precepts and penalty; and in him, as their righteousness, believers enjoy whatever the law, as a covenant, could have demanded for them. Rom. x. 4. He is the end of ministers' conversation; he is the scope and substance of all their ministrations, and in all they do they ought to aim at the advancement of his glory. Heb. xiii. 7. The end of the faith of the saints is what is exhibited in the promise, and they trust to obtain, even the eternal salvation of their souls. 1 Pet. i. 9. An oath is the end of strife, as no further inquiry is to be made in a cause, but all parties are to rest satisfied with the determination made by an oath. Heb. vi. 16.

ENDOR, a city in the half tribe of Manasseh, (Josh. xvii. 11; 1 Sam. xxviii. 7), in the vicinity of Nain, and at the foot of Little Hermon. This place is chiefly remarkable on account of the visit which Saul paid to a woman residing here, who had a familiar spirit. The inhabitants still point out a grotto, in which they allege the woman dwelt.

ENDURE, to continue, to bear with. To endure, referred to God, denotes his constancy, perpetual continuance in being, life, and greatness (Ps. ix. 7); or his bearing with persons, in his long-suffering patience. Rom. ix. 22. Referred to men, it signifies, 1. To bear up under the exercise of the duties of an office (Exod. xviii. 23), or under any thing that fatigues and presses. Gen. xxxiii. 14; Job xxxi. 23. 2. To bear affliction, especially for Christ, with a sensible, calm, and affectionate complacency, as the will of God. Heb. xii. 7; 2 Tim. iii. 11. The saints endure to the end; they persevere in their holy profession and practice, notwithstanding manifold opposition and trouble. Matt. xxiv. 13. Antichristians and other wicked persons will not endure sound doctrine; they dislike it, they reproach it, persecute it, and endeavour to banish it from them. 2 Tim. iv. 3.

EN-EGLAIM. Ezekiel (xlvi. 10) speaks of this place in opposition to En-gedi: "The fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi, even to En-eglain; they shall be a place to spread forth nets." Jerome says En-eglain is at the head of the Dead Sea, where the Jordan enters it.

ENEMY, one who opposes another, or thwarts his designs. God becomes men's enemy when he pursues them with his wrathful judgments. 1 Sam. xxviii. 16. Job supposed him an enemy when he grievously afflicted him. Job xxxiii. 10. Wicked men count faithful teachers their enemies, imagining they act from hatred in reproving and opposing their wicked ways. 1 Kings xxi. 20; Gal. iv. 16. Satan is an enemy to God and his creatures; he hates them, and seeks their dishonour and ruin. Matt. xiii. 25, 28. Wicked men are enemies to God; they hate his true character, and do what in them lies to dishonour his name, and ruin his interest. Rom. v. 10. Death is called an enemy; it really ruins the wicked, it terrifies the saints, and for a while detains their body from the heavenly glory. 1 Cor. xv. 26.

ENERGICI, a denomination in the sixteenth century; so called because they held that the eucharist was the energy and virtue of Jesus Christ—not his body, nor a representation thereof.

ENERGUMENS, persons supposed to be possessed with the devil, concerning whom there were many regulations among the primitive Christians. They were denied baptism and the eucharist—at least this was the practice of some Churches; and though they were under the care of exorcists, yet it was thought a becoming act of charity to let them have the public prayers of the Church, at which they were permitted to be present.

ENGAGE, to bind by promise. How delightful a wonder, that God's Son engaged his heart, or pledged his soul, that he would approach to an offended God, in room of us sinful men, in order to obey the broken law, and satisfy justice for us! Jer. xxx. 21.

EN-GANNIM, the name of a town in Judah, Josh. xv. 34; and of a Levitical city in Issachar, Josh. xix. 21. This has been frequently identified, and by Dr Wilson among others, with the modern Jenin, a town fifteen miles south of Mount Tabor, in the plain of Jezreel.

EN-GEDI, more anciently called Hazazon-Tamar, or the city of palm-trees, was a city of Judah, situated on the western shore of the Dead Sea, about forty miles distant from Jerusalem. The town probably gave name to the wilderness of En-gedi, where David hid himself in a cave for fear of Saul. Dr Robinson identifies it with the modern Ain Jiddi, the region around which he found to be completely desolate. The vineyards of En-gedi are mentioned in Cant. i. 14, and the hills around it produce, at present, the best wines of the country. "The whole slope," says Professor Robinson, "is still covered with trees and shrubs of a more southern clime. Nothing is needed but tillage to render this a most prolific spot. The soil is rich, the heat great, and water abundant."

EN-HADDAAH, a town of Issachar. Josh. xix. 21. Eusebius mentions a place of this name between Eleutheropolis and Jerusalem, ten miles from the former place.

EN-HAZOR, a city of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 37. Whether this be the Atrium Ennon, or Hazar-enan of Ezekiel (xlvi. 17, xlviii. 1), and of Moses (Numb. xxxiv. 9), it is difficult to determine.

ENJOY. 1. To possess with pleasure. Josh. i. 15. 2. To have in abundance. Heb. xi. 25. The land of Canaan enjoyed her Sabbaths when it lay untilled for want of inhabitants. Lev. xxvi. 34.

God's elect long enjoy the work of their hands, when they receive a long-continued happiness on earth, and everlasting blessedness in heaven. Isa. lxxv. 22.

ENLARGE. To enlarge nations is to grant them deliverance, liberty, happiness, and increase of numbers, territory, or wealth. Esth. iv. 14; Job xii. 23; Deut. xxxiii. 20. Enlargement of heart imports loosing of spiritual bands, fulness of inward joy (Ps. cxix. 32), or extensive love, care, and joy. 2 Cor. vi. 11. Enlargement of mouth imports readiness to answer reproaches, and to pour forth praise to God for his kindness. 1 Sam. ii. 1. God enlargeth men in trouble, or enlargeth their steps, when he grants them remarkable deliverances, and liberty to go where they please. Ps. iv. 1, xviii. 36. He enlargeth Japheth in giving him a numerous posterity, and a very extensive territory, viz., the north half of Asia, all Europe, and almost all America, to dwell in; or the word may be rendered God will persuade Japheth; by the preaching of the Gospel a multitude of his posterity have been, or shall be, turned to Christ. Gen. ix. 27. Hell's enlarging itself imports that the state of the dead, and even the region of the damned, should quickly receive multitudes of the sinful Jews. Isa. v. 14.

ENLIGHTEN, to give light. God enlightens his people's darkness when he frees them from trouble, grants them prosperity, and gives them knowledge and joy. Ps. xviii. 28. He enlightens their eyes when, by his Word and Spirit, he savingly teaches them his truth, and shows them his glory. Ps. xliii. 3, 4, xix. 8; Eph. i. 18. Hypocrites are enlightened with the speculative knowledge of divine truth, and the miraculous though not saving influences of the Holy Ghost. Heb. vi. 4.

EN-MISHPAT (fountain of judgment). Moses says (Gen. xiv. 7), that Chedorlaomer and his allies, having traversed the Wilderness of Paran, came to the Fountain of Mishpat, otherwise Kadesh. It had not this name till Moses drew from it the waters of strife, and God had exercised his judgments on Moses and Aaron. Numb. xx. 13, xxvii. 14. See KADESH.

ENMITY, opposition, very bitter, deep-rooted, irreconcilable hatred and variance. Such a constant enmity there is between the followers of Christ and Satan. Gen. iii. 15. Friendship with this world, in its wicked members and lusts, is enmity with God; is opposed to the love of him, and amounts to an actual exerting of ourselves to dishonour and abuse him. James iv. 4; 1 John ii. 15, 16. The carnal mind, or minding of fleshly and sinful things, is enmity against God; is opposed to his nature and will in the highest degree; and, though it may be removed, cannot be reconciled to him, nor he to it. Rom. viii. 7, 8. The ceremonial law is called enmity; it marked God's enmity against sin, by demanding atonement for it; it occasioned men's enmity against God by its burdensome services; and was an accidental source of standing variance between Jews and Gentiles: or perhaps the enmity here meant is the state of variance between God and men, whereby he justly loathed and hated them as sinful, and condemned them to punishment; and they wickedly hated him for his holy excellence, retributive justice, and sovereign goodness. Both are slain and abolished by the death of Christ. Eph. ii. 15, 16.

ENOCH, the son of Cain (Gen. iv. 17), in honour of whom the first city noticed in Scripture was called Enoch by his father, who was the builder. It was situated on the east of the province of Eden; and it is generally supposed by the Oriental geographers to have been situated in the low country of Susiana or Khnsistan.

ENOCH, an ancient patriarch, the seventh from Adam. His life, as recorded in sacred Scripture, was brief, but highly instructive. We are informed that "Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him." From this passage, as explained by an apostle, Heb. xi. 5, 6, it appears that this godly man was translated to heaven without tasting of death. He was eminently honoured while on earth, for he had this testimony, that he pleased God, and was thus marked out from among the wicked generation in which he lived to experience a signal token of God's favour, in being carried soul and body to heaven. Enoch was a prophet, and such was the extent of his inspired acquaintance with the will of God, that we are told by Jude that he prophesied of the second coming of Christ to judgment, Jude 14, 15: "And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." The prophecy to which the apostle here refers is to be found nowhere else in the Word of God, and must therefore have been conveyed to him by direct inspiration from heaven. There is a treatise, indeed, called "The Book of Enoch," which is said to contain the cited passage; but, even from internal evidence alone, the book is obviously apocryphal.

ENON (dore's eye or fountain), where John baptized, because there was much water there (John iii. 23), was eight miles south of Scythopolis, between Shalim and the Jordan, fifty-three miles north-east of Jerusalem, according to Eusebius.

ENOS or ENOSH, the son of Seth, and grandson of Adam, born A.M. 235. "In his days," we are informed, "men began to call upon the name of the Lord," Gen. iv. 26, an expression which seems to indicate that a signal revival of religion took place, in the course of which the people of God became more completely separated than they had hitherto been from the infidel and ungodly world. This interpretation appears to be plainly borne out by the marginal rendering: "Then men began to call themselves by the name of the Lord." Many of the Jewish interpreters, however, translate the word "call" by "profanely call," and thus consider the words of the sacred writer as indicating that at that period idolatry had its origin.

EN-ROGEL (that is, the fuller's fountain), is situated in the lowest part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat. It is thus described by Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne: "There are the remains of ancient buildings over it, and a large tank beside it. It is one hundred and twenty-five feet in depth. Formerly the water seems to have been drawn up by a Persian wheel, such as we saw at El-arish and many other places; but now an old Arab let down a skin vessel and gave us drink." The water was delightful. By this well, in ancient times, was drawn the border between Judah and Benjamin; for it is said with minute accuracy, that "the border came down (from the Valley of Rephaim) to the end of the mountain, and descended to the Valley of Hinnom, and descended to En-rogel." Josh. xviii. 16. In this spot, so near the city, and yet so completely secluded, the two youths, Jonathian and Ahimaaz, tarried when Absalom took possession of Jerusalem, that they might carry tidings to David. In this neighbourhood, also, was "the stone of Zoheleth, which is by En-Rogel," where Adonijah made a feast, at the time he aspired to the throne, when their mirth was so suddenly arrested by the shouts of joy in the city, proclaiming Solomon to be king. 1 Kings i. 9-41. Perhaps it may be from the prominent part which Joab acted in that memorable scene that the well is called by the Arabs to this day Beer-eyub, "the well of Job or Joab." Some have supposed En-rogel, to be the same with the Pool of Siloam, near Jerusalem.

EN-SHEMESH (that is, the fountain of the sun), was on the frontiers of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 7), but whether it was a town or a fountain is questionable. Dr Robinson thinks "that it may have either been the present fountain of the apostles below Bethany on the way to Jericho, or the fountain near St Saba."

ENSIGN, a military token or signal to be followed—a standard. See ARMY.

ENTER. To enter at the strait gate, and into the kingdom of God, is, by receiving Jesus Christ as our Saviour, door, and way to happiness, to become members of God's spiritual family and kingdom in heaven and earth. Matt. vii. 13; John iii. 5. To enter into joy, peace, or rest, is to receive the earnest or the full possession thereof. Matt. xxv. 21; Isa. lvii. 2; Heb. iv. 3. To enter into other men's labours, is to enjoy the fruit of them. John iv. 38.

ENTERTAINMENTS. See BANQUET.

ENTHUSIASM. To obtain just definitions of words which are promiscuously used, it must be confessed, is no small difficulty. This word, besides, is used both in a good and a bad sense. In its best sense it signifies a divine afflatus or inspiration. It is also taken for that noble ardour of mind which leads us to imagine anything sublime, grand, or surprising. In its worst sense it signifies any impression on the fancy, or agitation of the passions, of which a man can give no rational account. It is generally applied to religious characters, and is said to be derived from the wild gestures and speeches of ancient Pagans, pretending to more than ordinary and more than true communications with the gods, and particularly enthusias, in the act or at the time of sacrificing. In this sense, then, it signifies that impulse of the mind which leads a man to suppose he has some remarkable intercourse with the Deity, while at the same time it is nothing more than the effects of a heated imagination, or a sanguine constitution. Enthusiasm is defined by the celebrated Mr Hall of Leicester as "that religious state of mind in which the imagination is unduly heated, and the passions outrun the understanding."

That the Divine Being permits his people to enjoy fellowship with him, and that he can work upon the minds of his creatures when and how he pleases, cannot be denied. But then, what is the criterion by which we are to judge, in order to distinguish it from enthusiasm? It is necessary there should be some rule, for without it the greatest extravagances would be committed, the most notorious impostors countenanced, and the most enormous evils ensue. Now, this criterion is the Word of God, by which we are to try all pretences to new revelations and extraordinary gifts, as in the apostles' time. 1 John iv. 1-6. Whatever opinions, feelings, views, or impressions, we may have, if they are plainly inconsistent with the Word, if they are not accompanied with humility, if they do not influence our temper, regulate our lives, and make us just, pious, honest, and consistent, they cannot come from God, but are evidently the effusions of an enthusiastic brain. On the other hand, if the mind be enlightened; if the will which was perverse be renovated, detached from evil, and inclined to good; if the powers be roused to exertion for the promotion of the divine glory and the good of men; if the natural corruptions of the heart be suppressed; if peace and joy arise from a view of the Gospel of Christ, attended with a spiritual frame of mind, a heart devoted to God, and a holy, useful life—however this may be branded with the name of enthusiasm, it certainly is from God, because bare human efforts, unassisted by him, could never produce such effects as these.

ENTICE, cunningly to persuade and move one to what is sinful and hazardous. Satan enticed Ahab to go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead, by making the false prophets promise him victory. 2 Chron. xviii. 20. Whoremongers entice virgins, with promises of reward and hopes of secrecy, to uncleanness. Exod. xxii. 16. Our lusts entice to sin in hopes of profit, pleasure, honour, by means of it. James i. 14. Outward objects entice to sin, as they are occasions of tempting our evil hearts to it. Job xxxi. 26, 27. False teachers, pretended friends, and wicked companions, entice; by their fair speeches and guileful examples, they persuade us to embrace error, commit sin, or rush on snares. Col. ii. 4. Enticing words of man's wisdom, are such as please the ear and fancy of hearers, but lead away the heart from the regard of the true matter and scope of divine truth. 1 Cor. ii. 4; Col. ii. 4.

ENVY, a sensation of uneasiness and disquiet, arising on perceiving the advantages which others are supposed to possess above us, accompanied with malignity towards those who possess them. "This," says a good writer, "is universally admitted to be one of the blackest passions in the human heart. No one, indeed, is to be condemned for defending his rights, and showing displeasure against a malicious enemy; but to conceive ill-will at one who has attacked none of our rights, nor done us any injury, solely because he is more prosperous than we are, is a disposition altogether unnatural. Hence the character of an envious man is universally odious. All disclaim it; and they who feel themselves under the influence of this passion carefully conceal it. The chief grounds of envy may be reduced to three: accomplishments of mind; advantages of birth, rank, and fortune; and superior success in worldly pursuits. To subdue this odious disposition, let us consider its sinful and criminal nature; the mischiefs it occasions in the world; the unhappiness it produces to him who possesses it; the evil causes that nourish it, such as pride and indolence: let us, moreover, bring often into view those religious considerations which regard us as Christians—how unworthy we are in the sight of God—how much the blessings we enjoy are above what we deserve. Let us learn reverence and submission to that divine government which has appointed to every one such a condition as is fittest for him to possess; let us consider how opposite the Christian spirit is to envy; above all, let us offer up our prayers to the Almighty, that he would purify our hearts from a passion which is so base and so criminal."

EPAPHRAS, pastor of the church at Colosse, of whom Paul speaks in terms of cordial affection, calling him his "dear fellow-servant." It would appear from an incidental expression in Paul's Epistle to the Colossians, iv. 12, that he was a native of the town of Colosse. After having laboured for some time in the church in that city, he had been despatched to Rome, probably to inquire into the condition of Paul; and while there he seems to have shared in the imprisonment of the apostle, and to have urged him to write the admirable epistle to that Church which bears its name.

EPAPHRODITUS, a minister of Christ, who was despatched by the Church at Philippi to visit Paul during his imprisonment at Rome, and convey him the contributions which they had kindly made for his support. In the course of his journey to Rome, either from fatigue or some other cause, he was seized with a dangerous illness, from which, however, in the good providence of God, he was restored; and after residing a short time at Rome, comforting the apostle, he returned to Philippi, bearing the epistle addressed to the Church at that place.

EPENETUS, a disciple of Paul, of whom he says, "Salute my well-beloved Epenetus, who is the first-fruits of Achaia unto Christ." Rom. xvi. 5. There is here a remarkable various reading. Several ancient manuscripts, and some editions and fathers, read Asia, which is preferred by Grotius, Mill, Beugel, Whitby, Koppe, and Rosenmüller, and has been received by Griesbach. In 1 Cor. xvi. 15, the household of Stephanus, and not Epenetus, is termed the first-fruits of Achaia. To reconcile these passages, Mr Slade urges that Epenetus might have been the earliest convert in the household of Stephanus, and thus that while the household of Stephanus was the first-fruits of Achaia, Epenetus was the first of that family or household who was converted to God.

EPHAH, the eldest son of Midian, who gave his name to a city and small extent of land in the country of Midian, situated on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. Gen. xxv. 4. This country abounded with camels and dromedaries. Isa. lx. 6.

EPHAH, a measure both for things dry and liquid, in use among the Hebrews. The ephah for the former contained three pecks and three pints. In liquid measure, it was of the same capacity as the bath, or seven gallons and four pints.

EPHER, second son of Midian, and brother of Ephah. 1 Chron. i. 33.

EPHES-DAMMIM, a place near Azekah on the west of the Valley of Elah. Here the army of the Philistines was encamped when Goliath defied the hosts of Israel. 1 Sam. xvii. 1.

EPHESUS, a much celebrated city of Ionia, in Asia Minor, forty miles south-east of Smyrna, situated upon the River Cayster, and on the side of a hill five miles from the Egean Sea. It was the principal mart, as well as the metropolis of Proconsular Asia, and formerly in great renown among Heathen authors on account of its famous temple of Diana. (See DIANA.) The city had a fine prospect to the west of a lovely plain covered with groves of tamarisk, and watered and embellished by the mazy windings of the Cayster. It was a place of prodigious resort for various purposes; but so addicted were the inhabitants of the city to idolatry and the arts of magic, that the prince of darkness would seem to have, at that time, fixed his throne in it. Eph. ii. 2. A native of Ephesus is supposed to have invented those mystical spells and charms by means of which the people pretended to heal diseases and drive away evil spirits; whence originated the Ephesia grammata, or Ephesian letters, so often mentioned by the ancients.

Ephesus was greatly damaged by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who repaired and embellished it. Pliny styles it "the ornament of Asia." The Jews, according to Josephus, were very numerous, and had obtained the privileges of citizenship. Ephesus was autonomos—governed by its own laws. The entire population was, it is supposed, not less than six hundred thousand souls.

Tournefort says, that when he was at Ephesus, there were thirty or forty Greek families there. Chandler found only ten or twelve individuals. "Now no human being," says Pliny Fisk, "lives in Ephesus; and in Aisaluck, which may be considered as Ephesus under another name, though not on precisely the same spot of ground, there are merely a few miserable Turkish huts. 'How doth the city sit solitary that was full of people!'"

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. This Epistle was written when Paul was a prisoner at Rome, and, as is generally supposed, about the year 61. The occasion of the Epistle is supposed to have been some agreeable intelligence which he had received from certain individuals who had recently come from Asia Minor, and who had refreshed his soul with tidings of the stedfastness in the faith which had been manifested by the Ephesian Church, amid the dangerous and extensive apostasy which had broken out among the Jewish Churches in Asia. The Apostle Paul has been generally admitted to be the author of the Epistle; and, as a production of his pen, it has always been held in the highest veneration, not only for the importance of its matter, but also for the elegance of its composition.

EPHOD, an ornamental part of the dress worn by the Hebrew priests. Ephod comes from aphad, to tie, to fasten, to gird; and the use of the ephod was suitable to this signification, being a kind of girdle. Commentators are, for the most part, agreed in considering it as approaching in form to a short double apron, having the two parts connected by two wide straps united on the shoulders. These are called the two shoulder-pieces, and were to be joined at the two edges thereof. This junction was effected in some way under the two onyx-stones, and at the precise point where they rested upon the shoulders. These stones are said by Josephus, who calls them sard-onyx-stones, to have been very splendid; and Bähr thinks that the symbolical significancy of the ephod was mainly concentrated in these shoulder-pieces. The two main pieces, or lappets of the ephod, hung down, the one in front, the other behind, but to what depth is not stated, although Josephus says it was a cubit, which would bring their lower extremity near the loin. It is probable that the posterior portion hung down from the shoulders considerably lower than the anterior. To prevent the portions from hanging loose, there was a "curious girdle," forming an integral part of the ephod itself, and composed probably of two distinct bands issuing from the sides of either the frontal or hinder portion, passed round the body just under the arms, so as to encircle it over the region of the heart. The material of which the ephod was made was a kind of tapestry, with a rich interweaving of threads of gold. Maimonides tells us that the workman took one thread of pure gold, and put it with six threads of the blue, and twisted these seven threads as one. And so he did one thread of gold with six of purple, and one with six of scarlet, and one with six of linen. Thus these four threads of gold, were twenty-eight threads in all. In Rev. i. 13, there is an allusion made to an ephod with a large insertion of gold in its texture: "And in the midst of the seven candlesticks one like unto the Son of man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle." Writers are by no means agreed as to the precise structure of this part of the high-priest's dress. According to Josephus, it resembled a short coat with sleeves. Jerome compares it to the short Roman cloak called caracalla, but without the hood. In the opinion of Calmet, it was a kind of sash. The writer of the article PRIEST, in Kitto's "Cyclopædia," supposes it to have been derived from the usages of the Egyptians, and that it was a substitute for the leopard-skin worn by the Egyptian high-priests in their most sacred duties. There is one most important difference between the Jewish and the Egyptian ephods, inasmuch as the latter was covered over with idolatrous images and emblems, which, of course, were entirely wanting in the ephod of the Jewish high-priest.

EPHRAIM—(1.) Joseph's second son, by Asenath, Poti-pherah's daughter, born in Egypt, about A.M. 2294. (2.) The name of Ephraim was given to that part of the land of Palestine which was assigned to Ephraim, the second son of Joseph, above referred to. The term means fruitful, and was very remarkably applicable to the tribe which bore the name; for while Moses speaks of the "thousands of Manasseh," he mentions also the "ten thousands of Ephraim." Deut. xxxiii. 17. The tribe of Ephraim is sometimes called in Scripture the tribe of Joseph, as in Num. i. 32, 34. It contained Samaria, the capital of the kingdom of Israel, and accordingly the prophet Isaiah (vii. 5) uses the term Ephraim to denote the whole kingdom of the ten tribes. It had the Mediterranean as its western, and the Jordan as its eastern boundary. Though rocky and mountainous, it was peculiarly fertile and productive. Its towns were numerous, large, and populous. In this tribe was situated Shiloh, where the ark and tabernacle dwelt for some time. One of the most distinguished men of ancient times, Joshua, the successor of Moses, and the leader of the Israelites into the Promised Land, was a native of this district. (3.) A city of Ephraim, towards the Jordan, whither, it is probable, Jesus retired before his passion. John xi. 54. This Ephraim was a city on the confines of the land of Ephraim (2 Chron. xiii. 19), and was famous for fine flour. Josephus calls Ephraim and Bethel two small cities; and places the former not in the tribe of that name, but in the land of Benjamin, near the Wilderness of Judea, in the way to Jericho. (4.) A city of Benjamin, eight miles from Jerusalem, according to Eusebius, near Bethel. We believe these two cities have been confounded; for instead of the eight miles in Eusebius, Jerome reckons twenty. (5.) The forest of Ephraim, was east of the Jordan, and in it Absalom lost his life. 2 Sam. xviii. 6-15. It could not be far from Mahanaim. (6.) The mountains of Ephraim, called also the mountains of Israel, are situated in the centre of the Holy Land, and opposite to the mountains of Judah. Joshua was buried in the border of his own inheritance in Timnath-heres, "in the mount of Ephraim, on the north side of the hill Gaash." Judg. ii. 9.

EPHRATAH. See EPHRATH.

EPHRATH, Caleb's second wife, who was the mother of Hur. 1 Chron. ii. 19. From her it is believed that the city of Ephratah, otherwise called Beth-lehem, where our Lord was born, had its name; and this city is more than once known in Scripture by the name of Ephrath. Gen. xxxv. 16. Ephratah is used also for Beth-lehem in Mic. v. 2: "But thou, Beth-lehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting."

EPICUREANS, the disciples of a Greek philosopher who flourished at Athens about A.M. 3700. He divided philosophy into canonical and physical. The first comprehended the rules to be followed in ascertaining truth. The chief rules are, that the senses do not deceive us; that appearances are faithful representations of things; that it is in the judgment that error is found; that anticipation is the principle of demonstration, and that this anticipation originates in the senses; and that in morality the feeling of pleasure and of pain must determine our actions. In regard to physics, Epicurus adhered to the system of Leucippus and Democritus, affirming that the universe has always existed; that it is infinite, and formed of an assemblage of atoms, simple and indivisible, but differing in size, figure, and weight. Hence he denied the existence either of a Creator or Preserver of the universe, but held that all had its origin in, and is regulated by, mere chance. But though Epicurus was essentially an Atheist, he taught that gods existed, who employed themselves only in the contemplation and enjoyment of their own felicity, without interfering with the concerns of the universe. Man's chief end, in the system of Epicurus, was the enjoyment of pleasure, and the avoidance of pain. Virtue was to be followed only for the pleasure which it brought along with it, and vice to be shunned because of the pain which it caused. The followers of Epicurus maintained that the soul would, after its departure from the body, perish together with it; and that thus there was nothing to be either hoped or feared after death. Such were the leading doctrines held by a sect of philosophers who held a high reputation in ancient times. And from Acts xvii. 18, we learn that the Apostle Paul, when at Athens, engaged in discussion with some of these men, unfolding to them those precious truths which, revealed by God himself, infinitely surpass any system of mere human invention.

EPIPHANES (splendid, illustrious), an epithet given to the gods, when appearing to men. Antiochus, brother of Seleucus, coming fortunately into Syria a little after the death of his brother, was regarded as some propitious deity, and was hence called Epiphanes—the illustrious. See ANTIOCHUS IV.

EPIPHANY, a festival, otherwise called the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, observed on the 6th of January, in honour of the appearance of our Saviour to the three magi, or wise men, who came to adore and bring him presents. In Germany, this feast is called the day of the holy three kings. The Greeks term it Theophany, or appearance of God. This festival was not observed in the earliest ages of the Church, and indeed seems to have been unknown till the fourth century.

EPISCOPACY, that form of Church government in which diocesan bishops are established as distinct from, and superior to, priests or presbyters.

The controversy respecting Episcopacy commenced soon after the Reformation, and has been agitated with great warmth, between the Episcopalians on the one side, and the Presbyterians and Independents on the other. Among the Protestant Churches abroad, those which were reformed by Luther and his associates are in general Episcopal; whilst such as follow the doctrines of Calvin, have for the most part thrown off the order of bishops as one of the corruptions of Popery. In England, however, the controversy has been considered as of greater importance than on the Continent. It has been strenuously maintained by one party, that the Episcopal order is essential to the constitution of the Church; and by others, that it is a pernicious encroachment on the rights of men, for which there is no authority in Scripture. See article BISHOP.

I. Episcopacy in the Church of Rome. In the Church of Rome, the pope has the chief right of electing bishops; and even where sovereign princes have reserved to themselves a right of nominating to bishoprics, the pope sends his approbation and bulls to the new bishop.

When a person hears that the pope has raised him to the Episcopal dignity, he enlarges his shaven crown, and dresses himself in purple. Three months after his election, he is consecrated in a solemn manner. The officiating bishop sits on the Episcopal seat, placed about the middle of the altar, and the bishop elect stands between two assistant bishops. Then one of the assistants addresses himself to the officiating prelate, saying to him, that the Catholic Church requires such an one (naming him) to be raised to the dignity of a bishop. Then the officiating prelate demands of him the apostolical mandate; which being read by the notary, the officiating prelate answers at the close of it, "God be praised." This first ceremony concludes with the oath of the candidate, which he takes on his knees, by which he obliges himself to be faithful to the See of Rome and the Catholic Church. We are told in one of the rubrics of the Pontifical, that all patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops of Italy are obliged to renew this oath every three years; those of France, Germany, Spain, Flanders, the British Islands, Poland, &c., every four years; those of the extremities of Europe and Africa, every five years; and, lastly, those of Asia and America, every ten years.

After the oath, the candidate, on his knees, kisses the hand of the officiating prelate. He next receives the pontifical ornaments, and, being full habited, reads the office of the mass at the altar, the two assistant bishops standing on each side of him. This done, he bows to the officiating prelate, who repeats the following words to him, which include the Episcopal functions: "The duty of a bishop is to judge, interpret, consecrate, confer orders, sacrifice, baptize, confirm." After which words the candidate bishop prostrates himself, and continues some time in that posture, during which the officiating prelate, with his pastoral staff, signs him with the sign of the cross. This done, the officiating prelate and the two assistants lay their hands on his head; and the former, laying the book of the Gospels on his shoulder, says, "Receive the Holy Ghost." Then a napkin is put on the neck of the bishop elect, and the officiating prelate anoints his head with the chrism, as also the palms of his hands; next he blesses the pastoral staff, sprinkling it with holy water, and presents it to the new bishop. The book of the Gospels, shut, is put into his hands, with this exhortation: "Receive the Gospel; go and preach it to the people committed to your charge." After this exhortation, the officiating prelate and the assistant bishops give him the kiss of peace. These ceremonies end with the mystical offerings of the new prelate, which are two lighted torches, two loaves, and two small casks of wine.

The Church of Rome early lost many bishoprics by the conquests of the Mohammedans; hence the great number of titular bishops, whose bishoprics lie in partibus infidelium; that is, in countries in the possession of Infidels. The Roman See, however, only honours with this title ecclesiastics of a high rank.

II. Episcopacy in England, &c. The earliest account we have of British bishops, is carried up no higher than the Council of Arles, assembled by the Emperor Constantine, in the fourth century, at which were present the bishops of London, York, and Caerleon.

Before the Norman conquest, bishops were chosen by the chapters, whether monks or prebendaries. From the Conqueror's time to the reign of King John, it was the custom to choose bishops at a public meeting of the bishops and barons, the king himself being present at the solemnity, who claimed a right of investing the bishops, by delivering to them the ring and pastoral staff. It is true, the popes endeavoured to gain the election of bishops to themselves; and this occasioned great struggles and contests between the Roman pontiffs and the kings. At length, after various disputes between King John and the pope, the former by his charter, A.D. 1215, granted the right of election to the cathedral churches. A statute, in the reign of Henry VIII., settles the election of bishops as follows: "The king, upon the vacancy of the see, was to send his conge d'élire to the dean and chapter, or prior and convent, and in case they delayed the election above twelve days, the crown was empowered to nominate the person by letters patent. And after the bishop thus elected hath taken an oath of fealty to the king, his majesty, by his letters patent under the broad seal, signified the election to the archbishop, with orders to confirm it and consecrate the elect. And lastly, if the persons assigned to elect and consecrate deferred the performing their respective offices twenty days, they were to incur a premunire."

A bishop of England is a peer of the realm, and, as such, sits and votes in the House of Lords. He is a baron in a three-fold manner, viz., feudal in regard of the temporalities annexed to his bishopric; by writ, as being summoned by writ to Parliament; and by patent and creation. Accordingly, he has the precedence of all other barons, and votes both as baron and bishop. But though their peerage never was denied, it has been contested whether the bishops have a right to vote in criminal matters. At present, the bishops have their vote in the trial and arraignment of a peer; but, before sentence of death is passed, they withdraw, and vote by their proxy.

The jurisdiction of a bishop, in England, consists in collating to benefices; granting institutions on the presentation of other patrons; authorising induction; taking care of the profits of vacant benefices for the use of the successors; visiting his diocese once in three years; in suspending, depriving, degrading, and excommunicating; in granting administrations, and taking care of the probate of wills: these parts of his function depend on the ecclesiastical law. By the common law he is to certify the judges touching legitimate and illegitimate births and marriages. And to his jurisdiction, by the statute law, belongs the licensing of physicians, surgeons, and schoolmasters, and the uniting small parishes; which last privilege is now peculiar to the Bishop of Norwich.

The bishops' courts have this privilege above the civil courts, that writs are issued out from them in the name of the bishop himself, and not in the king's name, as in other courts. The judge of the bishops' court is his chancellor, anciently called Ecclesie causidicus—the Church lawyer.

The Swedish bishops constitute one of the estates of the kingdom, like the English, but have little power. The English Church has left to its bishops more authority than the rest, and for this reason has received the name of Episcopal. In Protestant Germany bishoprics were abolished at the Reformation; but they have been restored in Prussia within the last few years.

III. Episcopacy, how introduced. It is easy to apprehend how Episcopacy, as it was in the primitive Church, with those alterations which it afterwards received, might be gradually introduced. The apostles seem to have taught chiefly in large cities; they settled ministers there, who, preaching in country villages or smaller towns, increased the number of converts; it would have been most reasonable that those new converts, who resided at a considerable distance from the large towns, should, when they grew numerous, have formed themselves into distinct Churches, under the care of their proper pastors or bishops, independently of any of their neighbours; but the reverence which would naturally be paid to men who had conversed with the apostles, and perhaps some desire of influence and dominion, from which the hearts of very good men might not be entirely free, and which early began to work (2 Thess. ii. 7), might easily lay a foundation for such a subordination in the ministers of newly erected Churches to those which were more ancient, and much more easily might the superiority of a pastor to his assistant presbyters increase, till it at length came to that great difference which we own was early made, and probably soon carried to an excess. And if there were that degree of degeneracy in the Church, and defection from the purity and vigour of religion, which the learned Vitranga supposes to have happened between the time of Nero and Trajan, it would be less surprising that those evil principles which occasioned Episcopal, and at length the Papal usurpation, should before that time exert some considerable influence.

IV. Episcopacy, reduced plan of. Archbishop Ussher projected a plan for the reduction of Episcopacy, by which he would have moderated it in such a manner as to have brought it very near the Presbyterian government of the Scotch Church—the weekly parochial vestry answering to their Church session; the monthly synod to be held by the Chorepiscopi, answering to their presbyteries; the diocesan synod to their provincial, and the national to their General Assembly. The meeting of the dean and chapter, practised in the Church of England, is but a faint shadow of the second, the ecclesiastical court of the third, and the convocation of the fourth. See CHURCH OF ENGLAND—BISHOP.

EPISTLES, letters written from one party to another; but the term is eminently applied to those letters in the New Testament which were written by the apostles, on various occasions, to approve, condemn, or direct, the conduct of Christian Churches.

Historical books, like those of the four Gospels, are evidently not calculated for a full development of the doctrines and precepts of Christianity. They were meant for another purpose; and in order to give a complete view of the real nature, tendency, and scheme of the religion of Christ, to explain its principles, to enforce its injunctions, to impress it upon the hearts and consciences of men, and to preserve the Gospels themselves from the miserable glosses of ignorant expositors, there was wanting some appeal more argumentative and didactic. Such an inestimable appendix to the Evangelists is supplied in the Epistles. In them we are favoured with a larger exposition of truths already delivered—an exposition flowing from the high authority of our Lord himself. John xiv. 25, 26, xvi. 7–15, xx. 21–23; 1 Cor. ii. 7–16; 1 Thess. ii. 3, 4, iv. 8. The Epistles of the New Testament may be classified under two heads,—the Pauline and the Catholic Epistles; the first class being addressed to individual churches, and the second to Christians in general. The Epistles of Paul are thirteen, and if we include the Epistle to the Hebrews, fourteen in number; all probably written in the course of ten years, from A.D. 54 to A.D. 64. The earliest are supposed to be those addressed to the Thessalonians, and the latest those to Timothy. The catholic or general Epistles, so called, probably, from being not individual in their character, or intended to be read by particular Churches, but from being strictly catholic, or designed for Christians in general, are seven in number, one written by James, two by Peter, three by John, and one by Jude. In all the Epistles of the New Testament there is a remarkable simplicity of language, which shows them to be admirably fitted to convey the doctrines and precepts of Christianity even to the weakest and most untutored mind. "This simplicity," says the late Dr Cook, "is visible in the absence of all labour and pomp from the language of the Epistles; and in the incidental associations by which the trains of thought in them are conducted. Any change in these respects is only what the same writers would have followed, in executing works so different as are the Gospels and Epistles. This idea is supported, not only by the nature of the thing, but by a comparison of the Gospel with the Epistles written by John. The style is by the same hand, and conducted with the same simplicity; only, with such changes in expression and in train of thought as the different works required. There is nothing more formal, elaborate, and showy, in the one than in the other; no more appearance of the slightest desire to set off either the writer or the subject. To this general character of the Epistles in the New Testament, those of the Apostle Paul may be thought the greatest exceptions; and of all ascribed to him, the greatest, the Epistle to the Hebrews. In this Epistle, indeed, the subject is more formally introduced and regularly prosecuted than the matter in any of the rest. The doctrinal part has more the air of a studied dissertation; but even there, the language has no appearance of stiff, laborious composition; its current is as easy and artless as in any other of his works."

EPISTLES OF BARNABAS. See BARNABAS.

EPITAPH, a monumental inscription in honour or in memory of a person deceased. It has been disputed whether the Jews inscribed epitaphs on the monuments of the dead, but of this we feel quite assured. Sometimes, no doubt, as in the case of the pillar over Rachel's grave, a rude perpendicular stone was the only memorial of the dead. But the usual practice, even at an early period, was to erect a polished monument; or if the tomb was hollowed out of a rock, to smooth a portion of the rock, on which the inscription was either engraved with a stylus, or painted on a crest of plaster, or a tablet of lead fastened on its front. Inscriptions of this kind are still found on the mountains in the Wilderness of Sinai, and in the burying-places of the Egyptians. There is an allusion to a sepulchral inscription in 2 Kings xxiii. 16, 17: "And as Josiah turned himself, he spied the sepulchres that were there in the mount, and sent, and took the bones out of the sepulchres, and burned them upon the altar, and polluted it, according to the word of the Lord, which the man of God proclaimed, who proclaimed these words. Then he said, What title is that that I see? And the men of the city told him, It is the sepulchre of the man of God, which came from Judah, and proclaimed these things that thou hast done against the altar of Beth-el." Here the word title seems evidently to refer to an inscription which arrested the eye of Josiah. The primitive Christians were wont to inscribe upon the tombs of their dead the letters Alpha and Omega, referring evidently to Christ, who styles himself thus in Rev. i. 8, 11.

EPOCH. See ÆRA.

EQUANIMITY is an even, uniform state of mind, amidst all the vicissitudes of time and changes of circumstances to which we are subject in the present state. One of this disposition is not dejected when under adversity, nor elated when in the height of prosperity; he is equally affable to others, and contented in himself. The excellency of this disposition is beyond all praise. It may be considered as the grand remedy for all the diseases and miseries of life, and the only way by which we can preserve the dignity of our characters as men and as Christians.

EQUITY is that exact rule of righteousness or justice which is to be observed between man and man. Our Lord beautifully and comprehensively expresses it in these words: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets." Matt. vii. 12. "This golden rule," says Dr. Watts, "has many excellent properties in it. 1. It is a rule that is easy to be understood, and easy to be applied by the meanest and weakest understanding. Isa. xxxv. 8. 2. It is a very short rule, and easy to be remembered; the weakest memory can retain it; and the meanest of mankind may carry this about with them, and have it ready upon all occasions. 3. This excellent precept carries greater evidence to the conscience, and a stronger degree of conviction in it, than any other rule of moral virtue. 4. It is particularly fitted for practice, because it includes in it a powerful motive to stir us up to do what it enjoins. 5. It is such a rule as, if well applied, will almost always secure our neighbour from injury, and secure us from guilt if we should chance to hurt him. 6. It is a rule as much fitted to awaken us to sincere repentance, upon the transgression of it, as it is to direct us to our present duty. 7. It is a most extensive rule, with regard to all the stations, ranks, and characters of mankind; for it is perfectly suited to them all. 8. It is a most comprehensive rule, with regard to all the actions and duties that concern our neighbours. It teaches us to regulate our temper and behaviour, and promotes tenderness, benevolence, gentleness, &c. 9. It is also a rule of the highest prudence with regard to ourselves, and promotes our own interest in the best manner. 10. This rule is fitted to make the whole world as happy as the present state of things will admit."

EQUIVOCATION, the using a term or expression that has a double meaning. Equivocations are said to be expedients to save telling the truth, and yet without telling a falsehood; but if an intention to deceive constitute the essence of a lie, which in general it does, how can we equivocate without incurring guilt, as it is certainly an intention to deceive?

ERA. See ÆRA.

ERASTUS, a Christian whom Paul mentions Rom. xvi. 23, as "chamberlain of the city" of Corinth, an office which was held in high repute in ancient times. He is mentioned as having been with Paul at Ephesus, and as having been sent with Timothy into Macedonia. Acts xix. 22. Afterwards we find both of them with Paul at Corinth, and mentioned by him in his salutations to the Romans, his Epistle to that church having been written from Corinth. As he is mentioned also in 2 Tim. iv. 20, it is very probable that Corinth was the city where he generally resided.

ERASTIANISM. The originator of this erroneous system of opinions was Thomas Erastus, doctor of medicine at Heidelberg in the sixteenth century. A discussion had arisen concerning the necessity of Church government, and the power of presbyteries and other Church courts to excommunicate, when Erastus and his followers openly taught the entire subordination in all respects of the ecclesiastical to the civil authorities, and denied the power of the Church to exercise discipline, that power belonging exclusively to the civil magistrate. The conclusion which must be drawn from such opinions, if true, is, that the magistrate is head of the Church, and that the doctrine of the Westminster Confession is false, that "Christ hath appointed a government in the Church, in the hands of Church officers, distinct from the civil government." The Erastian principles, when first broached in Germany, met with the most violent opposition. Beza, though then far advanced in life, published a Treatise concerning Excommunication and Presbytery, in refutation of Erastus. Many others, at a later period, entered the field; and although Erastianism has been practically submitted to in too many of the Churches of the Reformation, few venture to defend the principles as scriptural, however statesmen may allege them to be expedient. It is no difficult matter to show that Christ hath instituted a government in his Church. In every social body order is essential to its right regulation, and government is essential to order. This of itself is a presumptive argument in favour of the existence of such a government; and without entering into the question at present as to the precise nature of this government, whether Presbyterian, Episcopal, or Independent, it is sufficient for our present object to refer to some of those passages of Scripture in which ecclesiastical persons are represented as invested with the power of rule. "We beseech you, brethren, to know them which labour among you, and are over you in the Lord"—"Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour"—"Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves; for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account."

But if such government be vested in the Church, is there not an authority vested also in the civil government? and wherein do these differ? We answer in the words of Professor Buchanan: "They differ in their origin; the civil governor holding primarily of God, as the universal sovereign—the Church holding of Christ, as mediator; and this difference is of some importance, notwithstanding the great truth which is clearly affirmed in Scripture, viz., that both are now placed under Christ, who is not only 'the head of the Church,' but 'head over all things to the Church.' They differ in their extent; civil government being an ordinance of God in all nations—the Church being limited to those countries where the Gospel is preached. They differ in respect to some of their ends; certain secular purposes being served by the State, which are not directly contemplated by the Church as a spiritual body, however much she may be fitted to aid in their attainment; and certain spiritual purposes, again, being served by the Church, which the State, considered as such, cannot effect. They differ in respect to some of the means by which these ends are to be promoted; the civil magistrate having the power of the sword, which is withheld from the Church, and the prerogative of making war on just and needful occasions, which is not competent to a spiritual kingdom; while the Church, again, has warrant to use the sword of ecclesiastical discipline, with which the magistrate may not interfere. They differ in respect to their officers, the civil magistrate having no power, as such, to preach or to administer the sacraments of religion; and the officers of the Church, as such, having no power to exercise any function of the magistracy; so that, even were there a nation in which every subject of the State was also a member of the Church, that nation would still be governed by two distinct sets of office-bearers, the one belonging to the Church, the other to the commonwealth.

"In these, and perhaps in some other respects, the Church and the civil government differ from one another; but they are not only different—each is in its own proper sphere, and in reference to its peculiar objects, independent of the other.

"We do not mean to affirm, either, that a man holding the office of the magistracy is exempt from the authority of the Church, or, that a man holding the office of an ecclesiastic is exempt from the authority of the State; far less that private persons are released from subjection to the one by reason of their subjection to the other; but that the two jurisdictions are distinct and independent, so that neither does the State derive its authority from the Church, nor does the Church derive its authority from the State. Both are divine institutions, and they have, as 'twin-children' of the same Father, a separate existence, an independent will, and a co-ordinate authority. This important doctrine stands opposed to two errors equally flagrant and pernicious; the one Erastian, which derives the authority of the Church from the will of kings and princes—the other Popish, which makes the State the mere creature and tool of the Church. The rightful authority of civil government is derived directly from God, as the moral governor of the world, and is equally valid in Heathen as in Christian countries. The legitimate authority of the Church is derived from its divine Founder, and is equally valid under whatever form of civil polity it may be exercised. The Church, as such, has no right to interfere with the jurisdiction, or usurp the functions, or supplant the officers, of the commonwealth; and, in like manner, the civil government has no right to encroach upon the spiritual functions, prerogatives, or powers of the Church. The one is fenced round with the same divine sanctions as the other, and each will best subserve the ends of its appointment by allowing the other to retain what rightfully belongs to it." Such, then, being the prominent points of distinction between the Church and the civil government, these must ever be kept in view in any alliance which is formed between the Church and the State. The State has a right to demand that no Popish domination over the civil power be asserted on the part of the Church; and the Church has a right to demand that no Erastian interference with the spiritual independence of the Church be asserted on the part of the State.

ERECH, an ancient city in Chaldea, which is stated (Gen. x. 10) to have formed a part of the kingdom of Nimrod. Its precise situation is doubtful. Bochart considers it as Aracca in Susiana, on the Tigris.

EREMITES. See HERMITS.

ESARHADDON, called Sargon in Isa. xx. 1, the son of Sennacherib and his successor in the kingdom of Assyria.

ESAU, the son of Isaac, and elder brother of Jacob. From him were descended the Idumeans. The manner in which he was supplanted by his younger brother, and sold to him the birthright, is recorded in Gen. xxvii.

On the most important part of his history, the selling of his birthright, Dr Watson observes—1. That although it was always the design of God that the blessing connected with primogeniture in the family of Abraham should be enjoyed by Jacob, and to exercise his sovereignty in changing the succession in which the promises of the Abrahamic covenant might descend, yet the conduct of Rebekah and Jacob was reprehensible, in endeavouring to bring about the divine design by the unworthy means of cunning and deceit; and they were punished for their presumption by their sufferings. 2. That the conduct of Esau in selling his birthright was both wanton and profane. It was wanton, because he, though faint, could be in no danger of not obtaining a supply of food in his father's house; and was therefore wholly influenced by his appetite, excited by the delicacy of Jacob's pottage. It was profane, because the blessings of the birthright were spiritual as well as civil. The Church of God was to be established in the line of the first-born; and in that line the Messiah was to appear. These high privileges were despised by Esau; who is therefore made by Paul a type of all apostates from Christ, who, like him, profanely despise their birthright as the sons of God. See BIRTHRIGHT.

ESDRAELON, PLAIN OF, in the tribe of Issachar, called likewise the Valley of Megiddo, the Great Plain, the Valley of Jezreel, the Plain of Esdrela. "The bosom of this great plain," says Mr Wylie, "is slightly undulating, meeting nowhere, throughout its whole extent, any serious obstruction; no part of its surface is covered with forests, on the contrary, it is so completely open that scarcely a tree is to be seen. The ground is arable and of the finest quality, and furnishing, whether cultivated or lying waste, proofs of such extraordinary fecundity, that in the opinion of intelligent travellers, the produce of this single plain might supply grain sufficient to maintain the whole province of Galilee, were it as abundantly stocked with inhabitants as it once was. It is watered by the Kishon, which rises at the foot of Tabor, and flows westward to the sea; in its ordinary state, this is an inconsiderable stream, but as it advances in its course, it is joined by numerous mountain-torrents, and on the fall of heavy rains, is apt to have its volume suddenly enlarged; and such appears to have been its state when it swept away the host of Sisera.

"The ancient aspect of this plain it is easy to imagine; and certainly nowhere would it have been possible to have found a more extensive or varied scene of beauty and magnificence. Viewed from any of the heights by which it is bordered, it would appear like one vast garden; its bosom waving with vast crops of grain, alternating with beautiful pastures; graced, moreover, with opulent cities, and villages without number, environed with vineyards, partially hidden amid pomegranate and orange trees. And then, to relieve the rich though, perhaps, tame aspect of the middle portion, around it rose a boundary of lofty and terraced mountains. Over all was spread the beautiful sky of Palestine. No wonder that several of the kings of Israel chose it for their residence. But what a change is now visible! And to what is that change to be ascribed? Certainly to no difference in the physical properties of the region: for here is the plain, watered by the river and bounded by the mountains as of old, its soil as fertile and its climate as genial as they ever were; yet what a contrast does its dreary and deserted aspect form to the gay and smiling scene which it exhibited in former times! Again we ask to what is this difference owing? To one cause, and to one cause only, can it be ascribed. The curse has fallen upon it, 'and, lo! the fruitful field' is 'a wilderness.'"

Prophecy points to this plain as the place where the great battle of Armageddon is to be fought—the last and terrible conflict between the armies of Antichrist and the followers of the Lamb. Travellers describe its present appearance as large and desolate. Maundrell says it is "of a vast extent, and very fertile, but uncultivated—only serving the Arabs for pasture." "On this extensive plain," says Hasselquist, "but little of which is cultivated, the Arabs sometimes fight their battles." Clarke speaks of it as a solitude, and "like one vast meadow covered with pasture." "It is impossible," says Wilson, "for language to describe the grandeur of this immense plain." The description of Messrs Bonar and McCheyne is similar: "The plain is singularly level, cultivated in some spots, but for the most part a wilderness of weeds and thorns. There is the appearance, indeed, of varied produce upon it; but this is caused merely by the different colours of the thistles and briars which cover it. It is reckoned that not more than one sixteenth of the whole is under cultivation."

ESDRAS, the name of two apocryphal books never admitted into the Jewish canon. Neither of these books appears to have ever existed in Hebrew. The first is extant in Greek, and the second in Latin. The first is chiefly historical, and gives an account of the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, the rebuilding of the temple, and the re-establishment of divine worship. This book is rejected by Jerome, and its canonical authority is denied by the Church of Rome. The second book is full of rabbinical fables of the most absurd kind; and some critics believe that it was written by a converted Jew towards the close of the first century.

ESH-BAAL. This word, which signifies the fire of Baal, was one of the names of the youngest of the four sons of Saul. 1 Chron. viii. 33. The other name by which he is called in 2 Sam. ii. 8, is ISH-BOSHETH, (which see.)

ESHCOL, the name of one who joined with Abraham in pursuing Chedorlaomer and the other allied kings who attacked Sodom and Gomorrah, taking captive Lot, Abraham's nephew, Gen. xiv. 24. The name also of a rich and fruitful valley, from which the spies brought grapes of the largest size and finest quality, as a specimen of the produce of the land of Canaan. Dr Wilson tells us that such grapes may still be procured in the valley, which, as he informs us, extends altogether about a couple of miles. "About half-an-hour from Hebron," says Mr Stephens, "we came to a valley supposed to be the Vale of Eshcol, where the spies sent out by Moses found the grapes. On the right we passed a ruined wall, by some called the Cave of Machpelah, or Sepulchre of the Patriarchs, but which the Jews at Hebron had called the House of Abraham."

ESHTAOL, a town of Dan, though it belonged first to Judah. Eusebius says it was ten miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Nicopolis (Josh. xv. 33), between Azotus and Askalon. Judg. xiii. 25, xvi. 31. It is called by Jerome, Asco. Eshtaol is thought to be a village now called by the Arabs Estdad, about fifteen miles south of Yebna. It is a wretched place, composed of a few mud huts.

ESHEMOTH, a city in the south of Judah. Eusebius says it was a large town in the district of Eleutheropolis, north of that city. It was ceded to the priests. 1 Chron. vi. 57.

ESOTERIC, something secret, revealed only to the initiated. In the mysteries or secret societies of the ancients, the doctrines were distinguished into the esoteric and the exoteric—the former for the initiated, who were permitted to enter into the sanctuary itself (the Esoterics); and the latter for the uninitiated (the Exoterics), who remained in the outer court. The same distinction is also made, in ancient philosophy, between those doctrines which belong peculiarly to the initiated, and those which are adapted to the limited capacities of the unlearned.

ESPOUSALS, a word of the same meaning with BETROTHMENT (which see), implying a mutually binding contract or engagement between two parties, with a view to marriage at an after period. An interval of months and sometimes years elapsed before the marriage was consummated. To this custom, as figuratively employed to denote the union between Christ and his people, allusion is made in Jer. ii. 2: "Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem, saying, Thus saith the Lord; I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown." The apostle uses the word in the same reference in 2 Cor. xi. 2: "For I am jealous over you with godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ." Among the primitive Christians, the betrothment took place in the presence of witnesses, usually not less than ten, and was ratified by pledges given by the man, viz., a ring, engraven with some figure emblematical of a Christian virtue; and a solemn kiss. At the end of two years, which was the usual duration of the espousals, the marriage was consummated.

ESSENES, a very ancient sect of the Jews, that was spread abroad through Syria, Egypt, and the neighbouring countries. They maintained that religion consisted wholly in contemplation and silence. Some of them passed their lives in a state of celibacy; others embraced the state of matrimony, which they considered as lawful, when entered into with the sole design of propagating the species, and not to satisfy the demand of lust. Some of them held the possibility of appeasing the Deity by sacrifices, though different from those of the Jews; and others maintained that no offering was acceptable to God but that of a serene and composed mind, addicted to the contemplation of divine things. They looked upon the Law of Moses as an allegorical system of spiritual and mysterious truths, and renounced, in its explication, all regard to the outward letter. They believed in a future state, but denied the resurrection of the dead, their doctrine being, that the souls of men after their death are transmitted into a state of immortality, therein to live in everlasting bliss or in everlasting woe, according as their actions have deserved, without ever any more returning either to their own or any other bodies. There is no mention of the Essenes, as there is of the Pharisees and Sadducees in the New Testament. The principal writers who give an account of this sect are, Josephus, Philo, and Pliny. Philo divides the Essenes into two classes—the Practical, who lived in society, and some of whom were married; and the Contemplative, who were also called Therapeutæ or physicians, because they devoted themselves to the cure of diseases of the soul. It has been supposed that those whom our Lord terms eunuchs (Matt. xix. 12) are the Contemplative Essenes, and that the Apostle Paul refers to their doctrines when he directs the Colossians (ii. 18, 23) to abstain from worshipping of angels and neglecting the body. The tenets referred to by Paul, "Touch not, taste not, handle not" (Col. ii. 21), are such as the Essenes held, who would not taste any pleasant food, but lived on coarse bread, and drank nothing but water; and some would not taste any food at all till after sun-set.

ESTABLISH. God establisheth the work of his people's hands, when he gives them direction, assistance, and success in their undertakings. Ps. xc. 17. We establish our own righteousness, when we perform it in order to found our acceptance with God, and persuade ourselves that it is a proper foundation for our hopes of eternal happiness. Rom. x. 3. We by faith establish the law, presenting to it as a covenant the law-magnifying righteousness of Jesus Christ, as fulfilled in our stead; and by faith deriving virtue from Christ, we are enabled to fulfil it as a rule of duty. Rom. iii. 31.

ESTHER or Hadassah, a Jewish captive of the tribe of Benjamin, the daughter of Abihail and niece of Mordecai, by whom, on the death of her parents, she was brought up. After Ahasuerus had divorced Vashti, Esther, on account of her beauty, was selected to be his wife; and thus was she suddenly raised, though a Jewess, to the throne of Persia. This unexpected event led, as we are informed in the Book of Esther, to the providential deliverance of the Jews, for whose destruction Ahasuerus had been persuaded to issue a decree. This remarkable interposition of Providence in behalf of the Jews gave rise to the feast of Purim or lots. The Book of Esther has been always admitted into the canon. Clemens of Alexandria, as well as some rabbins, allege the author of this book to have been Mordecai; and the book itself favours this opinion, saying that he wrote the history of this event. Others think it was composed and placed in the canon by Ezra, or by the great synagogue. Philo, the Jew, assigns it to Joachin, the son of Joshua the high priest, who returned with Zerubbabel. Cellerier ascribes it to an unknown author who lived at the time when the facts recorded in it happened. The time of the history is in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, who is believed to be Ahasuerus. (See AHASUERUS—ECBATANA.) The events recorded commence about the year of the world 3544, and extend over eighteen or twenty years. In our copies the Book of Esther terminates with the 3d verse of the 10th chapter; but in the Greek and Vulgate Bibles, there are ten more verses annexed to it, together with six additional chapters which the Greek and Roman Churches account canonical, but which, not being extant in Hebrew, are rejected by Protestants. They are considered both by Jerome and Grotius as fictitious. In most manuscripts and editions of the Book of Esther the names of Haman's sons, contained in the 9th chapter, are written under each other in ten lines, no other word being connected with them, in order to exhibit the manner in which they were hanged, each of the brothers being immediately suspended the one under the other, in one perpendicular line.

ESTRANGED, filled with dislike, rendered like strangers. The wicked are estranged from God—destitute of the knowledge of him or intimacy with him, and filled with dislike of him (Ps. lviii. 3); but not estranged from their lusts, not filled with dislike of them, or turned from the practice of them. Ps. lxxviii. 30. The Jews estranged Jerusalem, by turning out the worship of the true God, and bringing in the worship of idols, and the practice of the basest wickedness. Jer. xix. 4.

ETAM, a rock in the top or rather the clefts of which Samson is said to have dwelt. Judg. xv. 8. Josephus speaks of a place bearing this name about fifty furlongs distant from Jerusalem, to which Solomon used to resort daily. Dr Wilson, says it would form a very beautiful retreat from the crowded city of Jerusalem.

ETERNALS, a name given to those in the third century who maintained that our globe, being purified by the great conflagration subsequent to the day of judgment, will be regenerated and abide for ever, under the form of the new heaven and the new earth described by John in the Revelation. This opinion, however, not limited to the third century, is held by many orthodox writers even in the present day.

ETERNITY, with respect to God, is a duration without beginning or end. As it is the attribute of human nature, it is a duration that has a beginning, but will never have an end. "It is a duration," says a lively writer, "that excludes all number and computation; days, and months, and years, yea, and ages, are lost in it, like drops in the ocean! Millions of millions of years—as many years as there are sands on the sea-shore, or particles of dust in the globe of the earth, and those multiplied to the highest reach of number—all these are nothing to eternity. They do not bear the least imaginable proportion to it, for these will come to an end as certainly as a day, but eternity will never, never, never, come to an end! It is a line without an end! it is an ocean without a shore! Alas! what shall I say of it? it is an infinite, unknown something, that neither human thought can grasp nor human language describe!"

ETERNITY OF FUTURE PUNISHMENT. That the misery of the wicked in the place of torment will be everlasting in its duration, is the plain and explicit doctrine of the Word of God. Thus Matt. xxv. 46: "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal." The sentence pronounced upon the wicked, we are expressly told, will be, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Our Lord admonishes us to fear Him "who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Attempts have often been made to explain away this awful doctrine. It has by some been asserted, that eternal death means no more than eternal annihilation; and others allege that when the punishment of the wicked is said in Scripture to be eternal, it simply signifies that it shall be of very long continuance. In opposition to the idea of annihilation, it may be remarked—1. The Scripture everywhere represents the punishment of the wicked as implying very extreme pains and sufferings; but annihilation is no state of suffering at all. 2. If the eternal punishment threatened be annihilation, the wicked will never be sensible of its infliction, and therefore they will never know that God is just in their punishment, or that they have their deserts. 3. Scripture teaches that the wicked will suffer different degrees of torment, which is utterly inconsistent with annihilation, in which there can be no degrees. In proof that the punishment of the wicked will not only be of long continuance, but absolutely everlasting, we may simply quote some statements of Scripture, such as: "And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name." Rev. xiv. 11. "And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever." Rev. xx. 10. "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." Mark ix. 44. "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal." Matt. xxv. 46. These passages, and many more to the same purpose might be quoted, are explicit in their averments as to the eternity of hell torments—the absolute everlasting duration of the future punishment which awaits the wicked.

ETERNITY OF GOD is the perpetual continuance of his being, without beginning, end, or succession. That he is without beginning, says Dr. Gill, may be proved from—1. His necessary self-existence. Exod. iii. 14. 2. From his attributes, several of which are said to be eternal. Rom. i. 20; Acts xv. 18; Ps. ciii. 17; Jer. xxxi. 3. 3. From his purposes, which are also said to be from eternity. Isa. xxv. 1; Eph. iii. 11; Rom. ix. 11; Eph. i. 4. 4. From the covenant of grace, which is eternal. 2 Sam. xxiii. 5; Mic. v. 2.

That he is without end, may be proved from—1. His spirituality and simplicity. Rom. i. 23. 2. From his independency. Rom. ix. 5. 3. From his immutability. 1 Pet. i. 24, 25; Mal. iii. 6; Ps. cii. 26, 27. 4. From his dominion and government, said never to end. Jer. x. 10; Ps. x. 16; Dan. iv. 3.

That he is without succession, or any distinctions of time succeeding one to another, as moments, minutes, &c., may be proved from—1. His existence before such were in being. Isa. xliii. 13. 2. The distinctions and differences of time are together ascribed to him, and not as succeeding one another; he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Heb. xiii. 8; Rev. i. 4. 3. If his duration were successive, or proceeded by moments, days, and years, then there must have been some first moment, day, and year, when he began to exist, which is incompatible with the idea of his eternity; and, besides, one day would be but one day with him, and not a thousand years, contrary to the express language of Scripture. 2 Pet. iii. 8. 4. He would not be immense, immutable, and perfect, if this were the case; for he would be older one minute than he was before, which cannot be said of him. 5. His knowledge proves him without successive duration, for he knows all things, past, present, and to come: "he sees the present without a medium, the past without recollection, and the future without foresight. To him all truths are but one idea, all places but one point, and all times but one moment." It is right to mark an important difference between the eternity of God and that of some of his creatures, such as angels and souls of men. The existence of both the latter is not necessarily eternal, and there is no contradiction in supposing them to be annihilated. There was a time when they were not, and all that can be said of them is, that having begun, they shall never cease to exist. The eternity of God comprehends the past as well as the future, and is thus expressed by an inspired writer: "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God." Ps. xc. 2. Thus we may see the meaning of the apostle's expression in regard to God, "He only hath immortality." 1 Tim. vi. 16. To him exclusively belongs the attribute of absolute, underived, independent, and necessary eternity. And further, the existence of creatures is successive, but that of God comprehends the past, the present, and the future, or, as the schoolmen were wont to express it, the existence of God is an eternal now.

ETERNITY OF THE WORLD. It was the opinion of Aristotle and others, that the world was eternal; but that the present system of things had a beginning, seems evident, if we consider the following things:—1. We may not only conceive of many possible alterations which might be made in the form of it, but we see it incessantly changing; whereas an eternal being, forasmuch as it is self-existent, is always the same. 2. We have no credible history of transactions more remote than six thousand years from the present time. 3. We can trace the invention of the most useful arts and sciences; which had probably been carried farther, and invented sooner, had the world been eternal. 4. The origin of the most considerable nations of the earth may be traced; that is, the time when they first inhabited the countries where they now dwell; and it appears that most of the Western nations came from the East. 5. If the world be eternal, it is hard to account for the tradition of its beginning, which has almost everywhere prevailed, though under different forms, among both polite and barbarous nations. 6. We have a most ancient and credible history of the beginning of the world—I mean the history of Moses with which no book in the world, in point of antiquity, can contend.

Atheists, however, being compelled to admit that something must have existed from eternity, and being unwilling to concede the eternal existence of an intelligent Being, of inflexible justice and infinite purity, are sometimes in the habit of declaring the universe to be eternal. On this subject Dr. Dick reasons well and conclusively, in his "Lectures on Theology:" "If it has subsisted from eternity, it must have subsisted as it is, there being, on the hypothesis of Atheists, no cause to produce a change, and a change being inconsistent with the idea of necessary existence. Hence we see, by the way, that matter cannot be that Being which has existed from eternity. If it existed from eternity, it exists by necessity of nature. But it is an express contradiction to suppose that which exists necessarily, not to exist; and yet we see all sensible that there is no contradiction in supposing the non-existence of matter, for we can all conceive it to be annihilated. It is a contradiction to suppose that which exists necessarily, to exist in any other state or form. But we can conceive matter to be in motion or at rest; and finding some parts of it in the one state, and some in the other, we conclude that its existence is not necessary, but contingent. We can conceive it to be differently modified; that it might have wanted some of its properties, and possessed others which do not belong to it; that the frame of the universe might have been different; and that in our system there might have been more or fewer planets, and these might have been attended with more or fewer satellites. But if the universe is self-existent, it must have always been as it now is. The sun must have always been the centre of this system, and the planets must have always described their orbits around him. There must have been eternal revolutions of Saturn and the Georgium Sidus, and eternal revolutions of the Earth and Mercury. Now, as these revolutions are performed in different times, and, on the supposition of their eternity, are all infinite in number, it follows that we have infinites, which as infinites must be equal, but being made up of revolutions performed in unequal times, are unequal. But this is impossible, and the hypothesis from which it is deduced is absurd. It has been objected that, according to the doctrine of the infinite divisibility of matter, there may be one infinite greater than another, as the parts of matter differ in size. But the infinite divisibility of matter is a mere figment of the imagination; and, besides, only implies that our minds can affix no limit to the division, while here the division is actually made; revolutions have been described in periods longer and shorter, and yet they are equal in number, for they are all infinite."

ETHAM. This was the name of a wilderness in Arabia Petræa, also called the Desert of Shur, situated at the north-east extremity of the Red Sea, extending north to the confines of Palestine, and the first region which the Israelites reached in crossing from Egypt into Arabia. Exod. xiii. 20; Numb. xxxiii. 6. The site of Etham is commonly placed at Adjerod in the neighbourhood of Suez.

ETHAN the Ezrahite, and son of Kishi, was one of the wisest men of his time, except Solomon. 1 Kings iv. 31; Ps. lxxxix.; 1 Chron. vi. 44. He was called likewise Jeduthun, and appears under this name in the titles to several psalms. Ethan was a principal master of the temple music. 1 Chron. xv. 17. The 89th Psalm is ascribed to him.

ETHANIM, a Hebrew month (1 Kings viii. 2), after the captivity called Tizri. It is supposed to correspond to part of our September and October. It was the first month of the civil year among the Jews, and the seventh of the ecclesiastical.

ETHICS. See MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

ETHIOPIA. See CUSH.

ETHNARCH, the governor of a country, depending on, or appointed by, a king: thus Archelaus, the son of Herod, is said by Josephus to have been called Ethnarch of Judea by Augustus. The governor of Damascus under Aretas the king, mentioned by Paul (2 Cor. xi. 32), is supposed to have been a military commander, invested with the authority of ethnarch.

EUCCHARIST, the sacrament of the Lord's supper. The word in its original Greek (eucharistia), properly signifies giving thanks; from the hymns and thanksgivings which accompanied that holy service in the primitive Church. See LORD'S SUPPER.

EULOGY (eulogia, "blessed," or a "blessing"), a term made use of in reference to the consecrated bread. When the Greeks have cut a loaf or piece of bread, to consecrate it, they break the rest into little bits, and distribute it among the persons who have not yet communicated, or send it to persons that are absent; and these pieces of bread are what they call eulogies. The Latin Church has had something like eulogies for a great many ages; and thence arose the use of their holy bread. The name enlogy was likewise given to loaves or cakes brought to church by the faithful to have them blessed. Lastly, the use of the term passed hence to mere presents made to a person without any benediction.

EUNICE, the mother of Timothy, and the wife of a Greek proselyte. At an early period she became a convert to Christianity, and Paul has pronounced a high eulogium on her piety. Acts xvi. 1; 2 Tim. i. 5. Grotius and Kuinoel observe, that according to the Law of Moses, Jewesses were permitted to marry foreigners of good character, as may be seen in the history of Esther; but Jews were forbidden to marry Gentile women.

EUNUCH. The word signifies a chamberlain, or courtier, or a guard of the bed-chamber. In the courts of Eastern kings, the care of the beds and apartments belonging to princes and princesses, was generally committed to eunuchs; but they had the charge chiefly of the princesses, who lived secluded.

EUODIAS, a Christian female at Philippi who, along with Syntyche, appears to have been a deaconess of the Church in that city. It would appear from Phil. iv. 2, that these two women had differed on some point of doctrine—probably as to the binding obligation of the law of Moses.

EUPHRATES, a river which takes its rise in the mountains of Armenia, and passing through a vast extent of country in Western Asia, flows into the Persian Gulf.

EUROCLYDON, the Greek name for the north-east wind, of the nature of a whirlwind, which falls of a sudden upon ships in the Mediterranean Sea. Acts xxvii. 14. The same wind is now called a Levanter. It is not confined to any one single point, but blows in all directions from the north-east.

EUTYCHUS, the name of a youth mentioned in Acts xx. 9, who, while Paul was preaching at Troas, having sunk into a deep sleep, fell down from the third loft of an upper chamber, and was taken up dead. He was miraculously restored to life by the Apostle.

EUTYCHIANS, a sect of heretics who arose in the fifth century. They derived their name from Eutyches, the archimandrite or abbot of a monastery at Constantinople. The Nestorians had fallen into the error, in language at least, of ascribing two persons to Christ, which was an evident absurdity; Eutyches, to avoid this error, fell into the opposite extreme, and maintained that there was only one nature in Jesus Christ, the divine nature, which, according to him, had so entirely swallowed up the human, that the latter could not be distinguished. Hence it was inferred, that, according to this system, our Lord had nothing of humanity but the appearance. The words of Eutyches were these: "I acknowledge two natures in Christ before the union, but after the union, I acknowledge only one nature." He did not specify the time when the union took place; but some of his followers said that it took place at the conception, some at the resurrection, and some at the ascension. His opinion seems to have been, that the human nature was absorbed by the divine, so that the divine nature alone remained. The heresy of Eutyches was condemned by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, which promulgated the following decree as expressive of the faith which all Christians should hold: "That in Christ two distinct natures were united in one person, without any change, mixture, or confusion."

EVANGELIST, one who publishes glad tidings; a messenger or preacher of good news. The persons denominated evangelists were next in order to the apostles, and were sent by them, not to settle in any particular place, but to travel among the infant Churches, and ordain ordinary officers, and finish what the apostles had begun. Of this kind were Philip the deacon, Mark, Silas, &c. Acts xxi. 8. The term Evangelist is applied also to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, as having written the history of our blessed Lord, which they penned by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

EVE. Adam, we are told (Gen. iii. 20), called his wife's name Eve or Havah, "life." He had before called her at her creation Isha, woman; here he calls her Havah as a mother, evidently in anticipation; and the bestowment of the name indicated his faith in the promise of a future seed. The probability is, that Adam had a view more especially to the promise which had just been given, that she was to be the mother of a seed that was to bruise the serpent's head, and so, by being the progenitor of Christ, was to be the mother of all that should have spiritual life in and through him.

EVERLASTING, enduring always. See ETERNITY.

EVIDENCE. The theory of evidence was not unknown to Aristotle and the ancient writers, but it is chiefly to the researches of modern logicians, from Bacon downwards, that we are indebted for a complete exposition of it.

The grounds on which we believe a statement to be either true or false, are termed the evidence. These grounds, it is obvious, may vary in kind as well as in degree. Some truths are capable of being established with undoubted certainty; others, again, admit of a proof more or less strong. It is of great importance, therefore, to know by what kind of evidence any fact or statement can be supported, and thus we may readily ascertain to what extent our belief in it may be carried.

The two great classes into which all kinds of evidence are usually reduced, are intuitive and deductive—the former calling for immediate and irresistible belief, independently of any process of argumentation whatever; the latter requiring for its proof various consecutive steps of reasoning. Some writers are in the habit of dividing evidence into three classes—intuitive, deductive or demonstrative, and the evidence of testimony.

Under intuitive evidence, which commands instant and irresistible belief, are generally included, besides those à priori truths which are necessarily involved in an act of consciousness, the evidence of sense, of memory, and of axioms or general principles. It is well, however, to bear in mind that consciousness and intuitive evidence are convertible terms, and that is in no sense entitled to be considered as resting on intuitive evidence which is not involved in every act of consciousness. This view of the subject, no doubt, limits the number of intuitive, and therefore dogmatically certain truths; sufficient, however, remains to establish a sure foundation for all future reasonings of every kind. And this is all that ought to be desired. Those truths only are entitled to be ranked as intuitions which we cannot deny without involving ourselves in an obvious contradiction. What is essentially necessary to the operation of our intellectual and moral nature, is intuitive. We cannot think, for example, without being subjected to the influence of the evidence of consciousness; we cannot act without being subjected to the influence of the evidence of conscience. To these, then, in so far as man is concerned, dogmatical certainty belongs. He cannot doubt their truth, without disclaiming the nature with which he has been endowed.

The evidence of intuition or consciousness is certain in itself, but from its truths no other truths can be deduced. Hence the distinction drawn between this and all the other species of evidence, which are classed under one head, termed deductive. Deductive evidence, or that which is chiefly available in the evolution of unknown from known truths, is usually distinguished into two kinds, demonstrative and moral or probable evidence, giving rise to a corresponding distinction in modes of reasoning. It is of great importance that the difference between demonstrative and probable evidence be kept constantly in view, that we may be prevented from confounding two species of proof so completely distinct from one another. The evidence of demonstration applies to necessary, moral or probable evidence to contingent, truth. But this distinction of necessary and contingent truth, instead of being founded in nature, as we are liable to imagine, is entirely relative to our minds. It arises from the limited extent of our knowledge, and it is quite possible, nay, it is not at all unlikely, that beings of a higher order of intellect than that which is allotted to man, may recognise what we consider as contingent truths to be of the same order with those which we term necessary. But in present circumstances, the great mass of objects upon which our judgment and reasonings are exercised, rest upon probable evidence. Demonstrative evidence is very limited in the range of its application, extending no farther than to the relations of number and quantity, which are capable of being expressed in language so strictly definite as to admit of no misunderstanding or mistake. On the strict definition of terms rests the whole certainty of mathematical truth, which is not an absolute, therefore, but a hypothetical certainty; and to the great mass of phenomena, and events with which we are familiarly conversant, such a mode of reasoning would be altogether inapplicable. The language employed is too vague and ambiguous to admit of strict definition; and such is the imperfection of language, that, however desirable it might be to have words used in a fixed meaning, it is impracticable. The idea has, no doubt, been entertained of reducing words, expressive of our views on general subjects, to a fixed and certain signification; and even the illustrious names of Leibnitz and Locke are found in connection with such a plan; and yet we fear the experience of all past ages must pronounce it utopian. However advantageous, indeed, such a plan in some respects might be, it is very doubtful whether it might not so fetter and constrain the mind, that no scope would be given for the exercise of those powers which the labour required in procuring probable evidence summons into action. It is very injurious to the mind to entertain too strong a partiality for one species of evidence rather than another. We thereby lose sight of the important fact, that the same kind of evidence is not equally applicable in all cases, and that therefore we ought only to require such evidence as the particular circumstances of the case admit. Instead, therefore, of being dissatisfied with the kind of evidence adduced, it ought to be our chief inquiry whether, in any given case, we have obtained the strongest evidence of that kind which is applicable.

EVIL is distinguished into natural and moral. Natural evil is whatever destroys or any way disturbs the perfection of natural beings; such as blindness, disease, death, &c. Moral evil is the disagreement between the actions of a moral agent and the rule of those actions, whatever it is. Applied to a choice, or acting contrary to the moral or revealed laws of the Deity, it is termed wickedness or sin; applied to acting contrary to the mere rule of fitness, a fault. See SIN.

EVIL MERODACH, the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. During the time that the remarkable judgment of God rested upon his father, he administered the government; but of course, on the recovery of Nebuchadnezzar, Evil Merodach restored the rule into his hands. In the year B.C. 562, on his father's death, he succeeded to the throne, and signalized his accession by delivering Jehoiachin, king of Judah, out of prison. Different opinions are entertained as to the extent of his reign, but it appears, at all events, to have been very short, not exceeding one, or at furthest two years. Archbishop Ussher calculated that he reigned only one year, and was succeeded by his son Belshazzar. The writer of the article upon this king, in Kitto's Cyclopædia, regards him as identical with Ilvarodam in Ptolemy's Canon. This, however, seems somewhat doubtful, or rather unlikely.

EVIL-SPEAKING, the using language either reproachful or untrue respecting others, and thereby injuring them. It is an express command of Scripture to "speak evil of no man." Tit. iii. 2; James iv. 11. By which, however, we are not to understand that there are no occasions on which we are at liberty to speak of others that which may be considered as evil. 1. Persons in the administration of justice may speak words which in private intercourse would be reproachful. 2. God's ministers may inveigh against vice with sharpness and severity, both privately and publicly. Isa. lviii. 1; Tit. i. 13. 3. Private persons may reprove others when they commit sin. Lev. xix. 17. 4. Some vehemence of speech may be used in defence of truth, and impugning errors of bad consequence. Jude 3. 5. It may be necessary, upon some emergent occasions, with some heat of language to express disapprobation of notorious wickedness. Acts viii. 23. Yet, in all these, the greatest equity, moderation, and candour should be used; and we should take care—1. Never to speak in severe terms without reasonable warrant or apparent just cause. 2. Nor beyond measure. 3. Nor out of bad principles or wrong ends—from ill-will, contempt, revenge, envy, to compass our own ends—from wantonness or negligence; but from pure charity, for the good of those to whom, or of whom, we speak.

This is an evil, however, which greatly abounds, and which is not sufficiently watched against; for it is not when we openly speak evil of others only that we are guilty, but even in speaking what is true we are in danger of speaking evil of others. There is sometimes a malignant pleasure manifested—a studious recollection of everything that can be brought forward—a delight in hearing any things spoken against others—a secret rejoicing in knowing that another's fall will be an occasion of our rise;—all this is base to an extreme.

The impropriety and sinfulness of evil-speaking will appear, if we consider—1. That it is entirely opposite to the whole tenor of the Christian religion. 2. Expressly condemned and prohibited as evil. Ps. lxiv. 3; James iv. 11. 3. No practice hath more severe punishments denounced against it. 1 Cor. v. 11, vi. 10. 4. It is an evidence of a weak and distempered mind. 5. It is even indicative of ill breeding and bad manners. 6. It is the abhorrence of all wise and good men. Ps. xv. 3. 7. It is exceedingly injurious to society, and inconsistent with the relation we bear to each other as Christians. James iii. 6. 8. It is branded with the epithet of folly. Prov. xviii. 6, 7. 9. It is perverting the design of speech. 10. It is opposite to the example of Christ, whom we profess to follow. See SLANDER.

EXALT. Men exalt God when, with care and diligence, they advance his declarative glory, and praise his excellences and works. Exod xv. 2; Ps. xxxiv. 3, xcix. 5, 9. God exalts Christ in raising him from the dead, receiving him up into heaven, and giving all power and judgment in heaven and earth into his hand. Acts ii. 33. Antichrist exalts himself above everything called God; he exalts himself above magistrates, pretending to enthrone and depose them at pleasure; above angels, presumptuously requiring them to carry such souls to heaven as he pleaseth, and in ordering devils to leave the persons of the possessed; and above the true God, in pretending to dispense with his laws, give authority to his word, and govern his Church by rules of his own, &c. 2 Thess. ii. 4. See ANTICHRIST.

EXALTATION OF CHRIST consisted in his rising again from the dead on the third day, in ascending into heaven, in sitting at the right hand of God the Father, and in coming to judge the world at the last day. See RESURRECTION—ASCENSION—INTERCESSION—JUDGMENT-DAY.

EXAMINATION, SELF. See SELF-EXAMINATION.

EXAMPLE, a copy or pattern, in a moral sense, is either taken for a type, instance, or precedent, for our admonition, that we may be cautioned against the faults or crimes which others have committed, by the bad consequences which have ensued from them; or example is taken for a pattern for our imitation, or a model for us to copy after.

That good examples have a peculiar power above naked precepts to dispose us to the practice of virtue and holiness, may appear by considering—"1. That they most clearly express to us the nature of our duties in their subjects and sensible effects. General precepts form abstract ideas of virtue, but in examples, virtues are most visible in all their circumstances. 2. Precepts instruct us in what things are our duty, but examples assure us that they are possible. 3. Examples, by secret and lively incentive, urge us to imitation. We are touched in another manner by the visible practice of good men, which reproaches our defects, and obliges us to the same zeal; which laws, though wise and good, will not effect."

The life of Jesus Christ forms the most beautiful example the Christian can imitate. Unlike all others, it was absolutely perfect and uniform, and every way accommodated to our present state. In him we behold all light without a shade, all beauty without a spot, all the purity of the Law and the excellency of the Gospel. Here we see piety without superstition, and morality without ostentation; humility without meanness, and fortitude without temerity; patience without apathy, and compassion without weakness; zeal without rashness, and beneficence without prodigality. The obligation we are under to imitate this example arises from duty, relationship, engagement, interest, and gratitude. See article JESUS CHRIST.

Those who set bad examples should consider,—1. That they are the ministers of the devil's design to destroy souls. 2. That they are acting in direct opposition to Christ, who came to save, and not to destroy. 3. That they are adding to the misery and calamities which are already in the world. 4. That the effects of their example may be incalculable on society to the end of time, and perhaps in eternity; for who can tell what may be the consequence of one sin, on a family, a nation, or posterity? 5. They are acting contrary to the divine command, and thus exposing themselves to final ruin.

EXARCH, an officer in the Greek Church, whose business it is to visit the provinces allotted to him, in order to inform himself of the lives and manners of the clergy; take cognizance of ecclesiastical causes; the manner of celebrating divine service; the administration of the sacraments, particularly confession; the observance of the canons; monastic discipline; affairs of marriages; divorces, &c.; but, above all, to take an account of the several revenues which the patriarch receives from different Churches, and particularly as to what regards collecting the same. The exarch, after having enriched himself in his post, frequently rises to the patriarchate himself. Exarch is also used, in the Eastern Church, for a general or superior over several monasteries—the same that we call archimandrite, being exempted by the patriarch of Constantinople from the jurisdiction of the bishop.

EXCELLENCY, preciousness, surpassing value or glory. Ps. lxii. 4; Job xl. 10. The excellency of God is the bright, shining, and valuable perfections of his nature, and the glorious displays thereof. Deut. xxxiii. 26; Isa. xxxv. 2. The excellency of Christ is in the glorious properties of his nature, his offices, righteousness, and fulness. Phil. iii. 8. Saints are more excellent than others; they are united to Christ, have his righteousness on them, his grace in them, and their good works flowing from his indwelling Spirit, regulated by his law, and directed to his glory as their end; and they are more useful, being a blessing in the land. Prov. xii. 26.

EXCISION. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

EXCOMMUNICATION, a penalty or censure, whereby persons who are guilty of any notorious crime or offence are separated from the communion of the Church, and deprived of all spiritual advantages.

The Jews expelled from their synagogue such as had committed any grievous crime. John ix. 22, xii. 42, xvi. 2. Godwin, in his "Moses and Aaron," distinguishes three degrees or kinds of excommunication among the Jews. The first he finds intimated in John ix. 22, the second in 1 Cor. v. 5, and the third in 1 Cor. xvi. 22.

The degrees of the Jewish excommunication were niddui, cherem, and schammata. The first was a simple suspension or separation for a time from the Jewish synagogue; the second or greater excommunication, was a separation with imprecations and curses; and the greatest of all was a final excommunication, without hope of returning to the Church. Corresponding with this, some divines speak of Christian excommunication also as threefold—the lesser, being suspension from the Lord's supper; the second being a casting out of the Church, and a delivering over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved; and the third, or anathema maran-atha, being an accusing of a man to the coming of Christ, without hope of mercy. The effects of excommunication among the Jews were these, according to Buxtorf: The excommunicated might not be admitted into an assembly of ten persons, that being the number necessary to constitute a legal ecclesiastical assembly; he might not sit within four cubits of his neighbour; he might not shave his hair nor wash himself; and it was not lawful to eat or drink with him. He that died in excommunication got no funeral, nor was there any mourning made for him; but a stone was set over him, to signify that he was worthy to be stoned, because he did not repent, and because he was separated from the Church.

Among the early Christians discipline was very rigidly maintained; and when excommunication was pronounced against an offender, the whole Christian community mourned over him with the deepest sorrow. Thus Dr. Jamieson remarks, in his interesting work, entitled "The Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians," when speaking of excommunication: "The day on which such a doom was sealed was a season of universal and bitter lamentation. The aged considered themselves as having lost a son or a daughter—the young, as having been severed from a brother or sister. Every one felt that a tie had been broken, and that an event had occurred which could be considered in no other light than as a dire and wide-spread calamity. Before, however, they allowed matters to reach that painful extremity, they never failed to resort to every means, in private, of reproving and admonishing the brother whom they saw to be in fault; and it was not till after they had tried all the arts of persuasion, and their repeated efforts had proved unavailing, that they brought the case under the notice of the Church, and subjected the offender to that severe and impartial ordeal which few but the most daring and incorrigible had the hardihood to abide. It is scarcely possible for us, who live in a state of society so different, to conceive the tremendous effect of a sentence which cut off an obstinate offender from all connection with the Church, and which, being solemnly pronounced in the name of God, seemed to anticipate the award of the judgment-day. Looking upon the fallen disciple from that moment as an enemy of Christ and a servant of the devil, the brethren avoided his presence as they would have fled from plague or pestilence. They were forbid to admit him to their houses, to sit with him at table, or to render him any of the ordinary offices of life; and the man who should have been detected in his company, would have run the hazard of bringing his own character into suspicion, and of being thought a guilty partner of the other's sins." Under such a weight of misery it was difficult for any one but the most hardened to bear up, and accordingly we find that the most strenuous endeavours were made to recover the position they had lost in the Christian community. "From day to day," says Dr. Jamieson, "they repaired to the cloisters, or the roofless area of the church—for no nearer were they allowed to approach it—and there they stood, in the most humble and penitent attitude, with downcast looks, and tears in their eyes, and smiting on their breasts; or threw themselves on the ground at the feet of the faithful, as they entered to worship, begging an interest in their sympathies and their prayers—confessing their sins, and crying out that they were as salt which had lost its savour, fit only to be trodden under foot. For weeks and months they often continued in this grovelling state, receiving from the passengers nothing but the silent expressions of their pity. Not a word was spoken, in the way either of encouragement or exhortation; for during these humiliating stations at the gate, the offenders were considered rather as candidates for penance than as actually penitents. When at last they had waited a sufficient length of time in this state of affliction, and the silent observers of their conduct were satisfied that their outward demonstrations of sorrow proceeded from a humble and contrite spirit, the rulers of the Church admitted them within the walls, and gave them the privilege of remaining to hear the reading of the Scriptures and the sermon. The appointed time for their continuance among the hearers being completed, they were advanced to the third order of penitents, whose privilege it was to wait until that part of the service when the prayers for particular classes were offered up, and to hear the petitions which the minister, with his hands on their heads, and themselves on their bended knees, addressed to God on their behalf, for his mercy to pardon and his grace to help them. In due time they were allowed to be present at the celebration of the communion, and the edifying services that accompanied it; after witnessing which, and offering, at the same time, satisfactory proofs of that godly sorrow which is unto salvation, the term of penance ended.

"The duration of this unhappy banishment from the peace and communion of the Church lasted for no fixed time, but was prolonged or shortened according to the nature of the crime, and the promising character of the offender. The ordinary term was from two to five years. But in some cases of gross and aggravated sin, the sentence of excommunication extended to ten, twenty, and thirty years; and even in some cases, though rarely, to the very close of life. During the whole progress of their probation, the penitents appeared in sackcloth and ashes—the men were obliged to cut off their hair, and the women to veil themselves, in token of sorrow. They were debarred from all the usual comforts and amusements of life, and obliged to observe frequent seasons of fasting—an exercise which, in the ancient Church, especially among the Christians of the East, was deemed an indispensable concomitant of prayer. On the day appointed for their deliverance from this humiliating condition, they came into the church in a penitential garb of sackcloth, and with a trembling voice and copious tears, took their station on an elevated platform, where, in presence of the assembled congregation, they made a public confession of their sins, and throwing themselves down on the ground, they besought them to forgive the scandal and reproach they had brought on the Christian name, and to give them the benefit and comfort of their intercessory prayers. The brethren, moved with the liveliest emotions at beholding one, to whom they had often given the kiss of peace, in so distressing a situation, fell on their knees along with him, and the minister, in the same attitude of prostration, laying his hands on the head of the penitent, supplicated, with solemn fervour, the divine compassion on him, and then raising him, placed him in the ranks of the faithful at the table of communion."

Excommunication is founded upon a natural right which all societies have of excluding from their body such as violate the laws thereof; and it was originally instituted by our Lord (Matt. xviii.; 1 Cor. v., &c.) for preserving the purity of the Church; but ambitious ecclesiastics converted it by degrees into an engine for promoting their own power, and inflicted it on the most frivolous occasions.

The power of excommunication in the middle ages was lodged in the hands of the clergy, who distinguished it into the greater and less. The less consisted in excluding persons from the participation of the Lord's supper, and the prayers of the faithful; but they were not expelled from the Church. The greater excommunication consisted in absolute and entire exclusion from the Church, and the participation of all its rites; notice of which was given by circular letters to the most eminent Churches all over the world, that they might all confirm this act of discipline, by refusing to admit the delinquent to their communion. The consequences were very terrible. The person so excommunicated was avoided in all civil commerce and outward conversation. No one was to receive him into his house, or eat at the same table with him; and, when dead, he was denied the solemn rites of burial.

The Romish Pontifical takes notice of three kinds of excommunication,—1. The minor, incurred by those who have any correspondence with an excommunicated person. 2. The major, which falls upon those who disobey the commands of the Holy See, or refuse to submit to certain points of discipline; in consequence of which they are excluded from the Church militant and triumphant, and delivered over to the devil and his angels. 3. Anathema, which is properly that pronounced by the pope against heretical princes and countries. In former ages, these Papal fulminations were most terrible things; but latterly they were formidable to none but a few petty States of Italy. The latest instance of the excommunication of a sovereign was that of Napoleon, by Pius VII., in 1809.

Excommunication, in the Greek Church, cuts off the offender from all communion with the three hundred and eighteen fathers of the first Council of Nice, and with the saints; consigns him over to the devil and the traitor Judas; and condemns his body to remain after death as hard as a flint or piece of steel, unless he humble himself, and make atonement for his sins by a sincere repentance. The form abounds with dreadful imprecations; and the Greeks assert, that if a person die excommunicated, the devil enters into the lifeless corpse; and therefore, in order to prevent it, the relations of the deceased cut his body in pieces and boil them in wine. It is a custom with the patriarch of Jerusalem annually to excommunicate the pope and the Church of Rome; on which occasion, together with a great deal of idle ceremony, he drives a nail into the ground with a hammer, as a mark of malediction.

The causes of excommunication in the Church of England are, contempt of the bishop's court, heresy, neglect of public worship and the sacraments, incontinency, adultery, simony, &c. It is described to be twofold. The less is an ecclesiastical censure, excluding the party from the participation of the sacraments; the greater proceeds further, and excludes him not only from these, but from the company of all Christians. But if the judge of any spiritual court excommunicates a man for a cause of which he has not the legal cognizance, the party may have an action against him at common law, and he is also liable to be indicted at the suit of the sovereign.

Excommunication, in Scotland, consists only in an exclusion of openly profane and immoral persons from baptism and the Lord's supper; but is seldom publicly declared, as, indeed, such persons generally exclude themselves from the latter ordinance at least; but it is attended with no civil incapacity whatever.

Though the act of exclusion be not performed exactly in the same manner in every Church, yet in the Congregationalist or Independent Churches generally the power of excision lies in the Church itself. The officers take the sense of the members assembled together; and after the matter has been properly investigated, and all necessary steps taken to reclaim the offender, the Church proceeds to the actual exclusion of the person from among them, by signifying their judgment or opinion that the person is unworthy of a place in God's house.

EXECUTIONS. The rapidity with which a sentence of death is put in execution in Eastern countries is quite startling to a European reader. No sooner often has the offence been committed, than the messenger of death makes his appearance, shows his warrant, and executes his orders in silence and solitude. Such executions were not uncommon among the Jews under the government of their kings. We find Solomon sending Benaiah, as his capidgi or executioner, to put Adonijah and Joab to death. The execution of John the Baptist, by orders of Herod, was conducted in the same summary manner. This custom explains the saying of Solomon: "The wrath of a king is as messengers of death: but a wise man will pacify it." Prov. xvi. 14. There is a reference to the same practice in 2 Kings vi. 32: "But Elisha sat in his house, and the elders sat with him; and the king sent a man from before him: but ere the messenger came to him, he said to the elders, See ye how this son of a murderer hath sent to take away mine head? look, when the messenger cometh, shut the door, and hold him fast at the door: is not the sound of his master's feet behind him?" Criminals were at other times executed in public, and then commonly without the gate of the city. To this the Psalmist seems to refer, Ps. lxxix. 2, 3. Public executioners were unknown in ancient times. A prince or a courtier was commonly selected to execute the sentence of the law. The office of Potiphar in the Egyptian court, mentioned in Gen. xxxvii. 36, is thought to have been "chief of the executioners," as indeed it is rendered on the margin. Gideon commanded Jether, his eldest son, to execute his sentence on the kings of Midian. Solomon employed Benaiah, the chief captain of his armies, to perform that duty. Sometimes the chief magistrate executed the sentence of the law with his own hands. Thus, when Jether refused to act the executioner, Gideon did not hesitate himself to do so; and Samuel with his own hands hewed in pieces Agag, king of the Amalekites.

EXEGESIS, the practical part of the science of hermeneutics or Biblical Criticism, or the art of carrying its principles and rules into execution; one of the most useful departments of theological science.

EXERCISE. To exercise one's self to have a conscience void of offence, is to be desirous, with all thought, care, and pains, to act up to the rule of God's law. Acts xxiv. 16. To exercise one's self unto godliness is, with the utmost earnestness and activity, to live by faith on Christ as our righteousness and strength; and, in so doing, habitually to exert all our powers, and improve our time, opportunities, and advantages, to seek after and promote our fellowship with God, and conformity to him in thoughts, words, and actions. 1 Tim. iv. 7. To be exercised by trouble, is to be much afflicted therewith, and led out to a proper improvement of it. Heb. xii. 11. Having the senses exercised to discern good and evil, is to have the powers of the soul carefully and frequently employed, till they become skilful in distinguishing the difference between right and wrong, sound and unsound reasoning. Heb. v. 14.

EXHORTATION, the act of laying such motives before a person as may incite him to the performance of any duty. It differs only from suasion, in that the latter principally endeavours to convince the understanding, and the former to work on the affections. It is considered as a great branch of preaching, though not confined to that, as a man may exhort though he do not preach; though a man can hardly be said to preach if he do not exhort. There are some who, believing the inability of man to do anything good, cannot reconcile the idea of exhorting men to duty; it being, as they suppose, a contradiction to address men who have no power to act of themselves. But they forget—1. That the great Author of our being has appointed this as a means for inclining the heart to himself. Isa. lv. 6, 7; Luke xiv. 17, 23. 2. That they who thus address men, do not suppose that there is virtue in the exhortation itself to effect the end, but that its energy depends on God alone. 1 Cor. xv. 10. 3. That the Scriptures onjoin ministers to exhort men; that is, to rouse them to duty, by proposing suitable motives. Isa. lviii. 1; 1 Tim. vi. 2; Heb. iii. 13; Rom. xii. 8. 4. That it was the constant practice of prophets, apostles, and Christ himself. Isa. i. 17; Jer. iv. 14; Ezek. xxxvii. 1-14; Luke xiii. 3; Acts iii. 19, xi. 23. "The express words," says a good divine, "of scriptural invitations, exhortations, and promises, prove more effectual to encourage those who are ready to give up their hopes, than all the consolatory topics that can possibly be substituted in their place. It is, therefore, much to be lamented that pious men, by adhering to a supposed systematical exactness of expression, should clog their addresses to sinners with exceptions and limitations, which the Spirit of God did not see good to insert. They will not say that the omission was an oversight in the inspired writers; or admit the thought for a moment, that they can improve on their plan; why then cannot they be satisfied to 'speak according to the oracles of God,' without affecting a more entire consistency? Great mischief has thus been done by very different descriptions of men, who undesignedly concur in giving Satan an occasion of suggesting to the trembling inquirer that perhaps he may persevere in asking, seeking, and knocking, with the greatest earnestness and importunity, and yet finally be cast away."

EXODUS (from ex out, and odos a way), the name of the Second Book of Moses, taken from the Septuagint, and is so called in the Greek version because it relates to the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt. It comprehends the history of about one hundred and forty-five years; and the principal events contained in it are, the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt, and their miraculous deliverance by the hand of Moses; their entrance into the Wilderness of Sinai; the promulgation of the law, and the building of the tabernacle. See PENTATEUCH.

EXORCISM, the expelling of devils from persons possessed, by means of conjurations and prayers. The Jews made great pretences to this power. Josephus tells several wonderful tales of the great success of several exorcists. One Eleazer, a Jew, cured many demoniacs, he says, by means of a root set in a ring. This root, with the ring, was held under the patient's nose, and the devil was forthwith evacuated. The most part of conjurors of this class were impostors, each pretending to a secret nostrum or charm which was an overmatch for the devil. Our Saviour communicated to his disciples a real power over demons, as well as over the diseases which were occasioned by demons. See DEMONIAC.

Exorcism makes a considerable part of the superstition of the Church of Rome, the ritual of which forbids the exorcising any person without the bishop's leave. The ceremony is performed at the lower end of the church, towards the door. The exorcist first signs the possessed person with the sign of the cross, makes him kneel, and sprinkles him with holy water. Then follow the litanies, psalms, and prayer; after which the exorcist asks the devil his name, and adjures him by the mysteries of the Christian religion not to afflict the person any more; then, laying his right hand on the demoniac's head, he repeats the form of exorcism, which is this: "I exorcise thee, unclean spirit, in the name of Jesus Christ. Tremble, O Satan, thou enemy of the faith, thou foe of mankind, who hast brought death into the world, who hast deprived men of life, and hast rebelled against justice; thou seducer of mankind, thou root of all evil, thou source of avarice, discord, and envy." The Romanists likewise exorcise houses and other places supposed to be haunted by unclean spirits; and the ceremony is much the same with that for a person possessed.

EXORDIUM. See SERMON.

EXPEDIENCY. Mr. Hume was the originator of a system of morals which made this the foundation and rule of moral obligation; and with him it was quite enough to stamp the rightness or wrongness of any action, if it could be shown that it was either useful or useless on the whole. Thus the jurisdiction of conscience was abolished, and morality was reduced to a matter of mere calculation of interest—of profit and loss. On this subject the celebrated Robert Hall well remarks, that, "by a strange inversion, the indirect influence of Christianity in promoting the temporal good of mankind is mistaken for its principal end; the skirts of her robe are confounded with her body, and the powers of the world to come, instead of raising our thoughts and contemplations from earth to heaven, from the creature to the Creator, are made subservient to the advancement of secular interests and passions. How far these sentiments accord with the dictates of inspiration the most unlettered Christian may easily decide."

EXPERIENCE, knowledge acquired by sensation, consciousness, or trial without a teacher. It consists in the ideas of things we have seen and felt, and which the judgment has reflected on, to form for itself a rule or method of proceeding for the future.

Christian experience is that knowledge of the nature and power of Christianity which is acquired by trial. Nothing is more common than to ridicule and despise what is called religious experience as mere enthusiasm. But if religion consist essentially in love to God and man, we would ask how it can possibly exist without experience? We are convinced of, and admit the propriety of the term, when applied to those branches of science which are not founded on speculation or conjecture, but on sensible trial. Why, then, should it be rejected, when applied to religion? It is evident, that however beautiful religion may be in theory, its excellency and energy are only truly known and displayed as experienced. A system believed, or a mind merely informed, will produce little good, except the heart be affected, and we feel its influence. To experience, then, the religion of Christ, we must not only be acquainted with its theory, but enjoy its power; tranquillizing the conscience, subduing our corruptions, animating our affections, and exciting us to duty. Hence the Scripture calls experience tasting, &c. Ps. xxxiv. 8.

That our experience is always absolutely pure in the present state, cannot be expected; but if it be genuine, it will not fail, through the exercise of Christian diligence, to become more and more pure. The main point, therefore, is to guard well against mistaking the illusions of the imagination for the operation of divine truth on the conscience and the heart. See AFFECTIONS.

The most valuable things are most apt to be counterfeited. But Christian experience may be considered as genuine—1. When it accords with the revelation of God's mind and will, or what he has revealed in his Word. Anything contrary to this, however pleasing, cannot be sound, or produced by divine agency. 2. When its tendency is to promote humility in us: that experience by which we learn our own weakness and to subdue pride, must be good. 3. When it teaches us to bear with others, and to do them good. 4. When it operates so as to excite us to be ardent in our devotion, and sincere in our regard to God. A powerful experience of the divine favour will lead us to acknowledge the same, and to manifest our gratitude both by constant praise and genuine piety.

Christian experience, however, may be abused. There are some good people who certainly have felt and enjoyed the power of religion, and yet have not always acted with prudence as to their experience. 1. Some boast of their experiences, or talk of them as if they were very extraordinary; whereas, were they acquainted with others, they would find it not so. That a man may make mention of his experience is no way improper, but often useful; but to hear persons always talking of themselves, seems to indicate a spirit of pride, and that their experience cannot be very deep. 2. Another abuse of experience is, dependence on it. We ought certainly to take encouragement from past circumstances, if we can; but if we are so dependent on past experience as to preclude present exertions, or always expect to have exactly the same assistance in every state, trial, or ordinance, we shall be disappointed. God has wisely ordered it, that though he never will leave his people, yet he will suspend or bestow comfort in his own time; for this very reason, that we may rely on him, and not on the circumstance or ordinance. 3. It is an abuse of experience, when introduced at improper times, and before improper persons. It is true, we ought never to be ashamed of our profession; but to be always talking to irreligious people respecting experience, which they know nothing of, is, as our Saviour says, casting pearls before swine.

EXPERIENCE MEETINGS are assemblies of religious persons, who meet for the purpose of relating their experience to each other. They are sometimes called covenant and conference meetings. It has been doubted by some whether these meetings are of any great utility; and whether they do not, in some measure, force people to say more than is true, and puff up those with pride who are able to communicate their ideas with facility. But to this it has been answered—1. That the abuse of a thing is no proof of the evil of it. 2. That the most eminent saints of old did not neglect this practice. Ps. lxi. 16; Mal. iii. 16. 3. That by a wise and prudent relation of experience, the Christian is led to see that others have participated of the same joys and sorrows with himself; he is incited to love and serve God; and animated to perseverance in duty, by finding that others, of like passions with himself, are zealous, active, and diligent. 4. That the Scriptures seem to enjoin the frequent intercourse of Christians, for the purpose of strengthening each other in religious services. Heb. x. 24, 25; Col. iii. 16; Matt. xviii. 20. See CONFERENCE.

EXPERIMENTAL RELIGION, the connecting link between doctrinal and practical religion. All experimental religion bears some relation to divine truth. If taken in the most general sense, for the exercise of spiritual or holy affections, truth, especially evangelical truth, from its interesting nature, when embraced in the spirit, is here the cause, and these exercises are its immediate effects. 1 Thess. ii. 13; Heb. iv. 12. Or if taken more particularly for that proof or trial which we have of divine things as we pass through the vicissitudes of life, it is still the truth respecting those divine things which is the object of our experience. Rom. v. 1-5; John xvi. 33; James i. 3, 12; 2 Cor. i. 5; Heb. xii. 7-11, x. 32-39. Nothing can be more obvious than that there are manifold truths taught us in the Scriptures, to which we give our assent, and in this sense may be said to know them; but we do not know them experimentally and thoroughly, till we have proved them true by having made the trial. Of this kind are those which relate to the corruption, weakness, and blindness of the human heart—the evil of sin—the preciousness of the Saviour—the faithfulness and mercy of God—the sweetness of his word—his all-sufficiency as our portion and happiness, and the like. See EXPERIENCE.

EXPIATION, a religious act by which satisfaction or atonement is made for some crime, the guilt removed, and the obligation to punishment cancelled. Lev. xvi. See ATONEMENT—PROPITIATION.

EXPOSITION, the name often applied to the practice of expounding a large portion of the Word of God in public. This is commonly termed, in Scotland, lecturing, and forms a very important department of the pulpit ministrations of a stated pastor. Expository discourses are felt to be peculiarly valuable as presenting a clear and most impressive view of the true meaning of Scripture, and storing the minds of the people with correct views both of doctrinal and practical religion.

EXTORTION, the act or practice of gaining or acquiring anything by force. Extortioners are included in the list of those who are excluded from the kingdom of heaven. 1 Cor. vi. 10.

EXTREME UNCTION, one of the sacraments of the Romish Church, the fifth in order, administered to people dangerously sick, by anointing them with holy oil, and praying over them. See UNCTION, EXTREME.

EYE, the organ of vision. Frequent allusions to the eye occur in the sacred Scriptures, both in the natural and spiritual sense.

Deprivation of sight was a very common punishment in the East. It was at first the practice to sear the eyes with a hot iron; but afterwards they were taken out with a sharp-pointed instrument. We find an instance of this punishment in Jer. lii. 11: "Then he put out the eyes of Zedekiah; and the King of Babylon bound him in chains, and carried him to Babylon, and put him in prison till the day of his death." Sometimes a criminal is deprived of sight by plastering some strong cement on the eyes which cannot be removed; at other times by sewing them up, by holding up a red-hot iron close before them, by piercing the pupils through with a sharp needle or the point of dagger, or by tearing them violently out of the sockets.

"Eastern females," says Dr Watson, "painted their eyes, or rather their eyelids. As large black eyes were thought the finest, the women, to increase their lustre, and to make them appear larger, tinged the corner of their eyelids with the impalpable powder of antimony or of black lead. This was supposed also to give the eyes a brilliancy and humidity, which rendered them either sparkling or languishing, as suited the various passions. The method of performing this among the women in the Eastern countries at the present day, as described by Russel, is by a cylindrical piece of silver or ivory, about two inches long, made very smooth, and about the size of a common probe; this is wet with water, and then dipped into a powder finely levigated, made from what appears to be a rich lead ore, and applied to the eye; the lids are closed upon it while it is drawn through between them. This blackens the inside, and leaves a narrow black rim all round the edge. That this was the method practised by the Hebrew women, we infer from Isa. iii. 22, where the prophet, in his enumeration of the articles which composed the toilets of the delicate and luxurious daughters of Zion, mentions 'the wimples and the crisping pins,' or bodkins for painting the eyes.

"This method of tinging the eyelids a jet black was imported into Egypt, and generally adopted by the inhabitants. The modern Persians continue the practice, strongly tinging their eye-lashes and eyelids with antimony.

"The passage, Ps. cxxiii. 2, derives a striking illustration from the customs of the East. Maundrell observes, that the servants in Turkey stand round their master and his guests in deep silence and perfect order, watching every motion. Pococke says, that in Egypt the master commands them by signs. De la Motraye says, that the Eastern ladies are waited on even at the least wink of the eye, or motion of the fingers, and that in a manner not perceptible to strangers."

The Prophet Isaiah (vi. 5), after describing his vision of the glory of the Lord, exclaims: "Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts." It is probable that there is here an allusion to a custom prevalent in some of the despotic kingdoms of the East, where, as Sir John Chardin tells us, whenever the sovereign shows himself, every one casts his eyes on the earth, and is not permitted to look on the king.

EZEKIEL, the son of Buzi, of the house of Aaron. He was one of the captives carried by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylon, along with Jehoiachin, king of Judah. The scene of his prophecies is mentioned as having been on the river Chebar, which flows into the Euphrates about two hundred miles to the north of Babylon. The following account both of Ezekiel and his prophecies, is given by Mr Horne in his 'Critical Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures:': "He commenced his prophetic ministry in the thirtieth year of his age, according to general accounts; or rather, as Calmet thinks, in the thirtieth year after the covenant was renewed with God in the reign of Josiah, which answers to the fifth year of Ezekiel's and Jehoiachin's captivity (Ezek. i. 1, xl. 1), the era whence he dates his predictions; and he continued to prophesy about twenty or twenty-one years. The events of his life, after his call to the prophetic office, are interwoven with the detail which he has himself given of his predictions; but the manner of its termination is nowhere ascertained. The Pseudo Epiphanius, in his lives of the prophets, says that he was put to death by the prince or commander of the Jews in the place of his exile, because this prince was addicted to idolatry, and could not bear the reproaches of the prophet. No reliance, however, can be placed on this account, which is intermixed with many fables. Jerome is of opinion that, as Ezekiel was in part contemporary with Jeremiah, who prophesied in Judea while Ezekiel delivered his predictions beyond the Euphrates, their prophecies were interchanged, for the consolation and encouragement of the captive Jews. There is, indeed, a striking agreement between the subject-matter of their respective prophecies; but Ezekiel is more vehement than Jeremiah in reproving the sins of his countrymen, and abounds more in visions, which render some passages of his book exceedingly difficult to be understood. On this account, no Jew was anciently permitted to read the writings of this prophet, until he had completed his thirtieth year.

"The prophecies of Ezekiel have always been acknowledged to be canonical, nor was it ever disputed that he was their author. Yet the Jews say that the sanhedrim deliberated for a long time whether his book should form a part of the sacred canon. They objected to the great obscurity at the beginning and end of his prophecy; and to what he says in chap. xviii. 20, that the son should not bear the iniquity of his father, which, they urged, was contrary to Moses, who says (Exod. xx. 5), that God visits the 'sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation.' But it is worthy of remark, that Moses himself (Deut. xxiv. 16) says the very same thing as Ezekiel.

"Josephus ascribes to this prophet two books concerning the Babylonian captivity; and says, that, having foretold the ruin of the temple, and that Zedekiah should not see Babylon, he sent this writing to Jerusalem. But these circumstances are not recorded in the predictions now extant, nor have we any means of ascertaining what foundation Josephus had for his assertion. Most commentators are of opinion that the Jewish historian divided the prophecy we now have into two books, and that he took that part of the prophecy which contains a description of the temple (xli.-xlviii.), for a distinct book, because it treats on a subject wholly different from the topics discussed in the former part of his writings.

"The chief design of Ezekiel's prophecies is to comfort his brethren in captivity, who deplored their having too lightly credited the promises of Jeremiah, who had exhorted them speedily to submit to the Chaldees, on account of the approaching ruin of Jerusalem. As these captives saw no appearance of the fulfilment of Jeremiah's predictions, God raised up Ezekiel to confirm them in the faith, and to support by new prophecies those which Jeremiah had long before published, and even then continued to announce in Judea. In pursuance of this design, Ezekiel predicts the dreadful calamities which soon after were inflicted upon Judea and Jerusalem, on account of the idolatry, impiety, and profligacy of their inhabitants; the divine judgments that would be executed on the false prophets and prophetesses, who deluded and hardened the Jews in their rebellion against God; the punishments that awaited the Ammonites, Edomites, and Philistines, for their hatred of the Jews, and insulting them in their distress; the destruction of Tyre; the conquest of Egypt; the future restoration of Israel and Judah from their several dispersions; and their ultimately happy state after the advent and under the government of the Messiah."

EZION-GEBER. The name of one of the encampments of the Israelites, and mentioned along with Elath, in Deut. ii. 8. It is supposed to have been situated on the northern point of the eastern, or Elantic arm of the Red Sea, and to correspond to the modern El-akaba. From this place Solomon sent ships to Ophir, and here he built his vessels. 1 Kings ix. 26. See ELATH.

EZRA, the son of Seraiah, a priest descended from Aaron. When he had returned from the captivity in Babylon, he was appointed by Artaxerxes to be governor of Judea. He set himself, accordingly, to rearrange the polity of the Jews; and to him is attributed the formation of the complete canon of the Old Testament Scriptures, which he wrote out in the Chaldean character, the language then in use among the Jews. Ezra is said to have died in Jerusalem at the very advanced age of nearly one hundred and twenty years; but the modern Jews allege that he died in Persia, where his tomb is still pointed out at Zamuza. He is held in very high estimation among the Jews, being regarded as almost on a level with Moses.

EZRA, BOOK OF. The Jews and most Christian commentators ascribe the whole of this book to Ezra. It is written in Chaldee from the eighth verse of the fourth chapter, to the twenty-seventh verse of the seventh chapter. It contains the history of the Jews from the time of the edict issued by Cyrus to the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus—a period of seventy-nine, or, according to some chronologers, of one hundred years. This book consists of two principal divisions: the first contains a narrative of the return of the Jews from Babylon under the conduct of Zerubbabel; and the second gives an account of the reformation of religion under Ezra.

F.

FABLE, a fiction. The most ancient fable or apologue is that of Jotham. Judg. ix. 7–15. The general design of such fables is to convey some very important truth. But the Apostle Paul in his epistles to Timothy and Titus, exhorts them to shun profane and old wives' fables; referring to those vain traditions which the Jews held in such high estimation, and which our Lord declares made "void the commandment of God." The great reservoir of Jewish tradition is the books of the Jewish Talmud. Of these there are two, the one called the Babylonish, the other the Jewish Talmud. See PARABLE.

FACE. We frequently read in Scripture of the expression "the face of God," implying every thing by which God makes himself known. At first, man was admitted to a direct perception of God; and after the fall we are told, Gen. iii. 8, "And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden." The word presence in this passage is in the original face. Moses asks of God to show him his glory. Jehovah replies, "I will cause all my goodness to pass before thee;" "but," he adds, "my face thou canst not see, for there shall no man see it and live." In accordance with this we are elsewhere taught, "No man hath seen God at any time." Hence the idea has been generally entertained by theologians that Jehovah the Father hath never appeared to man, but that all the appearances which are mentioned in Scripture have been of Jehovah the Son. When God is said to speak "face to face," as in Deut. v. 4, the expression is meant to denote a near and clear manifestation of himself. When he extends favour to any one, he is sometimes said to "lift up the light of his countenance," or face. And when he is angry, he is said to "hide his face."

FAIL, to grow weak and inefficient, to fall short, to cease, to perish. Gen. xlvii. 16; Ps. cxlii. 4. God doth not fail, nor forsake his people; he always directs, supports, and protects them. Josh. i. 5. Promises would fail, if they were not accomplished to their full extent. Josh. xxi. 45. Men's hearts or spirits fail, when they are exceedingly grieved, discouraged, and filled with fear. Ps. xl. 12, lxxiii. 26.

FAINT, (1.) To lose vigour, courage, activity, and hope, by reason of hunger, thirst, fear, toil, distress. Ps. xxvii. 13; Gal. vi. 9. (2.) To long with such earnestness, that one is exhausted by the energy of his desires. Ps. lxxxiv. 2. My soul fainteth for thy salvation; I desire it so intensely, that I sink under the delay of it. Ps. cxix. 81.

FAIR, beautiful, lovely. Christ is fairer than the children of men. In his divine nature he is infinitely lovely; in his human he is transcendently so, it being that holy thing; and in his whole office, relations, appearance, and works, he is unspeakably glorious, and in him the perfections of God shine with unmatched lustre and brightness. The Hebrew word is of a double form, to mark the astonishing degree of his loveliness. Ps. xlv. 2. A high value was set by Eastern ladies on the fairness of their complexions. To this notion we find Abraham referring, in addressing Sarah: "And it came to pass, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he said unto Sarai his wife, Behold now, I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon: therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife: and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive. Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister: that it may be well with me for thy sake; and my soul shall live because of thee." Gen. xii. 11–13. Roberts observes, in reference to the daughters of Job being very fair: "The word fair may sometimes refer to the form of the features as well as the colour of the skin; but great value is attached to a woman of a light complexion. Hence our English females are greatly admired in the East, and instances have occurred where great exertions have been made to gain the hand of a fair daughter of Britain. The acmé of perfection in a Hindu lady is to be of the colour of gold."

FAIR HAVENS (Acts xxvii. 8) is called by Stephen, the geographer, "the fair shore." It was probably an open kind of road, not so much a port as a bay, which did not afford more than good anchorage for a time, on the south-east part of Crete. Jerome and others speak of it as a town on the open shore.

FAITH. In the article BELIEF (which see), it was shown that there is a foundation laid in the human constitution for the exercise of this principle, the foundation being laid deep in the primary laws of thought, or self-consciousness, the reason not of an individual man, but of humanity. The difference, then, between faith, in a theological sense, and the abstract principle of belief, of which we have already treated, lies, not in the mental act, which in both cases is the same, but in the object. Faith, as a religious principle, has a reference to religious and moral objects; it gives credit to statements, not because they are seen and felt to be true by the human mind, but because they are declared to be true, on the testimony of God himself. "Faith," says the Apostle Paul, "is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." We realize the things hoped for, because they are promised by God; we realize things which we see not, because they are revealed to us by God. Believers, accordingly, are said to "walk by faith, not by sight." And, in doing so, they cannot possibly be charged with presumption. They are believing, not without a warrant, nor even on an insufficient warrant, which might be justly termed presumption, but they are believing on the highest, the best, the most sufficient of all warrants, the testimony of Jehovah. Exercising such a faith, the Israelites passed safely through the Red Sea, which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned. As long as the Israelites had faith in the promise of God, they were safe and successful; but when they lost sight of the divine promise, their courage failed them, and they became an easy prey to their numerous and powerful enemies. Faith in God, then, is the belief of the divine testimony.

The term faith, however, is more frequently used in Scripture in connection with the Lord Jesus Christ as its object. Thus to the Philippian jailer it was declared by Paul and Silas, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," that is, rely on him exclusively for salvation. He is the surety of his people, "who hath appeared once to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." He is the Head and Representative of his people, who died that they might not perish, but might have eternal life. And it is by faith that the Christian realizes his vital union with Christ, feeling that he died in Christ's death, rose in his resurrection, and shall reign with him as a king and a priest for ever. The object, then, of justifying faith is Christ crucified as the substitute of sinners. And yet if we do not discover such a connection established by God between the expiation for sin and the pardon proclaimed in consequence, as to put confidence in the one as much as in the other, we do not truly believe in Jesus as the atonement for the sins of the world. Again, if acquittal at the bar of the Almighty is not believed, on the authority of God, to follow the imputation of the perfect obedience of Christ to us, how can we pretend to declare our belief in Christ as the end of the law for righteousness? To trust the faithfulness of God, therefore, as pledged to fulfil what he has promised, must form an essential part of saving faith. The nature of the object in which our belief is required is not more necessary to be known than is the security of the foundation on which our belief rests. And indeed no man can believe, in any sense, in Christ as his righteousness, without a realizing certainty that his justification is secure. So intimately connected is this righteousness with all that is interesting or important to him either in time or eternity, that if he knows and believes at all in Christ as his hope, he cannot fail to place a habitual trust in the divine promise which hath connected atonement with pardon and imputed righteousness with justification; we say, a habitual trust, for true faith is not a shadowy, evanescent feeling, but a living and ever-growing principle. Every moment we exercise faith in the all-meritorious righteousness and propitiatory sacrifice of Christ as the sole ground of hope, the spiritual discernment of its truth becomes more acute, the spiritual feeling of its importance more vivid, and the whole man more submissive to its influence. Moralists have talked much of a ruling principle or rather passion in the soul, which imparts a peculiar unity to the character of individuals. Now, faith in Christ is the ruling principle prompting to love, which is the ruling passion in the heart of the Christian. If we habitually repose confidence in Christ as the Lord our righteousness, we enjoy a peace which the world knoweth nothing of, which it can neither give nor take away. We are no longer influenced by the "spirit of bondage again to fear, but we have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." Actuated by a principle of faith, and invested in the righteousness of Christ, it will be our desire to walk in him, cultivating holiness in heart and life. Thus will our faith be manifested by our works; and walking with Christ upon the earth it will be every day more and more apparent that the life which we live in the flesh is by the faith of the Son of God. Sanctification is inseparable from justification. Let no man, therefore, flatter himself that he has obtained a title to heaven's blessedness, if he is not striving and praying to attain a growing assimilation to heaven's purity. Without an inherent as well as an imputed righteousness, we cannot enter the kingdom of God, for it is plainly declared by the word of Him who cannot lie, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

From all this it is plain that faith in Christ is not a mere assent of the mind to certain truths, but a cordial reception of Christ in all his fulness and in all his freeness. And this is not a natural act of the mind, but "it is the Spirit that worketh in us the work of faith with power." And further, it must be borne in mind that all the efficacy of faith in justifying the sinner is derived from its object, the atonement and the righteousness of the Lord Jesus. But how is it that we can obtain faith? Can we produce it by any inherent energy or by any effort of our own? No: faith is the gift of God. Now it is here that many stumble. Since without faith there cannot be salvation, and since faith is not in our power, but is the gift of God, if we miss salvation, the blame, they allege, is not ours, but His who did not confer upon us the gift of faith. The simple reply to such an objection is, that God hath appointed means through the use of which he communicates the gift. One of these is prayer. "Lord, increase our faith," "help our unbelief!" The Word is another mean through which the gift of faith is conveyed. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." The Christian ministry is also instrumental in imparting faith. Hence Paul asks, "Who is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?" "Before then," as it has been well remarked, "we can justly complain that we have not faith, because the free gift has not been bestowed upon us, we must be able to say, that we have diligently used all the appointed means for obtaining it,—that we have continued instant in prayer for it,—that we have read and received with meekness the Word of God,—that we have attended regularly and devoutly on the ministry of the Word,—that we have heard gladly the Word preached, and that we have taken good heed to what we have heard, hiding it in our hearts that we might grow thereby. But none who do these things will ever complain that the gift of faith has been denied to them. Those who thus seek, shall find. Those who thus wait upon the Lord, shall both receive strength and renew their strength. They shall grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. And knowing him, they cannot fail to believe in him.

"There is another mistake which some fall into on this subject. The Scriptures insist so much on the necessity of having faith, that not a few are disposed to ascribe to faith the merit of our salvation. They consider salvation as obtained, not merely through faith, but on account of it. They regard faith as the procuring cause of our acceptance with God. From being an agent, they raise it to a principal. From being an instrument, they exalt it to a cause. Now, faith is valuable only as it unites us to Christ, in whom alone is salvation. It is through faith's instrumentality, but not on account of faith's intrinsic worth, that we are saved. Faith is a saving grace just because it connects us with the Saviour; apart from him it cannot save. The hand which the man fainting from hunger puts forth for the bread which is set before him, is, without all doubt, very valuable, yet no one would say that it was the hand, but the bread, which nourished and strengthened him. In like manner, our salvation is owing, not to our faith, but to the righteousness of Christ, which, however, our faith apprehends and appropriates.

"From all this the necessity of having faith in Christ is still manifest. Though faith is not the ground of our salvation, yet, inasmuch as it is faith by which we are united to the Saviour, it is evident that without faith we cannot be saved."

FAITH, ARTICLES OF. See ARTICLES.

FAITH, CONFESSION OF. See CONFESSION.

FAITHFUL, an appellation given in Scripture to professing Christians—to all who had been baptized in token of the obedience of faith; and it is used to this day in that application in ecclesiastical language. See 1 Cor. iv. 17; Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 9; 1 Pet. v. 12; Acts xvi. 1, 15; 2 Cor. vi. 15; 1 Tim. v. 16, and many other passages.

FAITHFULNESS. See FIDELITY.

FAITHFULNESS, MINISTERIAL. See PASTOR.

FAITHFULNESS OF GOD is that perfection of his nature whereby he infallibly fulfils his designs, or performs his word.—1. It appears, says Dr. Gill, in the performance of what he has said with respect to the world in general—that it shall not be destroyed by a flood, as it once was, and for a token of it he has set his bow in the clouds—that the ordinances of heaven should keep their due course, which they have done for almost six thousand years, exactly and punctually—that all his creatures should be supported and provided for, and the elements all made subservient to that end, which we find to be so according to his sovereign pleasure. Gen. ix. 1–17.; Isa. liv. 9; Ps. cxlv.; Deut. xi. 14, 15; 2 Pet. iii.

2. It appears in the fulfilment of what he has said with respect to Christ. Whoever will carefully compare the predictions of the birth, poverty, life, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, with the accomplishment of the same, will find a striking demonstration of the faithfulness of God.

3. It appears in the performance of the promises which he has made to his people. In respect to temporal blessings (1 Tim. iv. 8; Ps. lxxxiv. 11; Isa. xxxiii. 16); to spiritual (1 Cor. i. 9); in supporting them in temptation (1 Cor. x. 13); encouraging them under persecution (1 Pet. iv. 12, 13; Isa. xli. 10); sanctifying afflictions (Heb. xii. 4–11); directing them in difficulties (1 Thess. v. 24); enabling them to persevere (Jer. xxxi. 40); bringing them to glory. (1 John ii. 25.)

4. It appears in the fulfilling of his threatenings. The curse came upon Adam according as it was threatened. He fulfilled his threatening to the old world in destroying it. He declared that the Israelites should be subject to his awful displeasure, if they walked not in his ways; it was accordingly fulfilled. Deut. xxviii. 15–68. See IMMUTABILITY.

FALL OF MAN, the loss of those perfections and that happiness which his Maker bestowed on him at his creation, through transgression of a positive command, given for the trial of man's obedience, and as a token of his holding every thing of God, as Lord paramount of the creation, with the use of every thing in it, exclusive of the fruit of one tree. This positive law he broke by eating the forbidden fruit; first the woman, then the man: and thus, the condition or law of the covenant being broken, the covenant itself was broken. The woman was enticed by an evil spirit under the semblance of a serpent, as appears from its reasoning the woman into the transgression of the law, of which a brute beast is incapable. Hence the evil genius is called a murderer and a liar from the beginning, John viii. 44; 1 John iii. 8; the old serpent, Rev. xii. 9, xx. 2. Moses relates this history, from what appeared externally to sense, both, therefore, are to be conjoined, the serpent as the instrument, and the devil as the primary cause. Man suffered himself to be seduced by perverse and confused notions of good and evil, prompted by a desire of a greater degree of perfection, and swayed by his sensual appetite in contradiction to his reason. Gen. iii. 6. And thus it appears possible, that, notwithstanding the divine image with which man was adorned, he might fall; for, though including in it knowledge, it did not exclude from it confused notions, which are those arising from sense and imagination, especially when off our guard and inattentive, blindly following the present impression. From this one sin arose another, and then another, from the connection of causes and effects, till this repetition brought on a habit of sin, consequently a state of moral slavery, called by divines a death in sin, a spiritual death, a defect of power to act according to the law, and from the motive of the divine perfections, as death in general is such a defect of power of action; and this defect or inability, with all its consequences, man entailed on his posterity, till Jesus Christ remove it, and reinstate them in all they forfeited in Adam.

Infidels, it is true, have treated the account of the fall and its effects with contempt, and considered the whole as absurd; but their objections to the manner have been ably answered by a variety of authors; and as to the effects, one would hardly think anybody could deny them.

For that man is a fallen creature is evident, if we consider his misery as an inhabitant of the natural world;—the disorders of the globe we inhabit, and the dreadful scourges with which it is visited; the circumstances in which we enter the world at birth; the painful and dangerous travail of women; our natural helplessness, ignorance, and sinfulness; the gross darkness in which we naturally are, both with respect to God and a future state; the general rebellion of the brute creation against us; the various poisons that lurk in the animal, vegetable, and mineral world, ready to destroy us; the heavy curse of toil and sweat to which we are liable; the innumerable calamities of life, and the pangs of death. The fact that man himself is fallen, is clearly proved by the wretchedness amid which he lives, and of which he so largely participates. The whole world is out of joint. All creation is groaning and travailing in pain, and man himself is obviously suffering the infliction of the penalty of some great moral delinquency with which he is chargeable. This is only explained by the fact that man is a fallen being.

Again, it is evident, if we consider him as a citizen of the moral world—his commission of sin, his omission of duty, the triumph of sensual appetites over his intellectual faculties, the corruption of the powers that constitute a good head—the understanding, imagination, memory, and reason; the depravity of the powers which form a good heart—the will, conscience, and affections; his manifest alienation from God; his amazing disregard even of his nearest relatives; his unaccountable unconcern about himself; his detestable tempers; the general outbreaking of human corruption in all individuals; the universal overflowing of it in all nations. Some striking proofs of this depravity may be seen, in the general propensity of mankind to vain, irrational, or cruel diversions; in the universality of the most ridiculous, impious, inhuman, and diabolical sins; in the aggravating circumstances attending the display of this corruption; in the many ineffectual endeavours to stem its torrent; in the obstinate resistance it makes to divine grace in the unconverted; the amazing struggles of good men with it; the testimony of the Heathens concerning it; and the preposterous conceit which the unconverted have of their own goodness. See DEPRIVITY, HUMAN.

FALLOW-DEER. This animal, which is mentioned in Deut. xiv. 5; 1 Kings iv. 23, was originally a native of Barbary, where it is still found wild. It is found very generally dispersed over Western and Southern Asia. It is smaller than the stag, having horns or branches serrated on the inside, which it sheds annually. The colour in winter is a darkish-brown, but in summer bay, spotted with white.

FALSE CHRISTS. See MESSIAH.

FALSEHOOD, untruth, deceit. See LYING.

FAME sometimes signifies common talk, public report (Gen. xlv. 16), but ordinarily it means a widely-spread report of one's excellence and of glorious deeds. Zeph. iii. 19. See REPUTATION.

FAMILIARS OF THE INQUISITION, persons who assist in apprehending such as are accused, and carrying them to prison. They are assistants to the inquisitor, and called familiars because they belong to his family. In some provinces of Italy they are called cross-bearers; and in others, the scholars of St. Peter the Martyr; and wear a cross before them on the outside garment. They are properly bailiffs of the Inquisition; and the vile office is esteemed so honourable, that noblemen in the kingdom of Portugal have been ambitious of belonging to it. Nor is this surprising, when it is considered that Innocent III. granted very large indulgences and privileges to these familiars; and that the same plenary indulgence is granted by the Pope to every single exercise of this office, as was granted by the Lateran Council to those who succoured the Holy Land. When several persons are to be taken up at the same time, these familiars are commanded so to order matters that they may know nothing of one another's being apprehended; and it is related, that a father and his three sons and three daughters, who lived together in the same house, were carried prisoners to the Inquisition, without knowing anything of one another's being there till seven years afterwards, when they that were alive were released by an act of grace. See INQUISITION.

FAMILY ARRANGEMENT, THE. On this subject we cannot refrain from quoting the following admirable remarks by the Rev. Dr. Buchanan, one of the professors of theology, New College, Edinburgh: "The family arrangement is a divine institution. It is not a creation of human policy, nor a result of human contrivance, but the wise and well-ordered product of divine wisdom and benevolence; and, indeed, it is one of the most admirable of God's arrangements. His wisdom is not more displayed in the construction of an individual man, than in the construction of the social system, in which every such individual is placed. God has chosen that the whole race should be divided into so many little communities, each of which is under the superintendence and government of its natural head, and all its members bound together by the ties of natural sympathy and affection. For this end, he has so arranged the economy of his providence, that men are brought into the world in a state of absolute helplessness—the helplessness of infancy; and that from their earliest years, they are placed in a state of entire dependence on their parents, and of absolute subjection to their authority. They are not created in a condition of solitary independence, but born in certain social relations, which make their very birth a bond of mutual interest and endearment, and provide for them a company of friends and protectors on their first entrance into the world.

"The parent is invested with absolute authority; but that this authority might be tempered in its exercise with mercy and compassion, and that power so despotic might not degenerate into tyranny, God has implanted in every parent's heart a love for his offspring, insomuch that, although previously he may have neither felt nor shown any peculiar liking for children, yet no sooner is his child born, than the instinct comes into play, and his heart yearns over the little one with a new and hitherto unknown tenderness. This parental affection is perfectly disinterested, being irrespective of all personal profit or advantage, and contemplating only the comfort and welfare of its objects; and it is not only so disinterested, but so strong and self-denied, that it prompts the parent to subject himself to many hardships and privations in the upbringing of his children, which nothing else except a strong natural affection would prompt him to undergo. But for this natural instinct, the family arrangement could not serve the beneficent purposes for which it was designed.

"These purposes are, to draw forth into exercise, and, by exercising, to develop and strengthen, the moral and social affections of infant humanity—to bring children from their earliest infancy under a course of training—to form in them habits of subjection to authority—of submission to a superior will—of order, and regularity, and self-denial in their daily conduct; and thus to prepare them, as it were in a private nursery, for the intercourse, and business, and duties of manhood;—these, in reference to the present and visible world, but far more in reference to the world invisible and eternal; to secure for them, from their earliest infancy, the benefit of a father's counsel and a father's care; to teach them betimes the lessons of piety, commended with persuasive power by the lips of a parent, whom God would have to be at once a master and a priest in his own house; and to give them, by the type of an earthly father, some idea of the character in which he himself best loves to be known, even as their Father in heaven!

"The institution of families seems to be one of God's chief ordinances for the education of the world. Even did the children of a family receive no set lessons, they are so placed by a wise Providence, that they cannot fail to derive from their connections a large amount of useful information. They pick it up, day by day, from the conversation and example of those who are older and more experienced than themselves; and all the advantages which they derive from the intimate and familiar intercourse of domestic life, must be ascribed to that wise arrangement by which one generation of human beings is linked to another—so linked, that the current experience and knowledge of the world are transmitted imperceptibly, and almost without an effort, from sire to son continually.

"Here, then, is the whole human race divided, as it were, into myriads of little communities, each with its own natural head and protector, to whom, by a powerful instinct, every child looks up with reverence, and from whom he hears without quarrel, and believes without hesitation, the instructions that are given, at a period when he is neither qualified to discover the truth for himself, nor to appreciate the grounds of evidence on which it rests.

"Were we asked to survey the social system, and to name that part of it which most strikingly illustrates the wisdom and benevolence of God—which is the most widely beneficial in its results, the most essential to the comfort and happiness of society, the best guarantee of social order and advancement; we should (notwithstanding the difficulty of making a selection, where all is so wise and perfect) point to the family arrangement. That admirable device of Omniscient Wisdom, whereby the wants of infant humanity are provided for—a practical education in part secured—the exercise and consequent expansion of the affections promoted; that arrangement whereby each of us was taught a fellow-feeling with our kind, and united with society and formed to a fitness for it, ere yet we had learned to speak or walk; that arrangement which leaves no man a solitary recluse, but binds up all nations and kindreds in little domestic monarchies, cemented by strong natural affections, and governed by paternal authority alone; that arrangement which, by conferring power on the parent, and teaching the children subjection from their earliest years, makes every house a school of early training for public life; that family arrangement, we regard as one of the master-pieces of Divine Wisdom. Destroy it, or break down the barriers by which its integrity is as yet preserved, and you will do more to demoralize, and ultimately to disturb society, than could be effected by any other supposable means. No anarchy would be so dreadful—no devastation so universally ruinous, as that which must spring from the disruption or decay of these domestic societies: and valuable as many of our social institutions are—our schools, our colleges, our senates, our municipal and civil institutions—none of them all can bear comparison, in point of practical utility, with the simple and unostentatious arrangement of Providence, by which we are united together in families.

"Hence God takes one of his chosen titles. He is 'The God of families'—'of all the families of the earth.' As such he should be acknowledged, not by individuals merely, but by families in their collective capacity. Every head of a family should be God's priest in his own house, as well as the instructor and pattern of his children: and kneeling down with his children around him, should offer up daily thanks for family mercies, and spread out all the family wants at God's footstool. O if that family be peaceful which is knit together by strong natural affection, how much is its peace hallowed and confirmed, when natural affection is strengthened and purified by the benign influence of religion! And how consoling to a parent's mind must the reflection be, that, although he may and must be soon removed from among his children on earth, he has committed them as a family into the hands of his and their Father in heaven!

"The family institute being a chief means of the world's education, the question arises, Ought religion to be made an exception to that general rule which prescribes the duty of a parent to instruct his children? If so many civil and secular advantages flow from the family arrangement, in consequence of the means thereby afforded for the diffusion of common knowledge amongst mankind, shall we suppose that God had no respect, in this remarkable arrangement, to the diffusion of religious and moral instruction? On the supposition that there is a God, and that man is capable of religion, this exception cannot, on any ground, whether of reason or of expediency, be for one instant admitted; for this were virtually to affirm, that God has less regard for the diffusion of knowledge in proportion as the subject to which it relates is important to mankind. In the Bible, God declares that the very end for which the family arrangement was devised and established, was, that by means of it, religion might be maintained in the world, and transmitted from father to son for ever. 'Did not God make one? Yet had he the residue of the Spirit. And wherefore one? That he might seek a godly seed.' Mal. ii. 15. It was, then, with a view to raise up a godly seed that the family arrangement was formed; and as this can only be secured by the religious instruction of youth, it follows that the teaching of religious truth is the first duty of parents—a duty so fundamental, that it rests on the very end for which marriage was ordained."

FAMILY OF LOVE, or FAMILISTS. See LOVE.

FAMILY PRAYER. See PRAYER.

FAMINE. Scripture records several famines in Palestine, and the neighbouring countries. Gen. xii. 10, xxvi. 1. The most remarkable one was that of seven years in Egypt, while Joseph was governor. It was distinguished for continuance, extent, and severity; particularly as Egypt is one of the countries least subjected to such a calamity, by reason of its general fertility.

Famine is sometimes a natural effect, as when the Nile does not overflow in Egypt, or rains do not fall in Judea, at the customary seasons—spring and autumn; or when caterpillars, locusts, or other insects, destroy the fruits. The Prophet Joel notices these last causes of famine. He compares locusts to a numerous and terrible army ravaging the land. Joel i. Famine was sometimes an effect of God's anger. 2 Kings viii. 1. The prophets frequently threaten Israel with the sword and famine, or with war and famine, evils that generally go together. Amos (viii. 11) threatens another sort of famine: "I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord."

FAN, an instrument used in the East for winnowing corn. Fans are of two kinds—one resembling a shovel, with which they throw up the corn to the wind, that the chaff may be blown away; the other is formed to produce wind when the air is calm.

An allusion to this instrument is found in Matt. iii.

12, to illustrate our Lord's discriminating character as a preacher and as a judge.

The fan or winnowing-shovel is usually a light wooden frame about a yard in diameter, wrought with hair or palm-leaves. Its shape is generally semi-oval, and it is held at the rounded end by the person, who tosses up with it the grain in a current of air which wafts away the chaff. The fan is not only used by farmers in the East to waft away the chaff from the corn, but by women every morning, who by this means separate the husks from the rice they prepare for the daily consumption of their families.

FANATICS. The ancients called those fanatici who passed their time in temples (fana), and being often seized with a kind of enthusiasm, as if inspired by the divinity, burst into wild and antic gestures, cutting and slashing their arms with knives, shaking the head, &c. The word is now applied to enthusiasts generally, and often unjustly to the zealous and devout.

FAR. God is far from the wicked; he has no friendship with them, is perpetually angry with, and is averse to deliver them. Prov. xv. 29. He is far from their reins; he is not seriously and affectionately thought of, esteemed, loved, or desired by them. Jer. xii. 2. He seems far from his own people, when he appears angry with them, hides the comforting views of his countenance, and continues to deny them assistance or relief. Ps. xxii. 1, x. 1. He removes our transgressions far from us, when he fully and finally forgives them, that they can never come into judgment against us. Ps. ciii. 12. He set the Jewish temple far from them, when he permitted the Chaldeans to carry them captives into Babylon, a place about six hundred miles east of Jerusalem. Ezek. vii. 20.

FARM. The word rendered "farm" in Matthew xxii. 5, and "field" in Matthew xiii. 24, may be understood as meaning farms, villages, or hamlets in the country.

FARTHING, a piece of brass money used by the Romans. Our translators give this English to both assarion and quadrans; but these were different. The assarion was the tenth part of a Roman penny, or about three farthings sterling. Matt. x. 29. The quadrans was equal to two mites, and so is about the fifth part of an English farthing. Mark xii. 42.

FASHION, a pattern or form. Exod. xxvi. 30. To fashion a thing, is to give it being or form. Job x. 8; Exod. xxxii. 4. To fashion one's self according to former lusts, is to live under their power, and to act according to their sinful inclinations and motions. 1 Pet. i. 14.

FASTING, abstinence from food. Religious fasting consists—1. "In abstinence from every animal indulgence, and from food, as far as health and circumstances will permit. 2. In the humble confession of our sins to God, with contrition or sorrow for them. 3. An earnest deprecation of God's displeasure, and humble supplication that he would avert his judgments. 4. An intercession with God for such spiritual and temporal blessings upon ourselves and others as are needful." It does not appear that our Saviour instituted any particular fast, but left it optional. Any state of calamity and sorrow, however, naturally suggests this.

The propriety of it may appear—1. From many examples recorded in Scripture. 2. By plain and undeniable inferences from Scripture. Matt. vi. 16. 3. From divine commands given on some occasions, though there are no commands which prescribe it as a constant duty. 4. It may be argued from its utility. The ends or uses of it are these:—1. A natural expression of our sorrow. 2. A help to devotional exercises. 3. Keeping the body in subjection. 4. It may be rendered subservient to charity.

How far or how long a person should abstain from food depends on circumstances. The great end to be kept in view is, humiliation for, and abstinence from sin. "If," says Marshall, "abstinence divert our minds, by reason of a gnawing appetite, then you had better eat sparingly, as Daniel in his greatest fast." Dan. x. 2, 3. They, however, who in times of public distress, when the judgments of God are in the earth, and when his providence seems to call for humiliation, will not relinquish any of their sensual enjoyments, nor deny themselves in the least, cannot be justified; since good men in all ages, more or less, have humbled themselves on such occasions; and reason, as well as Scripture, evidently proves it to be our duty.

"Although the first Christians," says Dr Neander, "did not by any means retire from the business of life, yet they were accustomed to devote many separate days entirely to examining their own hearts, and pouring them out before God, while they dedicated their life anew to him with uninterrupted prayers, in order that they might again return to their ordinary occupations with a renovated spirit of zeal and seriousness, and with renewed powers of sanctification. Those days of holy devotion, days of prayer and penitence, which individual Christians appointed for themselves, according to their individual necessities, were often a kind of fast-days. In order that their sensual feelings might less distract and impede the occupation of their heart with its holy contemplations, they were accustomed on those days to limit their corporeal wants more than usual, or to fast entirely. In the consideration of this, we must not overlook the peculiar nature of that hot climate in which Christianity was first promulgated. That which was spared by their abstinence on those days was applied to the support of the poorer brethren." Matt. ix. 15; 1 Cor. vii. 5. See ROGATION—LENT.

FAT. God forbade the Hebrews to eat the fat of beasts offered in sacrifice: "All the fat is the Lord's. it shall be a perpetual statute for your generations, throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood." Lev. iii. 17.

It must be observed, that the kind of fat, or that which is commonly called tallow, which was to be burnt upon the altar, was among the unclean parts which the Jews were forbidden to eat; but they were allowed to eat all the rest of the fat. The two kinds of fat are distinguished by Rabbi Bechai—one as being separate from the flesh, and not covered as by a rind; the other as not separate from the flesh, but intermingled with it. The separate fat is cold and moist, and has something thick and gross, which is ill digested in the stomach; but the fat which is united with the flesh is warm and moist. The latter every one was at liberty to eat; but any person who should eat the former was to be cut off from among the people.

In the Hebrew style, fat signifies not only that of beasts, but also the richer or prime part of other things: "He should have fed them with the finest" (in Hebrew, the fat) "of the wheat." Fat denotes abundance of good things: "I will satiate the soul of the priests with fatness." Jer. xxxi. 14. "My soul shall be satisfied with marrow and fatness." Ps lxiii. 5. The fat of the earth implies its fruitfulness; "God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine." Gen. xxvii. 28.

FATE (fatum) denotes an inevitable necessity depending upon a superior cause. The word is derived a fando, "from speaking," and primarily implies the same with effatum, viz., a word or decree pronounced by God, or a fixed sentence, whereby the Deity has prescribed the order of things, and allotted to every person what shall befall him. The Greeks called it eimarmenē, as it were a chain or necessary series of things indissolubly linked together. See PROVIDENCE—NECESSITY.

FATHER. This word occurs frequently in Sacred Scripture, and has on many occasions a far wider signification than that which is usually attached to the word in ordinary language, implying grandfather, great-grandfather, and even ancestor generally. Thus the Jews called Abraham their father, that is, they claimed to be directly descended from him. The term father is also used in the Bible to denote teacher; thus Jabal was the "father of such as dwell in tents, and such as have cattle;" and Jubal was "father of all such as handle the harp and organ." In the sense of origin or first example, Abraham is spoken of as the "father of the faithful," the "father of many nations." See ADOPTION—ABBA.

FATHERS, a term employed to signify the earliest and most ancient writers of the Christian Church. The writers of the first century, as being contemporaries of the apostles, are called apostolical fathers; those who flourished before the Council of Nice A.D. 325, receive the name of Ante-Nicene, while those who lived posterior to that Council are styled Post-Nicene fathers. Those who wrote chiefly in the Greek language, as Chrysostom, Basil, &c., are named Greek fathers, while those who wrote chiefly in Latin are named Latin fathers. No author who wrote after the twelfth century is dignified with the title of Father.

"Some suppose," says Buck, "that the study of the fathers is barren and unimproving; that though there are some excellent things interspersed in their writings, yet the instruction to be derived from them will hardly repay the toil of breaking up the ground; that a lifetime would hardly suffice to read them with care, and digest them completely. Others have such an high opinion of the fathers, as to be almost afraid of interpreting Scripture against their decision. They suppose, that as some of them were companions, disciples, or successively followers of the apostles, it is highly probable that they must have been well informed, that their sentiments must be strongly illustrative of the doctrines of the New Testament; and that as controversies have increased, and dogmas received since their time, they must be much less entangled with decisions merely human than more recent commentators. Perhaps it is best to steer between these two opinions. If a person have ability, inclination, and opportunity to wade through them, let him; but if not, referring to them occasionally may suffice. One caution, however, is necessary, which is this: that though the judgment of antiquity in some disputable points certainly may be useful, yet we ought never to put them on the same footing as the Scriptures. In many cases they may be considered as competent witnesses; but we must not confide in their verdict as judges."

The following is a list of the chief fathers: Contemporaries of the apostles, Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp. Papias, A.D. 116; Justin Martyr, 140; Dionysius of Corinth, 170; Tatian, 172; Hegesippus, 173; Melito, 177; Irenæus, 178; Athenagoras, 178; Miltiades, 180; Theophilus, 181; Clement of Alexandria, 194; Tertullian, 200; Minutius Felix, 210; Ammonius, 220; Origen, 230; Firmilian, 233; Dionysius of Alexandria, 247; Cyprian, 248; Novatus or Novatian, 251; Arnobius, 306; Lactantius, 306; Alexander of Alexandria, 313; Eusebius, 315; Athanasius, 326; Cyril of Jerusalem, 348; Hilary, 354; Epiphanius, 368; Basil, 370; Gregory of Nazianzen, 370; Gregory of Nyssa, 370; Optatus, 370; Ambrose, 374; Philaster, 380; Jerome, 392; Theodore of Mopsuestia, 394; Rufinus, 397; Augustine, 398; Chrysostom, 398; Sulpitius Severus, 401; Cyril of Alexandria, 412; Theodoret, 423; and Gennadius, 494.

FATHOM. The word rendered "fathom," in Acts xxvii. 28, is, according to Dr Arbutnot's tables, a measure of seven feet three inches in length. Our sailors have three kinds of fathoms—that of war ships, six feet; that of merchant ships, five feet and a half; and that of fly boats and fishing vessels, it is said, is five feet.

FATLINGS. In the parable recorded in Matt. xxii. 1-14, we find mention made of "fatlings;" and by this word must be understood calves, sheep, and goats, and other animals reared for the use of man. In Oriental countries, where animal food in large quantities is not used, it was accounted a peculiar act of hospitality to kill the fatlings. Hence the indignation of the elder brother of the prodigal, on finding that his father had killed the fatted calf in honour of his son's return.

FAULT, a slight defect or error, which subjects a person to blame, but not to punishment—a deviation from, or transgression of, a rule in some trifling circumstance.

FAVOUR OF GOD. See GRACE.

FEAR is that uneasiness of mind which arises from an apprehension of danger, attended with a desire of avoiding it. "Fear," says Dr. Watts, "shows itself by paleness of the cheek, sinking of the spirits, trembling of the limbs, hurry and confusion of the mind and thoughts, agonies of nature, and fainting. Many a person has died with fear. Sometimes it rouses all nature to exert itself in speedy flight, or other methods to avoid the approaching evil; sudden terror has performed some almost incredible acts of this kind."

Fear is of different kinds—1. There is an idolatrous and superstitious fear, which is called a fear of demons or false gods, which the city of Athens was greatly addicted to. "I perceive," says the Apostle Paul, "that in all things ye are too superstitious," or given to the fear and worship of false deities. 2. There is an external fear of God, an outward show and profession of it, which is taught by the precepts of men, as in the men of Samaria, who pretended to fear the Lord, as the priest instructed them, and yet served their own gods; and such an external fear of God Job's friends supposed was all that he had, and that he had cast even that off. 3. There is an hypocritical fear, when men make a profession of religion; but only serve God for some sinister end and selfish view; which Satan insinuated was Job's case: "Doth Job fear God for nought?" Job i. 9. 4. There is a servile fear, which they possess who serve God from fear of punishment, and not from love to him. 5

There is a filial fear, such as that of a son to his father. 2 Cor. vii. 1.

Fear is sinful when—1. It proceeds from unbelief or distrust of God. 2. When it ascribes more to the creature than is due, or when we fear our enemies without considering they are under God. 3. When we fear that in God which is not in him, or that he will break his promise. 4. When our fear is immoderate, so as to distract us in our duty.

FEARFUL. The fearful who shall have their portion in hell, are such as, being destitute of a holy awe of God, have such a slavish fear of him, that they will not dare to come boldly to a throne of grace, and receive his Son and the blessings of the new covenant in him; or those who fear man more than God. Rev. xxi. 8; Matt. x. 28.

FEAR OF DEATH. See DEATH.

FEAR OF GOD, is that holy disposition or gracious habit formed in the soul by the Holy Spirit, whereby we are inclined to obey all God's commands; and evidences itself, 1. By a dread of his displeasure. 2. Desire of his favour. 3. Regard for his excellences. 4. Submission to his will. 5. Gratitude for his benefits. 6. Sincerity in his worship. 7. Conscientious obedience to his commands. Prov. viii. 13; Job xxviii. 28.

FEARS. See DOUBTS.

FEAST, in a religious sense, is a ceremony of feasting and thanksgiving.

The principal feasts of the Jews were the feasts of Trumpets, of Tabernacles, of the Dedication, of the Passover, of Pentecost, and that of Purification. Feasts, and the ceremonies thereof, have made great part of the religion of almost all nations and sects; hence the Greeks, the Romans, Mohammedans, and Christians, have not been without them.

Feasts, in the English and Romish Churches, are innovations upon the simplicity of the Gospel, which ordains but one Christian feast, namely, the Lord's supper. They are either immovable or movable. Immovable feasts are those constantly celebrated on the same day of the year. The principal of these are, Christmas-day, Circumcision, Epiphany, Candlemas, or Purification; Lady-day, or the Annunciation, called also the Incarnation and Conception; All Saints and All Souls; besides the days of the several apostles, as St Thomas, St Paul. Movable feasts are those which are not confined to the same day of the year. Of these the principal is Easter, which gives law to all the rest, all of them following and keeping their proper distances from it. Such are Palm Sunday, Good Friday, Ash Wednesday, Sexagesima Sunday, Ascension-day, Pentecost, and Trinity Sunday.

Besides these feasts, which are general, and enjoined by the Church, there are others, local and occasional, enjoined by the magistrate, or voluntarily set on foot by the people; such are the days of thanksgiving for delivery from war, plague, &c.; such also are the vigils or wakes in commemoration of the dedication of particular churches.

The prodigious increase of feast-days in the Christian Church commenced towards the close of the fourth century, occasioned by the discovery that was made of the remains of martyrs, and other holy men, for the commemoration of whom they were established. These, instead of being set apart for pious exercises, were abused, in indolence, voluptuousness, and criminal practices. Many of them were instituted on a pagan model, and perverted to similar purposes with pagan holy days.

FEASTS OF LOVE. See AGAPÆ.

FEED is a metaphor taken from flocks, and is expressive both of the eating of the flock and of the care of the shepherd to provide their food. Christ feeds his people; he wisely and kindly applies to their souls his supporting, strengthening, comforting word, blood, and Spirit; he rules and protects them, and will for ever render them happy in the enjoyment of himself and his fulness. Isa. xl. 11; Rev. vii. 17. See PASTOR—SHEPHERD.

FEEL. Christ has a feeling of our infirmities; having endured the like, he tenderly sympathizes with us in our troubles. Heb. iv. 15. Such as keep God's commandments feel no evil—meet with nothing that really tends to their hurt. Eccl. viii. 5. The heathen feel after God when, amid great ignorance and mistakes, they search out and perceive his existence, and some of his perfections. Acts xvii. 27. They are past feeling, who have their conscience so seared that they can commit the most horrid crimes without the least conviction or remorse. Eph. iv. 19.

FEELINGS, RELIGIOUS, are those sensations or emotions of the mind produced by the views we have of religion. While some enthusiasts boast of, depend on, and talk much of their feelings, there are others who are led to discard the term, and almost to abandon the idea of religious feeling; but it is evident, that however many have been misguided and deceived by their feelings, yet there is no such thing as religion without them. For instance, religion consists in contrition, repentance, and devotion; now what is contrition but a feeling of sorrow for sin? what is repentance, but a feeling of hatred to it, with a relinquishing of it? what is devotion, but a feeling of love to God and his ways? Who can separate the idea of feeling from any of these acts? The fact is this, religious feelings, like every thing else, have been abused; and men, to avoid the imputation of fanaticism, have run into the opposite evil of lukewarmness, and been content with a system without feeling its energy. See AFFECTION—ENTHUSIASM—EXPERIENCE.

FEET. Anciently it was customary to wash the feet of strangers coming off a journey, because generally they travelled barefoot, or wore sandals only, which did not secure them from dust or dirt. When Abraham entertained the angels, the first office of kindness proposed to them was expressed in these words: "Let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under this tree." In the time of our Lord this custom still continued in use, so that the neglect of it on proper occasions was considered as very blame-worthy: "I entered into thine house, thou gavest me no water for my feet." The Saviour was in the circumstances of a traveller; he had no home to wash and anoint himself in before he went to Simon's house, and therefore had a right to complain that his entertainer had failed in the respect that was due to him as a stranger, at a distance from the usual place of his residence. To wash the feet was generally accounted a mean and servile office, performed usually by the female servants of the family. And it was customary for them to kiss the feet of those whom they respected. Thus Mary acted strictly according to established custom, when, at a public entertainment, she performed these offices to her Saviour. The feet of kings and princes, in some parts of the East, were washed in basins of pure gold. Persons of inferior station used vessels of silver, earthenware, or wood, according to their wealth. The towel which was used to wipe the feet after washing was considered through all the East as a badge of servitude. Jesus Christ washed the feet of his apostles, and thereby taught them to perform the humblest services for one another. The example of humility which he set them on this occasion was absolutely incomparable: no instance ever occurred among the Jews of a lord or master washing the feet of his servants or disciples. Feet, in the sacred writers, often means inclinations, affections, propensities, actions, motions: "Guide my feet in thy paths"—"Keep thy feet at a distance from evil"—"The feet of the debauched woman go down to death"—"Let not the foot of pride come against me"—"If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath from doing thy pleasure on my holy day"—"My foot hath held his steps, his way have I kept and not declined"—"My foot standeth in an even place"—"If I have walked with vanity or if my foot hath lusted to deceit." To be at any one's feet, signifies obeying him, listening to his instructions and commands. Moses says that "the Lord loved his people; all his saints are in thy hand: and they sat down at his feet." Deut. xxxiii. 3. Paul was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel. Mary sat at our Saviour's feet, and heard his word. Luke x. 39.

To be under any one's feet, to be a footstool to him, signifies the absolute subjection of enemies; but not their reconciliation or willing obedience. It is a phrase which is illustrated by the history of the five kings of Canaan, and is clearly an allusion to it. See Josh. x. 24, compared with Ps. cx. 1.

In Isa. iii. 18, we find mention made of tinkling ornaments about the feet. This probably refers to a custom existing in Persia, Arabia, and Egypt, where young ladies wear rings often about their ankles, to which are attached a number of little bells, so that every successive step keeps them ringing; and as the wearers take great delight in them, they generally walk at a rapid pace, for the purpose of increasing the tinkling noise. The Jewish ladies in the time of Isaiah took a similar pride in this piece of finery, for which the prophet rebukes them. Among the Orientals, it is reckoned a mark of becoming respect to others never to show the feet when seated. To this Isaiah (vi. 2) alludes, when he says of the seraph, "With twain he covered his feet." Thus seated on the bare ground the garments must inevitably be soiled, and accordingly on rising they brush off the dust from their clothes. Thus Isaiah (lii. 2) says to the captive daughter of Zion, "Shake thyself from the dust; arise and sit down, O Jerusalem."

There are sometimes allusions made in Scripture to speaking with the feet. On this subject Mr. Jowett thus remarks, in his "Christian Rescarches:" "So much is said in the Old and New Testament of speaking with the hands, eyes, and even feet, it is scarcely understood by Englishmen. They should see the expressive and innumerable gesticulations of foreigners when they converse. Many a question is answered, and many a significant remark conveyed, even by children, who learn this language much sooner than their mother-tongue. Perhaps the expression of Solomon, that the wicked man 'speaketh with his feet,' may appear more natural when it is considered that the mode of sitting on the ground brings the feet into view, nearly in the same direct line as the hands; the whole body crouching down together, and the hands, in fact, often resting upon the feet."

The feet as well as the hands of State criminals in Eastern countries, were often cut off, and fixed up in the most public places, as a warning to others. In accordance with this shocking custom, we find David commanding the hands and feet of the sons of Rimmon, who treacherously murdered Ishbosheth, to be cut off, and hung up over the Pool of Hebron.

FELIX (CLAUDIUS), a governor of Judea in the time of the apostles. He had three wives, not at once, but in succession. One of them was Drusilla, the sister of Agrippa, whom he seduced to abandon her husband. Felix was residing at Cesarea when Paul was brought thither and accused before him of sedition, corrupt doctrines, and a profanation of the temple. The apostle's defence on that occasion was not without effect. Felix was stung to the heart; his conscience was stricken; he trembled, and answered, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee." This promise he never fulfilled in the only sense in which it could have advanced his eternal interests. The conviction was temporary, and therefore unavailing. After a lapse of two years, he vacated the government to a successor and left Paul a prisoner. We have no further information concerning him.

FELLOWSHIP, joint interest, or the having one common stock. The fellowship of the saints is twofold:—1. With God. 1 John i. 3; 1 Cor. i. 9, xiii. 14. 2. With one another. 1 John i. 7.

Fellowship with God consists in knowledge of his will. Job xxii. 21; John xvii. 3. Agreement in design. Amos iii. 2. Mutual affection. Rom. viii. 38, 39. Enjoyment of his presence. Ps. iv. 6. Conformity to his image. 1 John ii. 6, i. 6. Participation of his felicity. 1 John i. 3, 4; Eph. iii. 14–21; 2 Cor. xiii. 14.

Fellowship of the saints may be considered as a fellowship of duties. Rom. xii. 6; 1 Cor. xii. 1; 1 Thess. v. 17, 18; James v. 16. Of ordinances. Heb. x. 24; Acts ii. 46. Of graces, love, joy, &c. Heb. x. 24; Mal. iii. 16; 2 Cor. viii. 4. Of interest, spiritual, and sometimes temporal. Rom. xii. 4, 13; Heb. xiii. 16. Of sufferings. Rom. xv. 1, 2; Gal. vi. 1, 2; Rom. xii. 15. Of eternal glory. Rev. vii. 9. See COMMUNION.

FENCED CITIES, walled round about, fortified, and so made strong and difficult to be taken or destroyed. 2 Chron. xi. 10; Job x. 11.

FERRET, a sort of weasel, which Moses declares to be unclean. Lev. xi. 30. The Greek mugalē is composed of mus, a rat, and gale, a weasel, because this animal has something of both. The Hebrew anaca, is by some translated hedgehog, by others leech, or salamander; by Bochart, lizard.

FERRY-BOAT. This expression occurs in 2 Sam. xix. 18. It is probable that a raft or float was constructed; some think a bridge of boats, and others a ferry-boat. Dr Boothroyd translates it in connection with the preceding verse, "These went over before the king, and performed the service of bringing over the king's household."

FERVENT, earnest, warm, burning, all in a glow. Rom. xii. 11; 2 Cor. vii. 7; 1 Pet. iv. 8, i. 22; Col. iv. 12; James v. 6.

FESTIVAL. See FEAST.

FESTUS, PORTIUS, the successor of Felix in the government of Judea as a Roman province. He commenced his rule A.D. 60, and on entering upon his sovereignty he found Paul imprisoned at Cesarea. Acts xxiv. 27. The Jews were very urgent with the new governor to put the apostle to death, or to send him up to Jerusalem, while they had formed a plot to murder him upon his way thither. Festus refused to grant their request, but offered to hear their complaints against Paul at Cesarea. Paul, however, arrested all further proceedings by making a direct appeal to Cæsar; which he had a right to do as enjoying the privileges of a Roman citizen. Festus seems to have enjoyed his government but a short time, as he died A.D. 62.

FETTERS, shackles or chains, for binding prisoners and madmen. With such were Joseph's feet hurt in the prison. Ps. cv. 18. The saints bind nobles with fetters of iron, when, by prayer and the exercise of the power that God gives them, they restrain them from accomplishing their wicked designs. Ps. cxlix. 8.

FEVER, a well-known disease, arising from an inflammatory state of the blood, accompanied with a quick pulse and excessive heat. It is mentioned in Deut. xxviii. 22. The Greek word in the New Testament which is translated fever, is derived from a word signifying fire, or a fiery heat.

FIDELITY, faithfulness, or the conscientious discharge of those duties of a religious, personal, and relative nature, which we are bound to perform.

FIELD. See FURROWS.

FIGHT, the violent and irreconcilable struggle between the saints' inward grace and corruption, and their striving against the temptations of Satan, are called a war, or warfare. Rom. vii. 23; 1 Pet. ii. 11; Eph. vi. 11, 12. Both are the good fight of faith, carried on by the exercise of the grace of faith, or in firm dependence on Christ's word and power, and in maintenance of the doctrine of faith: and it is good in respect of their cause, captain, and the manner and end of their conflict. 1 Tim. vi. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 7. Outward opposition, trouble, and distress, are likened to a fight or warfare. 2 Cor. vii. 5; Isa. xl. 2. See BATTLE.

FIG TREE. Gen. iii. 7; Numb. xiii. 23; Matt. vii. 16, xxi. 19, xxiv. 32; Mark xi. 13, 20, 21, xiii. 28; Luke vi. 44, xiii. 6, 7, xxi. 29; John i. 48; James iii. 12; Rev. vi. 13. This tree was very common in Palæstine. It becomes large, dividing into many branches, which are furnished with leaves shaped like those of the mulberry, and affords a friendly shade. Accordingly we read, in the Old Testament, of Judah and Israel dwelling, or sitting securely, every man under his fig tree. 1 Kings iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4; Zech. iii. 10. And besides these instances in the New Testament, we find Nathanael under a fig tree—probably for the purpose of devotional retirement. John i. 49–51. Hasselquist, in his journey from Nazareth to Tiberias, says: "We refreshed ourselves under the shade of a fig tree, where a shepherd and his herd had their rendezvous; but without either house or hut." The fruit which it bears is produced from the trunk and large branches, and not from the smaller shoots, as in most other trees. It always precedes the leaves, and is soft, sweet, and very nourishing. The first ripe fig is still called boccôre in the Levant, which is nearly its Hebrew name. Jer. xxiv. 2. Thus Dr. Shaw, in giving an account of the fruits in Barbary, mentions "the black and white boccôre, or early fig," which is produced in June; though the kermes, or kermouse, the "fig," properly so called, which they preserve and make up into cakes, is rarely ripe before August." And on Nahum iii. 12, he observes, that "the boccôres drop as soon as they are ripe, and, according to the beautiful allusion of the prophet, fall into the mouth of the eater upon being shaken." Further, "it frequently falls out in Barbary," says he, "and we need not doubt of the like in this hotter climate of Judea, that, according to the quality of the preceding season, some of the more forward and vigorous trees will now and then yield a few ripe figs six weeks or more before the full season. Something like this may be alluded to by the Prophet Hosea (ix. 10), when he says, 'I saw your fathers as the first ripe in the fig tree, at her first time.' Such figs were reckoned a great dainty." See Isa. xxviii. 4.

The story of our Saviour's denunciation against the barren fig-tree, (Matt. xxi. 19; Mark xi. 13) has occasioned some of the boldest cavils of infidelity; and the vindication of it has needlessly exercised the ingenuity of several of the most learned critics and commentators. The whole difficulty arises from the circumstance of his disappointment in not finding fruit on the tree, when it is expressly said, that "the time of figs was not yet." While it was supposed that this expression signified that the time for such trees to bring forth fruit was not yet come, it looked very unaccountable that Christ should reckon a tree barren, though it had leaves, and curse it as such, when he knew that the time of bearing figs was not come; and that he should come to seek figs on this tree, when he knew that figs were not used to be ripe so soon in the year. But the expression does not signify the time of the coming forth of figs, but the time of the gathering in of ripe figs, as is plain from the parallel expressions. Matt. xxi. 34; Mark xii. 2; Luke xx. 10. Mark, by saying, "For the time of figs was not yet," does not design to give a reason for his finding nothing but leaves; but he gives a reason for what he said in the clause before, "He came, if haply he might find any thereon;" and it was a good reason for our Saviour's coming and seeking figs on the tree, because the time for their being gathered was not come. Matthew informs us that the tree was "in the way," that is, in the common road, and therefore, probably, no particular person's property.

It is well known that the fruit of these prolific trees appears before the leaves, and it was about the end of March or beginning of April that our Saviour, at the time of the Passover, went to the fig tree, and expecting to find fruit upon it, but finding leaves only, he pronounced a curse upon it. To see a tree in leaf, therefore, while the season for gathering the figs as ripe had not yet arrived, rendered it a reasonable expectation to find fruit on it; and this it must have had, if it had not been barren.

Jesus was pleased to make use of this miracle to prefigure the speedy ruin of the Jewish nation, on account of its unfruitfulness under greater advantages than any other people enjoyed at that day; and, like all the rest of his miracles, it was done with a gracious intention, namely, to alarm his countrymen, and induce them to repent. In the blasting of this barren fig tree, the distant appearance of which was so fair and promising, he delivered one more awful lesson to a degenerate people, of whose hypocritical exterior, and flattering but delusive pretensions, it was a just and striking emblem.

FIGURES. See TYPES.

FILE. This word is only found in 1 Sam. xiii. 21, and refers rather to the bluntings or notches of edge-tools.

FILIAL PIETY is the affectionate attachment of children to their parents, including in it love, reverence, obedience, and kindness. Justly has it been observed, that these great duties are prompted equally by nature and by gratitude, independently of the injunctions of religion; for where shall we find the person who hath received from any one benefits so great, or so many, as children from their parents? And it may be truly said, that if persons are undutiful to their parents, they seldom prove good to any other relation. See CHILD.

FILIATION OF THE SON OF GOD. See SON OF GOD.

FILL. To fill up what is behind of the sufferings of Christ, is to bear the troubles assigned by him to his followers, and which are borne for his sake. Col. i. 24. To fill up the measure of sin, is to add one iniquity to another, till the patience of God can no longer suffer them to escape unpunished. Matt. xxiii. 32; 1 Thess. ii. 16. Satan fills the heart when he strongly inclines and emboldens it to sin. Acts. v. 3. Sinners are filled with their own devices, with their own ways, with drunkenness, and have their faces filled with shame, when God, to punish their wicked acts and designs, brings dreadful and confounding calamities upon them. Prov. i. 31, xiv. 14, xii. 21; Ezek. xxiii. 33; Ps. lxxxiii. 16. Christ filleth all in all: he is everywhere present; is in all the churches, and their true members; he is the great substance of all the blessings of the new covenant, and of all the graces and duties of his people. Eph. i. 23.

FILTHY LUCRE, is gain basely and sinfully gotten, as when ministers make their temporal support their great aim in their work. Tit. i. 7, 11; 1 Pet. v. 2.

FIND, to meet with, is used sometimes for to attack, to surprise one's enemies, to light on them suddenly; so Anah "found the Emin." Gen. xxxvi. 24. (See EMIM.) To find favour in the sight of any one, is an expressive form of speech common in Scripture.

FINER, a gold and silver worker, a refiner. Prov. xxv. 4. In Judg. xvii. 4, the word is rendered "founder;" and in Isa. xli. 7, "goldsmith." It refers especially to the melting of fine metals. That the art of working metals was known at a very early period, nay, even before the flood, is evident from Gen. iv. 19–22.

FINES. By the law of Moses an offending Israelite was punished with fines, differing in value according to the injury sustained. Thus the King of Israel, in reply to Nathan's parable of the ewe-lamb, declared, "As the Lord liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die: and he shall restore the lamb fourfold, because he did this thing, and because he had no pity." 2 Sam. xii. 5, 6. This sentence was required by the law of Moses. Exod. xxii. 1. In some instances the offender was fined in a large sum of money; in others, he was only required to restore double.

FINGER. The finger of God, denotes his power, his operation. Pharaoh's magicians discovered the finger of God in some of the miracles of Moses. Exod. viii. 19. That legislator gave the tables written with the finger of God to the Hebrews. Exod. xxxi. 18. The heavens were the work of God's fingers. Ps. viii. 3. To put forth one's finger, is a bantering gesture, or an insulting gesture. Isa. lviii. 9. Some take this for a menacing gesture, as Nicanor stretched out his hand against the temple, threatening to burn it. 2 Mac. xiv. 33.

FINING-POT, the pot used for melting metals, and mentioned in Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21.

FINISH means to bring to pass, to accomplish, to perfect, or to put an end to anything. One of the evangelists relates, that when Jesus was suspended upon the cross, and immediately prior to his giving up the ghost, "he cried with a loud voice, It is finished!"

1. The ministry which his heavenly Father had committed unto him, when he sanctified him and sent him into the world to publish the glad tidings of peace to guilty men, was now fulfilled. John xvii. 4.

2. His awful and complicated sufferings were ended. The whole of his life had corresponded to the prophetic delineation of his character. He was "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." Isa. liii. 3.

3. An end was now virtually put to the Levitical dispensation. That economy, founded in divine appointment, and which had subsisted during a period of fifteen hundred years, having answered the great purposes for which it was instituted, now obtained its consummation. Col. ii. 14, 15; Eph. ii. 14, 15; Heb. ix. 10. But,

4. The work of purchasing our redemption was now finished. The justice of God obtained full satisfaction for the dishonour which sinners had done to his violated law, so that now "God is just even in justifying the ungodly who believe in Jesus," at whose hands he hath received ample satisfaction for all their sins. Rom. iii. 24–26. These are some of the important things that are indicated in that memorable saying, "It is finished."

FIR, a well-known tree, of beautiful appearance, whose lofty height and dense foliage afford a spacious shelter and shade. It has a very straight trunk, and its wood is of great use in furniture, &c. The Seventy have rendered it, for want of established principles of natural history, cypress, fir, myrtle, juniper. The Chaldee reads fir constantly; and, as Mr. Taylor remarks, it is likely this translator should be quite as well acquainted with the subject as any foreigner.

In 2 Sam. vi. 5, it is said that "David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir-wood." Take the following passage from Dr. Burney's "History of Music:" "This species of wood, so soft in its nature and so sonorous in its effects, seems to have been preferred by the ancients as well as the moderns, to every other kind for the construction of musical instruments, particularly the bellies of them, on which their tone chiefly depends. Those of the harp, lute, guitar, harpsichord, and violin, in present use, are constantly made of fir-wood." The fir is mentioned about nineteen times in Sacred Scripture, and is celebrated chiefly for its timber; and that it was not an evergreen is probable from the remark of Hosea (xiv. 8): "I am like a green fir tree:" thereby intimating that it was not always green, but deciduous, or subject to change its leaves. That it was a tall straight tree is evident from Isa. xli. 19, lv. 13, lx. 13, where the prophet compares the saints to fir trees.

FIRE. The ordinary mode of warming the large apartments in the East is by the use of charcoal in brasiers. In John xviii. 18, the fire of coals was properly live charcoal. Claudius supposes that the fire which was burning before King Jehoiakim, and in which he burnt Jeremiah's roll, was a pan of coals. Cow dung, dried in the sun, is generally used as fuel in places where wood is scarce. It is stacked, when dried in cakes, and the fire formed of it throws out a powerful heat. God, to represent to man the glory of his majesty and the terrors of his justice, hath often appeared in fire and encompassed with fire, as when he showed himself in the burning bush, and descended on Mount Sinai, in the midst of flames, thunders, and lightning. Exod. iii. 2, xix. 18. Hence fire is a symbol of the Deity, and of his just and jealous regard to his glory. Deut. iv. 24. The Holy Ghost is compared to fire. Matt. iii. 11; Acts ii. 3. It is the work of the Holy Spirit to enlighten, purify, and sanctify the soul, and to inflame it with love to God, and zeal for his glory. See BAPTISM OF THE HOLY GHOST.

The mode in which Jehovah was wont to manifest his acceptance of a sacrifice in the early ages of the world, was by causing fire to come down from heaven and consume it upon the altar. It may possibly have been in this way that God manifested his acceptance of Abel's sacrifice in preference to that of Cain. "By faith," we are told by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, "Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts." Macknight upon this passage remarks, that "as in after times God testified his acceptance of particular sacrifices by sending down fire upon them, we may suppose it was in this manner that he testified Abel's righteousness upon his offering." Fire descended from heaven upon the altar in the Jewish tabernacle, and afterwards in the temple of Solomon, which was kept burning day and night by the priests. But no such practice was maintained in the second temple. In Jer. xxiii. 20, we find fire adopted figuratively to describe the word of God; "Is not my word like a fire?" powerful to penetrate, to purify, to melt, to consume. In the last sense Jehovah is said to be to the wicked a "consuming fire." When Jesus would describe the divisions and persecutions which should arise from the propagation of the gospel, he says, Luke xii. 49, "I am come to send fire on the earth." The same word is very frequently adopted to indicate the torments of the lost. Thus Mark ix. 46: "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." And again Matt. xxv. 41: "Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Some understand these expressions allegorically, as strongly representing the torments of an awakened conscience; while others, among whom are to be reckoned some of the early fathers, understand them literally to denote a real material fire, in which the lost are eternally tormented.

FIREBRAND, a torch or flambeau. The torch mentioned in Judg. xv. 4, was probably made of resinous wood. The word occurs also in Zech. xii. 6.

FIREPAN. In Exod. xxvii. 3 this word occurs, and it evidently means a shovel. The same word is also used in reference to the small tongs or snuffers of the candlestick. Exod. xxv. 38, xxxvii. 23.

FIRE, STRANGE. In Lev. x. 1, it is said of Nadab and Abihu, that they offered "strange fire before the Lord, which he commanded them not." By "strange fire," we are to understand fire which had not been taken from the altar that was there miraculously kindled, but, as the Targum of Jonathan suggests, from the fires at which the priests' portion of the sacrifices was dressed for food in the court of the tabernacle.

FIRKIN. This word, which occurs only in John ii. 6, corresponds to the Hebrew BATH (which see).

Critics, however, are not agreed as to the exact measure. The firkin contains nine gallons, but the bath contains only seven and a half; and when we consider that the marriage feast lasted seven days, the quantity, if answering to the bath, will not appear too great.

FIRMAMENT. It is said, Gen. i. 7, that God made the firmament in the midst of the waters to separate the inferior from the superior. The word used on this occasion properly signifies expansion, or something expanded. This expansion is properly the atmosphere, which encompasses the globe on all sides, and separates the water in the clouds from that on the earth.

FIRST. Our Saviour required his disciples "to seek first the kingdom of God;" that is, before all things (Matt. vi. 33); and Paul says, that God displayed his mercy towards him, "who was the chief [first] of sinners," and that in him first "he showed forth all long-suffering for a pattern," &c. I Tim. i. 15, 16.

FIRST-BORN. See BIRTHRIGHT.

FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK. See LORD'S DAY—SABBATH.

FIRST-FRUITS, among the Hebrews, were oblations of the earliest part of the fruits of the harvest consecrated to God, as an acknowledgment of his sovereign dominion. These first-fruits were offered from the Feast of Pentecost until that of Dedication, because after that time the fruits were neither so beautiful nor so good as before. The Jews were likewise prohibited from gathering in the harvest until they had offered to God the first-fruits, or, the new sheaf, which was presented the day after the great Day of Unleavened Bread; neither were they permitted to bake any bread made of new corn until they had offered the new loaves upon the altar on the day of Pentecost; without which all the corn was regarded as unclean and unholy. To this the Apostle Paul alludes in Rom. xi. 16, when he says, "If the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also holy." In this sense of special consecration to God it is that the regenerate are called "a kind of first-fruits of his creatures." James i. 18. It may mean, also, that the first Christians were converted as an earnest of the future conversion of the whole world. There was another sort of first-fruits which was paid to God. When bread was kneaded in a family, a portion of it was set apart, and given to the priest or Levite who dwelt in the place. If there were no priest or Levite there, it was cast into the oven, and consumed by the fire. These offerings made a considerable part of the revenues of the priesthood. Lev. xxiii. 9-21; Exod. xxii. 29; 2 Chron. xxxi. 5; Numb. xv. 19, 20.

The first-fruits of the Spirit are such communications of his grace on earth as fully assure us of the full enjoyment of God in heaven. Rom. viii. 23. Christ is called the first-fruits of them that slept; for as the first-fruits were earnest to the Jews of the succeeding harvest, so Christ is the first-fruits of the resurrection, or the earnest of a future resurrection; that as he rose, so shall believers also rise to happiness and life. 1 Cor. xv. 20.

First-fruits are mentioned in ancient writers as one part of the Church revenue. First-fruits, in the Church of England, are the profits of every spiritual benefice for the first year, according to the valuation thereof in the king's book.

FISH (Heb., dag, Greek, ichthys. — Matt. vii. 10, xvii. 27; Luke v. 6; John xxi. 6, 8, 11) occurs very frequently, and appears to be the general name in Scripture of aquatic animals. Boothroyd, in his note upon Numb. xi. 4, says, "I am inclined to think that the word here rendered flesh, denotes only the flesh of fish, as it certainly does in Lev. xi. 11; and indeed the next verse seems to support this explanation: 'We remember how freely we ate fish.' It was then particularly the flesh of fish for which they longed, which was more relishing than either the beef or mutton of those regions, which, unless when young, is dry and unpalatable. Of the great abundance and deliciousness of the fish of Egypt, all authors, ancient and modern, are agreed." Hence we may see how distressing to the Egyptians was the infliction which turned the waters of the river into blood, and occasioned the death of the fish. Exod. vii. 18-21. Their sacred stream became so polluted as to be unfit for drink, for bathing, and for other uses of water to which they were superstitiously devoted; and themselves were obliged to nauseate what was the usual food of the common people, and held sacred by the priests. Exod. ii. 5, vii. 15, viii. 20. In illustration of Luke v. 5—"And Simon answering said unto him, Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: nevertheless at thy word I will let down the net"—Mr. Roberts observes: "In general the fishermen of the East prefer the night to any other time for fishing. Before the sun has gone down they push off their canoes or cattamarams, each carrying a lighted torch, and in the course of a few hours may be seen out at sea, or on the rivers, like an illuminated city. They swing the lights about over the sides of the boat; which the fish no sooner see than they come to the place, and then the men cast in the hook or spear, as circumstances may require."

FISH-GATE. See JERUSALEM.

FITCHES, or VETCHES, a kind of tare. There are two words in Hebrew which our translators have rendered fitches. The first occurs only in Isa. xxviii. 25-27, and must be the name of some kind of seed; but interpreters differ much in explaining it. Jerome, Maimonides, R. David Kimchi, and other rabbins, understand it of the gith, which is thus described by Ballester: "It is a plant commonly met with in gardens, and grows to a cubit in height, and sometimes more, according to the richness of the soil. The leaves are small, like those of fennel, the flower blue, which disappearing, the ovary shows itself on the top, like that of a poppy, furnished with little horns, oblong, divided by membranes into several partitions or cells, in which are enclosed seeds of a very black colour, not unlike those of the leek, but of a very fragrant smell." The Jewish rabbins also mention its seeds among condiments, and mixed with bread. For this purpose it was probably used in the time of Isaiah; since the inhabitants of those countries, to this day, have a variety of rusks and biscuits, most of which are strewn on the top with the seeds of sesamum, coriander, and wild garden saffron.

The other word is rendered fitches in our translation of Ezek. iv. 9; but in Exod. ix. 32, and Isa. xxviii. 25, "rye."

Some think it the spelt; and this seems to be the most probable meaning of the Hebrew word; at least it has the greatest number of interpreters, from Jerome to Celsus. There are not, however, wanting some who think it was rye; among whom, R. D. Kimchi, followed by Luther, and our English translators: Dr. Geddes, too, has retained it, though he says that he is inclined to think that the spelt is preferable.

Dr Shaw thinks that this word, Exod. ix. 32, may signify rice. Hasselquist, on the contrary, affirms that rice was only brought into cultivation in Egypt under the caliphs. This, however, may be doubted. One would think, from the intercourse of ancient Egypt with Babylon and with India, that this country could not be ignorant of a grain so well suited to its climate.

FIVE POINTS, are the five doctrines controverted between the Arminians and Calvinists. See CALVINISM.

FIX. The heart is fixed, when it is powerfully captivated by the love of Christ, firmly depends on God's promises, perfections, and new covenant relations, and has its thoughts and desires firmly settled on him. Ps. lvii. 7, cxii. 7.

FLACIANS, the followers of Matthias Flacius Illyricus, who flourished in the sixteenth century. He taught that original sin is the very substance of human nature; and that the fall of man was an event which extinguished in the human mind every virtuous tendency, every noble faculty, and left nothing behind it but universal darkness and corruption.

FLAGELLANTS or WHIPPERS, a sect of wild fanatics who chastised and disciplined themselves with whips in public. It had its rise in Italy in the year 1260. Its author was one Rainer, a hermit; and it was propagated from thence through almost all the countries of Europe. A great number of persons of all ages and both sexes made processions, walking two by two, with their shoulders bare, which they whipped till the blood ran down, in order to obtain mercy from God, and appease his indignation against the wickedness of the age. They were then called the Devout; and, having established a superior, he was called General of the Devotion. Though the primitive Whippers were exemplary in point of morals, yet they were joined by a turbulent rabble, who were infected with the most ridiculous and impious opinions; so that the emperors and pontiffs thought proper to put an end to this religious frenzy, by declaring all devout whipping contrary to the divine law, and prejudicial to the soul's eternal interest.

However, this sect revived in Germany towards the middle of the next century, and, rambling through many provinces, occasioned great disturbances. They held, among other things, that whipping was of equal virtue with baptism and the other sacraments; that the forgiveness of all sins was to be obtained by it from God without the merits of Jesus Christ; that the old law of Christ was soon to be abolished, and that a new law, enjoining the baptism of blood, to be administered by whipping, was to be substituted in its place: upon which Clement VII., by an injudicious as well as unrighteous policy, thundered out anathemas against the Whippers, who were burnt by the inquisitors in several places. But they were not easily extirpated. They appeared again in Thuringia and Lower Saxony in the fifteenth century, and rejected not only the sacraments, but every branch of external worship; and placed their only hope of salvation in faith and whipping, to which they added other strange doctrines concerning evil spirits. Their leader, Conrad Schmidt, and many others, were committed to the flames by German inquisitors in and after the year 1414.

FLAGELLATION, or scourging, has in all ages been resorted to as a mode of punishment. It was very common among the Jews, and inflicted in one of two ways—either with leathern thongs or with rods. The offender having been stripped down to the middle, was bound by the arms to a low pillar, while the executioner stood behind him upon a stone, and, in presence of the judges, inflicted lashes both upon his back and breast. This punishment was also in use among the Romans; but by the Roman law it was forbidden to be inflicted upon Roman citizens. Scourging, however, was not only resorted to by the Romans as a punishment, but also as a mode of extorting confession from a criminal. Such a use of the scourge was reserved only for slaves and persons of the humblest condition. The circumstance that both Christ and his apostles were subjected to scourging, was early perverted into an excuse for the application of the scourge as a mode of inflicting penance. It did not, however, become general in the Church before the eleventh century, when, through the influence of Peter Damiani, afterwards cardinal bishop of Ostia, it came to be adopted by all classes as a species of atonement for sin. The idea was propagated that the sins of a year might be expiated by three thousand lashes and the chanting of thirty penitential psalms. Under this delusive notion, an Italian widow is said in the eleventh century to have inflicted upon herself three hundred thousand strokes of the scourge. Thus it was imagined, not only that sin was cancelled and the torments of hell escaped, but that peculiar holiness was acquired. By this means has Popery rendered the cross of Christ of none effect, by its idle and superstitious traditions.

FLAGONS. In Cant. ii. 5, the bride says, "Stay me with flagons, comfort me with apples." Mr. Taylor suggests that some kind of fruit seems to be intended. Perhaps some kind of sweet cake may be referred to. In Hosea it may imply cakes of grapes, alluding to idolatry. The Septuagint, in 2 Sam. vi. 19, has "pancake;" and in 1 Chron. xvi. 3, "honey-cake," where the word occurs without the insertion "of wine," which is added by our translators; but in Hos. iii. 1, is added on the margin, "of grapes." Might these be grapes gathered into gourds? or do they mean wine, as our translators have rendered them in Canticles, and have inserted the word wine in the other places—thereby fixing them to this sense?

FLAGS (Heb., achu) occurs Gen. xli. 2, 18; Job viii. 11; and suph (weeds), Exod. ii. 3, 5; Isa. xix. 6; Jonah ii. 5. The word achu, in the first two instances, is translated "meadows," and in the latter, "flag." It probably denotes the sedge, or long grass, which grows in the meadows of the Nile—very grateful to the cattle.

The word suph is called by Aben Ezra, "a reed growing on the borders of the river." Bochart, Fuller, Rivetus, Ludolphus, and Junius and Tremellius, render it by juncus, carex, or alga; and Celsius thinks it the fucus or alga, "sea-weed." Dr. Geddes says there is little doubt of its being the sedge called sari, which, as we learn from Theophrastus and Pliny, grows on the marshy banks of the Nile, and rises to the height of almost two cubits. This, indeed, agrees very well with Exod. ii. 3, 5, and the thickets of arundinaceous plants, at some small distances from the Red Sea, observed by Dr. Shaw; but the place in Jonah seems to require some submarine plant.

FLAME. This word occurs in Exod. iii. 2, in reference to the burning bush, and in Acts vii. 30, in reference to the same appearance as alluded to by the martyr Stephen.

FLATTERY, a servile and fawning behaviour attended with mean compliances and obsequiousness, in order to gain a person's favour. Such conduct is utterly inconsistent with that simple integrity and candour which ought ever to characterize the true Christian.

FLAX (Heb., phastah, Exod. ix. 31; Lev. xiii. 47, 48, 58, 59; Deut. xxii. 11; Josh. ii. 6; Judg. xv. 14; Prov. xxxi. 13; Isa. xix. 9, xlii. 3, xliii. 17; Jer. xiii. 1; Ezek. xl. 3, xlv. 17, 18; Hos. ii. 5, 9. Gr., linon, Matt. xii. 20; Rev. xv. 6), a plant very common, and too well known to need a description. It is a vegetable upon which the industry of mankind has been exercised with the greatest success and utility. On passing a field of it, one is struck with astonishment when he considers that this apparently insignificant plant may, by the labour and ingenuity of man, be made to assume an entirely new form and appearance, and to contribute to pleasure and health, by furnishing us with agreeable and ornamental apparel. This word, Mr Parkhurst thinks, is derived from the verb phasth, (to strip), because the substance which we term flax is properly the bark or fibrous part of the vegetable, peeled or stripped off the stalks. From time immemorial Egypt has been celebrated for the production or manufacture of flax. Wrought into garments, it constituted the principal dress of the inhabitants, and the priests never put on any other kind of clothing. The fine linen of Egypt is celebrated in all ancient authors, and its superior excellence mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures. The manufacture of flax is still carried on in that country, and many writers take notice of it. Rabbi Benjamin Tudela mentions the manufactory at Damietta; and Egmont and Heyman describe the article as being of a beautiful colour, and so finely spun that the threads are hardly discernible. The flax of the Sacred Scriptures appears to be the linum usitatissimum of modern botanists. Naturalists are acquainted with about twenty-seven species of flax. Moses in his enumeration of the calamities occasioned by the plague of hail (Exod. ix. 31), mentions flax among the principal objects of Egyptian cultivation: "And the flax and the barley was smitten: for the barley was in the ear, and the flax was balled." The flax crop, next to grain, was of the utmost importance to the manufacturing population of Egypt. It appears, from the Egyptian monuments, that two sorts of looms were used for weaving, viz., the upright loom, such as that into which Delilah entwined the seven locks of Samson's hair—this was used by the women; and the horizontal loom, used by the men.

FLEA, a well-known insect, to which David compares himself in 1 Sam. xxvi. 20, to show his insignificance before King Saul. He uses it also in the same sense in 1 Sam. xxiv. 14. It is a little wingless insect, equally contemptible and troublesome, but remarkable for its agility in leaping from one place to another.

FLEECE. This word only occurs in connection with the history of Gideon. Judg. vi. 36-40. The threshing floor of Gideon appears to have been an open, uncovered space, upon which the dews of heaven, which fall in Palestine in great abundance during the night, descended without interruption. The miracle on that occasion consisted in the dew having fallen one time upon the fleece without any on the floor, and that at another time the fleece remained dry while the ground was wet with it.

FLESH, a term of great moment in the Scriptures. It is used in a great variety of significations, both in the Old and New Testaments. Sometimes it is to be understood in a physical and sometimes in a moral sense. Physically, it denotes in some passages the whole body, as in Numb. viii. 7, Matt. xxvi. 41; in others, the whole family of man, as in Luke iii. 6. Elsewhere it is used to imply the sensual part of our nature, as in 2 Cor. vii. 1. Hence it is employed to denote what is external and ceremonial, as opposed to what is inward and moral. In this sense it occurs in Gal. iii. 3. Morally, the word "flesh" is employed to denote the unrenewed nature of man, as in Gal. v. 19-21: "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft," &c. It is quite evident from this passage that it includes vices of the most flagrant and odious kind, not only those which are sensual and arise from the unrestrained indulgence of the bodily appetites, but those also which are more directly indebted for their origin to the suggestions of the Evil One. All sins, in fact, of whatever kind they are, may be described as carnal or fleshly in their nature, being in direct opposition to works of a spiritual kind. The former belong to the unrenewed, the latter to the renewed nature. Accordingly, to be "carnally minded" is declared by the Apostle Paul to be "death; but to be spiritually minded," to be "life and peace." As long as a man is under the influence of the flesh, or of his unsanctified heart, he is under the curse of a holy God, who, as he hates sin, must necessarily hate a sinful nature. Hence it is declared that "they who are in the flesh cannot please God," as not being renewed by his Spirit, and therefore still under his wrath and curse.

FLESH-HOOK, a three-pronged fork, mentioned in 1 Sam. ii. 13. It was used by the priests, under the Jewish economy, in drawing out the flesh from the kettle or caldron, when engaged in sacrifice. "All that the flesh-hook brought up," we are told, "the priest took for himself."

FLESH POT occurs only in Exod. xvi. 3. It was probably a bronze vessel, standing on three legs, appropriated for kitchen purposes, with a fire lighted beneath it.

FLIES. The species of flies are exceedingly numerous,—some with two, and some with four wings. They abound in warm and moist regions, as in Egypt, Chaldea, Palestine, and in the middle regions of Africa; and during the rainy seasons are very troublesome. In the Hebrew Scriptures, or in the ancient versions, are seven kinds of insects, which Bochart classes among muscæ, or flies.

M. Sonnini, speaking of Egypt, says: "Of insects there the most troublesome are the flies. Both man and beast are cruelly tormented with them. No idea can be formed of their obstinate rapacity when they wish to fix upon some part of the body. It is vain to drive them away; they return again in the self-same moment; and their perseverance wearies out the most patient spirit. They like to fasten themselves in preference on the corners of the eye, and on the edge of the eyelid—tender parts, towards which a gentle moisture attracts them." The Egyptians paid a superstitious worship to several sorts of flies and other insects. If, then, such was the superstitious homage of this people, nothing could be more suitable than the judgment brought upon them by Moses. They were punished by the very things they revered; and though they boasted of spells and charms, yet they could not ward off the evil.

How intolerable a plague of flies can prove is evident from the fact, that whole districts have been laid waste by them. Such was the fate of Myuns in Ionia, and of Alarnæ. The inhabitants were forced to quit these cities, not being able to stand against the flies and gnats with which they were pestered. Trajan was obliged to raise the siege of a city in Arabia, before which he had sat down, being driven away by the swarms of these insects. Hence different people had deities whose office it was to defend them against flies. Among these may be reckoned BAAL-ZEBUB (which see), the fly-god of Ekron: and hence Jupiter had the titles of apomnios, muiaeros, muiochoros, because he was supposed to expel flies, and especially to clear his temples of these insects.

Solomon observes, "Dead flies cause the apothecary's ointment to stink." Eccles. x. 1. "A fact well known," says Scheuchzer; "wherefore apothecaries take care to prevent flies from coming to their syrups and other fermentable preparations. For in all insects there is an acrid volatile salt, which, mixed with sweet or even alkaline substances, excites them to a brisk intestine motion, disposes them to fermentation, and to putrescence itself; by which the more volatile principles fly off, leaving the grosser behind: at the same time, the taste and odour are changed—the agreeable to fetid, the sweet to insipid." This verse is an illustration, by a very appropriate similitude, of the concluding assertion in the preceding chapter—that "one sinner destroyeth much good," as one dead fly spoils a whole vessel of precious ointment, which, in Eastern countries, was considered as very valuable. 2 Kings xx. 13. The application of this proverbial expression to a person's good name, which is elsewhere compared to sweet ointment (Eccles. vii. 1; Cant. i. 3), is remarkably significant. As a fly, though a diminutive creature, can taint and corrupt much precious perfume; so a small mixture of folly and indiscretion will tarnish the reputation of one who, in other respects, is very wise and honourable, and so much the more, because of the malignity and ingratitude of mankind, who are disposed rather to censure one error than to commend many excellences, and from whose minds one small miscarriage is sufficient to blot out the memory of all other deserts. It concerns us, therefore, to conduct ourselves unblamably, that we may not, by the least oversight or folly, blemish our profession, or cause it to be offensive to others.

FLINT. This word is found in Deut. viii. 15, xxxii. 13. The expression in Job xxviii. 9, rendered in our version "rock of flint," refers to a species of quartz or granite. Michaelis thinks that it denotes porphyry, which, he says, abounds about Horeb and Sinai.

FLOATS. In the message which Hiram, king of Tyre, sent to Solomon, (1 Kings v. 9) he states that he would convey the wood for the building of the temple in "floats;" which was probably by binding a number of planks together in regular order, and steering them down the current. This was probably the most ancient practice. The earliest ships or boats were nothing more than rafts, or a collection of deals and planks bound together. On the Nile a different kind of float is used, consisting of large earthen pitchers, bound closely together, and covered with leaves of palm trees. The man that conducts it, has commonly in his mouth a cord, with which he fishes as he passes on.

FLOCK. See SHEPHERD.

FLOOD. See DELUGE—ARK.

FLOOR, for threshing grain, is frequently referred to in the sacred writings. The threshing floor in the East is usually in the open air, and in the middle of a field, where the grain is trodden out by oxen. This appears to have been the case with the threshing-floor of Gideon, and also of Araunah the Jebusite, where an altar was built, and sacrifice was offered. From the usually exposed nature of the threshing-floor, we find the idolaters of Israel compared to the chaff that is driven with the whirlwind out of the floor.

Various methods were used for threshing out the grain. Isaiah mentions four different instruments, the flail, the drag, the wain, and the feet of oxen. Thus, speaking of the husbandman, the prophet declares, Isa. xxviii. 26–28: “For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him. For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod. Bread corn is bruised; because he will not ever be threshing it, nor break it with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen.” But the most common method of threshing, was by treading with oxen. Hence the enactment in Deut. xxv. 4: “Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn.” And again, Hos. x. 11: “And Ephraim is as an heifer that is taught, and loveth to tread out the corn; but I passed over upon her fair neck: I will make Ephraim to ride; Judah shall plow, and Jacob shall break his clods.” The threshing-floor, Sir Gardner Wilkinson informs us, was a level circular area, near the field or in the vicinity of the granary, where, when it had been well swept, the ears were deposited, and cattle were driven over it, to tread out the grain. “After the grain was trodden out, they winnowed it with wooden shovels; it was then carried to the granary in sacks, each containing a fixed quantity, which was determined by wooden measures, a scribe noting down the number as called by the teller who superintended its removal. Sweepers with small hand-brooms were employed to collect the scattered grain that fell from the measure; and the ‘immense heaps of corn’ mentioned by Diodorus, collected from ‘the field which was round about every city,’ fully accord with the representation of the paintings in the tombs, and with those seen at the present day in the villages of the Nile.”

Niebuhr, in his Travels, gives the following description of a machine which the people of Egypt use at this day for threshing out their grain: “This machine,” says he, “is called nauridsj. It has three rollers, which turn on their axles; and each of them is furnished with some irons, round and flat. At the beginning of June, Mr Forskall and I several times saw, in the environs of Dsjise, how corn was threshed in Egypt. Every peasant chose for himself, in the open field, a smooth plat of ground from eighty to a hundred paces in circumference. Hither was brought on camels or asses, the corn in sheaves; of which was formed a ring of six or eight feet wide, and two high. Two oxen were made to draw over it again and again the sledge (traineau) above mentioned; and this was done with the greatest convenience to the driver; for he was seated in a chair fixed on the sledge. Two such parcels or layers of corn are threshed out in a day, and they move each of them as many as eight times, with a wooden fork of five prongs, which they call meddre. Afterwards they throw the straw into the middle of the ring, where it forms a heap, which grows bigger and bigger. When the first layer is threshed, they replace the straw in the ring, and thresh it as before. Thus the straw becomes every time smaller, till at last it resembles chopped straw. After this, with the fork just described, they cast the whole some yards from thence, and against the wind; which driving back the straw, the corn and the ears not threshed out fall apart from it, and make another heap. A man collects the clods of dirt and other impurities to which any corn adheres, and throws them into a sieve. They afterwards place in a ring the heaps, in which a good many entire ears are still found, and drive over them, for four or five hours together, ten couple of oxen joined two and two, till by absolute trampling they have separated the grains, which they throw into the air with a shovel, to cleanse them.” Captain Light gives a particular account of it, as he saw it in 1814: “A frame of four feet wide, and as many high, consisting of three sides, was placed on wooden rollers, serving as axles to a number of thin circular iron plates, put in motion by a couple of oxen, driven by a boy, who sat on a cross-bar above the rollers, and moved over the straw as it lay in heaps on the ground after the grain had been trodden out.”

FLOUR. See BREAD—CAKES—OFFERINGS, &c.

FLOURISH, to bud, spring forth, appear beautiful as a flower. Cant. vii. 12. Christ's crown flourisheth when his authority and glory are signally displayed, and many become his faithful, loving, and obedient subjects. Ps. cxxxii. 18. The Church flourisheth when the ordinances are pure and powerful; her ministers faithful, wise, and diligent; and her members mightily increase, and walk as becomes the Gospel. Cant. vi. 11. Men in general flourish when they appear gay in youth, and prosper and increase in wisdom, honour, wealth, or pleasure. Ps. xc. 6, xcii. 7. Saints flourish when their grace, comforts, and good works, more and more abound. Isa. lxvi. 14.

FLOWER. This generic term is found in Job xiv. 2, and Isa. xl. 6. Flowers grow in great variety and abundance in Palestine. On this subject we may quote the following remarks of a very popular writer of the present day—the Rev. Dr J. Hamilton of London: “We cannot read the Sacred Writings, without a conviction that the Hebrews were a people who delighted in flowers and green fields, in trees and forests, in orchards and gardens. The two hundred and fifty botanical terms occurring in the original of the Old Testament, are enough to prove this. No collection of classic authors of equal bulk, and not expressly treating on the subject, could furnish such a catalogue; for it must be remembered that all these terms occur incidentally, in their poetry, history, and laws. Averse as they were to sculpture and all representations which could possibly be perverted to the idolatrous use of graven images, they made an exception here. Flowers, both singly and in wreaths, with the fruit of the pomegranate, formed a conspicuous part of the golden ornaments of the temple.

“When the Queen of Sheba came to behold the glory of Solomon, and to try him with hard questions, tradition records that one of her most ingenious puzzles was a bouquet of artificial flowers, so true to nature that the eye could detect no difference. This she presented to the royal naturalist, along with a similar nosegay of garden flowers, and required him, without smelling them, to decide which was the work of nature and which her own. That father of botany was so nonplussed, that he was obliged to refer the matter to the decision of a bee, which was buzzing through the apartment at the time, and which soon discovered that the queen's waxen flowers contained no honey.

"Trees and flowers enhanced the enjoyment, or relieved the gloom of almost every scene in Jewish life. Like the streets of modern Ispahan, their cities were sometimes adorned and shaded by plane trees growing beside the water courses. Even in towns, the vine was trained along the walls of their houses, and as it twined round the balustrade of the outer staircase, was both a graceful and a useful ornament. The courts of their houses usually rejoiced in the shade of some spreading sycamore or oak, and the open spaces in the areas of the public buildings were usually planted, except in the temple, where idolatrous associations occasioned a special prohibition. Gardens, and the shelter sometimes of a single tree, were the most frequent places of retirement and devotion; and it was there that the rabbis loved to sit and deal out their wisdom to obsequious disciples. The very rusties had a taste for flowers, and, by a usage of which the significance is not so obvious as the elegance, the grain newly heaped on the threshing floor was crowned with lilies, or some equally graceful garland. The pathways of their conquerors, and heroes, and great men, were, on high occasions, strewn with flowers and the leaves of the palm. Their feasts were culivened by the beauty and sweetened by the fragrance of flowers. Hence the apocryphal Solomon puts into the mouth of his voluptuary the truly Anaereontic ditty: 'Come on, let us enjoy the good things that are present. Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments; and let no flower of the spring pass by us. Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they be withered.' This propensity followed them to the grave; and, as the modern Egyptians deck the tombs of their relatives with palm leaves and the fragrant origanum, and the inhabitants of Aleppo plant myrtles in their cemeteries; so to plant or strew flowers upon them seems to have been one way of 'garnishing sepulchres' among the Jews. When Abraham bought the field at Machpelah for a burying-ground, besides the cave, special mention is made of the trees which surrounded it. And, whether or not it were by a common custom, the most interesting sepulchre on earth was in the garden of a Jew. And who does not recall that imagery from groves, and fields, and gardens, which sheds over the sacred poetry the glowing tints of Persian minstrelsy, and the fragrance of Arabian song? Not to quote the nobler, but well-known examples which the psalms, and canticles, and prophecies supply, their uninspired authors will almost bear out the assertion. Thus, in the description of Wisdom by the son of Sirach: 'I was exalted like a cedar in Lebanon, and as a cypress tree upon the mountains of Hermon. I was erect like a palm tree in En-gedi, as a rose plant in Jericho, like a fair olive in a pleasant field, and grew up as a plane tree by the water. I gave a sweet smell like cinnamon and asphaltus, and yielded a pleasant odour like the best myrrh, as galbanum and onyx, and fragrant storax, and as the fume of frankincense in the tabernacle.

As the fir tree I stretched out my branches, and my branches are the branches of honour and grace. As the vine brought I forth pleasant savour, and my flowers are the fruit of honour and riches.' In similar taste, but perhaps with greater beauty, Simon the high priest is elsewhere described, 'As the morning star in the midst of a cloud, as the rainbow lighted up among sunny clouds, as the flower of roses in the spring of the year, as lilies by the rivers of waters, and as the branches of the frankincense tree in the time of summer, as a fair olive tree budding forth fruit, and as a cypress tree which groweth up to the clouds.'

"In its better days, Palestine was 'the garden of the Lord; a land of brooks of water, of fountains, and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil-olive and barley.' The iniquities of that land have dried up many of its fountains, blasted its vines, and withered its fig trees; but the bee still murmurs on the fragrant cliffs of Carmel, and the black clusters of the olive yield their fatness in Gethsemane. The ruthless Maronites and Druses have not been able to exterminate the cedars of Lebanon; and at the Fountain of Siloam the moss springs out of the wall, as did the 'hyssop' in the days of Solomon. The almond tree flourishes along the Jordan, and, like a canopy of silver, shines against the sky of a cloudless spring, even as when it first invited the youth of Judah to the fields and villages, and its snowy blossoms on leafless branches reminded the sumptuous monarch of approaching age. Sycamores grow by the way-side, as when Zaccheus climbed into one to catch a glimpse of the illustrious Stranger; and the Arabian pitches his tent beneath the terebinth, like Abraham when he received his angel visitors at Mamre. Jericho was the city of palm trees in the time of Moses; with the leaves of the palm the jubilant procession carpeted the pathway of their King as they conducted him to Jerusalem from Jericho; and probably most of us have seen dates from Jericho. The pine, cypress, and myrtle, still cast their shadow, though no feast of tabernacles returns, whose bowers they once adorned. Sharon has not lost its rose; and near the Mount of Beatitudes we recognise the gorgeous amaryllis, the descendant of those very lilies to which the Divine Teacher pointed one autumn evening eighteen hundred years ago, and bade his disciples 'consider' them, with a feeling which the greatest botanist of his day (Smith) has characterized 'as the highest honour ever done to the study of plants.' Hasselquist was charmed with the jasmine of Palestine; another traveller speaks with rapture of the delicious odour which sprang at every step of his way from Jerusalem to Jaffa, when the long-looked-for rains had revived the rosemary, thyme, balm, and other aromatic herbs; and Maundrell understood the allusion of the Prophet Hosea (xiv. 7), in the Glen of Lebanon, where Canobin lies embosomed. This valley 'is on both sides exceeding steep and high, clothed with fragrant greens from top to bottom, and everywhere plentifully refreshed with fountains, falling down from the rocks in pleasant cascades—the ingenious work of nature.'

FLUTE, a musical instrument, sometimes mentioned in Scripture by the names chalil, machalath, masrokoth, and huggab. The last word is generally translated organ; but Calmet thinks it was nothing more than a flute.

FLUX, BLOODY, another name for the dysentery. Acts xxviii. 8.

FO, FOHI, the venerated founder, among the Chinese, of a system of religion introduced in the first century of the Christian era. This eminent personage is said to have been born in Cashmere, about B.C. 1027. He professed to work miracles, and to inculcate a new theological system, which he expressed in figurative and enigmatical language. He taught that the principle of all things is the void and nothing from which all things spring, and to which all things return. His doctrines were exoteric and esoteric. The exoteric doctrines of Fohi formed a very crude and imperfect system of morality. The moral distinction between good and evil was admitted, and a system of retribution in a future life was plainly taught. The moral duties he reduced to five: not to kill any creature, not to steal, not to commit unchastity, not to speak falsely, and not to drink wine. The esoteric doctrines into which Fohi initiated only his most favoured disciples, are thus described by Dr Henderson:—

“The principal esoteric or secret doctrines, into which but few are initiated, are the following: The origin and end of all things is the void and nothing. The first human beings have sprung from nothing, and are returned to nothing. The void constitutes our being. All things, living and inanimate, constitute one whole; differing from each other not in essence, but only in form and qualities. The original essence of all things is pure, unchangeable, highly subtle, and simple; and because it is simple, the perfection of all other beings. It is perfect, and therefore exists in an uninterrupted quiet, without possessing virtue, power, or intelligence; nay, its very essence consists in the absence of intelligence, activity, and want or desire. Whoever desires to be happy, must constantly endeavour to conquer themselves, and become like the original essence. To accomplish this, he must accustom himself not to act, desire, feel, nor think. The great precept was, ‘Endeavour to annihilate thyself; for as soon as thou ceasest to be thyself, thou becomest one with God, and returnest into his being.’ The other followers of Fo adopt the doctrine of the void and nothing, and the transmigration of souls; but teach that they enter ultimately the class of Samanœans, and finally appear in the bodies of perfect Samanœans, who have no more crimes to expiate, and need no longer to revere the gods, who are only the servants of the Supreme God of the universe. This supreme, unoriginated Being cannot be represented by any image; neither can he be worshipped, because he is elevated above all worship; but his attributes may be represented, adored, and worshipped. Hence the source of the worship of images by the natives of India, and of the multitude of particular tutelary deities in China. All the elements, the changes of the weather, &c., have each its particular genius; and all these gods are servants or officers of the Supreme God.” “We find,” says Dr Henry, in explaining the system of philosophy, “at the beginning of the Chinese philosophy, under an image proper to that philosophy, a conception which always appears at the head of all theological theories. It is this: that the human mind has always conceived the primitive ground or root of all things as in God; this is that incomprehensible something which can be conceived only as the support, the absolute basis of everything that exists, or, to speak after the Chinese fashion, the great summit which sustains the existence of all other beings. This figure of language is in some respects strikingly significant. The word substance, support, basis, expresses in itself something which lies beneath, but God is above all. It is needful, therefore, to indicate at once these two relations; and this is well expressed by the Chinese term which represents God as a ‘sublime support.’

“But the great summit, inaccessible, impenetrable to human intelligence, is not a blind and formless principle. It is Li and Tao, reason and law; and, as such, reveals itself to our minds.

“The conception of the universe in the Y-King contains an idea common also to nearly all philosophies. The creation which proceeds from the grand summit comprehends two subordinate principles, the one active, the other passive. The Chin, the genii, which are the forces of nature, are eminently the active principle; matter is, compared with them, the passive principle, moved and directed by them. But by the distinction of two kinds of matter, the Yang, in virtue of its perfection, is considered as active relatively to the Yin or imperfect matter.

“These two great principles of nature enter also into the composition of man, who is thus a lesser world, a microcosm of the universe.

“Whatever may be the precise character or value of the theory of numbers, one cannot help remarking with interest, in one of the first attempts of ancient philosophy, the germ of the idea that the operations of nature correspond in certain respects to mathematical laws. We meet with this idea in all periods of philosophy. It has been often a barren, unproductive idea; yet the movement was to go on till at length it received a great and legitimate application, on which depended the progress of the physical sciences.”

FOAM, to cast forth as a raging sea. Foaming at the mouth is expressive of rage, or tormenting inward pain. Mark ix. 18. Seducers foam out their own shame, when, from a corrupt heart, and with rage against Christ and his ways, they publish their vain and erroneous doctrines, and indulge themselves in shameful practices. Jude 13. The King of Samaria was cut off as the foam of water. Some of their last kings were basely murdered; and Hoshea, the last, was easily and quickly ruined, and reduced to abject slavery. Hos. x. 7.

FODDER. The Hebrew word which is translated “fodder,” in Job vi. 5, is rendered in Job xxiv. 6, “corn,” and on the margin “mingled corn or dredge;” whereas in Isa. xxx. 24, it is rendered “provender.” Gesenius says, “The two latter passages are most clearly understood by a reference to the Roman farrago, which consisted of barley or oats, mixed with vetches and beans, which were sown and reaped together.”

FOLD, a house, or small enclosure, for flocks to rest together in by night, or at noon. Isa. xiii. 20. The country which a nation possesseth and dwelleth together in, is called their fold. Jer. xxiii. 3. The Church and ordinances of Christ are as a fold: there his sheep or people are gathered together; they enter by him as the door, and have strict union, and delightful society, and pleasant refreshment and rest together, and are surrounded with his protection and laws. John x. 1.

FOLLOW. To follow the Lord is to choose him as our portion, observe his laws, imitate his perfections, and cleave to his worship. Jer. xvii. 16. To follow Christ, the Lamb of God, is, under the direction and influence of his Word and Spirit, to depend on him.

FOOD. The Hebrews seem to have indulged in food of the simplest kind; such as bread, milk, rice, honey, and vegetables. They do not appear to have used animal food except on rare occasions, particularly at their appointed festivals. While the Israelites dwelt in Egypt, the nature of their ordinary food is mentioned in Numb. xi. 5: "We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick." How plain the food of the patriarchs was, appears from the pottage of lentiles and bread which Jacob had prepared and Esau coveted. The food with which Abraham entertained the three angels is thus described, Gen. xviii. 6, 7: "And Abraham hastened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth. And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetched a calf tender and good, and gave it unto a young man; and he hasted to dress it." And when the same patriarch dismissed Hagar and her son, he took bread and a bottle of water, and presented them to Hagar. The bread was generally made of wheat or barley, or lentiles and beans. Parched corn, in ancient as well as in modern times, formed a common article of food in the East. The oriental loaves were very small, three of them being required for the meal of a single person, as appears from Luke xi. 5, 6: "And he said unto them, Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves; for a friend of mine in his journey has come to me, and I have nothing to set before him?" To evince their hospitality, the Hebrews boiled or roasted the flesh of sheep and oxen and fat cattle. Among the delicacies at an Eastern meal, a prominent place is assigned to honey. Butter is often mentioned in Scripture along with honey; and to describe the fertility of Canaan, it is termed a land flowing with milk and honey. The shoulder of a lamb well roasted, and covered with butter and milk, is another delicacy which the Orientals greatly value. The Hebrews were forbidden by the law of Moses to eat of particular animals, which were accounted unclean. The regulations concerning clean and unclean animals are laid down in Lev. xi. and Deut. xiv. (See ANIMAL.) It appears from sacred Scripture that the antediluvians had not used animal food. Thus the original grant made to Adam is couched in these words, Gen. i. 29: "And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat;" but the grant made to Noah is thus expressed, Gen. ix. 3, 4: "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things. But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat."

FOOL, one who has not the use of reason or judgment. In Scripture, wicked persons are often called fools, or foolish, because such act contrary to reason, trust to their own hearts, violate the laws of God, and prefer things vile, trifling, and temporal, to such as are important, divine, and eternal.

Our Lord seems to have used the term in a sense somewhat peculiar, in Matt. v. 22: "Whosoever shall say to his brother, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire." But the whole verse shows the meaning to be, that when any one of his professed disciples indulges a temper and disposition of mind opposite to charity, or that peculiar love which the brethren of Christ are bound by his law to have towards each other (John xiii. 34), not only evincing anger against another without a cause, but also treating him with contemptuous language, he shall be in danger of eternal destruction.

FOOLISH SPEAKING, such kind of conversation as includes folly, and can no way be profitable and interesting. Eph. v. 4. Facetiousness, indeed, is allowable, when it ministers to harmless amusement, and to pleasant conversation,—when it is used for the purpose of exposing things which are base and vile,—when it has for its aim the reformation of others,—when used by way of defence under unjust reproach; but all such kind of speaking as includes profane jesting, loose, wanton, scurrilous, injurious, unseasonable, vain-glorious talk, is strictly forbidden.

FOOLS, FEAST OF. Under this name absurd festivals were held in several countries of Europe, from the fifth century onward to the Reformation. These ridiculous ceremonies had their origin in the heathen Saturnalia, and like them were accompanied with various extravagant observances. The Feast of Fools took place usually on New Year, but the festival was prolonged from Christmas to the last Sunday of Epiphany. The young people, who took the principal part, commenced with choosing for themselves an archbishop of fools, whom they made a farce of consecrating in the principal church of the place. At the conclusion of this idle ceremony, the newly-elected archbishop either said high mass himself, or ordered it to be said in his presence; and during the performance of this pretended sacred rite, the rest of the actors engaged in indecent songs and dances, and other foolish practices, in the church. This festival was openly encouraged by many of the clergy in those days of Popish darkness; but at length it was condemned by popes and councils, and in course of time utterly prohibited. The festival, however, was not finally abolished before the Reformation.

FOOTMAN. From a remark in 1 Sam. viii. 11, it would appear that the custom which still prevails in Persia, of having footmen to run beside the chariots of kings, had been known and practised at a very early period. In Jer. xii. the prophet complains of the prosperity of the wicked, and laments his own trials, when God answers him by the proverbial expression referring to the custom which we have just noticed: "If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses?"—implying that other and greater trials were in store for him.

FOOTSTOOL. The common manner of sitting, in the Eastern countries, is upon the ground, or floor, with the legs crossed. People of distinction have the floors of their chambers covered with carpets for this purpose; and round the chamber broad couches, raised a little above the floor, spread with mattresses handsomely covered, which are called sofas. When sitting is spoken of as a posture of more than ordinary state, it is quite of a different kind, and means sitting on high, on a chair of state or throne, for which a footstool was necessary, both in order that the person might raise himself up to it, and for supporting the legs when he was placed in it. "Chairs," says Sir John Chardin, "are never used in Persia, but at the coronation of their kings, when the monarch is seated in a chair of gold set with jewels, three feet high. The chairs which are used by the people in the East are always so high as to make a footstool necessary; and this proves the propriety of the style of Scripture, which always joins the footstool to the throne. Isa. lxvi. 1; Ps. cx. 1."

FORBEARANCE is the act of patiently enduring provocation or offence. The following may be considered as the most powerful incentives to the exercise of this disposition: (1.) The consideration that we ourselves often stand in need of it from others. Gal. vi. 1. (2.) The express command of Scripture. Eph. iv. 2; Col. iii. 13. (3.) The felicity of this disposition. It is sure to bring happiness at last, while resentment only increases our own misery. (4.) That it is one of the strongest evidences we can give of the reality of our religion. John xiii. 35. (5.) The beautiful example of Christ. Heb. xii. 3; 1 Pet. ii. 21-23.

FORBEARANCE OF GOD. See PATIENCE OF GOD.

FORD, a place at which a river may be safely crossed. Thus the ford of the Jabbok is referred to in Gen. xxxii. 22, 23; and the ford of the Jordan in Judg. iii. 28.

FOREHEAD, MARK ON THE. Ezek. ix. 4. Mr. Maurice, speaking of the religious rites of the Hindus, says, before they can enter the great pagoda, an indispensable ceremony takes place, which can only be performed by the hand of a Brahman; and that is, the impression of their foreheads with the tiluk, or mark of different colours, as they may belong either to the sect of Vishnu or Shiva. If the temple be that of Vishnu, their foreheads are marked with a longitudinal line, and the colour used is vermilion. If it be the temple of Shiva, they are marked with a straight line, and the colour used is turmeric or saffron. But these two grand sects being again subdivided into numerous classes, both the size and the shape of the tiluk are varied, in proportion to their superior or inferior rank. In regard to the tiluk, I must observe, that it was a custom of very ancient date in Asia to mark their servants in the forehead. It is alluded to in these words of Ezekiel, where the Almighty commands his angels to "go through the midst of the city, and set a mark on the foreheads of the men who sigh for the abominations committed in the midst thereof." The same idea occurs also in Rev. vii. 3, xxii. 4. Bond-servants or slaves were not only marked upon the forehead, as a punishment for offences or for attempts to escape from servitude, but to distinguish them as the property of their masters. The mark usually consisted of the name, or some peculiar character belonging to the master. Votaries of the gods among the heathen, were marked with signs, intended to denote that they were the devoted servants and worshippers of the god whose symbols they bore. That the Christians soon adopted a modification of this custom, by impressing the figure of the cross, or the monogram of Jesus Christ, upon their arms, we learn from Procopius and others. They were in ancient times formed either by the impress of a hot iron, or by the punctures of needles, afterwards rubbed over with a colouring powder or composition, and were indelible.

FOREIGNER, a sojourner, a stranger dwelling in another country. In the New Testament, it is sometimes used for a person not enjoying the privileges of citizenship. Thus in Eph. ii. 19: "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God."

FOREKNOWLEDGE OF GOD, is his foresight or knowledge of every thing that is to come to pass. Acts ii. 23. "This foreknowledge," says Charnock, "was from eternity. Seeing he knows things possible in his power, and things future in his will, if his power and resolves were from eternity, his knowledge must be so too; or else we must make him ignorant of his own power, and ignorant of his own will from eternity, and consequently not from eternity blessed and perfect. His knowledge of possible things must run parallel with his will. If he willed from eternity, he knew from eternity what he willed; but that he did will from eternity we must grant, unless we would render him changeable, and conceive him to be made in time of not willing, willing. The knowledge God hath in time was always one and the same, because his understanding is his proper essence, as perfect as his essence, and of an immutable nature."

"To deny this," says Saurin, "is to degrade the Almighty; for what, pray, is a God who created beings, and who could not foresee what would result from their existence—a God who formed spirits united to bodies by certain laws, and who did not know how to combine these laws so as to foresee the effects they would produce—a God forced to suspend his judgment—a God who every day learns something new, and who doth not know to-day what will happen to-morrow—a God who cannot tell whether peace will be concluded, or war continue to ravage the world; whether religion will be received in a certain kingdom, or whether it will be banished; whether the right heir will succeed to the crown, or whether the crown will be set on the head of an usurper? For according to the different determinations of the wills of men—of king, or people—the prince will make peace, or declare war; religion will be banished or admitted; the tyrant or lawful king will occupy the throne. But if God cannot foresee how the volitions of men will be determined, he cannot foresee any of these events. What is this but to degrade God from his deity, and to make the most perfect of all intelligences a being involved in darkness and uncertainty like ourselves?" See OMNISCIENCE.

The whole work of human redemption may be viewed as resolving itself into the divine foreknowledge. Thus, in describing the various steps through which the child of God is made to pass, the origin of the whole is traced back to this foreknowledge. "Whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate." Rom. viii. 29. But sometimes the foreknowledge of God includes, in Scripture language, his approbation. Thus Romans xi. 2: "God hath not cast away his people whom he foreknew."

FOREORDAIN. This word is used to denote that act of God whereby, from all eternity, he determined and appointed whatever he would do or permit to be done in time. It is important to draw a distinction between the effective and the permissive decrees of God. His effective decree has a reference to all the good that happens; while his permissive decree has a reference to the evil that is done by men. An action may be, abstractly speaking, the object of the former decree, and its sinfulness the object of the latter. "It has been objected," says Dr Shaw, "that if God has foreordained whatsoever comes to pass, human liberty is taken away. To this it has been commonly replied, that it is sufficient to human liberty that a man acts without any constraint, and according to his own free choice; that the divine deceit is extrinsic to the human mind; and, while it secures the futurity of events, it leaves rational agents to act as freely as if there had been no decree." "We feel," says Dr Dick, "that, although not independent upon God, we are free; so that we excuse ourselves when we have done our duty, and accuse ourselves when we have neglected it. Sentiments of approbation and disapprobation, in reference to our own conduct or that of other men, would have no existence in our minds if we believed that men are necessary agents. But the tie which connects the divine decrees and human liberty is invisible. 'Such knowledge is too wonderful for us; it is high, we cannot attain unto it.'—Ps. cxxxix. 6."

FORERUNNER, one who goes before, for the purpose, generally, of preparing the way for some person who is about to follow. Thus John the Baptist was the forerunner of Christ. Kings and nobles in the East are wont, before setting out on a journey, to send one or more persons as forerunners, to make all due preparations on the road by which they are to pass. Christ himself is spoken of as his people's forerunner to heaven, Heb. vi. 20: "Whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec." And in this character he speaks of himself, John xiv. 2, 3, "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." Thus Christ leads the way to heaven.

FORESKIN. See CIRCUMCISION.

FOREST, a woody tract of ground. There were several such tracts in Canaan, especially in the northern parts. The chief of these were,

THE FOREST OF EPHRAIM, near Mahanaim.

THE FOREST OF HARETH, in Judah.

THE FOREST OF LEBANON. In addition to the proper forest of Lebanon, where the cedars grow, Scripture thus calls a palace which Solomon built at Jerusalem, contiguous to the palace of the King of Egypt's daughter, and in which he usually resided. All the vessels of it were of gold. It was called the House of the Forest of Lebanon, probably from the great quantity of cedar used in it. 1 Kings vii. 2, x. 17.

FORGET. Men forget God, when they neglect to think of and worship him; when they break his laws, and pour contempt on anything pertaining to him. Judg. iii. 7. Men forget Jerusalem, when they are thoughtless of and unconcerned how things go in the Church. Ps. cxxxvii. 5. God's elect forget their fathers' house and their own people; in embracing Christianity, the Jews quitted their own ceremonies and temple; in receiving Christ, every one quits his natural dispositions, false persuasions, self-righteousness, and sinful customs, and parts with natural relations, so as to prefer Christ to all. Ps. xlv. 10. Saints forget the things behind, when they disesteem their works and attainments, and think of, and press after, further knowledge of, intimacy with, and conformity to, Christ. Phil. iii. 13, 14.

FORGIVENESS, CHRISTIAN, the pardon of any offence committed against us. The Christian Lawgiver, while forbidding the retaliation of injuries, hath suspended the exercise of forgiveness among his disciples upon the repentance of the transgressor, or on an acknowledgment of having done wrong. "If he repent, forgive him." Matt. xviii. 15-35, compared with Luke xvii. 3, 4. But when the sin or trespass is confessed, the forgiveness must be prompt and from the very heart; free from all mental reservation; no grudging, no evil surmising must be entertained: in their manner of forgiving, Christians must imitate that divine pattern which their heavenly Father hath set them, when, "for Christ's sake, he forgave them." Col. iii. 12, 13; Eph. iv. 32. And he has bound them in the most solemn manner to the exercise of this duty, under the awful penalty of not having their own daily trespasses forgiven, and themselves rejected in the great day of account. Matt. vi. 12, 14, 15, xviii. 21-35. To all which may be added, that Christianity, in the most pointed manner, forbids its friends to retaliate injuries which they may sustain from the unbelieving world; but, on the contrary, they are to "love their enemies, to bless those that curse them, to do good to such as hate them, and to pray for those who despitefully use and persecute them." Matt. v. 44. "This," says an ingenious writer, "was a lesson so new and utterly unknown, till taught by his doctrine, and enforced by his example, that the wisest moralists of the wisest nations and ages represented the desire of revenge as a mark of a noble mind. But how much more magnanimous, how much more beneficial to mankind, is forgiveness! It is more magnanimous, because every generous and exalted disposition of the human mind is requisite to the practice of it; and it is the most beneficial, because it puts an end to an eternal succession of injuries and retaliations." It has been truly said, "The feuds and animosities in families, and between neighbours, which disturb the intercourse of human life, and collectively compose half the misery of it, have their foundation in the want of a forgiving temper, and can never cease but by the exercise of this virtue on one side, or on both."

FORGIVENESS OF SINS. See PARDON—MERCY.

FORK. A pointed and probably a three-pronged instrument, mentioned in 1 Sam. xiii. 21.

FORM, the figure or shape of anything. It is sometimes used in Scripture to denote outward beauty, as in Isa. liii. 2: "He hath no form nor comeliness," that is, the appearance of the Messiah was not such as to attract the Jews. In 2 Tim. iii. 5, "Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof," the word "form" denotes simply the external aspect. The passage, however, in which the term occurs in a peculiar connection is Phil. ii. 6-8, which runs thus: "Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." For an exposition of this much disputed passage, see the article FORM OF GOD.

FORMALIST, one who places his dependence on the outward ceremonies of religion, or who is more tenacious of the form of religion than the power of it. 2 Tim. iii. 5.

FORM OF GOD. Phil. ii. 6. This remarkable expression has been made the subject of endless criticism, and as it is of no small importance that it should be well understood, as bearing upon the person of Christ, we shall satisfy ourselves with subjoining Dr Macknight's note on the place: "As the apostle is speaking of what Christ was before he took the form of a servant, the form of God of which he is said to have divested himself, (verse 7), when he became man, cannot be anything which he possessed during his incarnation, or in his divested state; consequently neither the opinion of Erasmus, that 'the form of God' consisted in those sparks of divinity by which Christ during his incarnation manifested his Godhead, nor the opinion of the Socinians, that it consisted in the power of working miracles, is well-founded. For Christ did not divest himself either of the one or the other, but possessed both, all the time of his public ministry. In like manner, the opinion of those, who, by 'the form of God' understand the divine nature, and the government of the world, cannot be admitted; since Christ, when he became man, could not divest himself of the nature of God. And with respect to the government of the world, we are led, by what the apostle says (Heb. i. 3), to believe he did not part with that; but in his divested state still upheld all things by the word of his power. The opinion of Whitby, therefore, and others, seems better founded, who, by 'the form of God,' understand that glorious state in which the Deity is said to dwell (1 Tim. vi. 16), and in which he manifested himself to the patriarchs of old (Deut. v. 22-24), and which was commonly accompanied with a numerous retinue of angels (Ps. lxxviii. 17), and which in Scripture is called the similitude (Numb. xii. 8), the face (Ps. xxxi. 16), the presence (Exod. xxxiii. 15), and the shape of God (John v. 37). This interpretation is supported by the term here used, which signifies a person's external appearance, and not his nature or essence. Mark xvi. 12; Matt. xvii. 2. Further, this interpretation agrees with the fact: 'The form of God'—that is, the visible glory, and the attendance of angels above described,—the Son of God enjoyed with his Father, before the world was (John xvii. 5), and on that, as on other accounts, he is 'the brightness of the Father's glory' (Heb. i. 3); but he divested himself thereof when he assumed human nature. Lastly, this sense of the words 'form of God,' is confirmed by the meaning of 'form of a servant' (verse 7), which evidently denotes the state or appearance and behaviour of a servant."

FORMS OF PRAYER. See PRAYER.

FORNICATION, whoredom, or the act of incontinency between single persons; for if either of the parties be married, it is adultery. While the Scriptures give no sanction to those austerities which have been imposed on men under the idea of religion; so, on the other hand, they give no liberty for the indulgence of any propensity that would either militate against our own interest or that of others. It is in vain to argue the innocency of fornication from the natural passion implanted in us, since "marriage is honourable in all," and wisely appointed for the prevention of those evils which would otherwise ensue; and besides, the existence of any natural propensity in us is no proof that it is to be gratified without any restriction. That fornication is both unlawful and unreasonable may be easily seen, if we consider—1. That our Saviour expressly declares this to be a crime. Mark vii. 21, 23. 2. That the Scriptures declare that fornicators cannot inherit the kingdom of God. 1 Cor. vi. 9; Heb. xii. 16; Gal. v. 19-21. 3. Fornication sinks into a mere brutal commerce a gratification which was designed to be the cement of a sacred, generous, and tender friendship. 4. It leaves the maintenance and education of children, as to the father at least, utterly unsecured. 4. It strongly tempts the guilty female to guard herself from infamy by methods of procuring abortion, which not only destroys the child, but often the mother. 6. It disqualifies the deluded creatures from being either good wives or mothers, in any future marriage, ruining that modesty which is the guardian of nuptial happiness. 7. It absolutely disqualifies a man for the best satisfactions—those of truth, virtue, innocent gratifications, tender and generous friendship. 8. It often propagates a disease which may be accounted one of the sorest maladies of human nature, and the effects of which are said to visit the constitution of even distant generations.

FORSAKE. Men forsake God and his law when they disregard and contemn him, and disobey his law, deny his truth, neglect his worship, and depend not on his fulness. Jer. xvii. 13, ix. 13. God seemingly forsakes his people when he withdraws his sensible presence, and withholds his assistance and comfort (Ps. lxxi. 11, xxii. 1; Isa. xlix. 14); but he never forsakes them as to real love, or such influence as is absolutely necessary for the subsistence of their graces. Heb. xiii. 5; Ps. xxxvii. 28. See DESERTION.

FORT, signifying a castle or fortress situated on a mountain, is in our version rendered "fort" in 2 Sam. v. 9, and "castle" in 1 Chron. xi. 7. Fortresses were often erected on the tops of hills, and in the mountain fastnesses.

FORTIFICATIONS. See ARMS—ARMY.

FORTITUDE is a virtue or quality of the mind, generally considered the same as courage; though in a more accurate sense they seem to be distinguishable. Courage resists danger—fortitude supports pain. Courage may be a virtue or vice according to the circumstances; fortitude is always a virtue: we speak of desperate courage, but not of desperate fortitude. A contempt or neglect of dangers may be called courage; but fortitude is the virtue of a rational and considerate mind, and is founded in a sense of honour and a regard to duty.

Christian fortitude may be defined that state of mind which arises from truth and confidence in God; enables us to stand collected and undisturbed in the time of difficulty and danger; and is at an equal distance from rashness on the one hand, and pusillanimity on the other. Fortitude takes different names, according as it acts in opposition to different evils; but some of those names are applied with considerable latitude. With respect to danger in general, fortitude has been called intrepidity; with respect to the dangers of war, valour; with respect to pain of body, or distress of mind, patience; with respect to labour, activity; with respect to injury, forbearance; with respect to our condition in general, magnanimity.

Christian fortitude is necessary to vigilance, patience, self-denial, and perseverance; and is requisite under affliction, temptation, persecution, desertion, and death. The noble cause in which the Christian is engaged, the glorious Master whom he serves, the provision that is made for his security, the illustrious examples set before him, the approbation of a good conscience, and the grand prospect he has in view, are all powerful motives to the exercise of this grace.

FORTUNATUS. Paul speaks of Fortunatus as having, along with Stephanas and Achaicus, refreshed his own spirit and that of the Corinthian believers, and as having been set for the service of the Church.

FOUNDATION, that part of a building on which the whole superstructure rests. The utmost caution and care must be exercised in laying a secure found-dation, and the necessity of this is strikingly shown in the closing words of our Lord's sermon on the Mount. Matt. vii. 24-27: "Therefore, whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it." In this passage Jesus plainly teaches us that each man is engaged in building either for time or for eternity—that every thing depends on the foundation; and on the day of retribution, our everlasting destiny will turn upon one point—whether we are or are not resting on the sure foundation. The Word of God plainly assures us that "other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Isa. xxviii. 16: "Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth shall not make haste." This text is quoted by the apostle Peter, and expressly applied to Christ. 1 Pet. ii. 6. Christ, then, is the only foundation on which the sinner can safely rest for salvation. Christ also is the foundation of the church, the corner-stone, which unites and consolidates the whole building. "And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit." Eph. ii. 20-22. The temple of Diana at Ephesus was a master-piece of architectural skill; and even Lord Shaftesbury, in his Miscellanies, openly acknowledges his admiration of the felicitous manner in which the apostle addresses the Ephesians in the above passage, containing as it does beautiful architectural allusions. He speaks to them of a spiritual temple infinitely more glorious, secure, and abiding, than that idolatrous temple in whose beauty and magnificence they so highly prided themselves.

FOUNDER. God and his prophets are likened to a founder, because, by the judgments declared by the prophets, and executed by God, nations are melted with trouble, to purge off their dross, and change them into a conformity to his will. Jer. vi. 29.

FOUNTAIN, is properly the source or spring-head of waters. There were several celebrated fountains in Judea, such as that of Rogel, of Gihon, of Siloam, of Nazareth, &c., and allusions to them are often to be met with in both the Old and New Testament. Dr. Chandler, in his Travels in Asia Minor, says: "The reader, as we proceed, will find frequent mention of fountains. Their number is owing to the nature of the country and the climate. The soil, parched and thirsty, demands moisture to aid vegetation; and a cloudless sun, which inflames the air, requires for the people the verdure, with shade and air, its agreeable attendants. Hence fountains are met with not only in the towns and villages, but in the fields and gardens, and by the side of the roads, and of the beaten tracks on the mountains. Many of them are the useful donations of humane persons while living, or have been bequeathed by them as legacies on their decease."

As water in Eastern countries is very highly prized on account of its scarcity, the discovery of a fountain is often to the traveller an event of the greatest interest and importance. A newly found well was usually reported to the head of the tribe, who took possession of it with formal ceremonies, distinguished it by his own name, and watched over the rare and inestimable treasure with the same care that he bestowed on the protection of his most valuable property. The great value attached to a fountain throws light upon the comparison which Jeremiah makes of Jehovah to "a fountain of living waters." Jer. ii. 13. Zechariah also predicts concerning the blood of Christ under the same significant figure, "In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness." Zech. xiii. 1. An allusion of the same kind occurs in Joel iii. 18: "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the mountains shall drop down new wine, and the hills shall flow with milk, and all the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters, and a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord, and shall water the valley of Shittim."

When we think of the importance attached in Oriental countries to fountains of water, we cannot wonder at the frequency with which sacred imagery is connected with such springs. Even Jesus, as he stands by the pool of Siloam, makes use of the same figure, comparing the refreshing influences of the Holy Spirit in the souls of his people to "a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

FOWL. See BIRDS.

FOWLER. This term is applied to one who captures birds. It appears to have been chiefly by nets and snares that birds were caught among the Hebrews. Thus Solomon, speaking of the want of consideration and forethought by which the profligate are characterized: "Till a dart strike through his liver; as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life." Prov. vii. 23. And again, to show how little human foresight avails, he remarks: "For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them." Eccles. ix. 12. In Ps. xci. 3 it is also said: "Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence." There is scarcely any process now followed in the art of fowling or snaring birds which was not known and practised in very early times.

FOX, or JACKAL. This animal is called in Scripture shual, probably from his burrowing, or making holes in the earth, to hide himself, or to dwell in. The Septuagint renders it by alōpēx, the fox; so the Vulgate, vulpes; and our English translation, fox. But still it is no easy matter to determine whether the animal intended be the common fox or the jackal—the little Eastern fox, as Hasselquist calls him. Several of the modern Oriental names of the jackal, from their resemblance to the Hebrew, favour the latter interpretation; and Dr. Shaw, and other travellers, inform us, that while jackals are very numerous in Palestine, the common fox is rarely to be met with.

We shall be safe, perhaps, under these circumstances, in admitting, with Shaw, Taylor, and other critics and writers on natural history, that the Hebrew shual is the jackal of the East. We shall first describe this animal, and then notice those passages of Scripture in which he is spoken of.

The jackal, or thaleb, as he is called in Arabia and Egypt, is said to be of the size of a middling dog, resembling the fox in the hinder parts, particularly the tail; and the wolf in the fore parts, especially the nose. Its legs are shorter than those of the fox, and its colour is of a bright yellow. There seem to be many varieties among them. Those of the warmest climates appear to be the largest; and their colour is rather of a reddish-brown than of that beautiful yellow by which the smaller jackal is chiefly distinguished.

Although the species of the wolf approaches very near to that of the dog, yet the jackal seems to be placed between them. To the savage fierceness of the wolf it adds the impudent familiarity of the dog. Its cry is a howl, mixed with barking, and a lamentation resembling that of human distress. It is more noisy in its pursuits even than the dog, and more voracious than the wolf. The jackal never goes alone, but always in a pack of forty or fifty together. These unite regularly every day, to form a combination against the rest of the forest. Nothing then can escape them. They are content to take up with the smallest animals; and yet, when thus united, they have courage to face the largest. They seem very little afraid of mankind, but pursue their game to the very doors, testifying neither attachment nor apprehension. They enter insolently into the sheepfolds, the yards, and the stables, and, when they can find nothing else, devour the leather harness, boots, and shoes, and run off with what they have not time to swallow. They not only attack the living, but the dead. They scratch up with their feet the new-made grave, and devour the corpse, how putrid soever. In those countries, therefore, where they abound, the natives are obliged to beat the earth over the grave, and to mix it with thorns, to prevent the jackals from scraping it away. They always assist each other as well in this employment of exhumation as in that of the chase, and while at their dreary work, exhort each other by a most mournful cry, resembling that of children under chastisement; and when they have thus dug up the body they share it amicably between them. Like all other savage animals, when they have once tasted human flesh, they can never after refrain from pursuing mankind. They watch the burying-grounds, follow armies, and keep in the rear of caravans. They may be considered as the vulture of the quadruped kind. Everything that once had animal life seems equally agreeable to them; the most putrid substances are greedily devoured; dried leather, and anything that has been rubbed with grease, how insipid soever in itself, is sufficient to make the whole go down. Such is the character which naturalists have furnished of the jackal, or Egyptian fox: let us see what references are made to it in Scripture. To its carnivorous habits there is an allusion in Ps. lxxiii. 9, 10: "Those that seek my soul, to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth: they shall fall by the sword; they shall be a portion for foxes." And to its ravages in the vineyard Solomon refers in Cant. ii. 15: "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes." In Scripture, says Professor Paxton, the Church is often compared to a vineyard; her members to the vines with which it is stored; and by consequence, the grapes may signify all "the fruits of righteousness" which those mystical vines produce. The foxes that spoil these vines must therefore mean false teachers, who corrupt the purity of doctrine, obscure the simplicity of worship, overturn the beauty of appointed order, break the unity of believers, and extinguish the life and vigour of Christian practice.

At the feast of Ceres, the goddess of corn, celebrated annually at Rome about the middle of April, there was the observance of this custom, to fix burning torches to the tails of a number of foxes, and to let them run through the circus till they were burnt to death. This was done in revenge upon that species of animals for having once burnt up the fields of corn. The reason, indeed, assigned by Ovid, is too frivolous an origin for such a rite; and the time of its celebration (the 17th of April), it seems, was not harvest time, when the fields were covered with corn, for the middle of April was seed-time in Italy, as appears from Virgil's Georgics. Hence we must infer that this rite must have taken its rise from some other event than that by which Ovid accounted for it; and Samson's foxes are a probable origin of it. The time of year agrees exactly. Wheat harvest in Palestine happened about the middle of April—the very time in which the burning of foxes was observed at Rome.

FRAME OF MIND. This word is used to denote any state of mind a man may be in; and, in a religious sense, is often connected with the word feeling or used synonymously with it. See FEELING.

"If our frames are comfortable," says one, "we may make them the matter of our praise, but not of our pride; we may make them our pleasure, but not our portion; we may make them the matter of our encouragement, but not the ground of our security. Are our frames dark and uncomfortable? they should humble us, but not discourage us; they should quicken us, but not obstruct us in our application for necessary and suitable grace; they should make us see our own emptiness, but not make us suspect the fulness of Christ; they should make us see our own unworthiness, but not make us suspect the willingness of Christ; they should make us see our own weakness, but not cause us to suspect the strength of Christ; they should make us suspect our own hearts, but not the firmness and freeness of the promises."

FRANCISCANS, an order of friars, founded in 1209, by St. Francis, of Assisi, who, having led a dissolute life, was reclaimed by a fit of sickness, and fell into an extreme of false devotion. Absolute poverty was his fundamental rule, and rigorously enjoined on all his followers. Some years afterward this rule was relaxed, by the indulgence of several successive popes; but this occasioned a schism in the order, about the end of the thirteenth century, and divided them into two parties; many adhering strictly to their founder's rule, and extolling him as equal to Jesus Christ himself. These were called, in ridicule, Fratricelli, or Little Brothers; which name Francis himself had assumed out of humility, and prescribed to his followers. They were also called Spiritual, while the others were called Brethren of the Community, or Observantine friars; in France they were called Cordeliers, from girding their habit with a cord. The Franciscans maintained that the Virgin Mary was born without original sin, which the Dominicans denying, occasioned a contention, which ended much to their disgrace. See DOMINICANS.

FRANKINCENSE, an odoriferous gum, anciently burnt as a sacred perfume, and now used in medicine. It exudes from incisions made in the tree during the heat of summer. The largest and best trees are called male incense. Some fraukincense is still brought from the East Indies, but that of Arabia or Syria is much preferred to it. The form of the tree from which it is extracted does not appear to be distinctly ascertained. Frankincense is mentioned, figuratively, no doubt, among the articles of merchandise in which Babylon traded. Rev. xviii. 13. It is from the Juniperus Lycia or cedar, that the gum-resin called olibanum is obtained. It has a strong smell, and somewhat bitterish and pungent taste. The olibanum sold in the shops is a different substance; but this is the frankincense adopted by the Roman Catholics in their church services; and is supposed to have been the incense so much celebrated in ancient times.

FRATERNITY, in the Roman Catholic countries, signifies a society for the improvement of devotion. Of these there are several sorts, as—1. The fraternity of the rosary, founded by St. Dominic. It is divided into two branches, called the common rosary, and the perpetual rosary; the former of whom are obliged to confess and communicate every first Sabbath in the month, and the latter to repeat the rosary continually. 2. The fraternity of the scapulary, whom it is pretended, according to the Sabbatine bull of Pope John XXII., the Blessed Virgin has promised to deliver out of hell the first Sabbath after their death. 3. The fraternity of St. Francis' girdle are clothed with a sack of a grey colour, which they tie with a cord; and in processions walk bare-footed, carrying in their hands a wooden cross. 4. That of St. Austin's leathern girdle comprehends a great many devotees. Italy, Spain, and Portugal, are the countries where are seen the greatest number of these fraternities, some of which assume the name of arch-fraternities. Pope Clement VII. instituted the arch-fraternity of charity, which distributes bread every Sabbath among the poor, and gives portions to forty poor girls on the feast of St. Jerome, their patron. The fraternity of death buries such dead as are abandoned by their relations, and causes masses to be celebrated for them.

FRATRICELLI, or LITTLE BROTHERS. Though this name, as above observed, was originally given to the reformed and spiritual Franciscans (not less than two thousand of whom are recorded to have been burned by the Inquisition), it was afterwards given to a multitude of sects which inundated Europe in the thirteenth century; and particularly to the Cathari and Waldenses, among whom many of the purer Franciscans were probably incorporated.

FRAUDS, PIOUS, artifices and falsehoods made use of in propagating religion, under the pretence of promoting the spiritual interests of mankind. These have been more particularly practised in the Church of Rome, and considered not only as innocent, but commendable. Neither the term nor the thing signified, however, can be justified. The terms pious and fraud form a solecism; and the practice of doing evil that good may come, is directly opposite to the injunction of the Sacred Scriptures. Rom. iii. 8.

FREE. (1.) Without price, out of mere favour. Rom. v. 15, iii. 24. (2.) Without constraint or obligation. Ps. liv. 6; Rom. viii. 2. (3.) Without restraint or hindrance. 2 Thess. iii. 1. God's Spirit is free, voluntary, or princely; he is freely bestowed on sinners, and in a princely and liberal manner, he influences, convicts, instructs, draws, and comforts men's souls. Ps. li. 12. God's blessings of the new covenant are free; though purchased by Christ, yet they are given to sinful men without money or price on our part, and are to be received as gifts of mere grace and favour. Rom. v. 18; Rev. xxii. 17. A free heart, is one disposed to bestow freely and willingly. 2 Chron. xxix. 31. Free or free-will offerings, were those given without any obligation of God's law. Exod. xxxvi. 3; Lev. xxii. 21. Persons are free when in no slavish bondage, or exempted from paying tribute (Deut. xv. 13; Matt. xvii. 26), or not obliged to maintain parents. Matt. xv. 6. The saints are free, or freed from the law, or freed from sin: they are, by the grace of God in Christ, delivered from the yoke of the broken law, the dominion of sin, and the slavery of Satan; and now, under the Gospel, they are free from the Jewish ceremonies, and are entitled to all the privileges of the children of God. Rom. viii. 2, vi. 22; John viii. 34, 36; Gal. v. 1. Sinners are free from righteousness—quite destitute of, and no way influenced by, a holy principle. Rom. vi. 20. To be free among the dead, is to be in a miserable ease on earth, as if a citizen of the grave. Ps. lxxxviii. 5.

FREE AGENCY is the power of choosing between good and evil, and following one's inclination. Many and long have been the disputes on this subject; not that man has been denied to be a free agent, but the dispute has been in what it consists. (See LIBERTY—WILL.) A distinction is made by divines between free agency and what is called the Arminian notion of free will. The one consists merely in the power of following our prevailing inclination; the other, in a supposed power of acting contrary to it, or at least of changing it. The one predicates the freedom of man; the other, a faculty in man, which Mr. Locke, though an anti-necessarian, explodes as an absurdity. The one goes merely to render us accountable beings; the other arrogantly claims a part, yea, the very turning-point, of salvation. According to the latter, we need only certain helps or assistances, granted to men in common, to enable us to choose the path of life; but according to the former, our hearts by nature being wholly depraved, our choice, though free, is opposed to holiness, so that we need an almighty power to renew them. The plain doctrine of Scripture evidently is, that man is free to act, and therefore strictly responsible; but as his acting, free though it be, will be entirely contrary to the law of God, it is absolutely necessary that an almighty agent should interpose to renovate the heart, and change the whole current of his desires and feelings. See NECESSITY.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. In the end of the article CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, it was stated that, in consequence of decisions which had been pronounced by the courts of law, and which were virtually sanctioned by the Legislature—decisions deemed subversive of the spiritual independence of the Church in its actings as a Church of Christ—four hundred and seventy ministers resigned their benefices, renouncing all the advantages arising from the connection of the Church with the State. This large body of ministers, joined by two hundred licentiates of the Church, and a very large body of elders, constituted themselves into the FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, claiming to be the true inheritors of the doctrine, discipline, government, and worship of the Church of Scotland, as laid down in the authorized standards of the Church. The adherents of the Free Church amount, as appears by the last census, to one-third part of the population of Scotland. Her ministers amount to seven hundred and fifty, and her congregations to eight hundred. The rise of the Free Church, as distinguished from the Establishment, is to be dated from the 18th May 1843, when the memorable disruption of the Church took place (See DISRUPTION), or, as it is expressed in the "Pastoral Letter" issued by the General Assembly of the Free Church in 1845, "An undoubted majority of the ministers and elders chosen, according to the laws of the Church, to represent the National Church of Scotland in the General Assembly summoned to meet at Edinburgh in May 1843, having come to the deliberate conviction that the interpretation finally and conclusively put upon the terms of the Church's civil establishment was incompatible with her essential liberty, as a Church of Christ, and her obligation to serve and obey Christ alone; and finding, moreover, that the brethren elected as members of Assembly were no longer free to discharge their duty, according to the Word of God; felt it impossible to consent to the Assembly proceeding to business, in the character in which alone it was now to be recognised by the State. In these circumstances, they saw that to continue the unequal struggle in defence of the constitutional privileges of the Church, was no longer consistent with her higher Christian duty; and that nothing now remained but to testify against the injury inflicted on the nation, rather than the Church, and to relinquish the benefits of the Establishment. The Protest read on their behalf, by the moderator of the former Assembly, in the presence of her majesty's commissioner, before they left the customary place of meeting—and the Act of Separation and Deed of Demission, thereafter executed, when the Assembly had been constituted in another hall—completed this grave transaction; and the Church of our fathers ceased to be the Endowed, that she might continue to be the Free, Church of Scotland." The altered terms on which the Free Church considers the Establishment now to be maintained in Scotland are thus concisely stated in the Protest:—

"1. That the courts of the Church by law established, and members thereof, are liable to be coerced by the civil courts in the exercise of their spiritual functions, and in particular in the admission to the office of the holy ministry, and the constitution of the pastoral relation; and that they are subject to be compelled to intrude ministers on reclaiming congregations, in opposition to the fundamental principles of the Church and their views of the Word of God, and to the liberties of Christ's people.

"2. That the said civil courts have power to interfere with and interdict the preaching of the Gospel and administration of ordinances, as authorized and enjoined by the Church courts of the Establishment.

"3. That the said civil courts have power to suspend spiritual censures pronounced by the Church courts of the Establishment against ministers and probationers of the Church, and to interdict their execution as to spiritual effects, functions, and privileges.

"4. That the said civil courts have power to reduce and set aside the sentences of the Church courts of the Establishment deposing ministers from the office of the holy ministry, and depriving probationers of their licence to preach the Gospel, with reference to the spiritual status, functions, and privileges, of such ministers and probationers—restoring them to the spiritual office and status of which the Church courts had deprived them.

"5. That the said civil courts have power to determine on the right to sit as members of the supreme and other judicatories of the Church by law established, and to issue interdicts against sitting and voting therein, irrespective of the judgment and determination of the said judicatories.

"6. That the said civil courts have power to supersede the majority of a Church court of the Establishment, in regard to the exercise of its spiritual functions as a Church court, and to authorize the minority to exercise the said functions, in opposition to the court itself, and to the superior judicatories of the Establishment.

"7. That the said civil courts have power to stay processes of discipline pending before courts of the Church by law established, and to interdict such courts from proceeding therein.

"8. That no pastor of a quoad sacra congregation can be admitted into the Church courts of the Establishment, and allowed to rule as well as to teach, agreeably to the institution of the office by the Head of the Church, nor to sit in any of the judicatories of the Church, inferior or supreme; and that no additional provision can be made for the exercise of spiritual discipline among the members of the Church, though not affecting any patrimonial interests, and no alteration introduced in the state of pastoral superintendence and spiritual discipline in any parish without the sanction of a civil court.

"All which jurisdiction and power on the part of the said civil courts severally above specified, whatever proceeding may have given occasion to its exercise, is, in our opinion, in itself inconsistent with Christian liberty, and with the authority which the Head of the Church hath conferred on the Church alone."

Thus separated from the State, the Free Church adheres to the Confession of Faith and standards of the Church of Scotland as heretofore understood. The only point in which she varies from her former position is in reference to the means of external support; which, as they were formerly derived from the resources of the State, are now entirely defrayed by the liberality of the Christian people. Nor has any deficiency been felt in pecuniary resources in consequence of this change. More than seven hundred churches have been erected, and are, with a very few exceptions, entirely out of debt. The Christian schemes of the Church have not only been maintained in all their former efficiency, but the contributions have been very greatly enlarged. A college has been erected for literary and theological education; and five hundred schools are built for the training of the young; while salaries are also afforded to the schoolmasters from a general fund, as in the case of the ministers. In addition to all this, most encouraging provision is made for the support of the ministry and the extension of the Church. The mode of securing this last object forms a very interesting peculiarity in the arrangements of the Free Church. In every congregation there is an association, under the management of the deacons, the members of which contribute according to their ability, and the proceeds of each association are forwarded to an authorized treasurer in Edinburgh, and go to form a central fund, known by the name of the Sustentation Fund. The aggregate sums thus collected are divided equally among all the ordained ministers of the Church by way of salary; which is understood to be supplemented in each individual case from the collections at the church door on the Sabbath. A fund has also been formed for the payment of annuities for life to the widows of deceased ministers, and also to the children until they reach the age of eighteen. The remarkable and increasing prosperity of the Free Church is felt by her to be a cause of devout thankfulness to the great Head of the Church, whose sole authority over his own house she has sought to uphold and maintain.

FREEDOM. See LIBERTY.

FREEMAN. This word denotes a person who, though once a slave, has been set free. The Apostle Paul uses it in 1 Cor. vii. 22: "For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman: likewise also he that is called, being free, is Christ's servant." Corinth being the chief slave market of Greece, it is not unlikely that many slaves were converted to Christianity, and hence the appropriateness of the apostle's allusion.

FREE-THINKERS, a name which infidels arrogate to themselves, with the design of endeavouring to convince the world that they alone are free from religious prejudices and bigotry of every kind. The term is no older than the last century, when infidelity was fashionable among certain classes in France, England, and Germany. Colton, in his "Lacon," has well and wittily remarked that free-thinking seems only to be another name for freedom from thinking. This state of mind is not of sudden but of gradual growth. "Men," says Robert Hall, "first lose their relish for what is vital and distinguishing in Christianity before they dispute its evidences or renounce its authority. Lax notions of the person of Christ, a forgetfulness of his mediation, place the mind in a deistical state, and prepare it for the most licentious opinions."

FREEWILL OFFERING. See OFFERING.

FRENCH CHURCH. See CHURCH, GALLICAN.

FRENCH PROPHETS. See CAMISARS.

FRIAR, or BROTHER, a term common to the monks of all orders. In a more peculiar sense, it is restricted to such monks as are not priests; for those in orders are usually dignified with the appellation of father.

FRIENDSHIP, a mutual attachment between two parties. It exists among men of the world often, as well as among Christians. But the contrast between the two kinds of friendship is thus beautifully and comprehensively described by Robert Hall. "Friendship, founded on the principles of worldly morality, recognised by virtuous heathens, such as that which subsisted between Atticus and Cicero, which the last of these illustrious men has rendered immortal, is fitted to survive through all the vicissitudes of life; but it belongs only to a union founded on religion to continue through an endless duration. The former of these stood the shock of conflicting opinions, and of a revolution that shook the world; the latter is destined to survive when the heavens are no more, and to spring fresh from the ashes of the universe. The former possessed all the stability which is possible to sublunary things; the latter partakes of the eternity of God. Friendship founded on worldly principles is natural, and, though composed of the best elements of nature, is not exempt from its mutability and frailty; the latter is spiritual, and therefore unchanging and imperishable. The friendship which is founded on kindred tastes and congenial habits, apart from piety, is permitted by the benignity of Providence to embellish a world which, with all its magnificence and beauty, will shortly pass away; that which has religion for its basis will ere long be transplanted in order to adorn the paradise of God." It has sometimes been alleged by unbelievers, as an objection against the morality of the Scriptures, that they do not directly inculcate the duty of friendship. The reply which is given by Mr Hall to this objection is well worthy of being quoted. "Let it be admitted, that our Lord did not formally prescribe the cultivation of friendship; and what then? He prescribed the virtues out of which it will naturally grow; he prescribed the cultivation of benevolence in all its diversified modes of operation. In his personal ministry, and in that of his apostles, he enjoined humility, forbearance, gentleness, kindness, and the most tender sympathy with the infirmities and distresses of our fellow-creatures; and his whole life was a perfect transcript of these virtues. But these, in the ordinary course of events, and under the usual arrangements of Providence, are the best preparation for friendship, as well as the surest guarantee for the discharge of its duties, and the observation of its rights. For such is the secret affinity of mind to mind, such the social constitution of man, that he who is imbued with these dispositions can scarcely fail in the pilgrimage of life to contract a friendship with one or more of his species. Accustomed to look upon the whole human family with a benign aspect, some members of it will attract more of his attention and awaken more of his complacency than others; where their virtues are equal, some more than ordinary congeniality of taste and temper will form a basis of preference, a motive for predilection, which, confirmed by habit, and strengthened by the reciprocal exchange of gratifying attentions and kind offices, will at length ripen into friendship. A mind habitually tender easily melts into softness, and exchanges the sentiments of esteem for those of specific attachment and endearment. What is friendship in virtuous minds but the concentration of benevolent emotions, heightened by respect and increased by exercise, on one or more objects? Friendship is not a state of feeling whose elements are specifically different from those which compose every other. The emotions we feel towards a friend are the same in kind with those we experience on other occasions; but they are more complex and more exalted. It is the general sensibility to kind and social affections more immediately directed to one or more individuals, and in consequence of its particular direction, giving birth to an order of feeling more vivid and intense than usual, which constitutes friendship. Hence we perceive the impropriety of making it the subject of legislation. It is the duty of every man to cultivate the dispositions which lead to friendship, the love of his species, admiration of virtue, regard to the feelings of others, gratitude, humility, along with the most inflexible adherence to probity and truth. Wherever these exist, friendship will be the natural result; but it will result as a felicity rather than as a duty; and is to be placed among the rewards of virtue rather than its obligations. Happiness is not to be prescribed, but to be enjoyed; and such is the benevolent arrangement of Divine Providence, that wherever there is a moral preparation for it, it follows of course; and such are the pleasures and advantages derived from virtuous friendship. Its duties, supposing it to be formed, are deducible, with sufficient certainty and precision, from the light of nature and the precepts of Scripture, and none more sacred; but in the act of forming it, the mind disdains the fetters of prescriptions, and is left to be determined by the impulse of feeling and the operation of events.

"Besides, were friendship inculcated as a matter of indispensable obligation, endless embarrassments would arise in determining at what period the relation shall commence; whether with one or with more; and at what stage in the progress of mutual attraction, at what point, the feelings of reciprocal regard shall be deemed to reach the maturity which entitles them to the sacred name of friendship. The laws of virtue and piety are coeval with our existence, considered as reasonable and accountable creatures. Their authority is founded on immutable relations, the duties resulting from which are capable of being clearly conceived and exactly defined. But he who could undertake to prescribe to the subtle and mysterious impulses which invite susceptible minds to friendship, would find himself engaged in an attempt as hopeless as to regulate the motions of the air, which bloweth where it listeth."

If we find no direct injunctions in the Sacred Writings to the cultivation of friendship, nowhere shall we discover more beautiful and attractive specimens of it than those which these writings contain. Where shall we go to obtain an instance of firm, devoted, self-sacrificing friendship equal to that which was exemplified in David and Jonathan? Jesus also gives a very beautiful picture of the loveliness of true spiritual friendship, that which can only exist in souls knit together by the love of God, in the attachment which he showed to Lazarus, and Mary, and Martha. It was in the hour of their heavy trials, however, that the depth of the Redeemer's friendship for this interesting little group of devout believers was seen and felt. As He stood by the grave of Lazarus, Jesus wept, and the bystanders, witnessing the affecting scene, could not refrain from exclaiming, "Behold how he loved him!"

The genius and injunctions of the Christian religion also inculcate this virtue; for it not only commands universal benevolence to men, but promotes the strongest love and friendship between those whose minds are enlightened by divine grace, and who behold in each other the image of their Divine Master. As friendship, however, is not enjoyed by every one, and as the want of it arises often from ourselves, we shall here subjoin, from an eminent writer, a few remarks, by way of advice, respecting it: (1.) We must not expect perfection in any with whom we contract fellowship. (2.) We must not be hurt by differences of opinion arising in intercourse with our friends. (3.) It is material to the preservation of friendship, that openness of temper and obliging manners on both hands be cultivated. (4.) We must not listen rashly to evil reports against our friends. (5.) We must not desert our friends in danger or distress.

FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF. See QUAKERS.

FRINGE. This word, which occurs in Numb. xv. 38, and Deut. xxii. 12, denotes the sacred threads or knots on the four corners of the garments. Many commentators are of opinion that the "fringes" were strings with tassels at the end, fastened to the four corners of the upper garment, the proper use of these strings being to fasten the corners together. The Pharisees are blamed by our Lord for making ostentatiously broad the "borders" of their garments; and we find our Lord spoken of as wearing this fringe, which is termed in the New Testament the hem or border, and which the sick often sought to touch, that they might be healed. Among the modern Jews every male is obliged to have a garment with fringes at the four corners; and every morning, when they put on this garment, they must take the fringes in their hands, and say: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe! who hath sanctified us with his commandments, and commanded us the commandment of the fringes." This garment is made of two square pieces, with two long slips like straps joined to them, in order that one of the square pieces may hang down before upon the breast and the other behind. At the extremity of the four corners are fastened the fringes, by means of four knots; which knots, with the threads of each fringe, are thirteen; and the numerical letters of the Hebrew word tsitsith (a fringe), amount to six hundred, and both added together, amount to six hundred and thirteen, the number of precepts contained in the law. This garment is also called the small veil, which every male Jew, of whatever condition, is obliged to wear constantly. In addition to the small veil, which is worn under their garments, they have, when at the morning prayers in the synagogue, the large veil with the fringes, which is put on over their garments. These veils are both termed the tallith. Particular directions are given how the threads must be spun which are fastened on the four corners. The fringes consist of a certain number of fine woollen cords, similar to stout cotton, which must also be spun by themselves, in the same manner as the tallith; at the commencement of which the spinner must say, "I spin this wool for the purpose of making fringes of it." The rabbins write in the Talmud, "The eye and the heart are the two accomplices of sin; therefore the law enforces the fringes, in order to remind man of the commandments of God, and to deter him from sin." They also call the fringes instruments for obeying the law of God; which, although in themselves they have no holiness, yet assist to holiness, and promote it.

FROG, a small and well-known amphibious animal of the genus Rana. Frogs were unclean: Moses, indeed, does not name them, but includes them by saying, "Ye shall not eat of anything that moves in the waters, unless it have fins and scales." Lev. xi. 10. John (Rev. xvi. 13), says he saw three unclean spirits issuing out of the false prophet's mouth, like frogs; and Moses brought on Egypt a plague of frogs. Exod. viii. 5. The frog of Egypt is the Rana punctata, or dotted frog; so called from its ash-coloured body being dotted with green spots. It was esteemed sacred among the Egyptians, and abounded in the River Nile.

FRONTLETS are thus described by Leo of Modena: The Jews take four pieces of parchment, and write, with an ink made on purpose, and in square letters, these four passages, one on each piece: (1.) "Sanctify unto me all the first-born," &c. Exod. xiii. 1-13. (2.) "And when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites," &c. Exod. xiii. 11-16. (3.) "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," &c. Deut. vi. 4-9. (4.) "If ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments," &c. Deut. xi. 13-21. This they do in obedience to the words of Moses: "These commandments shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes." These four pieces are fastened together, and a square formed of them, on which the letter shin is written; then a little square of hard calf's skin is put at the top, out of which come two leathern strings an inch wide, and a cubit and a half, or thereabouts, in length. This square is put on the middle of the forehead, and the strings being girt about the head, make a knot in the form of the letter resh; they are then brought before, and fall on the breast. It is called teffiaschel-rosh—the tephila of the head. The most devout Jews put it on both at morning and noon-day prayer; but the generality wear it only at morning prayer. Only the chanter of the synagogue is obliged to put it on at noon as well as morning.

It has been much disputed whether the use of frontlets and phylacteries was literally ordained by Moses. Before the Babylonish captivity no traces of them appear in the history of the Jews; the prophets never inveigh against the neglect of them, nor was there any question concerning them in the reformation of manners at any time among the Hebrews. The almost general custom in the East of wearing phylacteries and frontlets, determines nothing for the obligation or usefulness of the practice. Christ did not absolutely condemn them; but he condemned the abuse of them in the Pharisees—their wearing them with affectation, and larger than other Jews. The Caraites, who adhere to the letter of the law, and despise traditions, call the rabbinical Jews “bridled asses,” because they wear these tephilim and frontlets. See PHYLACTERIES.

FROST. The patriarch Jacob, in his manly defence against the charges of Laban, says: “In the day the drought consumed me, and the frost by night.” Gen. xxxi. 40. Throughout Western Asia there is a much more remarkable difference between the temperature of the day and night than is generally experienced in Europe. An idea of this alteration can only be imagined by supposing a night of our winter temperature following a day warmer than any that our summers afford. The time when this difference is the strongest is in the months of September, October, November, March, April, and May. We find the same peculiarity referred to in the prophecies of Jeremiah (xxxvi. 30): “Therefore thus saith the Lord of Jehoiakim king of Judah, He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David: and his dead body shall be cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost.”

FRUGALITY, is the keeping due bounds in our expenses—the happy mean between parsimony on the one hand and prodigality on the other. The example of Christ (John vi. 12), the injunctions of God’s Word (Luke xvi. 1; Prov. xviii. 9), the evil effects of inattention to it (Luke xv. 11–16); the peace and comfort which arise from it, together with the good which it enables us to do to others, should operate as motives to incite us to the practice of it.

FRUIT. The fruit of the lips is the sacrifice of praise or thanksgiving. Heb. xiii. 15. The fruit of the righteous—that is, the counsel, example, instruction, and reproof of the righteous—is a tree of life, is a means of much good, both temporal and eternal; and that not only to himself, but to others also. Prov. xi. 30. Solomon says, in Prov. xii. 14: “A man shall be satisfied with good by the fruit of his mouth;” that is, he shall receive abundant blessings from God as the reward of that good he has done by his pious and profitable discourses. “Fruits meet for repentance” (Matt. iii. 8), is such a conduct as befits the profession of penitence.

2. The fruits of the Spirit are those gracious habits which the Holy Spirit of God produces in those in whom he dwelleth and worketh, with those acts which flow from them, as naturally as the tree produces its fruit. The apostle Paul enumerates them in Gal. v. 22, 23; and also in Eph. v. 9, as he had before exhorted them to faith, to love, and to conformity to the will of God, or to the image of his Son Jesus Christ. Eph. vi. 13–16. We find the Apostle Peter exhorting his brethren, who had obtained like precious faith with himself, to “give all diligence,” by a continual increase in every Christian virtue, to make their calling and election sure; “for if these things be in you and abound,” says he, “they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ;” and with this he connects their enjoying “an abundant entrance into his everlasting kingdom.” 2 Pet. i. 5–11. The fruit of any tree was forbidden to be eaten for the first three years, being considered during that time impure. In the fourth year the fruit was offered to the Lord, and from that time the produce of the tree was permitted to be eaten. The law on this subject is laid down in Lev. xix. 23–25. Mr Roberts informs us that the Orientals have a great aversion to cut down any tree which bears fruit, as they principally live on vegetable productions. During the season of fruit, great quantities of it are consumed in the east. Hence, probably, fruit being a favourite article of food, the frequency with which the word is used in a metaphorical sense in the Sacred Scriptures. Thus, besides the passages already referred to, fruit is taken for a charitable contribution. “When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them this fruit, I will come by you into Spain.” Rom. xv. 28. Benevolence is here viewed as one of those fruits of righteousness which are produced only in hearts which have been sanctified by the Holy Ghost, and which shall assuredly redound to the glory of God. In the beautiful figure of the vine and the branches contained in John xv., holiness is termed fruit; thus, “Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing.” John xv. 4, 5. See ADD—EDIFICATION—GROWTH IN GRACE.

FRYING-PAN, a vessel in which something is boiled or baked. It is mentioned in Lev. ii. 7; and the Jewish writers distinguish it from the “pan,” or as it is in the margin “flat plate,” of verse 5, representing the frying-pan as concave and deep.

FUEL. In preparing their victuals, the Orientals are, from the extreme scarcity of wood in many countries, reduced to use cow-dung for fuel. At Aleppo, the inhabitants use wood and charcoal in their rooms, but heat their baths with cow-dung, the parings of fruit, and other things of a similar kind, which they employ people to gather for that purpose. See BAKING—DUNG.

Wood, however, and even any other combustible substance, is preferred when it can be obtained. The inhabitants of Aleppo, according to Russel, use thorns, and fuel of a similar kind, for those culinary purposes which require haste, particularly for boiling; which seems to be the reason that Solomon mentions the “crackling of thorns under a pot,” rather than in any other way. The same allusion to the use of thorns for boiling occurs in other parts of the Sacred Volume; thus, the Psalmist speaks of the wicked: “Before your pots can feel the thorns, he shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath.”

FULLER, a bleacher of new cloth, and who cleanses that which is foul. The word occurs in various passages of the Old Testament, as in Isa. vii. 3, xxxvi. 2; Mal. iii. 2.

FUNERAL RITES. See BURIAL.

FURLONG. This term, denoting a measure of distance, occurs in Luke xxiv. 13, and John vi. 19. It contained six hundred Greek, or six hundred and twenty-five Roman feet—equal to about six hundred and four and a half feet English. The Roman mile contained eight stadia or furlongs, but the Eastern mile ten. A Sabbath-day's journey was five furlongs, or half a mile.

FURNACE, a fire-place in which gold and silver are melted. The word is used frequently in sacred Scripture, sometimes in a literal and at other times in a metaphorical sense. Literally, it occurs in Prov. xvii. 3: "The fining pot is for silver, and the furnace for gold: but the Lord trieth the hearts." Furnaces are used for smelting, casting, and forging metals; and they are so constructed as to generate intense heat. We find Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace, into which the three Hebrew youths were commanded to be cast, described as having been seven times heated; and the being thrown into such a furnace appears to have been a punishment in the time of that monarch. "And whoso falleth not down and worshippeth, shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace." Dan. iii. 6. A punishment of this kind was justly regarded as one of the severest which could be inflicted; and, accordingly, Sir Gardner Wilkinson informs us that among the ancient Egyptians the being burnt to death was the doom of a parricide. The word furnace is sometimes employed metaphorically in Scripture to denote a place of bondage. Thus Deut. iv. 20: "But the Lord hath taken you, and brought you forth out of the iron furnace, even out of Egypt, to be unto him a people of inheritance, as ye are this day;" and Jer. xi. 4: "Which I commanded your fathers in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, from the iron furnace, saying, Obey my voice, and do them, according to all which I command you: so shall ye be my people, and I will be your God."

FURNITURE. The furniture of Eastern houses was, in the earliest ages, extremely simple. That of the poorer classes was limited to such articles as were absolutely necessary. The interior of the more common apartments was furnished with sets of large nails with square heads like dice, and bent at the head, so as to make them cramp-irons. On these nails were hung their kitchen and other utensils. Instead of chairs they sat on mats or skins; and the same articles, on which they laid a mattress, served them instead of bedsteads, while their upper garment was used for a covering. The wealthy classes had, as in the East they still have, fine carpets, couches or sofas, on which they sat, lay, and slept. 2 Sam. xvii. 28; 2 Kings iv. 10. These sofas or couches appear, in the days of Amos (vi. 4), to have had their frames inlaid with ivory with rich carvings. Rich hangings of velvet or damask often covered the lower part of the walls, and to this we find a reference in Esther i. 6: "Where were white, green, and blue, hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble: the beds were of gold and silver, upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black, marble." The upper part of the wall was adorned with the most ingenious wreathings and devices in stucco and fret-work. The floors were laid with painted tiles or slabs of the most beautiful marble, and covered with carpets of the richest materials. At one end of each chamber is a little gallery called a divan, raised three or four feet above the floor, with a balustrade in front, to which they go up by a few steps. Here they place their beds, cushions or carpets, on which they sit or recline. The corner of the divan is the seat of honour. In ancient times, articles of necessary furniture were few and simple. A hand-mill, a kneading-trough, and an oven, with a few earthenware vessels of various kinds, composed the whole furnishing of an Oriental house.

FURROWS, openings in the ground, made by a plough or other instrument. The furrows among Oriental husbandmen are made extremely shallow, but so remarkably straight, although of great length, that one would imagine they had used a line in tracing them. The sacred writers sometimes borrow similitudes from the furrows of the field: "If my land cry against me, or the furrows thereof complain" (Job xxxi. 38); if I have employed the poor to till my ground without paying them for their labour. And: "I will make Judah plough, and Jacob shall break the clods," or form the furrows. Hos. x. 11. The ten tribes and Judah shall one after the other endure the effects of my anger. But the prophet adds immediately, "Sow in righteousness, and reap in mercy."

FURY is attributed to God metaphorically, or speaking after the manner of men; that is, God's method of punishing the wicked is as fearful as the violent exertions of a man in a state of fury. So that when he is said to pour out his fury on a person, or on a people, it is a figurative expression for dispensing afflictive providences; but we must be very careful not to attribute human infirmities, passions, or malevolence, to the Deity.

FUTURE STATE, a term made use of in relation to the existence of the soul after death.

That there is such a state is clear from many passages of the New Testament. John v. 24; Acts vii. 9; Rom. viii. 10, 11; 2 Cor. v. 1, 2; Phil. i. 21; 1 Thess. iv. 14, v. 10; Luke xvi. 22, &c. And yet while these texts prove the point, some have doubted whether there be any where in the Old Testament any reference to a future state at all. The case, it is said, appears to be this: The Mosaic covenant contained no promises directly relating to a future state; probably, as Dr Warburton asserts and argues at large, because Moses was secure of an equal providence, and therefore needed not subsidiary sanctions taken from a future state, without the belief of which the doctrine of an universal providence cannot ordinarily be vindicated, nor the general sanctions of religion secured. But, in opposition to this sentiment, as Doddridge observes, "it is evident that good men, even before Moses, were animated by views of a future state (Heb. xi. 13, 16), as he himself plainly was (verses 24–26); and that the promises of heavenly felicity were contained even in the covenant made with Abraham, which the Mosaic could not disannul." See INTERMEDIATE STATE—RESURRECTION—SOUL.

G.

GAAL, the son of Ebed, who raised a revolt in Shechem against Abimelech, the son of Gideon; but being defeated by the latter, he was forced to flee. His brief history is recorded in Judg. ix. 26-41.

GAASH, a mountain of Ephraim, north of which stood Timnath-serah, celebrated for Joshua's tomb (Josh. xxiv. 30), which Eusebius says was known in his time. The same name is given to a brook or valley (2 Sam. xxiii. 30), probably at the foot of Mount Gaash.

GABA, a city at the foot of Mount Carmel, between Ptolemais and Caesarea. Dr Wilson thinks it is the modern Iibîâ. Josh. xviii. 24.

GABATHA, a town in the south of Judah, twelve miles from Eleutheropolis, where the Prophet Habakkuk's sepulchre was shown.

GABBATHA. (Heb. high or elevated. In Greek, lithostrōton, paved with stones. John xix. 13.) It was probably an eminence or terrace, a gallery or balcony, paved with stone or marble, and of considerable height. The word Gabbatha is properly a Syro-Chaldaic word, signifying a raised or elevated place. It seems to have been a tessellated pavement; that is, formed of pieces of marble and stone of various colours, on which was placed the bema, or chair of justice.

GABRIEL (the strength of God), a principal angel. He was sent to the Prophet Daniel, to explain his visions; also to Zacharias, to announce to him the future birth of John the Baptist. Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21, x. 16; Luke i. 11-20. Six months afterwards he was sent to Nazareth, to the Virgin Mary. Luke i. 26-38. (See ANGEL—ANNUNCIATION.) The Mohammedans hold Gabriel in great veneration, considering him the special enemy of the Jews, on account of their having rejected the Messiah, whom this angel was particularly honoured in serving. Both the Talmud and the Koran are filled with fables concerning him.

GAD, a son of Jacob by Zilpah, the maid of Leah. The name signifies "a troop." Hence we are informed, in reference to the birth of Gad, Gen. xxx. 11: "And Leah said, A troop cometh: and she called his name Gad." The greater number of the earlier versions, however, render the word Gad by "fortune." This rendering, however, is very unlikely to be the true one, as it is quite inconsistent with the interpretation of the name given to Gad by Jacob himself in Gen. xlix. 19: "Gad, a troop shall overcome him: but he shall overcome at the last;" and Moses in his last song thus speaks of Gad: "And of Gad he said, Blessed be he that enlargeth Gad: he dwelleth as a lion, and teareth the arm with the crown of the head." Deut. xxxiii. 20. The name of Gad was given also to that district of Palestine which was assigned to the tribe descended from him. When they left Egypt the tribe amounted to 45,650. They received an inheritance on the east side of the Jordan, along with the tribe of Reuben, and the half-tribe of Manasseh. The name Gad in the sense of "luck, fortune, or prosperity," was derived perhaps from some notion of the influence of some one of the heavenly bodies, either the sun, moon, or one of the planets; as in Arabic the planet Jupiter is called Gad, and the Targum of Jonathan renders Gad "a propitious star." The Chaldees has "fortune cometh." Some have supposed that this name was applied as the title of a species of divinity, and that from it comes, by remote derivation, our terms good and God.

GAD, David's friend, who followed him when persecuted by Saul. Scripture styles him a prophet, and David's seer. 1 Sam. xxii. 5; 2 Sam. xxiv. 11; 1 Chron. xxi. 9-11. He wrote a history of David's life, which is cited 1 Chron. xxix. 29.

GAD, the god or goddess of fortune, a Heathen deity, mentioned in several passages of Scripture. We find a place in Canaan called the Tower of Gad, (Josh. xv. 37), and another in the Valley of Lebanon, called Baal-gad. Josh. xi. 17. In Isa. lxv. 11, marginal rendering, those who prepare the table for Gad are allotted to the sword; and those who furnish a drink-offering to Meni, to the slaughter. We find Meni, in medals of Antioch, to be either male or female, without distinction; and therefore Gad, the associate of Meni, may well be thought similar in this respect. See MENI.

GADARA, a celebrated city of Palestine, the capital of Peræa, situated eastward of the Lake of Tiberias, eight miles from the shore. It was strongly fortified, had a court of justice, and several hot baths. It gave name also to a canton, which is mentioned as the country of the Gadarenes (Mark v. 1; Luke viii. 26), though Matthew calls it the country of the Gergesenes. Matt. viii. 28. Gergasa was near Gadara, and therefore one evangelist might with as much propriety call it the country of the Gergesenes as another that of the Gadarenes.

"Along the borders of this Lake of Tiberias," says Dr. Clarke, "may still be seen the remains of those ancient tombs, hewn by the earliest inhabitants of Galilee, in the rocks which face the water. They were deserted in the time of our Saviour, and had become the resort of wretched men, afflicted by diseases, and made outcasts of society; for in the account of the cure performed by our Saviour upon a demoniac in the country of the Gadarenes, these tombs are particularly alluded to; and their existence to this day offers strong internal evidence of the accuracy of the evangelist who has recorded the transaction: 'There met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit, who had his dwelling among the tombs.'"

GADARENES, COUNTRY OF THE, a district or province so called from Gadara, its capital. It is also termed by the Evangelist Matthew the country of the Gergesenes (Matt. viii. 28), from the town of Gergasa, which was in the immediate neighbourhood of Gadara. This is the country where our Lord wrought the cure on the demoniacs. The face of the mountain on the south contains numerous tombs; the same, in all probability, out of which came the demoniacs who met Christ on his arrival in this part of the country. These are the only tombs on the east of the lake near to the shore; and what strengthens the probability that they are the same with those which formed the dwelling of the demoniacs, is the fact that the high road from the Lake of Gennesareth to the country on the east runs through the valley immediately below; a circumstance to which Matthew seems to refer when he states that the fury of the "possessed" rendered them so dangerous "that no man might pass by that way." On the west the mountain runs down in steep declivities to the sea—in all likelihood the "steep place" down which the herd of swine rushed violently, when the devils entered into them.

GAIANITÆ, a denomination which derived its name from Gaian, a bishop of Alexandria, in the sixth century, who denied that Jesus Christ, after the hypostatical union, was subject to any of the infirmities of human nature.

GAIUS, a Christian who accompanied Paul on his travels through some of the Gentile countries. Acts xix. 29, xx. 4; Rom. xvi. 23. It is highly probable, though not absolutely certain, that this was the same Gaius who is mentioned in such honourable terms by the Apostle John in his Third Epistle.

GALATIA, a province of Asia Minor, bounded on the East by Cappadocia, on the west by Bithynia, on the south by Pamphylia, and on the north by the Euxine Sea. It was anciently peopled by the Galatæ or Gallo-Græci, and about twenty-six years before Christ it became a province of the Roman empire, from which period the people seem to have degenerated. It is now under the rule of the Ottoman empire. The religion of the ancient inhabitants of Galatia was thoroughly pagan. They are even said to have offered human sacrifices. Though savage and uncultivated, however, they were not altogether strangers to the fine arts. Hence the high admiration which they are said to have had for painting and architecture.

The Apostle Paul preached several times in Galatia—first, A.D. 51 (Acts xvi. 6); afterwards, A.D. 54 (Acts xviii. 23)—and formed considerable Churches there. It is probable, he was the first who preached there to the Gentiles; but, possibly, Peter had preached there to the Jews, since his First Epistle is directed to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, &c. These Jews, it has been supposed by some, occasioned those differences in the Galatian Church on account of which Paul wrote his Epistle in A.D. 52, in which he takes some pains to establish his character of apostle, which had been disputed, with the intention to place him below Peter, who preached generally to Jews only, and who observed the law.

But his main object throughout nearly the whole of it is, to counteract the pernicious influence of the doctrine of those false teachers, particularly as it respected the article of justification, or a sinner's acceptance with God. And in no part of the apostle's writings is that important doctrine handled in a more full and explicit manner; nor does he anywhere display such a firm, determined, and inflexible opposition to all who would corrupt the truth from its simplicity.

"The erroneous doctrines of the Judaizing teachers," says Dr. Macknight, "and the calumnies they spread, for the purpose of discrediting Paul's apostleship, no doubt occasioned great uneasiness of mind to him and to the faithful in that age, and did much hurt, at least for a while, among the Galatians. But in the issue these evils have proved of no small service to the Church in general; for by obliging the apostle to produce the evidences of his apostleship, and to relate the history of his life, especially after his conversion, we have obtained the fullest assurance of his being a real apostle, called to the office by Jesus Christ himself; consequently we are assured that our faith in the doctrines of the Gospel, as taught by him (and it is he who hath taught the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel most fully), is not built on the credit of a man, but on the authority of the Spirit of God, by whom Paul was inspired in the whole of the doctrines which he has delivered to the world."

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO. See GALATIA.

GALBANUM. This is the chelbena of the Hebrews, and occurs only in Exod. xxx. 34, in the account of the composition of the incense and perfume to be burned on the golden altar. It is supposed to be the juice or gum of the Bubon galbanum, belonging to a family of the umbelliferous tribe. The plant, when broken, exudes a thin milk, of a cream-colour; and hence the Hebrew chelbena is supposed to be derived from chelib, milk or fat.

GALENISTS, the followers of Galen Abraham Haan, a physician at Amsterdam, and an eloquent preacher among the MENNONITES (which see). He was considered a latitudinarian, admitting to his communion all who believed the Scriptures and led religious lives. He was opposed by Samuel Apostool. See APOSTOOLIANS.

GALILEAN, a term of insult which the Jews and afterwards the Pagans applied to the early Christians. Both Christ and his disciples were natives of Galilee, a district of Palestine, the people of which were usually accounted rebellious and troublesome. To be sprung, therefore, from Galilee came to be regarded as a reproach. Julian the apostate was particularly fond of applying this epithet to the followers of Jesus, whom he called the "Galilean God."

GALILEANS, a sect of the Jews, which arose in Judea some years after the birth of our Saviour. They sprang from one Judas, a native of Upper Galilee, upon the occasion of Augustus appointing the people to be mustered, which they looked upon as an instance of servitude which all true Israelites ought to oppose. They pretended that God alone should be owned as master and lord, and in other respects were of the opinion of the Pharisees; but as they judged it unlawful to pray for infidel princes, they separated themselves from the rest of the Jews, and performed their sacrifices apart. As our Saviour and his apostles were of Galilee, they were suspected to be of the sect of the Galileans; and it was on this principle, as Jerome observes, that the Pharisees laid a snare for him, asking, Whether it were lawful to give tribute to Cæsar? that in case he denied it, they might have an occasion of accusing him.

GALILEE, a province of Palestine or the Holy Land. The ancient Rabbins used to divide it into Upper and Lower Galilee and the Valley. The two former divisions alone, however, are spoken of by Josephus, who was some time governor of the province. In New Testament geography, it was the most northerly of the three districts into which Palestine was divided. Both the upper and lower parts of the province were remarkably fertile. To Lower Galilee Jesus and most of his disciples belonged, and there he performed the greater number of his miracles. See PALESTINE.

GALILEE, SEA OF, an inland lake of Palestine, which is known by different names, being sometimes called the Sea of Tiberias, and the Lake of Gennesareth. On the banks of this interesting lake stood several of those towns and villages which are so frequently mentioned in connection with the history of our blessed Lord. The appearance of the lake is thus described by Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne: "The greater part of the lake was in view, nearly in the form of an oval, a deep blue expanse of calm, unruffled, silent waters. Through part of the middle of the lake, we could discern a streak like the track of a vessel that had lately cut the waters. This might possibly be caused by the current of the Jordan passing through it; but of this we were rather sceptical, for at other times we could not discover any thing like this appearance. On the eastern side the mountains are lofty and bare, descending abruptly on the shore. We could not descry a single village or town on that side, although smoke was rising from one or two points. On the western side the hills are not so lofty nor so close upon the lake, but there is more variety. We remarked that there was no part of the margin which showed any thing like a plain except that part in the north-west, where a verdant plain extends apparently three or four miles along the shore, and seemed to be a mile or a mile and a half at its greatest breadth. We concluded at once that this must be the plain of Gennesareth, of which Josephus speaks in such glowing terms, and the land of Gennesareth, so often mentioned in the Gospel narrative, where stood Capernaum, and other cities whose very site is now unknown.

"We could imagine the days when Jesus walked down by the side of that lake, and preached to silent multitudes gathered round him. It seemed at that moment unspeakable condescension, that God in our nature should once have stood on some of these slopes, and stretched out his hand to sinners as he spoke in the tone of heavenly love, 'Come unto me, and I will give you rest!' And it was strangely solemn to be gazing upon rocks that echoed to his praise by night, and desert places where he was alone with his Father: 'He departed again unto a mountain himself alone;' and his disciples went down unto the sea.' John vi. 15. All sides of the lake are now comparatively bleak and dreary; yet they suit the stillness of the scene. Not a tree is to be seen on the mountains; and even the land of Gennesareth, so famous in the days of Josephus for the amazing variety and luxuriance of its trees and shrubs, is now only a wilderness of trees and bushes. 'Behold, your house is left unto you desolate!' Matt. xxiii. 38. The house remains, but it is desolate. The rocks and mountains around this sea continue unaltered; the water of the lake is as pure and as full as it was in ancient days; and yet the place is most desolate. Its cities are gone, and the vast population that once thronged its shores are now reduced to a few miserable inhabitants of mud-walled villages."

"The Lake of Gennesareth," says Dr Clarke, "is surrounded by objects well calculated to heighten the solemn impression made by historical recollections, and affords one of the most striking prospects in the Holy Land. In picturesque beauty, it comes nearest to the Lake of Locarno, in Italy, although it is destitute of any thing similar to the islands by which that majestic piece of water is adorned. It is inferior in magnitude, and in the height of its surrounding mountains, to the Lake Asphaltites."

"We have gone round the lake," says Mr Wylie, "without meeting a single human being, or a place of habitation, save the miserable town of Tiberias; we have traversed the fine plains, covered, in the time of Josephus, with palms, figs, and fruit trees of all kinds, and when there was a 'happy contentment of the seasons, as if every one of them laid claim to this country,'—and seen them producing only rank grass, thistles, and bushes; we have walked over the site of opulent cities, and have found only a broken column, or a mass of crumbling brick, to tell us of their former grandeur; we have looked up to the sides of the mountains, and had the heart saddened by their dull and withered aspect; we have examined the surface of the lake without finding a single boat of any description upon its waters; we have listened for the voice of man, but a profound silence reigns every where—not broken, save, perchance, by the ripple of the wave upon the strand; we feel that the 'land is empty,'—'that the Lord hath removed men far away, and there is a great forsaking in the midst of the earth.' The following little picture, from Stephens, expresses this feeling completely: he was looking upon the lake from amid the ruins of Capernaum. 'Not a habitation,' says he, 'not even an Arab's hut, is seen upon its banks; not a solitary boat upon its waters. A single pelican was floating at my feet, and, like myself, he was alone. He was so near me that I could have hit him with a stone; he was the only thing I saw that had life, and he seemed looking at me with wonder, and asking me why I still lingered in the desolate city.'"

GALL (rash), something excessively bitter, and supposed to be poisonous. Deut. xxix. 18, xxxii. 32; Ps. lxix. 21; Jer. viii. 14, ix. 15, xxiii. 15; Lam. iii. 19; Hos. x. 4; Amos vi. 12. It is evident, from the first mentioned place, that some herb or plant is meant of a malignant or nauseous kind. It is joined with wormwood, and, in the margin of our Bibles explained to be "a very poisonous herb." In Ps. lxix. 21, which is justly considered as a prophecy of our Saviour's sufferings, it is said, "They gave me gall (rash) for my meat." And, accordingly, it is recorded in the history, "They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall." Matt. xxvii. 34. But in the parallel passage, it is said to be "wine mingled with myrrh" (Mark xv. 23), a very bitter ingredient. Whence it is very probable that the word may be used as a general name for whatever is exceedingly bitter; and, consequently, where the sense requires it, may be put specially for any bitter herb or plant. Some commentators suppose this plant to be the Momordica elaterium. Michaelis regards it as the nightshade, and others the Lolium tremulentum.

GALLERIES. This word, which occurs in Cant. vii. 5, "the king is held in the galleries," properly means in the original "turns, windings," and probably refers to braids of hair as the peculiar head-dress of the bride. There is another word which is translated galleries, and occurs only in the writings of the Prophet Ezekiel (xli. 15, 16, xlii. 3). It is a very obscure term, but plainly refers to some part of an Eastern building. Gesenius says, it was probably a pillar or an ornament belonging to it.

GALLEY, a ship rowed with oars. The enemies of the Jews, and the Assyrian army in particular, are likened to galleys or gallants; that is, according to ancient ideas, large and magnificent ships. Isa. xxxiii. 21.

GALLICAN. See CHURCH, GALLICAN.

GALLIO, a proconsul of Achaia, and brother of the philosopher Seneca. He took the name of Gallio in consequence of his adoption into the family of Lucius Junius Gallio. He is thus introduced to our notice in the Acts of the Apostles: "And when Paul was now about to open his mouth, Gallio said unto the Jews, If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you: but if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it: for I will be no judge of such matters. And he drave them from the judgment-seat." Acts xviii. 14-16. From contemporary historians, we learn that Gallio was appointed proconsul of Greece or Achaia by the Emperor Claudius. His brother speaks of him as a man of a mild and benignant manner. When Paul was dragged before the tribunal of Gallio, and accused of "teaching men to worship God contrary to the law," the proconsul refused to interfere in matters which, as seeming to him purely religious, he regarded as quite beyond his jurisdiction. This, however, instead of being a ground of reproach upon the memory of Gallio, was rather an indication of wisdom and prudence.

GALLOWS, a gibbet, mentioned in Esther vi. 4, and rendered "tree" in Gen. xl. 19; Deut. xxi. 22. Hanging appears to have been a punishment practised among the Egyptians and other ancient nations, as well as among the Hebrews.

GAMALIEL, an illustrious doctor of the Jewish law, a Pharisee, and Paul's master. It is said he was the grandson of the famous HILLEL (which see), uncle to Nicodemus, and for thirty-two years president of the Jewish Sanhedrim. It is certain that the family of Gamaliel was so distinguished as to enjoy privileges of a peculiar kind, especially in relation to the study of Greek literature, which was generally prohibited among the Jews.

The Jews having brought Peter and the other apostles before the assembly of rulers, Gamaliel moved that they should retire; and then advised the assembly to take heed what they intended to do touching these men. Gamaliel's advice was followed; and the apostles were liberated. Acts v. 34.

When Paul, in Rom. x. 1, affirms, "My heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved," we should not forget how much of an interesting and affecting nature was connected with the personal character of many of whom he spoke. Could he cease to feel for his former venerated teacher, so richly cultivated, intelligent and amiable as he was, yet, in neglecting to embrace Christianity, so fatally mistaken? Heb. ii. 3.

GAMES. Among all the nations of antiquity, public games have, more or less, prevailed, but the most splendid and famous of all these solemnities were the Olympic games. To these the apostles make frequent allusions in the epistles. It may be useful, therefore, for the better understanding of the passages referred to, if we notice a few particulars connected with the games of Greece. To preserve due order in these popular amusements, certain persons were appointed, whose office it was to see that all the laws and arrangements of the games were duly attended to. Then judges were also authorised to decide any controversies that might arise among the antagonists, and to award the prizes to the successful candidates. In allusion to these offices, Jesus is thought by some to be called by Paul "the Author and Finisher of our faith." The Grecian games have different names, derived usually from the places at which they were celebrated—thus, they were called the Isthmian, Pythian, Nemean, and Olympic. Before entering upon the contest, the candidates were subjected to a long and laborious previous training. The strictness with which all the laws of the games were required to be observed, seems to be alluded to by Paul in 2 Tim. ii. 5: "And if a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully." And keeping in view the preparation required from intending competitors, he says in another passage, "Those who strive for the mastery are temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible." He evidently refers to the preparatory exercises, both of boxers and racers, when he says, "I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air." 1 Cor. ix. 26. In the foot-race, which formed an important part of these celebrated games, the candidates were careful, before commencing the contest, to lay aside every thing that might retard them in their course. Hence the apostle says, with a lively reference to the foot-race, as representing the Christian career, Heb. xii. 1, "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us." The number of the competitors was often very large, so that it was often necessary to determine by lot the places each should occupy at the starting-point. But although all started with equal advantages, one only could gain the prize. Hence the question which the apostle puts to the Corinthian believers, "Know ye not that they who run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize?" It is otherwise, however, with the Christian race, in which not only are all allowed to enter the lists, but all who strive and persevere to the end shall be rewarded with the crown of triumph. And accordingly the apostle adds the exhortation, "So run, therefore, that ye may obtain." The eagerness with which the competitors strove in the foot-race is beautifully alluded to by the apostle when referring to his own Christian experience: "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Phil. iii. 12-14. And again, speaking of his own assured success in the Christian race, 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." Another of the gymnastic exercises practised in the Grecian games was wrestling. A lively description of this species of contest is given by Dr Jamieson, in his 'Eastern Manners': "On preparing themselves for the contest, the wrestlers rubbed their bodies all over with a profuse quantity of oil, with the view of imparting greater strength and activity to their limbs. But as the effect of this anointing was to render their skin so slippery that it was impossible for the antagonists to take a firm hold of each other, they were accustomed to roll themselves in the black dust of the palaestra, or besprinkle themselves very carefully with a very fine white sand, more resembling the natural colour of the skin, and kept for the accommodation of the pugilists in the antechamber of the gymnasium. According to the rules of the fight, the combatants did not form themselves into two opposite sides, and make a confused and indiscriminate onset; they engaged in matches of two against two,—several contending couples being on the arena at the same time, and thus keeping up, by their various manœuvring, and the different degrees of gallantry and skill displayed by the detached groups of wrestlers, a lively and delighted interest among the crowd of lookers-on. The victory consisted in throwing an adversary three times on the ground. This result, however, was seldom obtained without a severe and protracted struggle. For as skill more than strength was required, and each of the combatants having been, during the long term of preparation, initiated into all the mysteries of the art, was on his guard against the many stratagems practised to disable or surprise him, the battle was long continued. The opponents not only fought, and dealt their blows on each other's person with fearful impetuosity and fierceness, but grappled with each other, became entwined in each other's arms, pushed with their heads, threw themselves into the most violent attitudes, lifted each other off their feet, and came with a tremendous dash to the ground together. The effects of the fall were often instantly fatal, or produced a hopeless decrepitude for life; and if this sad result did not take place, yet there was always such a belabouring of each other's person, blackened eyes, broken teeth, fractured ribs, and distortion of the whole features, that this athletic exercise was the rudest and most brutal, though one of the most popular of the ancient games." The following extract from Dr Clarke gives the reader a lively idea of this ancient gymnastic exercise: "At Nauplia, we saw two wrestlers advance into the arena, where the combat was to take place. They came up hand in hand, capering and laughing, and highly gratified by the opportunity of showing their skill. Presently they put themselves into various attitudes, and began to bid defiance to each other. These men afforded a perfect representation of the ancient Athletæ. They wore light leather breeches, well soaked in oil; in other respects their bodies were stark naked, except being anointed with oil, and rubbed all over with dust. To gain the victory, it was necessary not only that one of the combatants should throw the other, but having thrown him, he should be able to keep his adversary lying upon his back, while he, the conqueror, regained his feet,—for in the struggle they always fell together." To this dangerous exercise and the necessity for the combatants maintaining a severe and sustained struggle, the apostle refers in Heb. xii. 4: "Ye have not resisted unto blood, striving against sin." And again directly in Eph. vi. 12: "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." The reward which was usually bestowed upon the successful competitor in the games was a crown, either of wild olive, or of laurel, or of pine-tree, or of parsley. Now these being but fading flowers, the apostle refers to the infinite superiority of the Christian reward when he says, "Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible." And the aspect of the conquerors is thus referred to in Rev. vii. 9: "After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands." To these remarks we may add the following description, by Dr Nevin, of the ancient theatres in which the games took place:—

"The theatre of ancient times was built in the form of a half-circle, with seats rising one above another round the inside of the wall. Sometimes the building was made, as it were, double, with an oval shape, then it was called an Amphitheatre. They were left open at the top, or only covered with cloth of some close kind, to keep off the sun or lighter showers of rain. Various exhibitions were displayed in the centre. Plays were acted here for the entertainment of the fashionable multitude. Among the Romans, sports of various kinds were also exhibited. One amusement in which that refined people greatly delighted was the deadly sword fight between gladiators. These were persons trained to the use of the sword for the express purpose of gratifying the public taste, or their own pride, by such bloody spectacles. Captives, and slaves, and condemned malefactors, were the only gladiators at first, but in time free-born citizens, induced by hire or by the vain imagination of glory to be acquired in such an exhibition, presented themselves in the disgraceful scene of battle. Another show common in the Roman amphitheatres was the fight with wild beasts, which condemned persons were often compelled to endure by way of capital punishment. Amid the mockery of unfeeling spectators crowded around, the wretch on whom the sentence of the law had fallen was brought into the open space in the middle. Then a lion, or tiger, or bear, or some equally terrible animal, was let loose upon him, and excited to attack him with the greatest fury. To such cruel exposures in the theatres the apostle seems to allude when he speaks of Christians being made a gazing stock, or theatrical show, in their fight of affliction, from the enemies of the truth. Heb. x. 32, 33. In another place we hear him saying: 'After the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus.' 1 Cor. xv. 32."

GAMMADIM (contracted ones, cubit-high men). It is very uncertain what people are meant by this term, in Ezek. xxvii. 11. The Vulgate renders the word pignies. Mr Taylor takes them to be Nubians, whom the ancient writers describe as being of diminutive stature, contracted proportions, but warlike, and even terrible to the neighbouring nations; all which answers very well to the Gammadim. Many suppose it to be the name of a Phœnician people; others think it refers to a resolute, courageous people, from the Arabic gamael, to be hard, without compassion.

GAP, a breach made in a dam, wall, or hedge. The Jewish false prophets did not stand in the gap, or make up the hedge. They did nothing tending to stop the course of wickedness, which opened a door for the vengeance of God to break in upon their nation; nor did they, with effectual fervent prayer, intercede with God to turn away his wrath. Ezek. xiii. 5, xxii. 30.

GARDENS. From very early times gardens were viewed with peculiar interest in Oriental countries. The first employment, indeed, in which man was engaged was in cultivating a garden. "And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it, and to keep it." Gen. ii. 15. Among the ancient Hebrews, horticulture, or the art of gardening, was prosecuted as a favourite pursuit in Palestine in the days of its ancient prosperity and peace. The former and the present state of that country in regard to fruitfulness are thus contrasted by Dr Nevin, in his interesting and useful work on Biblical Antiquities: "Every variety of soil had its use; some valuable tree or plant growing better upon it than upon any other; so that the poorest and the roughest grounds yielded oftentimes as much as the fairest and most rich. While the different kinds of grain flourished on the more level and fertile tracts, plantations of the serviceable olive covered the barren and sandy hills; the low watery soils of clay nourished groves of the tall and beautiful palm; the steepest mountain sides were hung with the rich dark clusters of the vine. By the hand of industry, the naked rocks, on such steep places, were covered with earth, and walls were built to hinder it from being swept away with the showers. So, from the bottom to the top might sometimes be seen, rising one above another, plot after plot thus raised by labour and art, where the vine was reared by the husbandman's care, and rewarded his toil with its plentiful fruit. As every family had only a small piece of ground to till, every foot of it that could be improved was cultivated, and no pains were spared to turn it to its best account. Hence the land had the appearance of a garden, and yielded support to a vast number of inhabitants. The country of Lower Galilee, especially, has been celebrated for its fruitfulness. According to the testimony of Josephus, the Jewish historian, who lived just after the time of Christ, that part of it which bordered on the lake of Genesareth, where our Lord spent so much of his time, was especially remarkable for the great variety and plenty of its productions. Every plant seemed to thrive in it; fruits that naturally grow in different climates were raised with equal ease here; so that it seemed, says that writer, as if God had taken a peculiar delight in that region, and the seasons had rivalled each other in the richness of their gifts.

"But when the traveller passes through Palestine now, his eye meets no such scenery of fruitfulness and beauty over its mountains and plains. Large tracts of the country seem a barren waste; the rich covering of the field is gone, and the hills are stripped of the vine; a thinly scattered people live in comparative poverty and idleness, where once the many thousands of Israel and Judah found plentiful support. The country, for more than a thousand years, has been given up to be wasted by war and crushed by oppression. Its people have been driven away and trampled under foot by cruel enemies. The whole land is now under the dominion of the Turks, who, instead of encouraging industry, leave it without protection and without profit. The farmer has no motive to plough and sow; his crops would grow up only to be plundered by wandering Arabs; and if he could secure any property, it would only expose him to danger from the avarice of some tyrant officer of the government, determined to seize it all for himself. No wonder, then, that 'the fruitful land has been turned into barrenness.' It has been done, however, 'for the wickedness of them that dwelt therein,' and is a wonderful fulfilment of the threatnings of God, delivered even as far back as the time of Moses (Deut. xxix. 22-28), and repeated by the prophets that followed after."

On the subject of Oriental gardens, we may quote the following remarks, from an interesting paper by the Rev. Dr J. Hamilton of London: "We have indications in Scripture of various enclosures which occasionally bear the more general name of garden. Among these were—1. Grounds for the cultivation of the vine, or the olive, or any single species of fruit tree; 2. Orchards for the cultivation of fruit trees in general; 3. Kitchen gardens; 4. Flower gardens.

"1. We once read of gennath egoz, translated in the English version 'garden of nuts,' and by the Septuagint 'garden of almonds.' It is strange that so many expositors should have imagined these nuts to be hazels—when it is a question if, even as an exotic, the Corylus avellana could exist in such a latitude. The produce of this garden may have been the chesnut or walnut, or more probably the almond of the Greek translators.

"Olive-yards are often mentioned along with vineyards; and oil being nearly as essential as wine to such a climate, the Jews were fortunate in these rocky steeps with a warm soil, which the olive loves.

"But the vineyard was of these enclosures the chief. The best benediction which the dying patriarch could bestow on the father of the royal tribe was, that he should 'bind his foal to the vine, and unto the choice vine his ass's colt; that he should wash his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes'—a blessing most appropriate to him whose goodly inheritance included the vale of Eshcol. Vineyards were sometimes on the plain, and to exclude foxes and other depredators, were enclosed by a fence of thorns, interspersed with roses and wild pomegranates, or by a wall of stone; but not unfrequently the shelving sides of their many hills were built up into terraces, and by their running exposure compensated for the increased elevation. It was usual to build stone walls across the vineyard, for the support of the vines—a custom which seems to have been as early as the days of Jacob. Such a vineyard, from very early spring to the latest autumn, was the object of an assiduous labour; and if singing be always a sign of gladness, the occupation of a vine-dresser was the most mirthful of all employments. With a song he beguiled the hours, as he trained the tendrils and cleared away the superfluous leaves, to admit the sunshine to the new-formed clusters; with a song the vintage was gathered in; and with shouting, as well as singing, the wine press was trodden. At stated seasons the festive companies of the Israelitish youth repaired with dancing and music to the vineyards; much in the same manner as the 1st of May was wont to be observed in England, but with this difference, that such celebrations among the Jews were religious solemnities. Besides the 'cottage in the vineyard,' the lonely post of observation to one who guarded it at the time of ripe grapes, the more sumptuous proprietors erected handsome structures, repeatedly mentioned as towers, and no doubt the equivalent of the Turkish kiosks. In these it would be pleasant for a people of light avocations and few amusements to while away the time, particularly at those sultry seasons which indispose for labour the most willing. If any breeze were stirring, the higher apartment of a tower on a hill-side would be sure to catch it; and when the fields around were scorched into clay, the green festoons depending from the walls or flung across the trellises, would be a grateful refreshment to more senses than the eye. And just as we see our grandees lionizing the harvest fields, we may believe that from these towers of luxury the wealthy possessors would take their share of what was the final and crowning joy of a Jewish harvest; and patronizingly, or in sympathy, participate in the delight of groups who gathered and bore away the luscious fruits to the vats where the carolling vintagers pressed the juice, and where all vied in the revelry, down to the solitary gleaner, who filled his basket, blessing in his heart the lawgiver. When now no cluster could be seen, even on the outmost bough, in their turn, and last of all, the cattle were admitted, to browse upon the foliage.

"2. It was a law among the Jews, that they should not plant olives in vineyards; from which some have drawn the over-hasty inference, that every species of fruit tree required its separate enclosure. We are apt to think that the law applied only to the bringing together the two great staples of Jewish cultivation—the tree that gave them oil, and that which gave them wine. For the symbolical purpose, the one restriction was sufficient; and the Jews were no more hindered from planting dates and pomegranates together than they were prohibited from cultivating leeks and onions in the same enclosure. But the point is decided. For instance, it is incidentally said, 'A man had a fig tree planted in his vineyard;' a custom which is curiously verified by those Egyptian monuments where fruit trees are introduced among the vines. And we have repeated examples of orchards, properly so called, where trees of many sorts were reared together. Thus, in the mournful recital of his unsatisfying recreations, the royal preacher says: 'I made me orchards and vineyards, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits.' How many varieties were cultivated by the Jews, we have not now the means of knowing; but the almond, apple or citron, chesnut, date, pomegranate, and fig, occupied an important place, in addition to the vine and olive already mentioned. But for the sake of a dense shade, the orchard often contained trees more valued for their foliage than their fruit—the oak, the sycamore, the myrtle, the box, and the mulberry.

"3. The first time that we find a garden of herbs mentioned, is when the covetous Ahab set his heart upon the vineyard of Naboth. It was near to the palace, and therefore the King of Israel sought it, that he might convert it into a garden of herbs—the vineyard of a subject being good enough to make a kitchen garden for a king. In every country, these enclosures are chiefly occupied with the vegetables which the peculiarities of the climate render desirable. And whilst the fields of the Hebrews were sown with wheat, barley, rye, millet, and lentiles, their culinary vegetables were, on the one hand, gourds, cucumbers, and melons; on the other, onions, leeks, and garlic—rice, aulse, and cumin—mustard, cinnamon, and cassia; the former to allay their thirst, and act as refrigerants—the latter to season their dishes, and serve for tonics. Some of these were considered of sufficient importance to occupy a special enclosure; hence we read, for example, of a 'garden of cucumbers.' But in such cases the word field would be better adapted to our idiom. The analogous expression, 'a garden of turnips,' would sound strange to English ears.

"4. Like the modern Turks and Persians, the Jews were fond of perfumes. Many of those most valued neither grew spontaneously in their own land, nor could be reared by any art, but were, at great expense, imported from Arabia and the countries beyond. No sacrifice was complete without incense; clouds of which continually filled the temple. Their raiment was perfumed: hence blind Isaac, 'smelling the fragrance of Jacob's raiment, blessed him, saying, 'Behold! the fragrance of my son is as the fragrance of a field which Jehovah hath blessed.' And elsewhere, a bride is thus addressed: 'All thy garments, out of ivory wardrobes, perfumed with myrrh, aloes, and cassia, delighted thee with their fragrance.' The wealthy ceiled their houses with cedar, that they might be continually regaled with the 'smell of Lebanon.' The box of precious ointment poured on the head of a guest was a mark of a distinguished reception. And garlands of roses, in a land where they smell more sweetly than in Europe, encircled the heads of the banqueters. Accordingly, we are prepared to find odoriferous plants occupying the chief place in the flower garden of ancient Palestine. Thus, in the impassioned address of the bride of Solomon:—

'A garden art thou, filled with matchless sweets;
A garden wall'd, those matchless sweets to shield;
A spring enclosed, a fountain fresh and sealed;
A paradise of plants, where all unite,
Dear to the smell, the palate, or the sight:
Of rich pomegranates that at random blow;
Cypress and nard, in fragrant gales that flow;
Nard, saffron, cinnamon, the dulcet airs,
Deep through its canes the calamus prepares:
The scented aloes, and each shrub that showers
Gums from its veins, and spices from its flowers.
O pride of gardens! fount of endless sweets!
Well-spring of all in Lebanon that meets!'

Song of Solomon by Good.

"From this, and parallel passages in the same Song, a goodly catalogue of garden flowers might be collected; of which it might be observed, that most of them are distinguished by their fragrance, and that few of them were natives of Palestine. Except frankincense, none of them were consecrated to religious uses.

"It is to be remembered, however, that the gardens of which we have the most gorgeous descriptions in the Bible, were the gardens of one monarch; and as no succeeding king built such a temple as that of Solomon, or such a palace as the house of the forest of Lebanon, so we cannot be sure that even kings, after his day, had taste or wealth enough to construct aqueducts, dig fish-ponds, and lay out pleasure gardens. We are unfortunate in possessing no direct information either as to the way in which these gardens were laid out, the disposition of the plants, and the economy of the parterres. The history has omitted these; and time, which has left the marks of terraces along the hills, has spared no vestige of the flower border. Nor is there any reason to believe that many of the Jews could afford, or cared to possess apart, all those various gardens which we have enumerated. Most would be content to have the orchard, herb garden, and flower plot, all in one; and it would depend on the judgment or resources of the owner, how far these, collectively, should preserve the excellences of each. There are certain circumstances which make us suspect, that to many might be applicable the description, often quoted from Dr. Chandler, of a Turkish governor's garden at Eleus: 'We paid a piaster for seeing a very small spot of ground, walled in, and containing nothing except two vines, a fig, and a pomegranate tree, and a well of excellent water.' The garden of Nathanael might be no better than this; but such a garden let us not despise. It had shade, and verdure, and fruit; and it had a fountain. To a Jew who had seen no better, it might be a paradise. For, as Dr. Russell has observed, with that good sense which is superior to an affected fastidiousness, concerning the gardens of Aleppo: 'Inelegant as they may appear to the cultivated taste of an Englishman, they afford a voluptuous nooutside retreat to the languid traveller. Even he whose imagination can recall the enchanting scenery of Richmond or of Stow, may perhaps experience new pleasure in viewing the glistening pomegranates in full blossom. Revived by the freshening breeze, the purling of the brooks, and the verdure of the groves, his ear will catch the melody of the nightingale, delightful beyond what is heard in England; with conscious gratitude to Heaven, he will recline on the simple mat, bless the hospitable shelter, and perhaps, while indulging the pensive mood, he will hardly regret the absence of British refinement in gardening.'

"Owing to the density of the population, and the richness of the soil, a greater proportion of Palestine was occupied with gardens than of almost any land. This was particularly the case in the neighbourhood of towns. From the account of Josephus, the environs of Jerusalem were all laid out in gardens; and from the statement of the rabbis, it would appear that, except a few gardens of roses, which had existed since the days of the prophets, there were none within the walls. For this a good reason is assigned in the putrefaction of heaps of weeds, and the bad smell of the manure—a reason which will be more fully appreciated when it is known that the substance chiefly used for enriching the gardens, round the capital, was the blood which flowed away from the altars, and which, having been once dedicated to a sacred use, was procured by the gardeners on payment of some trivial offering. This objection was only applicable to economical gardens, and to these at certain seasons of the year.

"Perhaps the greatest restraint on the horticultural taste and skill of the Hebrews, particularly in the latter days of their commonwealth, arose from the ridiculous interference of their doctors, scribes, or rabbis. This extended to all the minutest affairs of life, and was acquiesced in with abject submission. Everything which should have been left to the discretion of the gardener, was eventually fixed down by the rules of this intermeddling casuistry. Thus, 'Cut not down the palm that bears a eab of dates. And what of the olive, that that should not be cut down? Ans. If it bear but the fourth part of a cab.' And a rabbi adds: 'My son Shibchah had not died, had he not cut down a fig tree before the time.' The fathers of the traditions discussed a multitude of such questions as the following: 'How many vines make a vineyard? How should its vines be arranged? How long is it lawful to sow the same plot of ground with different seeds? In a field sown with different crops, what corner is due to the poor? And when corn is sown among olives, should the poor have a corner at all? Is it lawful to sow anything within the wine press?' But there was one question which especially divided all the schools—'What was to be done as to the tithing of a tree which, on the first month, retained some of last year's fruit, and had put forth some of that year's produce?' For the answers of Rabbi Judan, Rabbi Jissa, Rabbi Zeira, Samuel Ben Abbe, and the decision of the schools of Shammai and Hillel, the reader must consult Dr. Lightfoot."

GARLANDS, a kind of crowns made with flowers, ribands, &c. Those brought by the priest of Jupiter, were probably designed to crown the ox destined for sacrifice, in like manner as the Jews crowned their victims for sacrifice with olive branches (Acts xiv. 13); or, as some think, they were intended to be set on the heads of the apostles.

GARLIC. This plant is mentioned only once in the Bible. Numb. xi. 5. The translators in rendering shumim garlic, no doubt mean the Allium sativum of botanists. This plant possesses an essential oil of an exceedingly heating and penetrating quality, which renders it almost unfit for use except as a medicine. The editor of the Pictorial Bible suggests the Allium scorodoprasum or rocambole, which has compound buds, with cloves smaller than those of garlic. There is another species, however, which, as being a native of Palestine, is more likely—the Allium Ascalonicum, shalote or eschallote. That the people of Egypt did eat garlic is evident from the fact, that in the time of Herodotus, an inscription existed on one of the pyramids, recording the expense of radishes, onions, and garlic, consumed by the workmen during the progress of the undertaking.

GARMENTS. See DRESS.

GARNER. This word, which occurs in Ps. cxliv. 13, is properly a "store chamber;" but in Joel i. 17, the Hebrew word thus rendered rather implies a "barn or granary." It occurs in the New Testament, Matt. iii. 12, denoting a repository, usually subterranean, such as those in which the Oriental nations still preserve their corn, wine, oil, and other articles of value.

GARNISH. The word thus rendered in 2 Chron. iii. 6, is in the margin "covered," and probably means that he paved the house with precious stones. In the New Testament it occurs: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous." Matt. xxiii. 29. Among the Jews this garnishing of the sepulchres consisted in keeping them in repair, and ornamenting them, and also, at least in later ages, in reciting certain prayers over them, and entreaties to the dead to intercede with God in their favour.

GARRISON, a post occupied, for purposes of offence and defence, by a military force. 1 Sam. x. 5; 2 Sam. viii. 6, 14.

GATE. The gates or doors of the dwelling-houses of the ancient Hebrews were constructed of wood. This was the case with the gates of Gaza, which Samson carried off, and bore them upon his shoulders to the top of a hill before Hebron.

"Gate," is often used in Scripture to denote a place of public assembly, where justice was administered (Deut. xvii. 5, 8, xxi. 19, xxii. 15, xxv. 7, &c.), because, as the Jews mostly laboured in the fields, assemblies were held at their city gates, and justice administered there, that labourers might lose no time, and that country people, who had affairs of justice, might not be obliged to enter the town. See Ruth iv. 1; Gen. xxiii. 10, 18. Hence, also, "gate" sometimes signifies power, dominion; almost in the same sense as the Turkish sultan's palace is called the Porte. God promises Abraham that his posterity shall possess the gates of their enemies—their towns, their fortresses (Gen. xxii. 17); and Christ says to Peter, "Thou art Peter; and on this rock will I build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Matt. xvi. 18. (See HADES—HELL.) Solomon says: "He that exalteth his gate seeketh destruction." The Arabs are accustomed to ride into the houses of those they design to harass. To prevent this, Theveutot tells us that the door of the house in which the French merchants lived at Rama was not three feet high, and that all the doors of that town are equally low. A lofty gate is one of the insignia of royalty in Eastern countries; and it must have been the same in ancient times. Hence the Psalmist addresses the lofty gates of the temple at Jerusalem: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye ever lasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in." Ps. xxiv. 7. Almost all the houses of the higher classes in the East have spacious entrances, with magnificent gates. There is usually in the houses of the grandees, and also in the cities, a gate which is reserved only for the entrance of royalty; and to this the prophet alludes: "Then he brought me back the way of the gate of the outward sanctuary which looketh toward the east; and it was shut. Then said the Lord unto me, This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter in by it; because the Lord, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut." Ezek. xlv. 1, 2. In fortified places, the gates, for security, were covered with thick plates of iron—a custom still observed in the East. Some of them were plated over with brass. Hence the Psalmist: "He hath broken the gates of brass" (Ps. cvii. 16); and in the Prophecy of Isaiah (xlv. 2): "I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight: I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron." People may be often seen hovering about the gates of the palaces in the East—some of them from mere curiosity, and others from the hope of obtaining some mark of royal favour. Hence the man that heareth the sayings of Wisdom is described as "watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors." Prov. viii. 34. In times of peace, the arms of soldiers were often hung upon the gates; and, accordingly, it is said, in Ezek. xxvii. 11, "They hanged their shields upon thy walls round about." Before the gates of temples, and buildings of every kind consecrated to religious purposes, there was anciently a wide enclosure, within which the people worshipped, and which looked toward the entrance of the edifice. Thus: "Likewise the people of the land shall worship at the door of this gate before the Lord in the Sabbaths and in the new moons." Ezek. xlv. 3. And in the beautiful song of the sons of Korah: "The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob." Ps. lxxxvii. 2.

The gate of a city was a place of public resort, where a great deal of important business was transacted. At the entrance of every town there is a roofed building, not enclosed by walls, where people meet to hear the news of the day, and talk over the affairs of the place. This, from the most ancient times, has been the chosen place where governors and elders sat to hear complaints or to dispense justice, to make conveyance of titles and estates, to hold markets, and perform all the offices connected with the general interests of the city. Thus: "Then went Boaz up to the gate, and sat him down there: and, behold, the kinsman of whom Boaz spake came by; unto whom he said, Ho, such a one! turn aside, sit down here. And he turned aside, and sat down. And he took ten men of the elders of the city, and said, Sit ye down here. And they sat down. And Boaz said unto the elders, and unto all the people, Ye are witnesses this day, that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi. Moreover Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place: ye are witnesses this day." Ruth iv. 1, 2, 9, 10. To this practice of administering justice in the gates, there are many allusions in the Sacred Scriptures. Thus we are told concerning David, after he had recovered from his grief at the death of Absalom: "Then the king arose, and sat in the gate. And they told unto all the people, saying, Behold, the king doth sit in the gate. And all the people came before the king: for Israel had fled every man to his tent." 2 Sam. xix. 8. And Jeremiah, when he would describe the desolation of Jerusalem, says: "Elders have ceased from the gate" (Lam. v. 14); that is, justice is no longer administered.

GATH, the fifth of the principal cities of the Philistines. It was a place of strength in the time of the Prophets Amos and Micah, and is placed by Jerome on the road between Eleutheropolis and Gaza, eighteen miles south of Joppa, and thirty-two west of Jerusalem. It appears to have been the extreme boundary of the Philistine territory in one direction, as Ekron was in the other. Hence the expression, "from Ekron even unto Gath." 1 Sam. vii. 14. It was memorable in the history of the Old Testament for being the birth-place of the giant Goliath. It was destroyed by David, but rebuilt by his grandson, Rehoboam; and after being again dismantled by Uzziah, king of Judah, was razed to the ground by Hazael, king of Syria. Eusebius and Jerome place it about four miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Lydda.

GATHER. God gathers sinners to himself, when, by his preached Gospel and Holy Spirit, he powerfully draws and unites them to himself, and instates and preserves them in fellowship with him. Matt. xxiii. 37. Those gather with Christ that promote the true interests of religion and welfare of men's souls. Matt. xii. 30; Luke xi. 23. The gathering of the people was to Judah, as, at the three solemn feasts, the Hebrew tribes went up to Jerusalem: and their gathering was, and is, to Shiloh, when multitudes attended his instructions. Multitudes, chiefly of Gentiles, believe on, and walk in him. Gen. xlix. 10. To have one's soul gathered with sinners, and his life with bloody men, is to be shut up in their company, to share in their plagues, and be carried into hell with them. Ps. xxvi. 9.

GATH-HEPHER, the birth-place of the Prophet Jonah, the son of Amittai, was situated in Galilee. 2 Kings xiv. 25. Joshua makes this city, which he calls Gittah hepher, to be part of the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 13); and Jerome, in his preface to the Prophecy of Jonah, says that it was two miles from Sephoris or Diocæsarea.

GATH-RIMMON. One of the Levitical cities. Josh. xix. 45. There were two other cities of this name, both given to the priests—the one situated in the half-tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xxi. 25), and the other in Ephraim. 1 Chron. vi. 69.

GAULON or GOLAN, a city beyond Jordan, from which the small province of Gaulonitis derived its name. It was seated in Upper Galilee beyond Jordan, and was given to the half-tribe of Manasseh. Deut. iv. 43. It was one of the cities of refuge. Josh. xxi. 27.

GAURS, the supposed descendants of the ancient Parsees (See MAGI—PARSEES), who still subsist in different parts of the East. The Mohammedans denounce this people as monsters of cruelty and iniquity; but modern travellers describe them as harmless and inoffensive, though very superstitious in their devotions. For their ancient principles, said to be derived from Zoroaster, see the articles above referred to; but it is difficult to say how far they retain the same principles. From some circumstances it has been supposed that they, or a part of them, have imbibed some points of Christianity; but little certain is known respecting them.

GAZA, an important city of the Philistines, situated about sixty miles south-west from Jerusalem, and within three miles of the Mediterranean Sea. It was the most southern of the five principal cities of the Philistines, and formed the frontier town of Palestine on the side of Egypt. It was subdued, along with the other lordships, by David, and although it revolted in the reigns of Jotham and Ahaz, it was reconquered by Hezekiah. For some time it was subject to the Chaldeans, then to the Persians, after whom it passed into the hands of the Greeks and Romans, and finally came into the possession of the Turks, to whom it still belongs.

"Modern Gaza," says Wittman, "is situated on an eminence, and is rendered picturesque by the number of fine minarets which rise majestically above the buildings, and by the beautiful date trees which are interspersed. The suburbs are composed of wretched mud huts; but within the town the buildings make a much better appearance than those we had generally met with in Syria. The streets are of a moderate breadth. Many fragments of statues, columns, &c., of marble, are seen in the walls and buildings in different parts of the town. The suburbs and environs of Gaza are rendered extremely agreeable by a number of large gardens, cultivated with the nicest care, which lie in a direction north and south of the town; while others of the same description run to a considerable distance westward. These gardens are filled with a great variety of choice fruit trees, such as the fig, the mulberry, the pomegranate, the apricot, the peach, and the almond, together with a few lemon and orange trees. The numerous plantations of olive and date trees which are interspersed, contribute greatly to the picturesque effect of the scene exhibited by the surrounding plains; and the view of the sea, distant about a league, tends to diversify still more the animated features of this luxuriant scene."

GEBA, a Levitical town belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, and mentioned in Josh. xviii. 24, xxi. 17. There is also a town of this name referred to in 2 Kings xxiii. 8, as the limit northward of the kingdom of Judah. Hence the phrase, "From Geba to Beersheba." Dr Wilson thinks that this place corresponds to the modern Ibia.

GEBAL is regarded by Philo as the first city of the Phœnicians. The people of this place were employed by Hiram, king of Tyre, in preparing materials for Solomon's temple. In Ezekiel xxvii. 9, they are mentioned as "calkers." Dr Kitto regards the Gebal of Scripture as corresponding to the Gabala spoken of by Pliny and other Roman geographical writers. This is also the opinion of Bochart and Pococke. The modern name of the city is Jebeil. It is the Byblus of the Greeks, and the birth-place of Adonis. There is also a southern district of Judea, inhabited by the Edomites, which bears this name, extending from the Dead Sea to Petra in Idumea.

It is this last Gebal which is mentioned in Ps. xxxiii. 7.

GEBIM, a place mentioned in Isa. x. 31, the situation of which is now quite unknown.

GEDALIAH, the son of Ahikam, who was left in Palestine by Nebuchadnezzar, to govern the people who remained there after the destruction of Jerusalem. He was treacherously murdered by Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah. 2 Kings xxv. 22-25; Jer. xli. 2.

GEDER. This name occurs several times in the Scriptures, and we are under the necessity of distinguishing the towns so called with considerable attention, because they have hitherto been subject to much confusion. They were all in the tribe of Judah, and apparently in the south of that tribe. They were, probably, rather forts, or military posts, than extensive and populous towns. Some of them were single; others, apparently, were double; and, perhaps, one was almost, or altogether, a chain of fencible posts, in a military sense.

GEDEROTH, a place which lay on the south-east border of the territory of the Philistines, and was surprised and captured by that people in the reign of Ahaz.

GEHAZI, the servant of the Prophet Elisha, who, contrary to his master's intention, fraudulently obtained presents from Naaman the Syrian captain, and was smitten with leprosy for his wickedness. 2 Kings v. 20-27.

GEHENNA, or VALLEY OF HINNOM, a valley in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, along the brook Kedron. This place, to which there is frequent reference in the Word of God, is thus described by Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne: "From the southern verge of Zion, we looked down into the valley of Hinnom, still called Wady Jehennam, which lies nearly due east and west. It appeared very deep, the opposite side rocky and precipitous, and the bosom of it filled with shady olive trees. Here Manasseh caused his children to pass through the fire to Moloch (2 Chron. xxxiii. 6); and here Jeremiah uttered that dreadful prophecy, 'This place shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the son of Hinnom, but the valley of Slaughter.' Jer. xix. 6. From the awful wickedness committed in this valley; perhaps as much as from the Satanic fires kindled in it, the name came to signify the place of eternal sin and woe. To us it appeared a pleasant shady valley, but in other days, when the precipitous sides were planted with thick trees, it may have been gloomy enough." Dr Wilson says: "The valley of Hinnom, associated so much with darkness, impurity, and blood, appeared like a deep and yawning gorge, with the facings of its nearly bare rocks on each side much cut and broken. It is now called Wady Jehennam, or the valley of Hell." This valley is sometimes thought to have been the common sewer of Jerusalem, and that fires were kept constantly burning to consume the filth of the city. At all events, we read in 2 Kings xxiii. 10, that it was thus polluted by king Josiah: "And he defiled Topheth, which is in the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Moloch." It was in this valley that human sacrifices were offered in honour of Moloch. In the New Testament, the name Gehenna is several times, in the original Greek, applied to hell. When we think of the horrid rites which were celebrated in the valley of Hinnom, we cannot fail to see that the analogy with the place of torment is not without foundation.

GELIOTH, a name applied to Gilgal. Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 17.

GEMARA. See TALMUD.

GEMARIAH, the son of Hilki'ah, who was sent to Babylon with Elasah, the son of Shaphan, from Zedekiah, king of Judah, to carry the tribute-money to Nebuchadnezzar. Jer. xxix. 3, 4. It was also the name of the son of Shaphan, a councillor of King Jehoiakim, before whom Baruch read Jeremiah's prophecies, and who reported them to the king. Jer. xxxvi. 12, 13.

GENEALOGY signifies the line of descent, or a list of a person's ancestors. The common Hebrew expression for it is Sepher-toledoth, "the Book of Generations." No nation was ever more careful to preserve their genealogies than the Jews. The Sacred Writings contain genealogies extended three thousand five hundred years backward. The genealogy of our Saviour is deduced by the evangelists from Adam to Joseph and Mary, through a space of four thousand years and upwards. Matthew gives the line of descent through Joseph, his reputed or legal father; and Luke through Mary, his mother. In reading these genealogies, we should remember that the Messiah was restricted by divine appointment—1. To the posterity of Abraham. 2. To the family of David. 3. To the existence of the second temple. It appears that our Lord was of the direct line, the elder branch of the royal family; in short, the very person who, had the dominion continued in the family of David, would have legally sat on the throne. Gen. xlix. 10; Acts ii. 25-36.

On the subject of the genealogy of our blessed Lord we cannot refrain from quoting the following beautiful remarks of the late Dr. Welsh, in his "Elements of Church History:" "I cannot but remark, that the mere list of names by which Matthew connects our Saviour with Abraham, and by which Luke connects him with Adam, has always appeared to me inexpressibly sublime, and calculated to inspire us with a deep sense of the superintending providence of God. We are carried through a period of many thousand years, and amidst the revolutions of the mightiest empires, and the rise and fall of many kingdoms, and the convulsions of external nature, and a long succession of the generations of men—amidst all these we see the hand of God continually exercised in bringing to pass his eternal decrees. We have, as it were, the fountain of a stream, scarcely discernible in its first beginning, in danger of being dried up in a scorching desert, then of being confounded amidst kindred floods, then of being lost amidst the interminable swamps of a new region, and finally, swallowed up in an opening of the earth and lost apparently to human vision for ever; and after having traced it through so many different and distant climes to such a termination, it rushes forth again revealed to view with matchless beauty and grandeur. The imagination of man is bewildered in attempting to form an idea of the long succession of many nations, and of the changes that took place in society from the times of Adam, and Abraham, and David, to that of Christ. But amidst the infinite diversity of human character, and the fearful ebullitions of human passions, and the wide varieties of human situation, and amidst the many millions of human beings that came into the world and fulfilled their little part, and then passed away and were forgotten—amidst all this endless diversity of human beings, and human passions, and human plans, the purpose of the Almighty is invariably the same, and it he effects alike by the consent, the co-operation, the indifference, the ignorance, the opposition of man. In the king and in the slave, in the palace and in the cottage, in the city and in the field, in the mountain and in the valley, in the righteous and in the wicked, we find the operations of Providence tending towards the same beneficent, the same God-like end. The faith of Abraham, the idolatry of Amaziah, the lowliness of Joseph, and the glory of Solomon, are all made to work together to one event. In the sheep-cots of Mamre, in the prison-houses of Egypt, in the corn-fields of Boaz, on the throne of Judah, among the willows by the rivers of Babylon, in the temple of Jerusalem, in the work-shops of Galilee, in the manger of Bethlehem—in all these we see the impress of the finger of God. And I cannot but think that in this commencement of the history of the New Testament Church, we have, in the reference that is made to the former dispensation, and in the fact that God never for a moment forgot the word which he spoke to a thousand generations, a pledge that in his own time God will not fail to accomplish all that he has spoken respecting his kingdom. In contemplating the gloomiest periods of the Christian Church, we also may derive encouragement, in the belief that the Almighty has never wholly deserted the earth. And when the circumstances of the Church appear most desperate, it should be remembered that it was when the cause of Israel and of mankind seemed lost for ever, when the throne of David was levelled in the dust, when the royal blood was almost lost amongst the meanest of the people, it was then that God raised up a horn of salvation in the house of his servant David."

The Jewish priests were obliged to produce an exact genealogy of their families, before they were admitted to exercise their function. Wherever placed, the Jews were particularly careful not to marry below themselves; and to prevent this, they kept tables of genealogy in their several families, the originals of which were lodged at Jerusalem, to be occasionally consulted. These authentic monuments, during all their wars and persecutions, were taken great care of, and from time to time renewed. But since the last destruction of their city, and the dispersion of the people, their ancient genealogies are lost. But to this the Jews reply, that either Elias, or some other inspired priest or prophet, shall come and restore their genealogical tables before the Messiah's appearance; a tradition which they ground on a passage in Neh. vii. 64, 65. The exactness with which the genealogies of the family of Aaron were kept throws light upon the remark of the apostle (Heb. vii. 3), in reference to Melchisedec, that he was "without descent," or rather without genealogy; that is, his name was not found in the public genealogical registers, and his descent being unknown, his priesthood must be of a different kind, and be regarded differently from that of Aaron and his sons. Not being in the line of Aaron, therefore, he is not to be confounded with the Jewish priests, who were only typical and temporary. It was customary, on the death of any person of distinction, to recite his genealogy at the time of his burial; and hence the affecting exclamation of the prophet, "Who shall declare his generation!" Isa. liii. 8.

GENERAL. The Hebrew word which is thus translated in 1 Chron. xxvii. 34, is variously rendered in other places, captain, commander, a chief, or prince. The later Jewish theological writers employ the term for an archangel, one of the seven principal angels which surround the throne of Jehovah.

GENERAL CALL. See CALLING.

GENERAL REDEMPTION. See ATONEMENT—ELECTION—REDEMPTION.

GENERATION. Besides the common acceptance of this word, as signifying descent, it is used for the history and genealogy of any individual. The ancients sometimes computed by generations: "In the fourth generation thy descendants shall come hither again." Gen. xv. 16. Among the ancients, when the duration of generations was not exactly described by the age of four men succeeding one another from father to son, it was fixed by some at a hundred years, by others at a hundred and ten, by others at thirty-three, thirty, twenty-five, and even at twenty years—being neither uniform nor settled; only, it is remarked that a generation is longer as it is more ancient.

GENERATION, ETERNAL. This expression is used in reference to the mysterious constitution of Christ's person as the Son of God. Some writers speak of the divine nature as communicated in its essence and perfections from the Father to the Son, and that in this consists his eternal generation. But such a mode of expression is very objectionable, inasmuch as it is an attempt to explain the incomprehensible filiation of the Son by an analogy drawn from the earthly relation of father and son, which can throw no possible light upon the subject. "We can conceive," as Dr. Dick well remarks, "the communication of a material essence by one material being to another, because it takes place in the generation of animals; but the communication of a spiritual, indivisible, immutable essence, is altogether inconceivable, especially when we add that the supposed communication does not constitute a different being, but takes place in the essence communicating." To avoid the incomprehensible notion of the communication of essence, some maintain that the first person of the Trinity did not beget the second as God, but as Son; or did not beget the essence, but the person. This is another attempt to be wise above what is written, as well as to explain what is inexplicable. The Sonship of Christ is not founded upon his mission, nor upon his miraculous conception, nor upon his resurrection, as is supposed by many; but he is the Son of God by an eternal, necessary, and ineffable generation. On this subject, among other passages of Scripture, we may refer to Ps. ii. 7; Prov. viii. 24, 25; Mic. v. 2; John i. 14. Though we cannot explain the manner of the eternal generation of the Son, yet the fact is undoubtedly revealed in the Word of God. Nor is this an unimportant doctrine. The denial of our Lord's eternal Sonship tends to subvert the doctrine of the Trinity, and to tarnish the glory and perfection of the great work of redemption. See SON OF GOD.

GENEROSITY, the disposition which prompts us to bestow favours which are not the purchase of any particular merit. It is different from humanity. Humanity is that exquisite feeling we possess in relation to others, so as to grieve for their sufferings, resent their injuries, or rejoice at their prosperity; and as it arises from sympathy, it requires no great self-denial or self-command; but generosity is that by which we are led to prefer some other person to ourselves, and to sacrifice any interest of our own to the interest of another. Generosity is peculiarly amiable when it is spontaneous and unsolicited, when it is disinterested, and when, in the distribution of its benefits, it consults the best season and manner in conferring them.

GENESIS, the first book of the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses, which derives its name Genesis from the title in the Greek Septuagint version, as giving a history of the generation or production of all things. It is almost universally agreed to have been written by Moses, although there is some difference of opinion as to the time when it was composed. Eusebius, followed by many others, has conjectured that it was written when Moses was keeping the flocks of his father-in-law, Jethro, in the Desert of Midian. Others allege that it was written after the promulgation of the law from Mount Sinai. Some Jewish writers, founding their opinion on Exod. xxiv. 12, suppose that God dictated to Moses all the contents of this book during the first forty days that he was with the Lord on Sinai, and that on his descent he committed the whole to writing. This book comprises the history of about 2369 years, or according to the computation of Dr. Hales, of 3619 years. It is divided by the Jews into twelve paraschae or large sections, and forty-three siderim or smaller sections; in our Bibles it consists of fifty chapters. The design of the Book of Genesis is to record the history of the world from the beginning of time, and also to exhibit the origin of the Church of Christ. A question has been started of late years as to the source whence Moses derived his knowledge of events which happened so long before his time. But when we consider the length to which the life of man in the early ages of the world extended, we may easily perceive that the most accurate traditions could be handed down to the time of Moses, passing as they must have done through the hands of a very few persons; and keeping in view that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God," we need be at no loss as to the perfect accuracy and truth of the Mosaic record.

GENIUS in the ancient mythology, signified a good or evil spirit, set over each person to direct his birth, accompany him in his life, to guard his person, and guide his thoughts. Genius, among the moderns, signifies that peculiar aptitude which some men naturally possess to perform well and easily that which others can do but indifferently, and with a great deal of pain. It is defined by Sir J. Reynolds to be, "the power of expressing a subject as a whole;" by others, "greater acuteness of perception and memory;" by others, "the predominance of the ideal faculty, or imagination;" by some it is resolved into "intuitive judgment," and others still into "patient thought," study, and application. Probably it comprehends something of all these.

GENNESARETH, LAND OF, or GENNESAR, so named from Cinneroth, the ancient name of a city and adjoining tract, extending four miles along the north-western shore of the Sea of Galilee. This part of Galilee is described by Josephus as possessing a singular fertility, with delightful temperature of the air, and abounding in the fruits of different climates. It is supposed to have derived its name from gen and sar, as being the garden of princes.

GENNESARETH, SEA OF. See GALILEE, SEA OF.

GENTILE, in matters of religion, a Pagan, or worshipper of false gods. The origin of this word is deduced from the Jews, who called all those who were not of their race and religion gojim; that is, gentes, which, in the Greek translation of the Old Testament, is rendered Gentiles, in which sense it frequently occurs in the New Testament, as in Matt. vi. 32: "All these things the Gentiles or nations seek." The prophets of the Old Testament dwell frequently and with benevolent delight on the future calling of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ. (See NATIONS—HEATHEN—PAGANISM.) In the writings of Paul, the Gentiles are generally denoted as Greeks. Rom. i. 14, 16, ii. 9, 10, iii. 9, 29, x. 12; 1 Cor. i. 22–24; Gal. iii. 28. Luke, in the Acts, expresses himself in the same manner. Acts vi. 1, xi. 20, xviii. 4, 6, 17, &c.

GENTILES, COURT OF THE. Josephus says there was in the court of the temple a wall, or balustrade, breast high, with pillars at particular distances, and inscriptions on them in Greek and Latin, importing that strangers were forbidden from entering farther. Here their offerings were received, and sacrifices were offered for them, they standing at the barrier; but they were not allowed to approach to the altar. From these particulars, we learn the meaning of what the Apostle Paul calls "the middle wall of partition" between Jews and Gentiles, broken down by the Gospel.

GENTILES, ISLES OF THE (Gen. x. 5), evidently denote Asia Minor, and the whole of Europe, which were peopled by the descendants of Japheth, and which, as lying west of Palestine, could only be communicated with by the Mediterranean Sea.

GENTLENESS, softness or mildness of disposition and behaviour. Little as this disposition is thought of by many, we find it considered in Scripture as a characteristic of the true Christian. "The wisdom that is from above," saith the Apostle James, (iii. 17), "is gentle." "This gentleness, indeed, is to be distinguished from passive tameness of spirit, and from unlimited compliance with the manners of others. That passive tameness which submits without a struggle to every encroachment of the violent and assuming, forms no part of Christian duty; but, on the contrary, is destructive of general happiness and order. That unlimited complaisance, which on every occasion falls in with the opinions and manners of others, is so far from being a virtue, that it is itself a vice, and the parent of many vices. It overthrows all steadiness of principle, and produces that sinful conformity with the world which taints the whole character. In the present corrupted state of human manners, always to assent and to comply, is the very worst maxim we can adopt. True gentleness, therefore, is to be carefully distinguished from the mean spirit of cowards and the fawning assent of sycophants. It renounces no just right from fear; it gives up no important truth from flattery; it is, indeed, not only consistent with a firm mind, but it necessarily requires a manly spirit and fixed principle, in order to give it any real value. It stands opposed to harshness and severity, to pride and arrogance, to violence and oppression; it is properly that part of charity which makes us unwilling to give pain to any of our brethren. Compassion prompts us to relieve their wants; forbearance prevents us from retaliating their injuries; meekness restrains our angry passions; candour, our severe judgments; but gentleness corrects whatever is offensive in our manner, and, by a constant train of humane attentions, studies to alleviate the burden of common misery."

GENTOOS, a term signifying mankind, assumed by the inhabitants of Hindostan, now called HINDUS (which see).

GENUFLECTION, the act of bowing or bending the knee, or rather of kneeling down. The Jews usually prayed standing, but not always. Baronius is of opinion that genuflection was established in public worship A.D. 58, from that passage in Acts xx. 36, where Paul is expressly mentioned to kneel down at prayer; but Saurin shows that nothing can be thence concluded. The same author remarks, also, that the primitive Christians carried the practice of genuflection in private so far, that some of them had worn cavities in the floor where they prayed; and Jerome relates of James, that he had contracted a hardness on his knees equal to that of camels.

GERAH, the smallest piece of money among the Hebrews, twenty of which made a shekel. Exod. xxx. 13. The word properly means a bean or a grain; and the Hebrews, no doubt, used this grain as a weight.

GERAR. We find a city of this name so early as Gen. xx. 1, xxvi. 1, 17, expressly stated to be a city of the Philistines. The probability is, that some wandering tribe of Palli had settled here, before the great influx of their nation into these parts, during the captivity of the Israelites in Egypt. As Abraham himself was a pilgrim from a region not very distant from the original country of these Palli, they might perhaps feel some kind of sympathy with him and for him. Gerar was not far from Gaza, in the south of Judah.

GERGESENES, or GIRGASHITES, a people of the land of Canaan, who settled east of the Sea of Tiberias, and gave name to a region and city. Buckingham, Burckhardt, and other modern travellers, consider the ruins of Djerash as those of the ancient Gergesa or Gerasa. Lord Lindsay, however, supposes the ruins of Djerash to be those of Pella, another city of the Decapolis. See GADARA.

GERIZIM, a mountain which forms part of the ridge called Mount Ephraim. This, the mount of blessing, rises on the south, while Ebal, the mount of cursing, rises on the north. These hills are of equal height, each being estimated by Professor Robinson to be from eight hundred to a thousand feet in height. On the summit of Gerizim stood, in past ages, the Samaritan temple referred to by the woman at the well of Jacob, when she said, "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain;" and every year it is ascended in solemn procession by the small remnant of the Samaritan people who still dwell in the city of their fathers. Its summit is crowned at this day, as Stephens informs us, by the white dome of the tomb of an Arab saint. In the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, the temple of the Samaritans was consecrated, at their express desire, to the worship of Jupiter. It was at length destroyed by John Hyrcanus Maccabæus, and was not rebuilt till Gabinius was governor of Syria, who repaired Samaria, and called it by his own name. It is certain that, in our Saviour's time, this temple was in being. John iv. 20. We are assured that Herod the Great, having rebuilt Samaria and called it Sebaste, in honour of Augustus, would have obliged the Samaritans to worship in the temple which he had erected there, but they constantly refused. It was on the summit of this mountain that Jotham repeated the parable of the trees, (Judg. ix. 7–20), probably the most ancient sustained allegory which is any where to be found.

GERRHENIANS, a people mentioned in the second book of Maccabees, and perhaps identical with the Gezerites, who are combined with the Geshurites and the Amalekites in 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, concerning all of which nations it is said, that "those nations were of old the inhabitants of the land as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt."

GERSHON, a son of Levi, who gave his name to one of the three great branches of the Levites. The office of the Gershonites was to carry the veils and curtains of the tabernacle, on the western side of which they encamped. Numb. iii. 25

GESHURITES [English translation, Ashurites], a people who dwelt east of the Jordan, north of Bashan, and near Mount Hermon. Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5. They were not driven out by the Israelites (Josh. xiii. 13); and after the death of Saul, Ish-bosheth was acknowledged king by them, and by the Israelites of Gilead. 2 Sam. ii. 9. The Geshur of 2 Sam. iii. 3, xv. 8, is a different country probably.

GETHSEMANE, a village on the Mount of Olives, near Jerusalem, to which our Lord sometimes retired, and in the garden of which he endured his mysterious agony. (See AGONY.) The garden, which is situated on the east side of the Kidron, "and occupies," says Lord Lindsay, "the very spot one's eyes would turn to, looking up from the page of Scripture," is thus described graphically by Mr. Wylie: "It is an even plat of ground, 'not above fifty-seven yards square,' enclosed by a low broken stone fence. A foot-path intersects it in an oblique direction; and as the monks have determined that this is the ground on which Judas walked when he betrayed his Master with a kiss, they have walled it off from the rest, and pronounced it accursed. Eight venerable olive trees still grow here, and vindicate its claim to be regarded as the very garden to which Christ resorted on the night alluded to, and where he offered the prayer—'Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me.' The soil below them is bare, without flower or verdure of any kind; as if the penal fires which smote the human nature of the Son of God with such terrible energy had withered also the earth on which he stood, and dried up all the springs of its fertility. No more fitting spot could have been chosen for the awful event of which, eighteen hundred years ago, it was the scene, and which has given to it an eternal interest. Overhung on the one side by the mountain, and on the other by the battlements of the temple and city, while the shadows of the night were still further deepened by the spreading olives of the garden—this was the very spot to which the soul of our Surety, which now began to be 'exceeding sorrowful,' would naturally turn. The wilderness could not have afforded him a more secluded spot, where his sorrows might flow unseen; and here he was near at hand, and ready against the hour when he was to be 'led as a lamb to the slaughter.' With regard to the olives of the modern Gethsemane, the monks affirm that they are the literal trees which stood here on the night referred to. This is impossible, since all the trees in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem were cut down by Titus, to serve in the siege of the city. The olive possesses the power of shooting afresh after it has been cut; and it is just possible that the modern olives of Gethsemane are stems from the old root. The trees are unquestionably of great age, and of enormous size.

"The valley where Gethsemane is situated partakes deeply in the desolation which characterizes all the scenery around Jerusalem. It has a withered, desolate, and ruinous aspect. The western acclivity has a white chalky appearance. The generally dry bed of the Kidron, which occupies the bottom—the mouldering tomb-stones in the Jewish and Turkish burial-grounds—the grey rocks at the bottom of the mountain—the enclosing hills, whose sides, nearly naked, are of a dull red colour, and relieved only by a few black and parched vines, with some groves of wild olive trees—the silent city above, 'whence no smoke rises, no noise proceeds'—'from the ruinous state of all these tombs, overthrown, broken, and half open, you would imagine that the last trumpet had already sounded, and that the Valley of Jehoshaphat was about to render up its dead.' No one can survey the scene without recalling to mind the touching lament which the Saviour poured over this city in the days of her pride, as he surveyed her from the side of the Mount of Olives: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them who are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!' And how awfully has the closing prediction been fulfilled, in the providence of God: 'Behold your house is left unto you desolate!'"

GEZURITES, a people mentioned in 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, but whose precise locality cannot now be ascertained.

GIAH, a place referred to in 2 Sam. ii. 24, where Joab and Abishai are said to have pursued Abner as far as Giah, which is described as "by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon."

GIANT. What is the precise meaning of this word in Scripture it is difficult to discover. The Hebrew word is niphlim, in Gen. vi. 4, and Numb. xiii. 33. It is very doubtful whether there is any reference in these passages to extraordinary height of stature; more probably the signification is "men of cruelty and violence." The word Rephaim also, which occurs in Gen. xiv. 5, xv. 20, and Josh. xvii. 15, is translated "giants," and seems to apply to a powerful race of Canaanites on the east side of the Jordan. It is used in Deut. ii. 11, 20, to describe all the giant tribes in Canaan. In some passages the Rephaim, or "the dead" as they are called in our version, is used in reference to the abode of the wicked beyond the grave. Such seems to be the meaning of the word in Prov. ii. 18, iv. 19, xxi. 16. The Anakim were the most famous giants of Palestine. That they were men of great stature is very probable. It is well known that there have been races of men remarkable for their stature, though considerably exaggerated stories of such people are to be found in the narratives of credulous travellers. Included in the plain of the Jordan is a valley called the Valley of Rephaim, or of the giants; so called, it may be, from the uncommon stature of its inhabitants. This valley was famous for being the theatre of several glorious victories which David and his successors obtained over their ruthless enemies, the Philistines. 2 Sam. v. 22; 1 Chron. xvi. 5. Towards the east and south-east of Canaan dwelt a gigantic race of men called the Emim; and due east, another people of great stature, under the name of Zuzim, or Zamzumim. The Rephaim, a branch of the same family, were settled on the north-east. These several tribes or nations inhabited the regions adjoining to Canaan when Abraham arrived in the promised land, except the country toward the north, which was possessed by some of the families of Canaan; but their descent is no longer to be traced in the records of time. It is possible that the word in Gen. vi. 4 translated "giants," and which literally means "fallers," may imply men not so much of great strength and stature as of great cruelty, rapine, and violence. They are otherwise and elsewhere termed Anakim, Rephaim, Gibberim; thus Nimrod, in Gen. x. 8, is called Gibbor, a mighty one, a giant. By the Greeks this class of men are called gigantes, "born of the earth."

GIBBETHON, a city in the tribe of Dan, allotted to the Levites. Josh. xxi. 23.

GIBEAH, a city of Benjamin, which Dr Wilson tells us corresponds with the modern town of Jeba, situated about a mile and a half to the east of Ramah, but not visible from that village. Dr Robinson says, "It lies upon a low conical, or rather a round eminence, on the broad ridge which shelves down like all the rest towards the Jordan valley, and spreads out below the village into a fine sloping plain, with fields of grain. The village is small, and is half in ruins. Among these are occasionally seen large hewn stones, indicating antiquity. There is here the ruin of a square tower, almost solid; and a small building having the appearance of an ancient church." This town was the birth-place of Saul, and from this circumstance it is frequently called "Gibeah of Saul." It was remarkable for the wickedness of its inhabitants, and for the desolating war with which God in his anger was pleased to visit it, and which resulted in the almost entire destruction of the tribe of Benjamin. Judg. xix.

GIBEON, a city belonging to the tribe of Judah, lying to the north of Jerusalem, and to the west of Ramah. It is now called el-Jib. Joshua calls it "a great city," and its importance above all the cities of the surrounding district is quite plain, from the alarm which its capture excited in the neighbourhood. The stratagem by which they obtained a league from the Israelites, shows them to have been a crafty people (Josh. ix.); and its discovery by Joshua, while their lives were spared, led to their being made hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation of Israel. The stratagem is thus recorded: "And when the inhabitants of Gibeon heard what Joshua had done unto Jericho and to Ai, they did work wilyly, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors, and took old sacks upon their asses, and wine bottles, old, and rent, and bound up; and old shoes and clouted upon their feet, and old garments upon them; and all the bread of their provision was dry and mouldy. And they went to Joshua unto the camp at Gilgal, and said unto him, and to the men of Israel, We be come from a far country; now therefore make ye a league with us. And the men took of their victuals, and asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord. And Joshua made peace with them, and made a league with them, to let them live: and the princes of the congregation sware unto them." From that period the Gibeonites seem to have continued faithful to the Israelites. Before the building of the temple of Jerusalem, the tabernacle seems to have been stationed for some time at Gibeon. 1 Chron. xxi. 29, 30; 1 Kings iii. 4. Solomon also sacrificed in it. Here the stupendous miracle took place of the sun and the moon standing still.

The most accurate account we have seen of the present appearance of Gibeon, is that which is given by Messrs. Bonar and M'Cheyne, in their Travels in Palestine: "The most interesting," say these intelligent travellers, "of all the ancient towns at this time within sight was El-geob, lying at our feet, directly north, and about a mile distant. This is the ancient Gibeon, whence came the wily Gibeonites who beguiled Joshua and the congregation of Israel; described as 'a great city, as one of the royal cities, greater than Ai, and all the men thereof were mighty.' Josh. x. 2. It is situated on the top of a remarkably round hill, the sides of which are so completely terraced, not by art, but by nature, that they present the appearance of a flight of steps all round, from the top to the bottom. The buildings are mostly on the western brow of the hill, the rest of the summit being covered with fine olive trees. Many of the terraces also are set with vines and fruit trees. From the foot of the ridge on which Ramah stands, a fine plain or shallow valley stretches past Gibeon to the north for two or three miles. From Gibeon it stretches westward for about a mile, bounded by a low hilly range, except in two points where there are openings towards the western plain, the one of which is the descent of Beth-horon. The fields of this valley were distinctly marked out, some of them bearing grain, but most lying waste. In one place, the vineyards stretched quite across, with a verdure most refreshing to the eye. This valley the muleteers called Ajaloun. Again and again we put the question to them, to make sure that we were not mistaken, and they still answered Ajaloun. Since our return, we have not been able to find that any previous writer has found this name still remaining, and applied to this valley, and we, therefore, fear that the muleteers may have picked it up from the inquiries or conversation of some traveller. However this may be, the scene of Joshua's miracle was at that time vividly set before us. The glorious sun was sloping westward, about to sink in the Mediterranean Sea, and his horizontal rays were falling full upon the hill of Gibeon; at the same moment the moon was rising, and soon after poured her silver beams into this quiet vale. Such probably was the very position of the sun and moon, in that memorable day when Joshua prayed and 'said, in the sight of Israel, Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon.' Josh. x. 12. We are plainly told that the battle between Joshua and the five kings of the Amorites was 'at Gibeon.' It lasted probably the greater part of the day, till toward evening the bands of the Amorites began to give way, and Israel chased them as far as the descent to Beth-horon. At that steep defile, the Lord cast down great hailstones from heaven upon them, so that they died. But it seems to have been before that, and before they were out of sight of Gibeon, that Joshua uttered the singular prayer above narrated; and in confirmation of this view, it is interesting to notice that Isaiah (xxviii. 21) calls the scene of that day's wonders 'The Valley of Gibeon.'

"There was a peculiarly mellow softness in the evening light, that gilded both tower and valley at the moment, and it was strangely interesting to look upon the scene where 'the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man.' It was at Gibeon, also, that Abner and Joab met on either side of the pool, and that the young men began the contest which ended so fatally. We were afterwards told that the pool remains there to this day on the north side of the hill. Here, too, 'at the great stone which is in Gibeon,' Joab murdered Amasa, and 'shed the blood of war in peace, and put the blood of war upon his girdle that was about his loins, and in his shoes that were upon his feet.' 2 Sam. xx. 8; 1 Kings ii. 5. In the same place, Johanan, the son of Kareah, found Ishmael 'by the great waters that are in Gibeon.' It was here, also, that 'God appeared to Solomon in a dream by night, and said, Ask what I shall give thee.' 1 Kings iii. 5. It is thus hallowed as a place of prayer, and yet more, as a place where God showed to the world before the Redeemer came, to what extent he would give of his bounty to his people—all a prelude to the unspeakable gift, his beloved Son, which has made all other wonders lose their glory, by reason of the glory that excelleth."

GIDEON, the son of Joash, of the tribe of Manasseh; the same with Jerubbaal, one of the judges of Israel. He dwelt in the city of Ophra, and was chosen by God in a very extraordinary manner to deliver the Israelites from the oppression of the Midianites, under which they had laboured for the space of seven years. Judg. vi. 11-27, viii. 1-24.

GIDGAD, a mountain in the wilderness of Paran, between Benejaakan and Jotbathah, where the Hebrews encamped. Numb. xxxiii. 32.

GIER-EAGLE (racham), Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 17. The Septuagint understands this bird to be the swan; others suppose the pelican, and Bochart tries to prove that the golden vulture is meant. The general opinion, however, is in favour of the Vultur percnopterus of Linnæus, of which Bruce the traveller says: "We know from Horus Apollo, that the rachma, or she-vulture, was sacred to Isis, and adorned the statue of the goddess; that it was the emblem of parental affection; and that it was the hieroglyphic for an affectionate mother." Hasselquist says: "The appearance of the bird is as horrid as can well be imagined. The face is naked and wrinkled, the eyes are large and black, the beak black and crooked, the talons large, and extended ready for prey, and the whole body polluted with filth. These are qualities enough to make the beholder shudder with horror. Notwithstanding this, the inhabitants of Egypt cannot be enough thankful to Providence for this bird. All the places round Cairo are filled with the dead bodies of asses and camels; and thousands of these birds fly about and devour the carcasses, before they putrify and fill the air with noxious exhalations." No wonder that such an animal should be deemed unclean.

GIFT OF TONGUES. It is recorded in Acts ii. 1-11, that the apostles, or, as some think, the whole disciples, amounting to one hundred and twenty, spoke by divine inspiration in the words of foreign languages, so that people from many different countries heard in their own languages the wonderful works of God. This wonderful gift, imparted to the apostles on that occasion, has exercised the learning and ingenuity of the commentators. Treatises on the subject have been published by different learned divines, particularly on the Continent. Most of the earlier, and not a few of the later theologians have alleged the gift thus granted on the day of Pentecost to have been bestowed in perpetuity. Ernesti and Moschius are of opinion that the gift of tongues was temporary and sudden, and only occasionally exerted, during public assemblies, as a testimony to the truth of the Gospel. Storr asserts, that the knowledge of foreign tongues was not granted to the apostles, but only mental faculties made equal to, and fit for, the speaking of those tongues, whenever there should be need. Some of the ancients, again, and Wolf among the moderns, have transferred the miracle from the apostles to the hearers, alleging that the apostles spoke in their vernacular tongue, but that these words were received by the auditors of different nations each in their vernacular tongue. But this idea is plainly repugnant to the context, as may be seen by comparing Acts ii. 4 and 11. Eichhorn, Bardili, Ziegler, and others, maintain that the miracle may be explained on natural principles. But the preternatural appearance of tongues of fire, as well as the whole circumstances attendant on this mysterious event in the history of the inspired apostles, shows plainly that, taught by the Holy Ghost, they spoke miraculously in foreign tongues.

GIFTS. No mark of esteem is more usual in Oriental countries than the presenting of a gift. This appears to have been a custom of very great antiquity. Thus, as early as the time of the patriarchs we find Jacob tendering a most magnificent present to Esau; and when the gift was declined, Jacob entreated his brother to receive it as a sure evidence that "he had found grace in his sight." This shows that even in those primitive times a gift was a mark of goodwill, and in the case of an enemy, a mark of reconciliation. The effect which a gift is understood to have in the East is thus referred to by Solomon, Prov. xviii. 16: "A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men." Presents were usually given before consulting a prophet, and those usually consisted of some kind of provisions. Hence, when the servant of Saul proposed to consult Samuel, his master replied, "If we go, what shall we bring the man of God? for the bread is spent in our vessels, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God. What have we?" Another instance of the presents made to the ancient prophets is found in 2 Kings iv. 42. On approaching great men in the East, it is the custom to offer gifts more or less costly according to the rank of the individual. This custom has descended to the present time. Gifts in ancient as well as in modern times have been used as bribes to judges and rulers. Amos the prophet says of the judges in his days, "They sold the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes."

GIHON, a fountain west of Jerusalem, where Solomon was anointed king by Zadok and Nathan. Hezekiah ordered the waters of the upper channel of Gihon to be conveyed into Jerusalem; supposed to be the same which was afterwards called Siloam. 1 Kings i. 33; 2 Chron. xxxii. 30. 2. The name of one of the four rivers of Paradise. Gen. ii. 13. Gesenius and Rosenmüller suppose it to be the Oxus or Araxes. Josephus considers it to be the Nile, which is said to be called Guyon by the modern Abyssinians. Bishop Patrick and Dr. Wells suppose it to be one of the channels into which the Euphrates is divided after its junction with the Tigris. See EDEN.

GILBOA, a ridge of mountains, memorable for the defeat and death of Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam. xxxi.), running north of Beth-shan or Scythopolis, and forming the western boundary of that part of the plain of the Jordan. They are said to be extremely dry and barren, and are still called, by the Arabs, Djebel-gilbo. The summits of the mountains of this range are lofty and peaked; their sides are bare, or covered only with a little withered grass and a few stunted shrubs; they look as if they had not borne bloom or verdure since the fatal day on which the "beauty of Israel" was slain upon their "high places." In their present state, we may perhaps be able to recognise the effects of the inspired bard's malediction: "Ye Mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew; neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings."

GILEAD, a mountainous district east of the Jordan, and which separated the lands of Ammon, Moab, Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, from Arabia Deserta. Gen. xxxi. 21.

The scenery of the Mountains of Gilead is described by Mr. Buckingham as being extremely beautiful. The plains are covered with a fertile soil, the hills are clothed with forests, and at every new turn the most beautiful landscapes that can be imagined are presented. The Scripture references to the stately oaks and herds of cattle in this region are well known.

"Rising on the southern border of Manasseh," to quote the description of Mr. Wylie, "the hills of this range traverse the ancient territory of the tribe of Gad, and terminate about six miles south of the River Jabbok. Their length, in a straight line, may be estimated at about twenty-five miles. Jacob, on his return from Padan-aram, traversed these mountains; on their summit he was overtaken by his uncle, Laban, who had pursued him with a hostile intention; but being forbidden of God in a dream, he refrained from doing him injury. The parties, on their meeting, entered into a friendly compact, and a heap of stones was raised on the summit of the hill in token of the transaction; and from that day the mountains were termed Galeed or Gilead—the mountains of the heap. Till the beginning of the present century, the territory of Gilead, and indeed the eastern possessions of Israel generally, were an 'unknown land;' no one had crossed the Jordan, for the purpose of exploring the country lying beyond it, which, up to the time we have indicated, was generally believed to be a desert, and as such represented in our maps; judge, then, of the surprise of the traveller, when, on entering this region for the first time, he found its fertile soil and rich prospects not surpassed, and scarcely equalled, by the finest parts of Samaria and Galilee. Around it is thrown a rampart of barren mountains, but these once passed, scenes of extraordinary beauty and grandeur disclose themselves to the eye, resembling rather what we might expect to meet in a long inhabited and highly cultivated country, than in this neglected land." "The path," says Lord Lindsay, "wound through thickets of the most luxuriant growth, and of every shade of verdure, frequently overshadowing the road, and diffusing a delicious coolness, though a delightful breeze so allayed the heat that it was never oppressive; while the cooing of wood-pigeons, the calling of partridges—magnificent birds as large as pheasants—the incessant hum of insects and hiss of grasshoppers, singing in the trees as happy as kings, after breakfasting on the dews of Mount Gilead, and the thought that gave zest to it all, that this was Mount Gilead, made up a full cup of enjoyment."

GILGAL, the seat of the encampment of the Israelites after passing the Jordan. It is nearly three miles distant from Jericho. The word Gilgal signifies rolling or revolution. The ark was long stationed at this place, and it appears also to have been one of the towns in which idolatrous worship was set up. Accordingly, there are various allusions to Gilgal in the prophecies of the Old Testament. Thus Hos. iv. 15: "Though thou, Israel, play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend; and come not ye unto Gilgal, neither go ye up to Beth-aven, nor swear, The Lord liveth." "Come to Beth-el, and transgress; at Gilgal multiply transgression; and bring your sacrifices every morning, and your tithes after three years." Amos iv. 4. We read in Judges iii. 19 of the "quarries" that were by Gilgal, a word which, in the margin, is translated "graven images," probably referring to the idols of the Moabites.

GILOH, a city belonging to the tribe of Judah, taken from the Philistines, of which Abithophel was a native. Josh. xv. 51; 2 Sam. xv. 12.

GIMZO, a city of Judah, taken by the Philistines in the time of Ahaz. 2 Chron. xxviii. 18.

GIN, a net, snare, or trap, especially used in the art of fowling. The word occurs in Isa. viii. 14, and Amos iii. 5.

GIRDLE. "The girdle is an indispensable article in the dress of an Oriental," says Professor Paxton, "and the principal use is to tuck up their long flowing vestments, that they may not incommode them in their work, or on a journey. The Jews, according to some writers, wore a double girdle—one of greater breadth, with which they girded their tunic when they prepared for active exertions; the other they wore under their shirt, around their loins. The upper girdle was sometimes made of leather, the material of which the girdle of John the Baptist was made; but it was more commonly fabricated of worsted, often very artfully woven into a variety of figures, and made to fold several times about the body; one end of which being doubled back, and sewn along the edges, serves them for a purse, agreeably to the acceptance of zōnyē in the Scriptures, which is translated purse in several places of the New Testament. Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8. The Turks make a further use of these girdles, by fixing their knives and poniards in them; while the writers and secretaries suspend in them their ink-horns; a custom as old as the Prophet Ezekiel, who mentions "a person clothed in white linen, with an ink-horn upon his loins." Ezek. ix. 2. That part of the ink-holder which passes between the girdle and the tunic, and receives their pens, is long and flat; but the vessel for the ink, which rests upon the girdle, is square, with a lid to clasp over it."

"To loose the girdle and give it to another, was, among the Orientals, a token of great confidence and affection. A girdle curiously and richly wrought, was, among the ancient Hebrews, a mark of honour, and sometimes bestowed as a reward of merit. 2 Sam. xviii. 11. People of rank and fashion in the East wear very broad girdles, all of silk, and superbly ornamented with gold and silver and precious stones, of which they are extremely proud, regarding them as the tokens of their superior station, and the proof of their riches. "To gird up the loins," is to bring the flowing robe within the girdle, and so to prepare for a journey, or for some vigorous exercise.

GIRGASHITES. See GERGESHITES.

GITTITES, the inhabitants of Gath. Josh. xiii. 3. Obed-edom and Ittai are called Gittites (2 Sam. vi. 10, xv. 19), probably, because they visited David at Gath, or because they were natives of Gittaim, a city of Benjamin. 2 Sam. iv. 3.

GITTITH, a Hebrew word, which occurs frequently in the titles of the psalms. It is generally translated "wine-presses." Calmet is of opinion that such psalms were given to the class of young women or songstresses of Gath, to be sung by them (Ps. viii.), remarking that Gittith does not signify wine-presses, but "a woman of Gath." If wine-presses were meant, it should be gitteth.

GIVE, properly signifies to bestow a thing freely, as in alms. John iii. 16. But it is used to signify the imparting or permitting of anything good or bad. Ps. xvi. 7; John xviii. 11; Ps. xxviii. 4. To give ourselves to Christ, and his ministers and people, is solemnly to devote ourselves to the faith, profession, worship, and obedience of Jesus Christ, as our husband, teacher, saviour, portion, and sovereign Lord; and to a submissive subjection to the instruction, government, and discipline of his ministers: and to a walking with his people in all the ordinances of his grace. 2 Cor. viii. 5. To be given to a thing, is to be much set upon, earnest for, and delighted in it. 1 Tim. ii. 3.

GLASS (hualos). This word occurs Rev. iv. 6, xv. 2, xxi. 18, 21. There seems to be no reference to glass in the Old Testament. The art of making it was not known. Our translators have rendered the Hebrew in Exod. xxxviii. 8, and Job xxxvii. 18, "looking-glass." But the making mirrors of glass, coated with quicksilver, is an invention quite modern. Mirrors were anciently made of polished metal. The word esoptron, or mirror, occurs in 1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. iii. 18, and James i. 23. Dr. Pearce thinks that in the first of these passages it signifies any of those transparent substances which the ancients used in their windows, and through which they saw external objects obscurely. It is certain that the specimens of Roman glass, dug up from Pompeii, are all dull and cloudy. But others are of opinion that the word denotes a mirror of polished metal; as this, however, was liable to many imperfections, so that the object before it was not seen clearly or fully, the meaning of the apostle is, that we see things as it were by images reflected from a mirror, which shows them very obscurely and indistinctly. In the two latter passages, a mirror undoubtedly is meant. Thus, in 2 Cor. iii. 18, Christians are said to be changed into the image of Christ, "from glory to glory:" and the apostle having spoken of this change as resulting from our "beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord," it is plain that the allusion is to the reflected brightness from the surface of the highly-polished metal, as if he had said "from brightness to brightness," or from one degree of brightness to another.

GLASSITES, a sect which arose in Scotland about the year 1728. It derived its name from the Rev. John Glass, who was its founder. Mr. Glass was for several years minister of the parish of Tealing, near Dundee; and having been led to imbibe opinions opposed to civil establishments of religion, he left the Established Church, and became minister of a church formed on Congregational principles, after which he promulgated various peculiar religious opinions, which led to great controversy. The sect thus formed receives the name of Glassites in Scotland, and Sandemanians in England—this latter name being derived from Robert Sandeman, the son-in-law of Mr. Glass, who, by his acute writings, tended considerably to spread the distinguishing tenets of the sect. Mr. Fuller, by his "Strictures on Sandemanianism," afforded a very convincing reply to the erroneous doctrines of this body of professing Christians. On the fundamental point of the ground of a sinner's acceptance before God, Mr. Glass and also Mr. Sandeman, taught that faith is nothing more than the bare belief of the bare truth; or, in other words, that faith is a mere act of the understanding, in opposition to the moral nature of faith taught by the apostle, when he says, "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness." It is to this point of the system that Fuller chiefly, and indeed almost exclusively, directs attention in his "Strictures." The other opinions and practices in which this sect differs from other Christians are their weekly administration of the Lord's supper; their love-feasts, of which every member is not only allowed but required to partake, and which consist of their dining together at each other's houses, in the interval between the morning and afternoon services; their kiss of charity, used on the occasion of the admission of a new member, and at other times when they deem it necessary and proper; their weekly collection before the Lord's supper, for the support of the poor, and paying their expenses; mutual exhortation; abstinence from blood and things strangled; the washing of each other's feet, the precept concerning which, as well as other precepts, they understand literally; community of goods, so far as that every one is to consider all that he has in his possession and power liable to the calls of the poor and the Church; and the unlawfulness of laying up treasures upon earth, by setting them apart, for any distant, future, and uncertain use. They allow of public and private diversions, so far as they are unconnected with circumstances really sinful; but apprehending a lot to be sacred, they disapprove of lotteries, playing at cards, dice, and other similar amusements. They contend for a plurality of elders, pastors, or bishops, in each church; and the necessity of the presence of two elders in every act of discipline, and at the administration of the Lord's supper. In the choice of these elders, second marriages disqualify for the office; but want of learning, and engagements in trade, are no sufficient objections, if qualified according to the instructions given to Timothy and Titus; and elders are ordained by prayer and fasting, imposition of hands, and giving the right hand of fellowship. In their discipline they are strict and severe, and think themselves obliged to separate from the communion and worship of all such religious societies as appear to them not to profess the simple truth for their only ground of hope, and who do not walk in obedience to it. We shall only add, that in every transaction they esteem unanimity to be absolutely necessary. Such is a brief and rapid sketch of the doctrines and practices of the Glassites, or Sandemanians.

GLEANING. The Hebrews were not permitted to go over their trees or fields a second time, to gather the fruit or the grain, but were to leave the gleanings for the poor, the fatherless, and the widow. Lev. xix. 10, xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 21; Ruth ii. 3. See HARVEST.

GLEDE, a fowl of the ravenous kind. It is called daah, from its swift flight; and raah, from its quick sight. It is impatient of cold, and so is seldom seen in the winter. Through fear and cowardice, it seldom attacks any but tame fowls, hens, &c. Deut. xiv. 13. It is called a vulture, Lev. xi. 14. The etymology would seem to indicate it to be a swift-flying bird; but it is very difficult to ascertain what particular bird is referred to. A modern authority supposes it to be the Neophron percnopterus, or Pharaoh's chicken, one of the smallest of the vultures, and very common in all the warm portions of the Old World.

GLORIFY, to render glorious. God is glorified by Christ, or by creatures, when his perfections are acknowledged, or manifested by their praising, trusting in, or serving him; or are displayed in his favours and judgments; for example, John xvii. 4; Ps. l. 23; Rom. iv. 20; Lev. x. 3; Isa. xlv. 23. Christ is glorified in God's receiving him into heaven, bestowing on him the highest honour, power, and authority, as our Mediator (John xvii. 1, 5); and in the Holy Ghost's declaring and revealing his excellences, and communicating his fulness to men (John xvi. 14); and in his people's believing on him, walking in him, praising, obeying, and imitating him; and his exerting, and manifesting his power and wisdom, by doing good to them. 2 Thess. i. 10, 12; John xi. 4. Men are glorified when endowed with great and shining holiness, happiness, and honour, in the heavenly and eternal state. Rom. viii. 17, 30. To glorify one's self, is to claim or boast of honour not due to us. Heb. v. 5; Rev. xviii. 7.

GLORY, splendour, magnificence; also admiration, praise, or honour, attributed to God, in adoration or worship. The glory of God, is the splendid manifestation of the divine perfections in creation, providence, and grace. Exod. xxxiii. 18. It is also used for the state of future happiness. Rom. iii. 23, v. 2. We may be said to give glory to God when we confess our sins, when we love him supremely, when we commit ourselves to him, are zealous in his service, improve our talents, walk humbly, thankfully, and cheerfully before him, and recommend, proclaim, or set forth, his excellences to others. Josh. vii. 19; John xv. 8; Ps. l. 23; Matt. v. 16. See GLORIFY.

GNASH. The expression of "gnashing with the teeth" occurs in various passages of Sacred Scripture, and it is intended to denote rage or anguish. Thus it is said of the place of eternal torment: "There shall be weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth."

GNAT (kōnōps—Matt. xxiii. 24), a small winged insect, comprehending a genus of the order Diptera. In those hot countries, as Servius remarks, speaking of the East, gnats and flies are very apt to fall into wine, if it be not carefully covered; and passing the liquor through a strainer, that no gnat or part of one might remain, became a proverb for exactness about little matters. This may help us to understand that passage (Matt. xxiii. 24), where the proverbial expression of carefully straining out a fly from the liquor to be drunk, and yet swallowing a camel, intimates that the scribes and Pharisees affected to scruple in regard to little things, and yet disregarded those of the greatest moment.

GNOSTICS (from gnosticos, knowing), ancient heretics, famous from the first rise of Christianity, principally in the East. It appears from several passages of Scripture, particularly 1 John ii. 18, 1 Tim. vi. 20, Col. ii. 8, that many persons were infected with the Gnostic heresy in the first century; though the sect did not render itself conspicuous, either for numbers or reputation, before the time of Adrian, when some writers erroneously date its rise. The name was adopted by this sect, on the presumption that they were the only persons who had the true knowledge of Christianity. At first the Gnostics were the only philosophers and wits of those times, who formed for themselves a peculiar system of theology, agreeable to the philosophy of Pythagoras and Plato; to which they accommodated all their interpretations of Scripture. But Gnostics afterwards became a generic name, comprehending divers sects and parties of heretics, who rose in the first centuries, and who, though they differed among themselves as to circumstances, yet all agreed in some common principles. They corrupted the doctrine of the gospel by a profane mixture of the tenets of the oriental philosophy, concerning the origin of evil and the creation of the world, with its divine truths. Such were the Valentinians, Simonians, Carpocratians, Nicolaitanes, &c.

The word Gnostics sometimes also occurs in a good sense, in the ancient ecclesiastical writers, particularly Clemens Alexandrinus. In the seventh book of his Stromata, he shows that none but the Gnostic, or learned person, has any true religion. He affirms that were it possible for the knowledge of God to be separated from eternal salvation, the Gnostic would make no scruple to choose the knowledge; and though God should promise him impunity in doing of any thing he has once spoken against, or offer him heaven on those terms, he would never alter a whit of his measures. In this sense the father uses Gnostics in opposition to the heretics of the same name, affirming that the true Gnostic is grown old in the study of the holy Scripture, and that he preserves the orthodox doctrine of the apostles, and of the Church; whereas the false Gnostic abandons all the apostolical traditions, as imagining himself wiser than the apostles.

Such as would be thoroughly acquainted with all their doctrines, reveries, and visions, may consult Irenæus, Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Epiphanius; particularly the first of these writers, who relates their sentiments at large, and confutes them. Indeed, he dwells more on the Valentinians than on any other sect of Gnostics; but he shows the general principles whereon all their mistaken opinions were founded, and the method they followed in explaining Scripture. He accuses them of introducing into religion certain vain and ridiculous genealogies; that is, a kind of divine processions or emanations, which had no other foundation but in their own wild imagination. The Gnostics confessed that these æons or emanations were nowhere expressly mentioned in the Sacred Writings; but insisted that Jesus Christ had intimated them in parables to such as could understand them. They built their theology not only on the Gospels and the Epistles of Paul, but also on the law of Moses and the Prophets. These last were peculiarly serviceable to them, on account of the allegories and allusions with which they abound, which are capable of different interpretations; though their doctrine concerning the creation of the world by one or more inferior beings of an evil or imperfect nature, led them to deny the divine authority of the books of the Old Testament, which contradicted this idle fiction, and filled them with an abhorrence of Moses and the religion he taught; alleging that he was actuated by the malignant author of this world, who consulted his own glory and authority, and not the real advantage of men. Their persuasion that evil resided in matter, as its centre and source, made them treat the body with contempt, discourage marriage, and reject the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, and its reunion with the immortal spirit. Their notion, that malevolent genii presided in nature, and occasioned diseases and calamities, wars and desolations, induced them to apply themselves to the study of magic, in order to weaken the powers or suspend the influence of these malignant agents. The Gnostics considered Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and inferior to the Father, who came into the world for the rescue and happiness of miserable mortals, oppressed by matter and evil beings; but they rejected our Lord's humanity, on the principle that everything corporeal is essentially and intrinsically evil, and therefore the greater part of them denied the reality of his sufferings. They set a great value on the beginning of the Gospel of John, where they fancied they saw a great deal of their æons, or emanations, under the terms the word, the life, the light, &c. They divided all nature into three kinds of beings, viz., hylie, or material; psychic, or animal; and pneumatic, or spiritual. On the like principle they also distinguished three sorts of men—material, animal, and spiritual. The first, who were material, and incapable of knowledge, inevitably perished, both soul and body; the third, such as the Gnostics themselves pretended to be, were all certainly saved; the psychic, or animal, who were the middle between the other two, were capable either of being saved or damned, according to their good or evil actions. With regard to their moral doctrines and conduct, they were much divided. The greatest part of this sect adopted very austere rules of life, recommended rigorous abstinence, and prescribed severe bodily mortifications, with a view of purifying and exalting the mind. However, some maintained that there was no moral difference in human actions; and thus confounding right with wrong, they gave a loose rein to all the passions, and asserted the innocence of following blindly all their motions, and of living by their tumultuous dictates. They supported their opinions and practice by various authorities. Some referred to fictitious and apocryphal writings of Adam, Abraham, Zoroaster, Christ, and his apostles; others boasted that they had deduced their sentiments from secret doctrines of Christ, concealed from the vulgar; others affirmed that they arrived at superior degrees of wisdom by an innate vigour of mind; and others asserted that they were instructed in these mysterious parts of theological science by Theudas, a disciple of Paul, and by Matthias, one of the friends of our Lord. The tenets of the ancient Gnostics were revived in Spain, in the fourth century, by a sect called the Priscillianists. At length the name Gnostic, which originally was glorious, became infamous, by the idle opinions and dissolute lives of the persons who bore it.

GO. When God is said to go down, or up, it does not mean that he changes his place in respect of his essence, but that his knowledge, or powerful operation, or the symbol of his presence, bears such relation to a particular place. Gen. xi. 5, 7, xviii. 21. His goings are the display of his perfections, and the acts of his providence towards the world, towards Jesus, or his Church; and in respect of this he may be said to come or go from one. Ps. lxxviii. 24. Christ's goings forth from everlasting prove his divine nature, prior to his incarnation. Micah v. 2. The saints' going out and in, denotes their whole conversation, which is by Christ as the door. They have great liberty in him, and live by faith on him. Ps. xvii. 5, cxxi. 8; John x. 9. "The Prince in the midst of them when they go in shall go in; and when they go forth shall go forth." Jesus, who is among his people in their heart, always present to assist them, shall go with them when they go in to the throne of grace, that he may present their petitions, and render them acceptable; when they go in to the house of God, he shall go in to feed them on good pasture; when they go in to their heart to search it, he shall go in to discover it to them, and comfort against all grief on every side. When they go out from public ordinances, he shall go with them, to impress what they have been about on their mind; he shall go out with them to the world, to keep them from the evil; he shall go out of the world with them at death, to introduce them to eternal glory. Ezek. xlv. 10.

GOAD, a long staff or wand for driving cattle. Judg. iii. 31. It had a piece of sharply-pointed iron on the small end, and perhaps a paddle on the other, to cut up weeds. "The words of the wise are as goads;" they penetrate into men's minds, and stir them up to the practice of duty. Eccles. xii. 11. In the Book of Judges, Shamgar is said to have used this weapon with terrible effect against the enemies of Israel. The incident is thus recorded: "And after him was Shamgar the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox goad: and he also delivered Israel." Judg. iii. 31. Maundrell describes this weapon as "about eight feet long, and at the larger end about six inches in circumference, armed at the lesser end with a sharp prickle for driving the oxen, and at the other end with a small paddle of iron, strong and massive, for cleansing the plough from the clay." Stubborn and refractory oxen often resisted the goad, and kicked it with their feet. This proverbial saying the glorified Redeemer applied to Saul on the road to Damascus: "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks."

GOAT (gnar). The goat was one of the clean beasts which the Israelites might both eat and offer in sacrifice. The kid is often mentioned as a food, in a way that implies that it was considered as a delicacy. The akar, or wild goat, mentioned in Deut. xiv. 5, and nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible, is supposed to be the tragelaphus, or "goat deer." Schultens conjectures that this animal might have its name from its shyness, or running away. The word jol, or jaal, occurs 1 Sam. xxiv. 2; Job xxxix. 1; Ps. civ. 18; Prov. v. 19; and various have been the sentiments of interpreters on the animal intended by it. Bochart insists that it is the ibex, or "rock goat." The root whence the name is derived, signifies to ascend, to mount; and the ibex is famous for clambering, climbing, and leaping on the most craggy precipices. The Arab writers attribute to the jaal very long horns, bending backwards; consequently it cannot be the chamois. The horns of the jaal are reckoned among the valuable articles of traffic. Ezek. xxvii. 15. The ibex is finely shaped, graceful in its motions, and gentle in its manners. The female is particularly celebrated by natural historians for tender affection to her young, and the incessant vigilance with which she watches over their safety, and also for ardent attachment and fidelity to her mate. Goats are often mingled with the sheep in Eastern countries, and can with difficulty be distinguished from them. Hence the allusion in Matt. xxv. 32: "And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." In illustration of this, Mr. Howard Malcolm remarks, in his Travels in South-eastern Asia: "So completely do sheep lose their distinctive features in these hot climates, that in seeing them mixed with goats, I never could tell them apart. They are never white as with us, and their wool degenerates into hair."

GOATS' HAIR was used by Moses in making the curtains of the tabernacle. Exod. xxv. 4, &c. The hair of the goat is plucked off or shorn like the wool of the sheep, and manufactured in the East into different kinds of articles. The hair of the spouse is compared, in the Song of Solomon, to a flock of goats from Mount Gilead. "Behold, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair; thou hast doves' eyes within thy locks: thy hair is as a flock of goats that appear from Mount Gilead." Cant. iv. 1. Michal, the daughter of Saul, placed a pillow of goats' hair for a bolster to the image in the bed of David.

GOB, a plain where two battles were fought between the Hebrews and Philistines. 2 Sam. xxi. 18, 19. In 1 Chron. xx. 4, we read Gezer instead of Gob. The Septuagint, in some copies, reads Nob instead of Gob, and in others Gath.

GOBLET. This word implies a round basin in Cant. vii. 2. It is also found in Exod. xxiv. 6, where it is rendered "bason," and denotes a vessel employed for receiving the blood of the victims, for the purpose of being sprinkled on the people. They were of various materials.

GOD, that infinitely great, intelligent, and free Being; of perfect goodness, wisdom, and power; transcendently glorious in holiness; who made the universe, and continues to support it, as well as to govern and direct it, by his providence and laws. The name is derived from the Icelandic Godi, which signifies the supreme magistrate, and is thus perfectly characteristic of JEHOVAH as the moral governor of the universe. It also corresponds to the Jewish and Christian sense of the Greek words Theos and Kurios, in the New Testament, the names usually applied to the ETERNAL. For an account of the various attributes which enter into our conception of the divine character, as revealed in the Scriptures, the reader is referred to those articles. Also, see ATTRIBUTES.

2. By his personality, intelligence, and freedom, God is distinguished from Fate, Nature, Destiny, Necessity, Chance, Anima Mundi, and from all other fictitious beings acknowledged by the Stoics, Pantheists, Spinosists, and other sorts of Atheists. See ATHEISM.

3. The knowledge of God, his nature, attributes, word, and works, above all, his moral character, with the relations between him and his creatures, makes the subject of the extensive science called theology, that master-science, of which all the other sciences are but subordinate and illustrative parts. If there have been men of science, who have failed to trace the relation of all science to the knowledge of God, it has been owing to a bias of mind altogether foreign to sound philosophy.

4. Not only the works of creation, but the course of divine operation in the government of the world, has from age to age been a manifestation of the divine character; continually receiving new and stronger illustrations, until the completion of the Christian revelation by the ministry of Christ, and his inspired followers; and still placing itself in brighter light, and more impressive aspects, as the scheme of human redemption runs on to its consummation. From all the acts of God as recorded in the Scriptures, we are taught that he alone is God; that he is present everywhere, to sustain and govern all things; that his wisdom is infinite, his counsel settled, his truth sure, and his power irresistible; that his character, as well as his law, is immutably holy, just, and good; above all, that he is rich in mercy; that he has freely provided, whether as Father, or Son, or Holy Ghost, the means of our salvation; that he is alike and at once the Father and Lord, the Redeemer and Judge, the Sanctifier and Friend of man.

5. Under these deeply awful but consolatory views do the Scriptures present to us the supreme object of our worship, love, and trust; and they dwell upon each of the above particulars with inimitable sublimity and beauty of language, and with an inexhaustible variety of illustration. Nor can we compare these views of the divine nature with the conceptions of the most enlightened Pagans, without feeling how much reason we have for everlasting gratitude, that a revelation so explicit, so comprehensive, and so joyful, should have been made to us, in our guilty and perplexed condition. It is thus that Christian philosophers, even when they do not use the language of the Scriptures, are able to speak of this great and mysterious Being in language so clear, and with conceptions so noble; in a manner, too, so equable, so different from the sages of antiquity, who, if at any time they approach the truth, never fail to mingle with it some essentially erroneous or grovelling conception.

6. "The idea of the Supreme Being," says Robert Hall, "has this peculiar property, that as it admits of no substitute, so, from the first moment it is formed, it is capable of continual growth and enlargement. God himself is immutable; but our conception of his character is continually receiving fresh accessions, is continually growing more extended and refulgent, by having transferred to it new elements of beauty and goodness; by attracting to itself as a centre whatever bears the impress of dignity, order, or happiness. It borrows splendour from all that is fair, subordinates to itself all that is great, and SITS ENTHRONED ON THE RICHES OF THE UNIVERSE.

7. "As the object of worship will always be in a degree the object of imitation, hence arises a fixed standard of moral excellence; by the contemplation of which the tendencies to corruption are counteracted, the contagion of bad example is checked, and human nature rises above its natural level."

Who, then, as he contemplates this glorious Being in the transcendent beauty of his revealed character, can forbear to pray, "THY NAME BE HALLOWED; THY KINGDOM COME; THY WILL BE DONE; AS IN HEAVEN, SO IN EARTH?"

GOD, EXISTENCE OF. The methods usually followed in proving the existence of God are two—the first called argumentum à priori, which, beginning with the cause, descends to the effect; the other, argumentum à posteriori, which, from a consideration of the effect, ascends to the cause. The former of these has been particularly laboured by Dr. Samuel Clarke; but after all he has said, the possibility of any one's being convinced by it hath been questioned. The most general proofs are the following:—

"1. All nations—Heathens, Jews, Mohammedans, and Christians—harmoniously consent that there is a God who created, preserves, and governs all things. To this it has been objected, that there have been, at different times and places, men who were Atheists, and deniers of a God. But these have been so few, and by their opinions have shown that they rather denied the particular providence than the existence of God, that it can hardly be said to be an exception to the argument stated. And even if men were bold enough to assert it, it would not be an absolute proof that they really believed what they said, since it might proceed from a wish that there were no God to whom they must be accountable for their sin, rather than a belief of it. Ps. xiv. 1. It has also been objected, that whole nations have been found in Africa and America that have no notion of a Deity: but this is what has never been proved; on the contrary, upon accurate inspection, even the most stupid Hottentots, Saldanians, Greenlanders, Kamtschatkans, and savage Americans, are found to have some idea of a God.

"2. It is argued from the law and light of nature, or from the general readiness of mankind, arising from their intellectual constitution, to acquiesce in the truth of his existence, whenever they understand the terms in which it is expressed. Whence could this proceed, even in the minds of such whose affections and carnal interests dispose them to believe the contrary, if there were no impression made by the contemplation of nature on their hearts? Admitting that there are no innate ideas in the minds of men, an inspired apostle assures us that even the Gentiles, destitute of the law of Moses, have the 'work of the law written in their hearts.' Rom. ii. 15.

"3. The works of creation plainly demonstrate the existence of a God. The innumerable alterations and manifest dependence, everywhere observable in the world, prove that the things which exist in it neither are, nor could be, from eternity. It is self-evident that they never could form themselves out of nothing, or in any of their respective forms; and that chance, being nothing but the want of design, never did nor could form or put into order anything, far less such a marvellous and well-connected system as our world is. Though we should absurdly fancy matter to be eternal, yet it could not change its own form, or produce life or reason. Moreover, when we consider the diversified and wonderful forms of creatures in the world, and how exactly those forms and creatures correspond with their respective ends and uses; when we consider the marvellous and exact machinery, form, and motions of our own bodies; and especially when we consider the powers of our soul, its desires after an infinite good, and its close union with, and incomprehensible operations on, our bodies, we are obliged to admit a Creator of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness." "The plain argument," says Maclaurin, in his Account of Sir I. Newton's Philosophical Discoveries, "for the existence of the Deity, obvious to all, and carrying irresistible conviction with it, is from the evident contrivance and fitness of things for one another, which we meet with throughout all parts of the universe. There is no need of nice or subtle reasonings in this matter—a manifest contrivance immediately suggests a contriver. It strikes us like a sensation; and artful reasonings against it may puzzle us, but it is without shaking our belief."

"4. It is argued from the support and government of the world. Who can consider the motions of the heavenly luminaries, exactly calculated for the greatest advantage to our earth and its inhabitants; the exact balancing and regulating of the meteors, winds, rain, snow, hail, vapour, thunder, and the like; the regular and never-failing return of summer and winter, seed-time and harvest, day and night; the astonishing and diversified formation of vegetables; the propagation of herbs, almost everywhere, that are most effectual to heal the distempers of animal bodies in that place; the almost infinite diversification of animals and vegetables, and their pertinents, that notwithstanding an amazing similarity, not any two are exactly alike, but every form, member, or even feather or hair of animals, and every pile of grass, stalk of corn, herb, leaf, tree, berry, or other fruit, hath something peculiar to itself; the making of animals so sagaciously to prepare their lodgings, defend themselves, provide for their health, produce, and protect, and procure food for their young; the direction of fishes and fowls to and in such marvellous and long peregrinations at such seasons, and to such places, as best correspond with their own preservation and the benefit of mankind; the stationing of brute animals by sea or land at less or greater distances, as are most suited to the safety, subsistence, or comfort of mankind; and preventing the increase of prolific animals, and making the less fruitful ones, which are used, exceedingly to abound; the so diversifying the countenances, voices, and hand-writings of men, as best secures and promotes their social advantages; the holding of so equal a balance between males and females, while the number of males, whose lives are peculiarly endangered in war, navigation, &c., is generally greatest; the prolonging of men's lives, when the world needed to be peopled, and now shortening them when that necessity hath ceased to exist; the almost universal provision of food, raiment, medicine, fuel, &c., answerable to the nature of particular places, cold or hot, moist or dry; the management of human affairs relative to societies, government, peace, war, trade, &c., in a manner different from, and contrary to, the carnal policy of those concerned; and especially the strangely similar but diversified erection, preservation, and government of the Jewish and Christian Churches;—who, I say, can consider all these things, and not acknowledge the existence of a wise, merciful, and good God, who governs the world, and everything in it?

"5. It is proved from the miraculous events which have happened in the world; such as the overflowing of the earth by a flood; the confusion of languages; the burning of Sodom and the cities about by fire from heaven; the plagues of Egypt; the dividing of the Red Sea; raining manna from heaven, and bringing streams of water from flinty rocks; the stopping of the course of the sun, &c.

"6. His existence no less clearly appears from the exact fulfilment of so many and so particularly circumstantiated predictions, published long before the events took place. It is impossible that these predictions, which were so exactly fulfilled in their respective periods, and of the fulfilment of which there are at present thousands of demonstrative and sensible documents in the world, could proceed from any but an all-seeing and infinitely wise God.

"7. The existence of God further appears from the fearful punishments which have been inflicted upon persons, and especially upon nations, when their immoralities became excessive, and that by very unexpected means and instruments; as in the drowning of the old world; destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; plagues of Pharaoh and his servants; overthrow of Sennacherib and his army; miseries and ruin of the Canaanites, Jews, Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Saracens, Tartars, and others.

"8. Lastly, the existence of God may be argued from the terror and dread which wound the consciences of men when guilty of crimes which other men do not know, or are not able to punish or restrain, as in the case of Caligula, Nero, and Domitian, the Roman emperors; and this while they earnestly labour to persuade themselves or others that there is no God."

Moses began his writings by supposing the being of a God; he did not attempt to explain it. Although many of the inspired writers asserted his existence, and to discountenance idolatry, pleaded for his perfections, yet no one of them ever pretended to explain the manner of his being. Our duty is clear. We are not commanded nor expected to understand it. All that is required is this: "He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Heb. xi. 6.

GODFATHERS and GODMOTHERS. See SPONSORS.

GODLINESS, strictly taken, is right worship or devotion; but in general it imports the whole of practical religion. 1 Tim. iv. 8; 2 Pet. i. 6. It is difficult, as Saurin observes, to include an adequate idea of it in what is called a definition. "It supposes knowledge, veneration, affection, dependence, submission, gratitude, and obedience; or it may be reduced to these four ideas—knowledge in the mind, by which it is distinguished from the visions of the superstitious; rectitude in the conscience, that distinguishes it from hypocrisy; sacrifice in the life or renunciation of the world, by which it is distinguished from the unmeaning obedience of him who goes as a happy constitution leads him; and, lastly, zeal in the heart, which differs from the languishing emotions of the lukewarm." The advantages of this disposition are, honour, peace, safety, usefulness, support in death, and prospect of glory; or, as the apostle sums up all in a few words: "It is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." 1 Tim. iv. 8.

GODLY, godlike, that which proceeds from God, and is pleasing to him. It also signifies conformity to his will, and an assimilation to his character. Ps. xii. 1; Mal. ii. 15; 2 Cor. i. 12; Tit. ii. 12, &c.

GOËL. See AVENGER OF BLOOD.

GOG and MAGOG, proper names which occur in Ezek. xxxviii, and xxxix. Dr. Hales thinks they are general names of the northern nations of Europe and Asia, or of the districts north of Caucasus or Mount Taurus. Gog rather denotes the people, Magog the land. Josephus conjectures that these are to be understood as names applied to the Scythians of the ancients, answering to the Tartars of the moderns, a people extending through the centre of Asia and the south-east of Europe. Many are of opinion that the prophecies concerning Gog and Magog have a reference to the Turks as being descended from the Tartars. The Arabian geographers have placed the country of Gog and Magog at the remotest extremity of Tartary.

GOLD, the most esteemed of the precious metals. It is the heaviest of all known bodies, and the most ductile of all the metals. It is wholly incapable of rust, and is not sonorous when struck upon. It requires a strong fire to melt it, remaining unaltered in the degree of heat that fuses tin or lead, but running with a less vehement one than is necessary to the fusing of iron or copper. It does not retain its colour till the time of melting, but becomes ignited and white before it runs, and, when in fusion, it appears of a pale bluish-green colour on the surface. Common fire carried to its utmost vehemence has no further effect on gold than the fusing of it. It will remain ever so long in its fiercest heat, and come out at last unaltered, and with its weight entire.

Arabia had formerly its golden mines. "The gold of Sheba" (Ps. lxxii. 15), is, in the Septuagint and Arabic versions, "the gold of Arabia." Sheba was the ancient name of Arabia Felix. Mr. Bruce, however, places it in Africa, at Azab. The gold of Ophir, so often mentioned, must be that which was procured in Arabia, on the coast of the Red Sea. We are assured by Sanchoniathon, as quoted by Eusebius and by Herodotus, that the Phœnicians carried on a considerable traffic with this gold even before the days of Job, who speaks of it, ch. xxii. 24.

In Zech. xiii. 9, it is said, "I will try them as gold is tried." Mr. Roberts tells us, in illustration of this passage: "The people of the East try the quality of the gold by the touch. Thus they have a small stone on which they first rub a needle of known quality; they then take the article they wish to try and rub it near to the mark left by the other, and by comparing the two, they judge of the value of that which they try." In those regions, there are not any marks by which we can judge of the quality except in the way alluded to.

GOLDEN CALF. See AARON—APIS—CALF.

GOLGOTHA. See CALVARY.

GOLIATH, a famous giant of Gath (1 Sam. xvii. 4, &c. A.M. 2941), who defied the Hebrews, and was encountered and slain by David. He was descended from Rapha—that is, the old Rephaim. See GIANTS—ARMS, MILITARY.

GOMARISTS, Calvinists, so called from Francis Gomar, the chief antagonist of Arminius.

GOMER, the eldest son of Japheth (Gen. x. 2), peopled a considerable part of Asia Minor, particularly the region of Phrygia; the appellation of which Bochart conceives, with great probability, to be a translation into Greek of the Hebrew word Gomer, "a coal." Phrygia is literally "the burnt country." See DISPERSION.

GOMORRAH, one of the five cities of the plain, consumed by fire. Gen. xix. 24, &c. See DEAD SEA.

GOOD, in general, is whatever increases pleasure or diminishes pain in us. Great confusion has been introduced into philosophical writings, from not distinguishing between the three distinct senses in which this term good is used. 1. The agreeable, or that which gives immediate pleasure, without regard to consequences. 2. The useful, or that which, on the whole, is best for us in the present life. And 3, The virtuous, or that which God approves as right, and which is productive of everlasting happiness. If men always choose the greatest apparent good, as metaphysicians have contended, we must never forget to examine which kind of good it is which they prefer, since this determines their character. Those who consult only their senses, prefer the agreeable; those who consult their reason only, prefer the useful; and those who consult their conscience, prefer the virtuous. This last is the only true wisdom; for this kind of good, in the natural order as well as in the final event of things, comprehends every other.

GOOD FRIDAY, a fast kept in the English and Romish Churches, in memory of the sufferings and death of Jesus Christ. It is observed on the Friday in Passion Week, and it is called, by way of eminence, good, because of the good effects of our Saviour's sufferings. Among the Saxons it was called Long Friday; but for what reason does not appear, except on account of the long offices then used. The Protestants on the Continent consider this day as the most solemn in the whole year; by the Roman Catholics, however, it is only celebrated as a half holiday.

GOODNESS, philosophically, the fitness of a thing to produce any particular end. In morals, perfection, kindness, benevolence.

GOODNESS OF GOD relates both to the absolute perfection of his own nature, and his kindness manifested to his creatures. Goodness, says Dr Gill, is essential to God, without which he would not be God. Exod. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 6, 7. Goodness belongs only to God—he is solely good (Matt. xix. 17); and all the goodness found in creatures is only an emanation of the divine goodness. He is the chief good—the sum and substance of all felicity. Ps. cxliv. 12, 15, lxxiii. 25, iv. 6, 7. There is nothing but goodness in God, and nothing but goodness comes from him. 1 John i. 5; James i. 13, 14. He is infinitely good; finite minds cannot comprehend his goodness. Rom. xi. 35, 36. He is immutably and unchangeably good. Zeph. iii. 17. The goodness of God is communicative and diffusive. Ps. cxix. 68, xxxiii. 5. With respect to the objects of it, it may be considered as general and special. His general goodness is seen in all his creatures; yea, in the inanimate creation, the sun, the earth, and all his works; and in the government, support, and protection of the world at large. Ps. xxxvi. 6, cxlv. His special goodness relates to angels and saints;—to angels, in creating, confirming, and making them what they are—to saints, in election, calling, justification, adoption, sanctification, perseverance, and eternal glorification.

GOPHER-WOOD. See ARK.

GOSHEN. This name is given in Gen. xlvii. 1 to the best and most fruitful portion of the land of Egypt, where, by the command of Pharaoh, the Israelites were located. It is generally considered as having stretched along the eastern side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, including the district of Heliopolis. Jablonski places Goshen in the district immediately bordering on Suez; while Dr Adam Clarke, Pococke, Sicard, Norden, and St John consider it as situated on the Wady Toumilat, in which the Cairo Canal terminates. All writers agree in maintaining that it lay on the Arabian side of the Nile, and that all the transactions which Scripture records occurred in Lower Egypt, or the district immediately bordering on it. Dr Hales shows the wise policy of the Egyptians in assigning Goshen to the Hebrews. "It formed," he says, "the eastern barrier of Egypt towards Palestine and Arabia, the quarter from which they most dreaded invasion, and whose nakedness was now covered in a short time by a numerous, a brave, and an industrious people, amply repaying, by the additional security and resources which they gave to Egypt, their hospitable reception and naturalization in the country."

GOSPEL, the revelation of the grace of God to fallen man through a Mediator. It is taken also for the history of the life, actions, death, resurrection, ascension, and doctrine, of Jesus Christ. The word is compounded of two Saxon words—god, "good," and spell, "a message," or "tidings," and thus corresponds to the Greek euangelion, which signifies a joyful message, or good news. It is called the gospel of his grace, because it flows from his free love, Acts xx. 24; the gospel of the kingdom, as it treats of the kingdom of grace and glory; the gospel of Christ, because he is the author and subject of it, Rom. i. 16; the gospel of peace and salvation, as it promotes our present comfort, and leads to eternal glory, Eph. i. 13, vi. 15; the glorious gospel, as in it the glorious perfections of Jehovah are displayed, 2 Cor. iv. 4; the everlasting gospel, as it was designed from eternity, is permanent in time, and the effects of it are eternal, Rev. xiv. 6. The histories of the life of Christ in the New Testament, known by the name of the Gospels, were written by four of his contemporaries, two of whom had been constant attendants on his public ministry. The first of these was written within a few years after his death—some think about eight years after our Lord's ascension, others think about fifteen. It was published in that very country where Christ had lived, and among the people who had seen him, and observed his conduct. "Besides our Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles," says Dr. Paley, "no Christian history claiming to be written by an apostle, or apostolical man, is quoted within three hundred years after the birth of Christ, by any writer now extant or known; or if quoted, is quoted with marks of censure and rejection." There are many apocryphal Gospels; amongst these are the Gospels of St. Peter, St. Andrew, St. Barnabas, the Gospel of the Infancy of our Saviour, the Gospel of the Birth of Mary, the Prot-Evangelion of James, and the Gospel of Nicodemus. In perusing the writings of the four Evangelists, it is well to bear in mind that their object was not to give a regular chronologically-arranged history of the life, ministry, and sufferings of Jesus Christ, but the collection of such a body of well-authenticated facts as might disclose the nature, and form sufficient proof of the truth, of Christianity.

GOSPEL CALL. See CALLING.

GOURD (kikican—Jonah iv. 6, 7, 9, 10). Michaëlis, in his remarks on this subject, says, "Celsius appears to me to have proved that it is the kiki of the Egyptians." Niebuhr says, "I saw, for the first time at Basra, the plant el-keroa, mentioned in Michaëlis' 'Questions.' It has the form of a tree. The trunk appeared to me rather to resemble leaves than wood; nevertheless, it is harder than that which bears Adam's fig. Each branch of the keroa has but one large leaf, with six or seven foldings in it. This plant was near to a rivulet, which watered it amply. At the end of October, 1765, it had risen in five months' time about eight feet, and bore at once flowers and fruit, ripe and unripe. Another tree of this species, which had not had so much water, had not grown more in a whole year. The flowers and leaves of it which I gathered withered in a few minutes; as do all plants of a rapid growth. This tree is called at Aleppo, palma Christi. An oil is made from it called oleum de keroa—oleum ficus infernalis. The Christians and Jews of Mosul (Nineveh) say, it was not the keror whose shade refreshed Jonah, but a sort of gourd, el-keror, which has very large leaves, very large fruit, and lasts but about four months."

The epithet which the prophet uses in speaking of the plant, "son of the night it was, and as a son of the night it died," does not compel us to believe that it grew in a single night, but either, by a strong Oriental figure, that it was of rapid growth, or akin to night in the shade it spread for his repose. The figure is not uncommon in the East, and one of our own poets has called the rose "child of the summer." Nor are we bound to take the expression, "on the morrow," as strictly importing the very next day, since the word has reference to much more distant time. Exod. xiii. 14; Deut. vi. 20; Josh. iv. 6. It might be simply taken as afterwards. But the author of "Scripture Illustrated" justly remarks, "As the history in Jonah expressly says, 'The Lord prepared this plant,' no doubt we may conceive of it as an extraordinary one of its kind, remarkably rapid in its growth, remarkably hard in its stem, remarkably vigorous in its branches, and remarkable for the extensive spread of its leaves, and the deep gloom of their shadow; and, after a certain duration, remarkable for a sudden withering, and a total uselessness to the impatient prophet."

2. We read of the wild gourd in 2 Kings iv. 39. This plant or fruit is called in Hebrew pakorat and pakoim. There have been various opinions about it. Celsius supposes it to be the colocynth. The leaves of the plant are large, placed alternate; the flowers white, and the fruit of the gourd kind of the size of a large apple; which, when ripe, is yellow, and of a pleasant and inviting appearance, but to the taste intolerably bitter, and proves a drastic purgative. It seems that the fruit, whatever it might have been, was early thought proper for an ornament in architecture. It furnished a model for some of the carved work of cedar in Solomon's temple. 1 Kings vi. 18, vii. 24.

GOVERNMENT OF GOD is either providential, moral, or spiritual. His providential government, is the disposal of his creatures, and all events relative to them, according to his infinite justice, power, and wisdom. His moral government, is his rendering to every man according to his character, considered as good or evil. His spiritual government, is that which he maintains by his Spirit and Word over the hearts and lives of his saints, both individually and as collected into the visible Church; hence called, in the current language of the New Testament, the "kingdom of God." Rom. xiv. 17; 1 Cor. iv. 20; Col. i. 12, 13; John iii. 3-7. God governs all things by directing and disposing them to the end for which he designed them. "But our God is in the heavens: he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased." Ps. cxv. 3. "And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing: and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" Dan. iv. 35. The government of God may be considered in a twofold view—natural and moral. This twofold view of his government arises from the two general classes which are the objects of it. The irrational and inanimate creatures are the subjects of his natural government. The rational part of the creation, as angels and men, are the subjects of his moral government. Thus the whole creation, animate and inanimate, rational and irrational, are comprehended under the government of that all-wise and all-powerful Being, whose kingdom ruleth over all, from the highest seraph in the heavens, to the meanest insect that crawls upon the earth. Every part of the material world has an immediate dependence on the will and power of God, in respect of every motion and operation, as well as in respect of continued existence; but he governs the material world by certain physical laws—commonly called the laws of nature, and in Scripture, the ordinances of heaven—and agreeably to these laws, so far as relates to second causes, certain effects uniformly and necessarily follow certain causes. The providence of God is also concerned about the volitions and actions of intelligent creatures; but his providential influence is not destructive of their rational liberty, for they are under no compulsion, but act freely; and all the liberty which can belong to rational creatures is that of acting according to their inclinations. Though there is no event contingent with respect to God, "who declareth the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things which are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure;" yet many events are contingent or accidental with regard to us, and also with respect to second causes. See DOMINION—SOVEREIGNTY.

GOVERNOR OF THE FEAST. This officer is thus described by Professor Paxton in his "Illustrations of Sacred Scripture:" "The entertainment was conducted by a symposiarch, or governor of the feast. He was, says Plutarch, one chosen from among the guests, the most pleasant and diverting in the company, that would not get drunk, and yet would drink freely; he was to rule over the rest, to forbid any disorder, but to encourage their mirth. He observed the temper of the guests, and how the wine worked upon them; how every one could bear his wine, and endeavoured accordingly to keep them all in harmony, and in an even composure, that there might be no disquiet nor disturbance. To do this effectually, he first proclaimed liberty to every one to drink what he thought proper, and then observing who among them was most ready to be disordered, mixed more water with his wine, to keep him equally sober with the rest of the company; so that this officer took care that none should be forced to drink, and that none, though left to their own choice, should get intoxicated. Such, we have reason to believe, was the governor of the feast at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, which our Lord honoured with his presence. The term architriklinos, literally signifies the governor of a place furnished with three beds; and he acted as one having authority; for he tasted the wine before he distributed it to the company, which, it is universally admitted, was one of the duties of a symposiarch. Neither the name nor the act accords with the character and situation of a guest; he must, therefore, have been the symposiarch, or governor of the feast. It is admitted he knew not the wine was done, and that they were at a loss for more; but this only proves that he was not so fully acquainted with the state of matters as he ought to have been, and as such persons commonly were; and, besides, it is easy to discern a secret arrangement of Divine Providence, by which the governor of the feast was, in this instance, ignorant of one thing belonging to his office, that the miracle might be attested by an unexceptionable witness, and on his authority made known to the whole company. But the existence of such an officer among the Jews is placed beyond a doubt by a passage in the apocryphal Book of Ecclesiasticus, where his office is thus described: 'If thou be made the master of a feast, lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest; take diligent care of them, and so sit down. And when thou hast done all thine office, take thy place, that thou mayest be merry with them, and receive a crown for the well-ordering of the feast.'"

GOZAN, a city or country in Northern Mesopotamia, called by Ptolemy Gauzanitis, to which the Israelites were carried into captivity. Gozan was also the name of a river which runs through the province. 2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11.

GRACE, a term of very frequent occurrence in the Scriptures, especially those of the New Testament, in which the place it occupies is so important, that, without a proper understanding of its import, we can never make any considerable progress in the knowledge of the Scriptures, or indeed comprehend the general design of divine revelation; and yet, unhappily, no subject is more misunderstood.

If we carefully examine the Scriptures concerning this important subject, we shall find the revealed properties of divine grace to be the following: It is free, foregoing, distinguishing, sovereign, effectual, rich, eternal, and regulated by infinite wisdom in such a way as to satisfy justice, secure holiness, maintain truth, and secure happiness.

Divines have distinguished grace into common or general, and special or particular. Common grace is what all men have who hear the Gospel—the illumination and strivings of God's Spirit, convictions of sin, &c. Gen. vi. 3; John xvi. 7–15. Special grace is that which is peculiar to the saved; such as electing, redeeming, justifying, pardoning, adopting, establishing, and sanctifying grace. Rom. viii. 30. This special grace is by some distinguished into imputed and inherent. Imputed grace consists in the holiness, obedience, and righteousness of Christ, imputed to us for our justification; inherent grace is what is wrought in the heart by the Spirit of God in regeneration. Grace is also said to be efficacious, irresistible, and victorious; not but that there are in human nature, in the first moments of conviction, even in the saved, some struggles, opposition, or conflict; but by these terms we are to understand that, in the end, victory declares for the grace of the Gospel. There have been many other distinctions of grace; but as they are of too frivolous a nature, and are now obsolete, they need not a place here.

Growth in grace, is the progress we make in the divine life. It discovers itself by an increase of spiritual light and knowledge; by our renouncing self, and depending more upon Christ; by growing more spiritual in duties; by being more humble, submissive, and thankful; by rising superior to the corruptions of our nature, and finding the power of sin more weakened in us; by being less attached to the world, and possessing more of a heavenly disposition.

GRAIN. See AGRICULTURE.

GRANARY. See BARN—GARNER.

GRAPE, the fruit of the vine. There were fine vineyards and excellent grapes in the Promised Land. The bunch of grapes which was cut in the Valley of Eshcol, and was brought upon a staff between two men to the camp of Israel at Kadeshbarnea (Numb. xiii. 23), may give us some idea of the largeness of the fruit in that country. It would be easy to produce a great number of witnesses to prove that the grapes in those regions grow to a prodigious size. By Calmet, Scheuchzer, and Harmer, this subject has been exhausted. "At Beidtdjin," says Schultz, "a village near Ptolemais, we took our supper under a large vine, the stem of which was nearly a foot and a half in diameter, the height about thirty feet, and which covered with its branches and shoots (for the shoots must be supported) a hut of more than fifty feet long and broad. The bunches of these grapes are so large that they weigh from ten to twelve pounds, and the grapes may be compared to our plums. Such a bunch is cut off and laid on a board, round which they seat themselves, and each helps himself to as many as he pleases." Forster, in his Hebrew Dictionary (under the word Eshcol), says, that he knew at Nuremburg a monk of the name of Acacius, who had resided eight years in Palestine, and had also preached at Hebron, where he had seen bunches of grapes which were as much as two men could conveniently carry. The time of ripe grapes in Palestine appears to be about the middle of September. The juice of the grape, it is well known, is expressed by treading in the East; and to this custom there is an allusion in Mic. vi. 15: "Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap; thou shalt tread the olives, but thou shalt not anoint thee with oil; and sweet wine, but shalt not drink wine." When a few clusters of grapes are to be squeezed, it may be done by the hand; in this way Pharaoh's butler supposed he took the grapes and pressed them into his master's cup. But when a large quantity of juice was required, the grapes were subjected in a wine-press to the feet of a treader. See VINE—WINE-PRESS—VINEYARD.

The wild grapes (Isa. v. 2–4) are the fruit of the wild or bastard vine; sour and unpalatable, and good for nothing but to make verjuice. Hasselquist is inclined to believe that the prophet here means the Solanum incanum, "hoary nightshade," because it is common in Egypt and Palestine, and the Arabian name agrees well with it. The Arabs call it aneb el dib, "wolf's grapes." The prophet could not have found a plant more opposite to the vine than this; for it grows much in the vineyards, and is very pernicious to them. Gesenius thinks the wild grapes must have been the Aconitum napellus, "wolf's bane" or "monk's hood," a well-known poisonous plant, bearing berries in the form of grapes. See Jer. ii. 21; Deut. xxxii. 32, 33.

GRASS (desha) or HERBAGE (Gen. i. 11), the well-known vegetable upon which flocks and herds feed, and which decks our fields, and refreshes our sight with its grateful verdure. Its feeble structure and transitory duration are mentioned in Scripture as emblematic of the frail condition and fleeting existence of man. The inspired poets draw this picture with such inimitable beauty as the laboured elegies on mortality of ancient and modern times have never surpassed. See Ps. xc. 6, ciii. 15, 16, and particularly Isa. xl. 6–8. As, in their decay, the herbs of the fields strikingly illustrate the shortness of human life, so, in the order of their growth, from seeds dead and buried, they give a natural testimony to the doctrine of a resurrection. The Prophet Isaiah and the Apostle Paul both speak of bodies rising from the dead, as of so many seeds springing from the ground to renovated existence and beauty, although they do not, as some have absurdly supposed, consider the resurrection as in any sense analogous to the process of vegetation. Isa. xxvi. 19; 1 Cor. xv. 35–44. See HAY—HERB—FUEL.

In several places, Scripture refers to grass growing on the house tops, but which comes to nothing. The following quotation, from Jowett's "Christian Researches," will show the nature of this: "In the morning the master of the house laid in a stock of earth, which was carried up, and spread evenly on the top of the house, which is flat. The whole roof is thus formed of mere earth, laid on, and rolled hard and flat. On the top of every house is a large stone roller, for the purpose of hardening and flattening this layer of made soil, so that the rain may not penetrate; but upon this surface, as may be supposed, grass and weeds grow freely. It is to such grass that the Psalmist alludes as useless and bad." It is a common practice in the East to set the dry grass on fire before the autumnal rains; which, for want of care, often occasions great damage. The season for consuming the dry herbage, and undergrowth on the mountains is in the latter end of July. The tops of the houses in Judea are flat, and being covered with plaster of Paris, are frequently grown over with grass, which, as it is but small and weak, and from its elevation exposed to the scorching sun, is soon withered. To prevent this they pluck it up, for the use of their cattle, with the hand. To this practice there is a beautiful allusion in Ps. cxxix. 6, 7: "Let them be as the grass upon the house-tops, which withereth afore it groweth up: wherewith the mower filleth not his hand; nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom." The amazingly rapid growth of vegetation is noticed by every traveller in the East. The refreshing showers, and the copious dews, are often referred to in Scripture: "My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass." Dent. xxxii. 2. But such extraordinary quickness of growth is incompatible with strength and permanence; the feeble and sickly blade yields as quickly to the burning heat, and vanishes away. Hence such expressions as that of the Psalmist abound in the Bible: "It is withered afore it groweth up."

GRASSHOPPER (hagab), Lev. xi. 22; Numb. xiii. 33; 2 Chron. vii. 13; Eccles. xii. 5; Isa. xl. 22; Judges vi. 5; Jer. xlv. 23. In Arabic, giaba. Our translators render the Hebrew word locust, in the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the temple (2 Chron. vii. 13), and with propriety. But it is rendered grasshopper, in Eccles. xii. 5, where Solomon, describing the infelicities of old age, says, "The grasshopper shall be a burden."

The Prophet Isaiah contrasts the grandeur and power of God, with everything reputed great in this world, by a very expressive reference to this insect: "Jehovah sitteth on the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants are to him as grasshoppers." Isa. xl. 22. What atoms and inanities are they all before him, who sitteth on the circle of the immense heavens, and views the potentates of the earth in the light of grasshoppers, those little insects that wander over the barren heath for sustenance, spend the day in insignificant chirpings, and take up their contemptible lodging at night on a blade of grass! See LOCUST.

GRATITUDE, is that pleasant affection of the mind which arises from a sense of favours received, and by which the possessor is excited to make all the returns of love and service in his power. "Gratitude," says Mr. Cogan, in his Treatise on the Passions, "is the powerful reaction of a well disposed mind, upon whom benevolence has conferred some important good. It is mostly connected with an impressive sense of the amiable disposition of the person by whom the benefit is conferred, and it immediately produces a personal affection towards him." We shall not wonder at the peculiar strength and energy of this affection, when we consider that it is compounded of love placed upon the good communicated, affection for the honour, and joy at the reception. Thus it has goodness for its object, and the most pleasing, perhaps unexpected, exertions of goodness for its immediate cause. Thankfulness refers to verbal expressions of gratitude. See THANKFULNESS.

GRAVE. See SEPULCHRE.

GRAVEL, small stones, fragments of rock reduced to a minute size by attrition. This word occurs in Prov. xx. 17: "Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel;" and Lam. iii. 16: "He hath also broken my teeth with gravel stones, he hath covered me with ashes."

GRAVEN. This word is found in Isa. xlix. 16: "Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands; thy walls are continually before me." There is here an allusion to the Eastern custom of tracing out on the hands sketches of certain eminent cities or places, and then rubbing them with the powder of the henna or cypress, and thereby making the marks perpetual. Mr. Roberts says, "The palms of the hands are believed to have written on them the fate of the individual; and from this it is common to say, in reference to men or things, 'They are written on the palms of his hands.'"

GRAVEN IMAGE. This is mentioned in Deut. xxvii. 15: "Cursed be the man that maketh any graven or molten image, an abomination unto the Lord, the work of the hands of the craftsman, and putteth it in a secret place. And all the people shall answer and say, Amen." It seems to refer to the household gods, which will be more fully considered under the article TERAPHIM, which is the earliest name by which these domestic idols are mentioned in the Bible.

GRAVITY, is that seriousness of mind, united with dignity of behaviour, that commands veneration and respect. It is often enjoined in the New Testament as a branch of Christian morals.

GREATNESS OF GOD, is the infinite glory and excellency of all his perfections. His greatness appears by the attributes he possesses (Dent. xxxii. 3, 4); the works he hath made (Ps. xix. 1); by the awful and benign providences he displays (Ps. xcvi. 1, 2); the great effects he produces by his word (Gen. i.); the constant energy he manifests in the existence and support of all his creatures (Ps. cxlv.); and the everlasting provision of glory made for his people. 1 Thess. iv. 17. This greatness is of himself, and not derived (Ps. xxi. 13); it is infinite (Ps. cxlv. 3); not diminished by exertion, but will always remain the same. Mal. iii. 6. The consideration of his greatness should excite veneration (Ps. lxxxix. 7, 8), admiration (Ps. lxxii. 18), humility (Job xlii. 5, 6), dependence (Isa. xxvi. 4), submission (Job i. 22), obedience. Deut. iv. 39, 40. See ATTRIBUTES.

GREAVES, defensive armour for the legs. They were composed of brass, copper, or other metals. They reached from the knee to the ankle, and were fastened behind. They were at first worn, however, on the left leg, just as the buckler was carried on the left arm, the left side being most exposed in the action. Goliath appears to have worn greaves of brass upon his legs. See ARMS, MILITARY—ARMOUR.

GREEKS were, properly, the inhabitants of Greece; but this is not the only acceptation of the name in the New Testament. It seems to import—(1.) Those persons of Hebrew descent who, being settled in cities where Greek was the natural language, spoke this language rather than their parental Hebrew. They are called Greeks to distinguish them from those Jews who spoke Hebrew. Acts vi. 1. (2.) Such persons as were Greek settlers in the land of Israel, or in any of its towns. After the time of Alexander these aliens were numerous in some places. Mark vii. 26.

GREYHOUND. This well-known animal is mentioned only in Prov. xxx. 31. Critics have variously interpreted the word. The Septuagint, Vulgate, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic versions translate it "cock," while others render it a "zebra."

GRIEVE. God is grieved, when he is highly offended with men's sinning, and provoked to execute his judgments on them. Gen. vi. 6; Heb. iii. 10.

Men grieve the Holy Ghost, when they resist his persuasions, abuse his gifts or grace, and so displease and offend him, and provoke him to withdraw his influences, and give them up to their corrupt lusts. Eph. iv. 30.

GRIEVOUS, that which furnishes great cause of grief. (1.) What is very offensive; so sin is grievous when it is very great and aggravated (Lam. i. 8, 20; Ezek. xiv. 13), and men are grievous revolvers when they sin exceedingly. Jer. vi. 28. (2.) What is very ill-natured, outrageous, and provoking; so grievous words stir up anger. Prov. xv. 1. (3.) What is very afflicting and hard to be borne; and so war, visions, &c., are said to be grievous. Isa. xxi. 15; Matt. xxiii. 4. (4.) What is very hurtful and destructive; so wolves and false teachers are called grievous. Acts xx. 29. Men write grievousness, which they have prescribed, when they establish and ratify wicked and oppressive laws. Isa. x. 1, 2.

GRIND. See MILL.

GRISLED. This word, which is found in Gen. xxxi. 10, 12, means speckled, spotted, hail-spotted, or marked with large white spots like hail-stones on a dark ground. This was the colour of the horses seen in the fourth chariot in Zechariah's vision (Zech. vi. 3), bay mottled with white. The Syriac version gives, both here and in Genesis, "spotted with red."

GROANING, is expressive of great trouble, and of a vehement desire of relief. Exod. ii. 24. The saints groan earnestly, and with groanings that cannot be uttered; they have a deep and heart-burdening sense of their sins and afflictions, and, with ardent desire, long and cry for deliverance. 2 Cor. v. 2, 4; Rom. viii. 26.

GROUND. It was a common mark of reverence to a superior, to bow with the face to the ground. An Eastern conqueror requires the vanquished to fall prostrate on the ground before him; they kiss his feet, and the very ground on which he treads. Hence the submission which the world shall one day render to the Messiah is thus expressed: "They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him; his enemies shall lick the very dust." There is an allusion to the same custom in Isa. lx. 14: "The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee; and all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet; and they shall call thee, The city of the Lord, The Zion of the Holy One of Israel."

GROVE. It is difficult to determine the precise reason why groves were selected in ancient times for sacred purposes. Some suppose that they were so used in consequence of the refreshing coolness of the shade; and others, because of the sombre character of the situation. It is somewhat doubtful whether the one advantage or the other be referred to in Hos. iv. 13: "They sacrifice upon the tops of mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks and poplars and elms, because the shadow thereof is good: therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses shall commit adultery." As places consecrated to religious exercises, groves appear to have been planted at a very early period. Thus in the time of Abraham, Gen. xxi. 33: "And Abraham planted a grove in Beer-sheba, and called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God." Such places were not used for the worship of the true God alone, but they became scenes of idol-worship. Hence the Israelites were prohibited from the use of these groves, as in Deut. xvi. 21, 22: "Thou shalt not plant thee a grove of any trees near unto the altar of the Lord thy God, which thou shalt make thee. Neither shalt thou set thee up any image; which the Lord thy God hateth." They were commanded also to cut down and burn the groves of the Canaanites: "And ye shall overthrow their altars, and break their pillars, and burn their groves with fire; and ye shall hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place." Deut. xii. 3. Some think that grove-worship began with the worship of demons or departed spirits. There is no doubt that it was an ancient custom to bury the dead under trees or in woods. Thus Gen. xxxv. 8: "But Deborah Rebe-kah's nurse died, and she was buried beneath Beth-el under an oak: and the name of it was called Allon-bachuth." And again, 1 Sam. xxxi. 13: "And they took their bones, and buried them under a tree at Jabesh, and fasted seven days." Afterwards the custom was introduced of planting groves and building temples near the tombs of departed heroes.

GUARDIAN ANGEL. See ANGEL.

GUEST. Gospel hearers are likened to guests; at Christ's invitation, by his ministers, or others, they come to his ordinances, professing to feed with him on his fulness. Matt. xxii. 10, 11. The Chaldeans were guests bidden to the Lord's sacrifice; he raised them up and enabled them to execute his vengeance; and they satiated their own pride and covetousness in murdering and spoiling the Jews, and nations around. Zeph. i. 7.

GUEST-CHAMBER. See CHAMBER.

GUIDE. God is a guide; he directs the motions of all his creatures (Job xxxviii. 32), and, by his Word, Spirit, and providence, he directs his people in their proper course, and comforts them under their troubles. Isa. xlix. 10. A first husband is called a guide of youth (Prov. ii. 17); so God was to the Hebrews. Jer. iii. 4.

GUILT, the state of a person justly charged with a crime; a consciousness of having done amiss, liability to punishment.

GUILTY, chargeable with crimes that expose to punishment. Gen. xlii. 21. He that offends in one point is guilty of all—of breaking all the commandments of God; he tramples on the authority which establishes, and fails of that love which fulfils, the whole law. James ii. 10. An unworthy partaker of the Lord's supper is guilty of the body and blood of the Lord; he is chargeable with the horrid crime of crucifying Christ afresh, and offering the highest indignity to his person and righteousness, represented by the symbols of that ordinance. 1 Cor. xi. 27.

GULF. The great gulf fixed between Abraham and the rich man, may denote the great distance between heaven and hell, and the irremovable hindrances of coming from one to the other. Luke xvi. 26.

GUR-BAAL. The name of a town or district only mentioned in 2 Chron. xxvi. 7, as inhabited by Arabians; it is rendered by the Septuagint, Petra in Arabia, the celebrated capital of Arabia Petraea. See EDOM.

GUTTER. The same word which, in 2 Sam. v. 8, is rendered "gutter," is translated in Ps. xlii. 7 "water-spout." Gesenius supposes it to mean a water-course, or water-fall. Dr Boothroyd terms it "secret passage." It seems to refer to some subterraneous passage through which water passed. By such passages besiegers sometimes entered a city.

H.

HABAKKUK. We have no certain information concerning the tribe or birth-place of Habakkuk. The pseudo Epiphanius affirms that he was of the tribe of Simeon, and was born at Bethcazar. Some commentators have supposed that he prophesied in Judea in the reign of Manasseh, but Archbishop Ussher places him, with greater probability, in the reign of Jehoiakim. Comp. Hab. i. 5, 6. Consequently this prophet was contemporary with Jeremiah. Several apocryphal predictions and other writings are ascribed to Habakkuk, but without any foundation. His genuine writings are comprised in the three chapters which have been transmitted to us; and the subject of them is the same with that of Jeremiah, viz., the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, for the heinous sins of the Jewish people; the consolation of the faithful amid all their national calamities; and warnings to repent and to return unto the Lord.

HABERGEON. See ARMS, MILITARY.

HABIT, a peculiar power and facility of doing any thing, acquired by frequent repetition of the same action. It is distinguished from custom. Custom respects the action, habit the actor. By custom we mean a frequent reiteration of the same act, and by habit the effect that custom has on the mind or body. "Man," as one observes, "is a bundle of habits. There are habits of industry, attention, vigilance, advertency; of a prompt obedience to the judgment formed, or of yielding to the first impulse of passion; of apprehending, methodizing, reasoning; of vanity, melancholy, fretfulness, suspicion, covetousness, &c. In a word, there is not a quality or function, either of body or mind, which does not feel the influence of this great law of animated nature." To cure evil habits, we should be as early as we can in our application, to cross and mortify the inclination by a frequent and obstinate practice of the contrary virtue. To form good habits, we should get our minds well stored with knowledge; associate with the wisest and best men; reflect much on the pleasure good habits are productive of; and, above all, supplicate the Divine Being for direction and assistance.

HABITATION. God is the habitation of his people; in him they find the most delightful rest, safety, and comfort. Ps. xci. 9. Justice and judgment are the habitation or establishment of God's throne; all his royal acts are founded on justice and judgment: he takes pleasure to execute them; and being executed on our Redeemer, they became the foundation of his exercise of mercy, and performance of his promises to us. By his righteous distribution of rewards and punishments, he supports the honour of his character. Ps. lxxxix. 14. The land of Canaan, the city of Jerusalem, the tabernacle and temple, heaven and the heart of saints, are represented as the habitation of God; there he did or does signally show himself present, work by his power, or bestow his favour and influence. Jer. xxv. 30; Ezra vii. 15; Exod. xv. 2; Ps. cxxxii. 5, 13; Eph. ii. 22. Eternity is represented as his habitation; he is eternal in a manner no other is, nor does his duration increase as that of angels and men. Isa. lvii. 15. He inhabited the praises of Israel; he dwelt in the temple when they praised; he owns, deserves, is the object of, and kindly accepts, the praises of his people. Ps. xxii. 3.

HACHILAH, a hill about ten miles south of Jericho, where David concealed himself from Saul. 1 Sam. xxiii. 19. Jonathan Maccabæus built here the castle of Massada.

HADAD, the son of a king of East Edom, who, when Joab—as is recorded in 1 Kings xi. 14—issued a cruel order to exterminate all the males of Edom, escaped the consequences of this bloody edict by being carried into Egypt by his father's servants. In that country the royal fugitive was treated with great kindness, having received from the king a house and lands, and the queen's sister as his wife. When tidings reached Egypt of the death of David, and the murder of Joab, Hadad wished to return to Edom, a desire which Pharaoh, though reluctantly, at length gratified. The Egyptian monarch was naturally anxious to retain in his dominions so near a relative as the husband of his beloved sister Tahpenhes. He tried to prevail upon Hadad to prolong his residence in the country which had so benevolently harboured him in the days of his calamity, when he might have fallen a victim to the savage tyranny of Joab. Hadad, however, was resolved to return. On reaching his own country, Hadad tried to rouse the people to revolt against Solomon, to whom they were tributary. With the assistance of Rezon, Hadad succeeded in conquering part of Syria, from which he made frequent invasions upon the territories of Solomon. Hadad was also the name of a Syrian deity, otherwise called Ahad or Achad. Macrobius says that the word signifies one or only, and that it is on that account applied to the sun. The early Syrian kings were fond of assuming the name of Benhadad (son of Hadad), and a similar practice prevailed among other Pagan sovereigns.

HADADEZER, king of Zobah, a country which extended from Libanus to the Orontes, whom David defeated first with his own forces, and afterwards when reinforced by auxiliaries from Damascus. 2 Sam. viii. 3.

HADAD-RIMMON. See ADAD-RIMMON.

HADES, the invisible world, or the place of the departed in the intermediate state, prior to the resurrection. The corresponding term in Hebrew is sheol; which is derived from a root signifying to demand, inquire, and either denotes the place with respect to which it may be asked "Man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" (Job xiv. 10), or the insatiable receptacle which crieth Give, give, and never saith, It is enough. Prov. xxx. 15, 16. Both words, sheol and hades, are employed to express the state of the dead, in its most comprehensive point of view; including the grave as the invisible residence of the body, and the world of spirits as the invisible abode of the soul. At other times they are used, either of the one or the other, taken separately. They are often very improperly rendered hell in our common version; the instances being comparatively few in which the words have the accessory signification of the place of punishment. In other passages the term grave is too limited a rendering. The reader must judge from the context, and all the circumstances of the case, in which acceptance the words are to be taken.

HADID, or CHADID, a city of Benjamin (Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37); probably the Adita or Adida of Josephus, and of 1 Macc. xii. 38, xiii. 13, in Sephela or in the plain of Judah.

HADORAM, the name of an Arabian nation descended from Joktan. It is mentioned in Gen. x. 27, and 1 Chron. i. 21.

HADRACH, or ADRA, a district mentioned by Zechariah (ix. 1), who denounced dreadful threatenings against it. Ptolemy notices a city called Adra. It could not be far from Damascus; for Zechariah calls Damascus the bulwark, defence, and confidence of Hadrach.

HAGAR, an Egyptian female, taken by Abraham at the suggestion of Sarah, in consequence of her own barrenness, to be his secondary wife. It is a curious circumstance that the Mahometans, who hold Hagar in very high regard, calling her by the appellation of "Mother Hagar," contend that she was the lawful wife of Abraham. The origin of this strange admiration of the Egyptian slave is probably to be found in the fact that her son Ishmael was the ancestor of the Arabians. In Gal. iv. 24, 25, the name Hagar is used allegorically to represent the inferior condition of the Jewish people under the law, to that of Christians under the gospel. They are as much inferior, in fact, as the handmaid Hagar was to Sarah, the legitimate spouse of the patriarch.

HAGARITES, the descendants of Ishmael, called also Ishmaelites and Saracens, or Arabians, from their country. They are mentioned in 1 Chron. v. 10, and are supposed to have settled in the neighbourhood of Mount Sinai.

HAGGAI, one of the minor prophets of the Old Testament. He is generally supposed to have been a native of Babylon, and to have accompanied the Jewish captives on their return to their own land. There he continued until he was inspired by the Spirit of God to speak in prophecy to the Jews, exhorting Zerubbabel and Joshua to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem. Animated by the encouraging assurances of the Lord by his prophet, the Jews resumed the work in the second year of Darius. Haggai pointed out to the Jews the great superiority of this second temple which they were about to build, when compared with the temple of Solomon, not on account of its greater outward magnificence, but because it would be honoured by the presence, in person, of the Messiah, the desire of all nations. Haggai is said by Epiphanius to have been descended from Aaron; but we have no certain information as to his descent.

HAGIOGRAPHIA (Greek for holy writings), the name given to the third division of the Jewish Scriptures, which comprises the Book of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, Esther, and the Chronicles. These books appear to have received the name of "Sacred Writings," to intimate that, though they were not written by Moses, nor by any of the prophets, strictly so called, they were nevertheless to be received as of the same divine authority, having been written or added to the canon under the influence of that Holy Spirit by whose inspiration the other books were composed. See BIBLE.

HAIL! an ordinary mode of salutation in the East, intending to express simply a desire for the welfare of the person thus addressed. It was used by the angel when addressing the Virgin Mary, "Hail! thou that art highly favoured among women;" and some Roman Catholic writers, in their anxiety to magnify the mother of our Lord, attach importance even to the word "Hail;" but every one at all acquainted with the writings of the best Greek authors, knows that no word is more frequently used as an expression of good will on meeting one whom we either love or respect. It is ridiculous to assert that in employing the word "Hail!" the angel designed to adore the Virgin.

HAILSTONES, congealed drops of rain, frozen in the higher regions of the atmosphere. We find hail mentioned (Exod. ix. 24, 25) as one of the plagues of Egypt: "So there was hail, and fire mingled with hail, very grievous, such as there was none like it in all the land of Egypt since it became a nation. And the hail smote throughout all the land of Egypt all that was in the field, both man and beast; and the hail smote every herb of the field, and brake every tree of the field." Hail was also the means made use of by God for defeating an army of the kings of Canaan. Josh. x. 11. God's judgments are likened to a hail-storm in Isa. xxviii. 2; but the most tremendous hail mentioned in Scripture, or in any writer, is that alluded to in Rev. xvi. 21: "Every stone was about the weight of a talent."

HAIR. "The hair of the Jews, as is the case in eastern countries generally, was almost universally of a black colour. By the men it was always worn short, except sometimes, perhaps, by delicate and vain persons like Absalom, or by such as were under the Nazarite vow. 'All the days of the vow of his separation there shall no razor come upon his head; until the days be fulfilled, in the which he separateth himself unto the Lord, he shall be holy, and shall let the locks of the hair of his head grow.' Numb. vi. 5. It was common to anoint the hair, especially on festival occasions. The liquid ointment used for that purpose was made out of the best oil of olives, mixed with spices. 'Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.' Ps. xxiii. 5. 'My head with oil thou didst not anoint: but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment.' Luke vii. 46. In conformity with this custom, Mary poured ointment on our Saviour's head, as he sat at meat in the house of Simon the leper; but to show her very great regard for his person, she used ointment far more costly than the common kind—'ointment of spikenard, very precious.' Mark xiv. 3. At the same time, to express still more affection and profound respect, she anointed also his feet, and wiped them with the hair of her head. 'Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment.' John xii. 2. Females, as in all other countries, wore their hair long. The Apostle Paul teaches us that this usage ought never to be abandoned: 'Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him? But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her for a covering.' 1 Cor. xi. 14, 15. The same apostle, however, was altogether opposed to the fashion of dressing up this simple ornament with an artificial glory of braided tresses and gold and costly gems. On this subject Peter also thought it proper to leave his inspired admonition. 1 Pet. iii. 3. Such vain decorations were very common among the Jewish ladies." Cutting off the hair was a sign of mourning (Jer. vii. 29); but sometimes in mourning they suffered it to grow long. In ordinary sorrows they neglected their hair; and in violent paroxysms they plucked it off with their hands. Such a violent expression of sorrow is exemplified in the conduct of Ezra, which he thus describes: "And when I heard this thing, I rent my garment and my mantle, and plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard, and sat down astonished." Ezra ix. 3. See BALDNESS.

HALAH, a river of Media, or of Colchis; also, a city or country of Media, to which the kings of Assyria transplanted the Ten Tribes. It is mentioned with Habor (2 Kings xvii. 6); which shows it to have been on the River Gozan. Hyde supposes it to be Holwan; Bochart thinks it to be the metropolis of the Calachene, admitting a permutation of the first letter.

HALHUL, a town in the territory of Judah, mentioned in Josh. xv. 58. Jerome speaks of a place called Alula near Hebron, which may probably be the same.

HALI, a town in the territory of Asher. Josh. xix. 25.

HALLEL. This was the name which, by way of eminence, the Jews gave to the Hallelujah Psalms, which comprised Ps. cxiii.—cxviii., and was divided into two parts—the first including Ps. cxiii.—cxv., sung before eating the passover, or rather before drinking the second cup; and the second part including Ps. cxvi.—cxviii., sung after the passover was concluded, or in mixing the fourth and last cup. Whether this hymn, to which allusion is supposed to be made in Matt. xxvi. 30, was sung or recited, has been matter of discussion, but the probability is that it was sung.

HALLELUJAH. See ALLELUIA.

HALLOW, to render sacred, set apart, consecrate. The English word is from the Saxon, and is properly to make holy; hence hallowed persons, things, places, rites, &c.; hence, also, the name, character, power, dignity of God, is to be hallowed; that is, profoundly revered as holy in every human heart. Matt. vi. 9; Luke xi. 2. See SANCTIFICATION—HOLY.

HALT, lame. Many persons who were halt were cured by our Lord. To halt between two opinions (1 Kings xviii. 21), should plainly be understood as implying to hesitate, from indecision which to embrace, or to stagger from one to the other, repeatedly—some say it is an allusion to birds, who hop from spray to spray, forwards and backwards—as the contrary influence of supposed convictions vibrate in the mind in alternate affirmation and doubtfulness.

HAM or CHAM is supposed to have been the youngest son of Noah. In the division of the earth which followed upon the deluge, it is thought that the southern parts were assigned to him. The land of Ham, when mentioned by David in the Psalms, is understood to signify Egypt. By the descendants of Ham were founded the first great empires of Assyria and Egypt. A melancholy incident in the history of Ham is related in Gen. ix. 20–25. When Noah awoke, he pronounced a prophecy in reference to Canaan, the son of Ham. (See CANAAN.) From the descendants of Ham were peopled the republics of Tyre, Sidon, and Carthage; but they early fell to decay; and Egypt, which was one of the first, became the last and "basest of the kingdoms" (Ezek. xxix. 15), and has been successively in subjection to the Shemites and Japhethites, as have also the settlements of the other branches of the Hamites. (See CANAAN—DIVISION OF MANKIND.) Egypt is designated the "land of Ham" by the Psalmist. Ps. lxxviii. 51, cv. 23, 27, cvi. 22. It has been thought that the idol Hamun or Amnun, worshipped in Egypt and Libya, was Ham. Jupiter Ammon was the sun, to whom divine honours were paid at a very early period. See AMMON.

HAMAN, the son of Hammedatha the Amalekite. He rose to a high office at the court of the king of Persia, with whom he used all the influence which he possessed for obtaining the persecution of the Jews. In the providence of God, however, all his designs were defeated, and he himself suffered an ignominious death, being hanged on a gallows fifty feet high, which he himself had erected for Mordecai, the uncle of queen Esther. The instructive history of this wicked man is contained in the book of Esther.

HAMATH, a noted city of Syria, supposed to have been situated on the river Orontes. The entrance which led to the city was by a pass of Mount Hermon, which is called in Scripture the "entrance of Hamath," an expression which is used to denote the northern boundary of Canaan. The modern Hamah, which is situated at the northern extremity of the beautiful vale of Cœlo-Syria, is probably the same with the ancient Hamath. The kingdom of Hamath, indeed, seems to have corresponded, particularly in its southern and central parts, with this great plain and valley between Libanus and Antilibanus, stretching northward as far as Hamath, its capital. In Amos vi. 2, it is called Hamath the Great, and in 2 Chron. viii. 3, Hamath-zobah. It was originally occupied by a nomadic tribe of Canaanites; but afterwards rose into a separate kingdom, which, in the time of David, was ruled by Toi, an ally of that prince.

HAMMER. God's Word is like a hammer; with it he breaks our hearts. Jer. xxiii. 29. Babylon was the hammer of the whole earth; the Chaldean armies broke in pieces and subdued a multitude of nations. Jer. i. 23. The pins of the tent of the Bedouin Arab are generally of wood, and are driven into the ground by a mallet; which is probably the hammer referred to in Judg. iv. 21.

HAMMON, a town in the tribe of Asher. Josh. xix. 28. Also a town in the tribe of Naphtali. 1 Chron. vi. 76.

HAMMOTH-DOR, a Levitical city in the tribe of Naphtali, ceded to the family of Gershon. Josh. xxi. 32.

HAMONAH, a city where Ezekiel (xxxix. 16) foretold the burial of Gog and his people would be. We know not any town of this name in Palestine. Hamonah signifies multitude; and the prophet intended to show that the slaughter of Gog's people would be so great, that the place of their burial might be called multitude.

HAMON-GOG, a valley near the Sea of Gennesareth, called also the Valley of the Passengers, probably because it was the great road by which the merchants and traders from Syria and other Eastern countries went into Egypt. The Ishmaelite merchants to whom Joseph was sold were passing this way towards Egypt.

HANANEEL, the name of a tower at Jerusalem, mentioned in Zech. xiv. 10.

HANANI, mentioned in 1 Kings xvi. 7, as the father of Jehu. Nothing is known of this person. The same name belongs to a seer who is thus spoken of in 2 Chron. xvi. 7: "And at that time Hanani the seer came to Asa king of Judah, and said unto him, Because thou hast relied on the king of Syria, and not relied on the Lord thy God, therefore is the host of the king of Syria escaped out of thine hand." On hearing this, the king was enraged, and ordered the prophet to be seized and thrown into prison. This seer is sometimes supposed to have been identical with the father of Jehu, but there is not the slightest probability that he is the same person.

HANANIAH, one of the three Hebrew youths, who, when carried captive to Babylon, signalized themselves by refusing to worship the golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar. Hananiah received in Chaldea the name of Shadrach, and was selected to wait upon the king. The few, though remarkable events, which composed the history of this noble young man, are recorded in the book of Daniel. Another person bearing the name of Hananiah, was a false prophet of Gibeon, who, coming to Jerusalem in the fourth year of Zedekiah, king of Judah (A.M. 3409) foretold to Jeremiah and all the people that within two years all the vessels of the Lord's house that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, had carried to Babylon, would be restored. Jer. xxviii.

HAND. This word occurs very frequently in Sacred Scripture, and in different connections, which modifies its signification. Thus, to kiss one's hand, is an act of adoration and worship. "If I beheld the sun when it shined, and my mouth hath kissed my hand." Job xxxi. 26, 27. To lift up one's hand, is a way of taking an oath which has been in very general use. Striking hands was a ceremony introduced at an early period, to ratify a bargain or agreement. Thus we find Solomon alluding to it, Prov. vi. 1: "My son, if thou be surety for thy friend, if thou hast stricken thy hand with a stranger." And even long before the days of Solomon, Job (xvii. 3), in his solemn appeal to God, thus expresses himself: "Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee; who is he that will strike hands with me?" This form of swearing is also mentioned in the history of Jehu. 2 Kings x. 15. As instances of lifting up the right hand in making an oath, we may refer to Gen. xiv. 22, and Deut. xxxii. 40. Another mode of taking an oath at a very early period, was by putting the hand under the thigh. Thus, Gen. xxiv. 2, 3: "And Abraham said unto his eldest servant of his house, that ruled over all that he had, Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh: and I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites, among whom I dwell." A very solemn mode of taking an oath, in the East, is by joining hands, uttering at the same time a curse upon the false swearer. Sometimes when two persons make a contract, they bring the palms of their right hands into contact, and then raise them to their lips and forehead. At other times, and far more usually, they rub the forefingers of their right hands rapidly together, repeating the words "Right, right, or Together, together." To give one's hand, signifies to grant peace, to swear friendship, to promise entire security, to make alliance. 2 Kings x. 15. The Jews say they were obliged to give the hand to the Egyptians and Assyrians, that they might procure bread (2 Macc. xiii. 22); that is, to surrender to them, to submit. To stretch out one's hand, signifies to chastise, to exercise severity or justice. Ezek. xxv. 7. God delivered his people with a high hand, and stretched out arm, by performing many wonders, and inflicting many chastisements, on the Egyptians. To stretch out one's hand, sometimes denotes beseeching; thus, "I have spread out my hands," entreated, "all the day unto a rebellious people." Isa. lxxv. 2. To seat one on the right hand, is a token of high favour. Ps. xvi. 11, lxxvii. 10. The Son of God is often represented as sitting at the right hand of his heavenly Father: "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand" (Ps. cx. 1); thou hast done thy work upon earth, now take possession of that sovereign kingdom and glory which by right belongeth unto thee; do thou rule with authority and honour, as thou art Mediator. The accuser was commonly at the right hand of the accused: "Let Satan stand at his right hand." Ps. cix. 6. And in Zech. iii. 1, Satan was at the right hand of the high priest Joshua, to accuse him. Often, in a contrary sense, to be at one's right hand signifies to defend, to protect, to support him: "I have set the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved." Ps. xvi. 8. Our Saviour, in Matt. vi. 3, to show with what privacy we should do good works, says that our left hand should not know what our right hand does. Above all things, we should avoid vanity and ostentation in all the good we undertake to do, and should not think that thereby we merit anything. Clapping the hands was used in the East as an expression of joy. In this way, the enemies of Jerusalem expressed their malignant satisfaction at its fall: "All that pass by clap their hands at thee; they hiss and wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, Is this the city that men call, The perfection of beauty, The joy of the whole earth?" Lam. ii. 15. And Job, after describing the destruction of a wicked man, says, "Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place." When sentence of death was pronounced upon a criminal, the witnesses put their hands upon his head and said, "Thy blood be upon thine own head." To this custom the Jews alluded, when they cried, "His blood be on us, and on our children." When a malefactor was led to execution, his hands were secured with cords, and his feet with fetters. Hence David's lamentation over the dust of Abner: "Thy hands were not bound, nor thy feet put in fetters." The hands, as well as the head and the feet, of state criminals were often cut off, and fixed on the most public places, as a warning to others. Thus: "And David commanded his young men, and they slew them, and cut off their hands and their feet, and hanged them up over the pool in Hebron. But they took the head of Ish-bosheth, and buried it in the sepulchre of Abner in Hebron." 2 Sam. iv. 12.

Laying on hands, or imposition of hands, is understood in different ways both in the Old and New Testaments. It is often taken for ordination and consecration of priests and ministers, as well among the Jews as Christians. Numb. viii. 10; Acts vi. 6, xiii. 3; 1 Tim. iv. 14. Thus, when Moses constituted Joshua his successor, God appointed him to lay his hands upon him. Numb. xxvii. 18. Jacob laid his hands on Ephraim and Manasseh, when he gave them his last blessing. Gen. xlviii. 14. The high priest stretched out his hands to the people, as often as he recited the solemn form of blessing, Lev. ix. 22. The Israelites who presented sin-offerings at the tabernacle, confessed their sins while they laid their hands upon them. Lev. i. 4. This testified that the person acknowledged himself worthy of death, that he laid his sins upon the sacrifice, that he trusted in Christ for the expiation of his sins, and that he devoted himself to God. Our Saviour laid his hands upon the children that were presented to him, and blessed them. Mark x. 16. And the Holy Ghost was conferred on those who were baptized, by the laying on of the hands of the apostles. Acts viii. 17, xix. 6.

HANDBREADTH, a measure of about four inches. Our days are as a handbreadth; they are very short, and their shortness ought to be ever before us. Ps. xxxix. 5.

HANDMAID, a maid servant, a female slave or domestic, who, according to the usages of Eastern nations in early times, might be disposed of as her mistress chose. This accounts for Sarah giving Hagar to Abraham as his inferior or secondary wife. The prompt and ready obedience which the Eastern slaves render to the slightest command of their master or mistress is beautifully alluded to in Ps. cxxiii. 2: "Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that he have mercy upon us."

HANDMILL. See MILL.

HANDWRITING. The ceremonial law is called a handwriting against us; its rites witnessed our guilt and desert of death, and it was a means of shutting out the Gentiles from the Church of God. Col. ii. 14.

HANES, a city of Egypt, mentioned in Isa. xxx. 4, and supposed to be the same as Tahapanes, mentioned in Jer. ii. 16.

HANGING, a mode of inflicting capital punishment, which seems to have been practised in the earliest times, as appears from the notice of it which occurs in the history of Joseph, when the unfortunate end of the chief baker is recorded in such a manner as to convey the impression that it was a customary mode of executing criminals in Egypt. The Hebrew custom, however, was no more than hanging up their bodies after they were dead, and exposing them for some time to open shame. For this purpose a piece of timber was fixed in the ground, out of which came a beam, to which the hands of the criminal were tied, so that his body hung in the posture of a person on the cross. When the sun set, the body was taken down; for the law says, "He that is hanged on a tree is accursed of God;" not that the criminal was accursed because he was hanged, but he was hanged because he was accursed.

HANGINGS. The curtain before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation is termed a hanging. Exod. xxvi. 36. This inner covering was of fine linen, splendidly embroidered with figures of cherubim and fancy work, in scarlet, purple, and light blue. It is described in the same terms as the veil of the holy of holies.

HANNAH, wife of Elkanah, and the excellent mother of Samuel. She dwelt at Ramath, or Ramathaim, in Ephraim. 1 Sam. i. 2.

HANNATHON, a town in the tribe of Zebulun. Josh. xix. 14.

HANUN, son of Nabash, king of the Ammonites, is known for his grievous insult to David's ambassadors, sent to comfort him after his father's death. 2 Sam. x. 1-5; 1 Chron. xix. 1-5.

HAPHRAIM, a city belonging to the tribe of Issachar. Josh. xix. 19.

HAPHTOROTH. When Antiochus Epiphanes conquered the Jews about 167 B.C., he issued an edict prohibiting the Jews from the use of the Law in the synagogues, on pain of death. That they might not be wholly deprived of the Word of God, they selected, from other parts of the Bible, fifty-four portions, which were termed Haphtoroth. From this custom of the Jews, the primitive Christians adopted the practice of reading a lesson every Sabbath out of the Old and New Testaments. The Paraschioth, or sections of the Law, and the Haphtoroth, or sections of the Prophets, have been read together since the days of the Maccabees.

HAPPINESS, absolutely taken, denotes the durable possession of perfect good, without any mixture of evil; or the enjoyment of pure pleasure unalloyed with pain; or a state in which all our wishes are satisfied: in which senses happiness is only known by name on this earth. The word happy, when applied to any state or condition of human life, will admit of no positive definition, but is merely a relative term; that is, when we call a man happy, we mean that he is happier than some others with whom we compare him, than the generality of others, or than he himself was in some other situation.

True happiness consists in the exercise of the dispositions, and the enjoyment of the blessings, pointed out by our Lord in his sermon on the mount. Matt. v.-vii.; Rom. v. 1-10. In subordination to these, human happiness may be greatly promoted by the exercise of the social affections, the pursuit of some engaging end, the prudent regulation of the habits, and the enjoyment of health.

HARA, a city or district of Media, to which the Israelites of the Ten Tribes were transplanted by Tiglath-pileser. 1 Chron. v. 26.

HARADAH, a camp-station of Israel. Numb. xxxiii. 24. (See EXODUS.) From its vicinity to Egypt, the place of bustle, or hasty removal.

HARAN, the eldest son of Terah, and the brother of Abraham and Nahor. The children of Haran were Lot, Milcah, and Iscah. Haran seems to have died early, some time before his father Terah. The name Haran is also given to the city in Mesopotamia which Abraham first arrived at after setting out on his journey from Ur, and where Terah died and was buried. It is called Charran in the New Testament. It is by this latter name that the martyr Stephen speaks of it when, reviewing the history of the patriarch Abraham, he says, Acts vii. 4: "Then came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran: and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell." It was to this place that Jacob removed when he fled from the face of his brother Esau, of whom he was afraid. It is situated in the north-western part of Mesopotamia, on a river running into the Euphrates.

HARD. "A hard heart," denotes a mind void of holy affections; "a hard forehead," determined, insolent. "I have made thy forehead hard against their foreheads" (Ezek. iii. 8); the Israelites are hardened to insensibility, have lost all shame; but I will make you still harder, still bolder in reproving evil, than they are in committing it. Isa. i. 7.

HARE (Heb. arnabeth, Arab. arneb, Lev. xi. 6; Deut. xiv. 7.) This name is derived, as Bochart and others suppose, from areh, to crop, and nib, the produce of the ground; these animals being remarkable for devouring young plants and herbage. This animal resembles the rabbit, but is larger, and somewhat longer in proportion to its thickness. The hare in Syria, says Dr. Russell, is distinguished into two species, differing considerably in point of size. The larger is the Turkman hare, and chiefly haunts the plains; the other is the common hare of the desert: both are abundant. The difficulty as to this animal is, that Moses says the arnabeth chews the cud; but Aristotle takes notice of the same circumstance, and affirms that the structure of its stomach is similar to that of ruminating animals. Cowper, the poet, also tells us that his three hares "chewed the cud all day till evening." The animal here mentioned may, then, be a variety of the species.

HARETH, a forest of Judah, in which David concealed himself from the pursuit of Saul. 1 Sam. xxii. 5.

HARLOT, literally a common prostitute (Prov. xxix. 3); but the term most commonly occurs in Scripture metaphorically, to denote the unchaste conduct of the Israelites in mingling the worship of the true God with the impure and idolatrous rites of the heathen nations, in violation of the covenant which had been ratified between God and them. Isa. i. 21. In Josh. ii. 1, Rahab, who concealed the spies, is called by the opprobrious name of a harlot. Several writers have attempted to explain the Hebrew word differently, terming her a hostess. But besides that, the caravanseraï, or Eastern inns, had neither hosts nor hostesses, the word does not occur anywhere else, in a sense which the context will allow to be rendered "hostess;" and the Septuagint, as well as the apostles Paul and James, have given it the common interpretation.

HARNESS, the furniture of a horse, to render him fit for work or war (Jer. xlvi. 4); but it is more frequently taken for a set of defensive armour. 1 Kings xxii. 34. (See ARMOUR.) The harness of the Egyptian war chariots was composed of leather, and the hangings were richly decorated, being stained with a great variety of colours, and studded with gold and silver. See CHARIOTS OF WAR.

HAROD, a well or fountain, not far from Jezreel and Mount Gilboa, called, from the apprehensions and fears of those who were here tried by Gideon, "Palpitation of the heart," as a symptom of alarm and terror. Judg. vii. 1, 3.

HAROSHETH OF THE GENTILES, that is, of the heathen nations as opposed to the Hebrews; so called, perhaps, from the remains of the Canaanitish nations having resorted thither in great numbers, to assist Sisera, the commander of Jabin's armies, and to obtain his protection. It was situated in the tribe of Naphtali, near the west border of the lake Samechonitis, in the region which was afterwards called "Galilee of the Gentiles."

HARP, a stringed musical instrument. Among the Egyptians, harps were made of all sizes, from a few inches to six or seven feet in length, and of a great variety of forms. With the people of Israel the harp appears to have been a peculiar favourite. The first mention made of it in Scripture is Gen. iv. 21, when its invention is ascribed to Jubal. As there is no instrument that forms a finer accompaniment to the human voice, it was very extensively employed in the religious worship of the Jews, and is spoken of in the book of Revelation as similarly employed by the redeemed in heaven, when they shall stand with the Lamb on Mount Zion, and sing "a new song before the throne."

HARROW, an agricultural implement seldom used in Palestine, the grain being covered, when sown, by repassing the plough along the edge of the furrow; and in places where the soil is sandy, they first sow, and then plough the seed into the ground. The harrow was often nothing more than a large piece of wood, or a bundle of thick prickly bushes, dragged over the surface of the field, to make it plain, as appears from Isa. xxviii. 24, 25: "Doth the plowman plow all day to sow? doth he open and break the clods of his ground? When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and cast in the principal wheat and the appointed barley and the rye in their place?" See AGRICULTURE.

HART (ail, Deut. xii. 15, xiv. 5; Ps. xlii. 1; Isa. xxxv. 6), the stag or male deer. Dr. Shaw considers its name in Hebrew as a generic word, including all the species of the deer kind; whether they are distinguished by round horns, as the stag; or by flat ones, as the fallow deer; or by the smallness of the branches, as the roe. Dr. Good observes that the hind and roe, the hart and the antelope, were held, and still continue to be, in the highest estimation in all the Eastern countries, for the voluptuous beauty of their eyes, the delicate elegance of their form, and their graceful agility of action. The names of these animals were perpetually applied, therefore, to persons, whether male or female, who were supposed to be possessed of any of their respective qualities. In 2 Sam. i. 19, Saul is denominated "the roe of Israel;" and in the 18th verse of the ensuing chapter, we are told that "Asahel was as light of foot as a wild roe;" a phraseology perfectly synonymous with the epithet swift-footed, which Homer has so frequently bestowed upon his hero Achilles. Thus again: "Her princes are like harts which find no pasture; they are fled without strength before their pursuers." Lam. i. 6. "The Lord Jehovah is my strength; he will make my feet like hinds' feet; he will cause me to tread again on my own hills." Hab. iii. 19. See HIND.

HARVEST. The season of harvest was denominated, by the Rabbins, Ketsir, and included the latter half of Nisan, the whole of Zif, and the former half of Sivan; extending, according to our computation, from the commencement of April to the beginning of June. During the first two weeks of this period, the "latter rain" generally fell in torrents, and regulated, by its continuance, the approach of harvest. When the Land of Promise resembled Eden, and yielded its strength like the garden of the Lord, the beginning of this season was a time of intense interest and eager anticipation to the husbandman. He was now in the buoyant expectation of reaping the reward of his toils, and bringing home his sheaves rejoicing. The vintage, indeed, could only be viewed in the distance; but the grapes were already forming in the cluster. The fig-tree had yielded its blossoms; the olive was flourishing in the grove, and by the mountain side. The luxuriant pastures were not yet scorched with the drought of summer; the cattle were browsing amidst the profusion of nature. The choice wheat was appearing in the ear. The cultivated terraces on the heights of Judea, were loaded with the bounty of heaven; and the barley fields, especially in the plains of Jericho, were crowned with the mellow tinge of autumn.

Thereapers generally went forth to the barley harvest about the feast of the Passover, and to the wheat harvest about the feast of Pentecost; but according to the statements of modern travellers, the barley is sometimes longer in coming to maturity in the regions of the East. When Dr Richardson traversed the plains of Jordan in the month of May, the fields were loaded with waving crops of barley, ready for the sickle; and when the deputation, sent by the Church of Scotland to Palestine, to inquire into the condition of the blinded sons of Abraham, entered Judea, at the beginning of June, they "found the reapers busy in the Valley of Eshcol; and met many a camel carrying to the thrashing-floor the ripe barley."

The season of harvest was a period of mirth and jovialty. Hence Isaiah says, "They joy before thee, according to the joy in harvest." And when the same prophet lamented the desolations of the land, the bereavement of the joy in harvest was so overpowering to him, that he burst into tears—"Therefore I will bewail with the weeping of Jazer the vine of Sibmah: I will water thee with my tears, O Heshbon, and Elealeh; for the shouting for thy summer fruits and for thy harvest is fallen." Isa. xvi. 9.

HASSIDEANS. See ASSIDEANS.

HASTE, HASTEN. To hasten righteousness, is to execute judgment and justice with all proper speed. Isa. xvi. 5. To hasten to the coming of the day of God, is earnestly to long after and prepare for the last judgment. 2 Pet. iii. 12.

HATE. To hate is not always to be understood rigorously, but frequently signifies merely a less degree of love. "If a man have two wives, one beloved and another hated" (Deut. xxi. 15); that is, less beloved. Our Saviour says that he who would follow him, must hate father and mother; that is, he must love them less than Christ, less than his own salvation, and not prefer them to God. "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated;" that is, have deprived of the privileges of his primogeniture, through his own profaneness, and visited him with severe judgment on account of his sins.

HATRED is the aversion of the will to any object considered by us as evil, or to any person or thing we suppose can do us harm. (See ANTIPATHY.) Hatred is ascribed to God, but it is not to be considered as a passion in him, as in man; nor can he hate any of the creatures he has made, as his creatures. Yet he is said to hate the wicked (Ps. v. 5), and indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, will be upon every soul of man that does evil. Rom. ii. 9. See WRATH OF GOD.

HATS. This word occurs only once in the Sacred Writings, viz., in Dan. iii. 21, where it is rendered in the margin "turbans," but which is the right translation of the Chaldee word it is difficult to decide. Perhaps the Hebrews began to wear turbans in imitation of their conquerors. See HEAD-DRESS.

HAURAN, a town and district of country situated on the north-east of Canaan, anciently belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh, and identical, in all probability, with the Ituræa of Luke iii. 1. It is mentioned by Ezekiel, (xlvii. 16, 18), in connection with the eastern boundary of Canaan. It is the later Auranitis. Dr Wilson tells us that Eshluneskin is the present capital of the Hauran, and that the whole province is full of ruined villages, built almost entirely of hewn stone of the time of the Romans.

HAVEN. The Hebrew word which is rendered "haven" in Gen. xlix. 13, is rendered in other passages either "sea-shore" or "sea-coast," and properly implies a maritime region rather than a haven or port. There is a place mentioned in Acts xxvii. 8, by the name of Fair Havens, which is a small bay in Candia, still called by the inhabitants Calos Limenas, about two leagues to the east of Matala.

HAVILAH. There is a country called Havilah mentioned in Gen. ii. 11, so named from its first and most distinguished occupant. The territory of Havilah, the son of Cush, the son of Ham, lay in Arabia, near the Persian Gulf. The other person of this name (Gen. x. 29), was the son of Joktan, of the race of Shem. His possessions fell to him to the east of Persia, in the country watered by the Indus, in or near the region afterwards termed Cabul. He was brother to Ophir, whose land is celebrated for gold; and the English editor of Calmet, with other eminent geographers, is of opinion that the ships of Solomon, in sailing to Ophir, ascended the Indus. The two brothers may be supposed to have settled near each other. On the east, accordingly, the land of Eden seems to have extended to the borders of India, and in accordance with this, the Targum of Jonathan renders Gen. ii. 11: "The name of the first river is Phiseu, which runs along the whole land of India, where there is gold, and the gold of that land is excellent."

HAVOTH-JAIR. The Hebrew or Arabic Haroth or Avoth signifies cabins or huts, such as belong to the Arabians, and are placed in a circle; such a collection of them forming a hamlet or village. The district mentioned in Numb. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14, was in the Batanæa, beyond Jordan, in the land of Gilead, and belonged to the half-tribe of Manasseh. It included about sixty cities, which Jair took from the Amorites.

HAWK (nets, from the root netsa, to fly, because of the rapidity and length of flight for which this bird is remarkable. Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15; Job xxxix. 26.) Naz is used generically by the Arabian writers to signify both falcon and hawk; and the term is given in both these senses by Meninski. There can be little doubt that such is the real meaning of the Hebrew word, and that it imports various species of the falcon family, but more especially the sparrowhawk. As this is a bird of prey, cruel in its temper, and gross in its manners, it was forbidden as food, and all others of its kind, in the Mosaic ritual. The Greeks consecrated the hawk to Apollo; and among the Egyptians no animal was held in so high veneration as the ibis and the hawk. Most of the species of hawk, we are told, are birds of passage. The hawk, therefore, is produced, in Job xxxix. 26, as a specimen of that astonishing instinct which teaches birds of passage to know their times and seasons, when to migrate out of one country into another, for the benefit of food, or a warmer climate, or both. The word rendered in our version, Lev. xi. 16, "night-hawk," was in all probability a species of owl. The hawk was held in so great veneration by the Egyptians, that to kill one of these birds was a capital crime.

HAY. See GRASS.

HAZAEI, an officer of Benhadad, King of Syria, and deputed by him to inquire from Elisha, the prophet, how his sickness was to terminate. The interview which ensued between the courtier and the prophet of the Lord is very remarkable. After having sent through Hazael a message for Benhadad, we are informed, 2 Kings viii. 12, that Elisha wept, "and Hazael said, Why weepeth my lord? And he answered, Because I know the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel: their strongholds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child." Hazael was enraged at the prophet for predicting such things concerning him, and he said, "What! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" Little did Hazael know his own heart, and how readily men are often found to commit those very crimes from which at one time they would have shrunk with abhorrence, and the very thought of which was almost intolerable. And Elisha answered, "The Lord hath showed me that thou shalt be king over Syria." This awful prediction was soon fulfilled. Hazael put Benhadad to death; and through his popularity with the army he readily obtained the now vacant throne. On succeeding to the government of Syria he fulfilled to the uttermost the predictions concerning him of the Israelitish prophet. He reigned upwards of forty years.

HAZEL. The Hebrew luz, which our translators render hazel, occurs only in Gen. xxx. 37-39, where we are told of Jacob: "And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the hazel and chesnut tree; and pilled white strakes in them, and made the white appear which was in the rods. And he set the rods which he had pilled before the flocks in the gutters in the watering troughs when the flocks came to drink, that they should conceive when they came to drink. And the flocks conceived before the rods, and brought forth cattle ringstraked, speckled, and spotted." The plant alluded to is probably the Corylus, a genus of the class Monœcia, order Polyandria, and the species Corylus avellina or hazel-nut tree. This is one of the plants where the males and females, in the Linnæan language, dwell in separate houses.

HAZERIM, HAZEROTH, HAZOR, AZEROTHAIM, are all names which signify villages or hamlets, and are often put before the names of places. There is a town called Hazor in Arabia Petraea, in all probability the same as Hazerim, the ancient habitation of the Hivites, before they were driven away by the Caphtorim (Deut. ii. 23), who settled in Palestine. It seems also to be the Hazeroth where the Hebrews encamped. Numb. xi. 35, xii. 16, xxxiii. 17.

HAZEON-TAMAR, a town (Gen. xiv. 7) called En-gedi in Josh. xv. 62; 1 Sam. xxiv. 1; 2 Chron. xx. 2; Cant. i. 14; Ezek. xlvii. 10.

HEAD. It was very common among the Orientals to swear by the head. This practice prevailed also among the Greeks and Romans. The most sacred oath among the Persians is by the head of the king. In the time of our Lord, the custom of swearing by the head appears to have been common among the Jews; for, said he to the multitudes, "Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black." The usual token of a man of quality and power in Persia, is to have a spear stuck up at his bolster head—a custom which has continued since the days of Saul. Thus, 1 Sam. xxvi. 7: "So David and Abishai came to the people by night: and, behold, Saul lay sleeping within the trench, and his spear stuck in the ground at his bolster: but Abner and the people lay round about him." Bowing the head is, in the East, as among us, a token of respect; but there the head is bowed down to the ground in approaching a superior. When receiving a letter from a prince, or a person of high rank, the precious document is kissed and applied to the forehead. Nay, when great respect is entertained, the letter is fastened upon the head, or sometimes upon the shoulder. To this custom there is an allusion in Job xxxi. 35, 36: "O that one would hear me! behold, my desire is, that the Almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book. Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me." As a mark of contempt, wagging the head is frequent in Eastern countries. Thus, Lam. ii. 15: "All that pass by clap their hands at thee; they hiss and wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, Is this the city that men call The perfection of beauty, The joy of the whole earth?"—"To make their land desolate, and a perpetual hissing; every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished, and wag his head." Jer. xviii. 16. To express distress, the Orientals often put dust or ashes upon their head. Hence, Josh. vii. 6: "And Joshua rent his clothes, and fell to the earth upon his face before the ark of the Lord until the eventide, he and the elders of Israel, and put dust upon their heads." The mourner sometimes laid his hands upon his head. Accordingly, the prophet says (Jer. ii. 37): "Yea, thou shalt go forth from him, and thine hands upon thine head: for the Lord hath rejected thy confidences, and thou shalt not prosper in them." In great distress they occasionally covered the head. Thus, when Haman was ordered to honour Mordecai, he is said to have "hastened to his house mourning, and having his head covered." And in the time of a severe famine, we are told of the Jews: "They were ashamed and confounded, and covered their heads." Jer. xiv. 3.

The word head has several significations besides its natural one. It is taken for one that hath rule and pre-eminence over others. Thus God is the head of Christ; as Mediator, from him he derives all his dignity and authority. Christ is the only spiritual head of the Church, both in respect of eminence and influence; he communicates life, motion, and strength to every believer. Also, the husband is the head of his wife, because by God's ordinance he is to rule over her (Gen. iii. 16); also in regard to pre-eminence of sex (1 Pet. iii. 7), and excellency of knowledge. 1 Cor. xiv. 35. The apostle mentions this subordination of persons in 1 Cor. xi. 3: "But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God." "The stone which the builders rejeeted was made the head of the corner." Ps. cxviii. 22. It was the first in the angle, whether it were disposed at the top of that angle, to adorn and crown it, or at the bottom, to support it. This, in the New Testament, is applied to Christ, who is the strength and beauty of the Church, to unite the several parts of it, namely, both Jews and Gentiles, together. See HAND.

HEAD-BANDS. These were fillets bound round the head, for the purpose of fastening the several parts of the head-dress. They were of the richest texture, and sparkled with rubies and pearls, and precious stones of different kinds. This is mentioned by Isaiah (iii. 20) in the minute description which he gives of the different parts of an Eastern lady's dress.

HEAD-DRESS. The ancient Jews very seldom wore any covering upon their head, except when they were in mourning, or worshipping in the temple or in the synagogue. Folds of lawn or other light stuffs, wound loosely round the temples, were the only head-coverings in use in the times of the patriarchs. The number and variety of the folds in the modern turban indicate the rank of the wearer. During the Babylonish captivity, the Jews began to wear turbans, after the example of their conquerors. Accordingly, the three Jewish youths were cast into the fiery furnace with their hats, or turbans, as it is in the margin. In the time of the Maccabees, Antiochus Epiphanes introduced the habits and fashions of the Greeks among the Jews, and among other changes, he made them wear hats. The Jews were accustomed in ancient times to bind a narrow fillet about their temples. The diadem was also a part of the Jewish head-dress. Hence Isa. xxviii. 5: "In that day shall the Lord of hosts be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of his people." The diadems of kings in ancient times were nothing more than turbans of fine linen, adorned in front with a row of gold or precious stones. (See HEAD-BANDS.) Fragrant ointments were often poured upon the head. Thus we find Mary pouring ointment upon the head of Christ, as he sat at meat in the house of Simon. To this custom the Psalmist alludes: "Thou anointest my head with oil." Ps. xxiii. 5. And also Ps. xlv. 7: "Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." The Orientals attached a great importance to a good head of hair, and held baldness in contempt. (See BALDNESS.) In dressing their heads the Eastern ladies plait and perfume their hair, and fix about their head a triangular piece of linen, adorned with various figures in needlework. Over this, among ladies of high rank, is worn a sarmah, which consists of thin flexible plates of gold or silver, of a triangular shape, carefully cut through, and engraved in imitation of lace. This, perhaps, is what the prophet refers to in Isa. iii. 18, when he speaks of "round tires like the moon." A handkerchief of crape, gauze, silk, or fine linen, is bound close over the sarmah, and hangs carelessly upon the favourite lock of hair. The Syrian ladies wear upon their heads a hollow silver horn, which rises obliquely from their forehead. See HORN.

HEADSHIP OF CHRIST. This important doctrine is very plainly revealed in the Word of God. There is a double headship of which the Bible speaks—a headship over all things to the Church, and a headship over the Church itself. Both are exercised by the Lord Jesus Christ. It is expressly stated by the Apostle Paul, when speaking of Christ's exaltation, "And gave him to be head over all things to the Church." And Jesus himself declared, before he left the world: "All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth." This mediatorial headship over all things differs from the universal, essential, absolute sovereignty which Christ possesses as God. And in proof of this we may simply refer to the fact, that the power which belongs to Christ as mediator is said to be given him; whereas his essential authority is original, inherent, undervived. The ultimate object of both is no doubt the same—the glory of God. But the immediate object of Christ's headship as mediator, is the salvation of his Church. And besides, it is important to remark further, that Christ is directly said to be "the head of the Church." Thus Col. i. 18: "He is the head of the body, the Church." "For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church: and he is the Saviour of the body." Eph. v. 23. This headship, like that which we have just been noticing, is a gift from the Father; but it rests, further, on the right of conquest. He hath purchased the Church with his own blood, and he hath purchased the right to rule over it. Hence it follows that to Christ belongs supreme power in the Church. "Two things," as has been well remarked, "are implied in this supremacy of Christ in his Church, and are necessary to the display and exercise of his headship of it, viz., that he prescribes its laws and institutions—that he appoints those by whom these laws and institutions are to be administered. Laws flow from the supreme authority in any body or state. To give laws is the most striking proof of possessing the supreme authority—the authority to which all in that particular state or body must bow. Were there any one who could give laws to the Church beside Christ—were there any one entitled to alter or annul Christ's laws, or to demand the Church's submission to laws of his own—then he, and not Christ, would be the Church's head. But inasmuch as Christ is the head, he alone must reign within Zion's walls; and all things in the Church—its order, institutions, and government—must be regulated by his will, and by his will alone. Human authority may not interfere. The Church must listen to her Lord alone, receive the law at his lips, and be free to obey it. Human power may not meddle with the homage which the Church owes to her exalted King. No human law can release her from her obligation to consider only her Lord's commands, and obey them. And if any power whatever cross her path, obstruct her faithfulness to Christ, command her to break his law, or to regulate her proceedings by anything else than a regard to his mind, she must not obey—she must refuse compliance, at whatever hazard. It was thus that Daniel was tried; and he disobeyed. It was thus that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were tried; and they disobeyed. It was by the highest court in Judea that Peter and John were interdicted from preaching Christ's Gospel, just as the ministers of the Church of Scotland were interdicted by the Court of Session from preaching the same Gospel in various parishes of this land. Peter and John broke the former interdict with the declared approbation of their Lord. Those who broke the latter interdict also received, we doubt not, their Lord's approbation.

"How are Christ's laws to be known, since he is not on earth personally to issue his mandates, or to be consulted as to the ordering of his body, the Church? There is no difficulty here. All are agreed that the Bible is Christ's statute-book. There we are to learn his will in regard to all things pertaining to his kingdom.

"It is also implied in Christ's supremacy, that he appoints those by whom his laws and institutions are to be administered. They must have their commission from him, else would he cease to be head of the Church. And the question arises, To whom has he intrusted the administration of the Church's affairs? Few Presbyterians are ignorant, or ever supposed that there was any ground for questioning the statement of the Confession, that 'the Lord Jesus, as king and head of his Church, hath therein appointed a government in the hand of Church officers, distinct from the civil magistrate.' But this has been often denied, and is denied by many still; and power over the Church, not in temporal things merely, but in the things of Christ, has been, and is still, claimed for the civil magistrate. This is Erastianism—a heresy against which the Confession carefully guards, against which our fathers struggled, and in resisting which many of them shed their blood, but which is as tenacious of life as old Adam, and which statesmen have of late applauded and defended, and civil courts abundantly practised. We may, therefore, glance at the proof of the Confession's statement, that 'the Lord Jesus has appointed a government in the hand of Church officers, distinct from the civil magistrate.' It was remarked already, that the difference between Christ's headship of the Church and his sovereignty as God, affords an absolute certainty that there must be authorities for the administration of this special kingdom different from civil magistrates and judges, unless Christ has expressly invested them with this office. Has he done so? It cannot be even pretended, on the ground of any law of his. Where is the statute of Christ which makes civil magistrates Church officers? It cannot be found in all his Word. And there being no such declaration of the mind of Christ, the consideration just adverted to excludes for ever the civil magistrate, as such, from any authority in Christ's house. But he is further excluded by the express appointment of distinct Church officers for the rule and administration of the Church. Not only has Christ not given this work to magistrates, but he has positively given it to others. In Matt. xvi. 18, 19, and xviii. 15-18, we find Christ committing the 'keys' of his kingdom or Church to the apostles. These keys for opening and shutting, or power to bind and loose, do not signify mere teaching, but government and discipline; for the ease to which the latter passage refers is one of Church censure. And though our Lord spoke to the apostles, it is obvious that the power communicated was to belong to the Church by its ministers in every age; because the matter is of permanent and universal application; because he does not say, 'Tell it to the apostles,' but 'Tell it to the Church'—a word belonging to every land and age; and because he immediately subjoins a promise of the most enduring kind, as specially applicable to the duty he had been prescribing: 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' And, accordingly, the possession of this power by the ordinary and standing office-bearers of the Church is shown in many passages in which we get glimpses of the arrangements of the Church in the apostles' days, and in which duties are prescribed for all times. 'Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken to you the word of God'—'Know them that labour among you, and are over you in the Lord.' These passages identify the rulers of the Church with its ordinary teachers and pastors. They intimate that a power of ruling is possessed by those who teach and labour in spiritual things, and to these they restrict that power. It is superfluous to quote other passages running almost in the same terms. But we have the exercise of this power of discipline and government commanded and performed. 'Put away from among yourselves that wicked person,' said Paul respecting the scandalous Corinthian. And in reference to the act of authority by which this offender was cut off from the visible Church, he says in his next epistle to them, 'Sufficient to such a man is this punishment which was inflicted of many.' So again, when we find the rule laid down, 'A man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject'—that is, repulse from the communion of the faithful—we have the rule carried into operation in the case of Hymeneus and Alexander, 'whom,' says Paul, 'I have delivered unto Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme.' And we find the angel of the Church of Thyatira reproved, because he did not put forth this power in a similar case: 'I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel to teach and to seduce my servants to eat things sacrificed unto idols.'

"Though these are but samples of a multifarious proof (see 'Gillespie's Aaron's Rod Blossoming,' book ii. ch. 9), yet are they sufficient to establish irrefragably the doctrine of the Confession, that 'the Lord Jesus, as king and head of his Church, hath therein appointed a government in the hands of Church officers, distinct from the civil magistrate;' and that the civil magistrate, as such, is excluded from all interference with the proper affairs of Christ's kingdom, not only by the nature of that kingdom, but by the express appointment, by the Church's Head, of other office-bearers for that end—office-bearers invested with a different commission—possessed of a different power—the power of the keys, not of the sword; not controlling by holding in their hands, like the civil magistrate, the disposal of men's lives and properties, but by appeals to the conscience alone; ruling not by laws of human device, but by the immutable laws which are laid down in the Bible, the statute-book of their heavenly King.

"From the headship thus belonging to Christ, it necessarily results—1. That all in the Church must obey Christ, whether office-bearers or private members. In regard to the matter which has been so much agitated of late years—the appointment and settlement of ministers—there are duties enjoined on the private members of the Church. In these they are bound to obedience to Christ; they must 'try,' and 'receive,' or refuse to receive, according to their conscientious application of His directions to this matter. And the duties in regard to the ordination of ministers, and formation of the pastoral bond, which are laid on the office-bearers of the Church, they, too, must fulfil.

"2. All the members of the Church are free, and must be left free, and cannot surrender their freedom to obey Christ their Head. Such freedom is due to them as the servants of Christ, whom, in the things of his own service, he hath made free from all—free from the doctrines and commandments of men. It is due to Christ, who hath given them his law and required their obedience by all the authority of his headship as king in Zion. To attempt to hinder their obeying the will of Christ, from whatever quarter the attempt may come, is an offence against the liberty of Christ's freedmen, and an act of direct rebellion against Christ himself. If Church courts, as often of old, interfere with the expression of a people's mind in regard to that judgment of any one proposed for their minister which Christ himself commands them to form, and, in opposition to that judgment, thrust a man upon them, they will be guilty of the same offence against the Christian people, and the same rebellion against Christ. And if attempt be made to coerce Church courts in regard to their duties in the ordination and admission of ministers, or any other duties, as these are laid down by Christ, the same rebellion is perpetrated against him. It matters not whether this should be done, as in the days of the Charleses, in the name of 'the prerogative of the king,' or in the name of 'the law of the land.' Whatever the name, and however done, by courts or by kings, the act does not change its character. It is an assault on the lordly rule and prerogative of the Lord Jesus Christ; for it is an overthrowing of the government and order which he has appointed in his own house. It is a sin against him who has a rod of iron wherewith to dash in pieces his enemies like a potter's vessel, and who subjoins to this declaration the admonition: 'Be wise now, therefore, O ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth;' as if kings and judges were in special danger of trenching on his rights, and provoking his wrath.

"The freedom of which neither office-bearers nor private members of the Church may be deprived by any, they may not themselves surrender or bargain away. They are not at liberty to part with that which Christ has secured to them, and in the possession and exercise of which they are commanded to 'stand fast.' To do so were to sin. And if they should, in any form, consent to give or bargain away this freedom, there is no one that may insist on retaining the gift, or on the fulfilment of the bargain; for no one may insist that another shall sin. If any portion of Christ's Church should find itself under compact to yield any part of its freedom under his law, it ought to break the compact—not keep it. Its sin was the entering into such a compact; and to keep the compact is just to repeat the sin.

"3. The office-bearers and members of the Church are not at liberty to take directions respecting the administration of the Church's affairs from any power or quarter whatever, except from Christ. If any authority issue a commandment counter to Christ's, the answer of Christians must ever be, 'Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye.' But should the case be considerably different—should there be issued a command affecting the things of Christ, and applying immediately to the government of his Church, yet of such a character that it could not at once be shown to be directly counter to a statute of Christ—even in such a case, since there is no power on earth, beyond the Church itself, which has a right to issue such a command, the Church is not at liberty to obey simply because such a command has been laid on it. It must judge for itself by the light of Christ's instructions, and be free to determine, according to its own conscientious interpretation of the mind of Christ, how it is to act. To deny it this liberty, much more to attempt to coerce it against its own solemn convictions of what Christ's mind is, is to encroach on his prerogative."

Such is a clear and luminous view of the great principles involved in the Headship of the Lord Jesus Christ; a doctrine which it is of the utmost importance that all professing Christians should fully understand.

HEALTH. This word occurs in Ps. xlii. 11: "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God." The word literally denotes "the salvation of the face," and the same phrase still occurs in the language of the East.

HEAP. It was a custom in early times that heaps of stones were raised as a memorial of important events. Such heaps were also piled up by the Hebrews, in some cases, to point out the burying-place of some remarkable person. Thus over the grave of Achan. Josh. vii. 26. The burying-place of Absalom also was distinguished by a similar erection, as a monument of his disgrace to future ages. 2 Sam. xviii. 17.

HEAR, or HEARING. It literally denotes the exercise of that bodily sense of which the ear is the organ; to receive information by the ear—(2 Sam. xviii. 12); and as hearing is a sense by which instruction is conveyed to the mind, and the mind excited to attention and obedience, so the ideas of attention and obedience are grafted on the expression or sense of hearing. The caution to take heed how we hear, or what we hear, includes application, reception, and practice.

HEARING THE WORD OF GOD, is an ordinance of divine appointment. Rom. x. 17; Prov. viii. 4; Mark iv. 24. Public reading of the Scriptures was a part of synagogue worship (Acts xiii. 15, xv. 21), and was the practice of the Christians in primitive times. Under the former dispensation there was a public hearing of the law at stated seasons. Deut. xxxi. 10–13; Neh. viii. 1–3. It seems, therefore, that it is a duty incumbent on us to hear; and, if sensible of our ignorance, we shall also consider it our privilege. As to the manner of hearing, it should be constantly (Prov. viii. 34; James i. 23–25); attentively (Luke xxi. 38; Acts x. 33; Luke iv. 20, 22); with reverence (Ps. lxxxix. 7); with faith (Heb. iv. 2); with an endeavour to retain what we hear (Heb. ii. 1; Ps. cxix. 11); with an humble, docile disposition (Luke x. 39); with prayer (Luke xviii. 1–8).

The advantages of hearing are information (2 Tim. iii. 16), conviction (1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25; Acts ii.), Conversion (Ps. xix. 7; Acts iv. 4), Confirmation (Acts xiv. 22), Consolation (Phil. i. 25; Isa. xl. 1, 2, xxxv. 3, 4.)

HEART. The Hebrews used this word for the soul, comprehending all its feelings and faculties. Hence are derived many modes of expression. "An honest and good heart" (Luke viii. 15), is a heart studious of holiness, being prepared by the Spirit of God to receive the Word with due affections, dispositions, and resolutions. We read of an evil heart, a broken heart, a clean heart, a liberal heart. To "turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers" (Mal. iv. 6), signifies to cause them to be perfectly reconciled, on the principles of true piety. To want heart, sometimes denotes to want wisdom and resolution: "Ephraim is like a silly dove, without heart." Hosea vii. 11. "O fools, and slow of heart" (Luke xxiv. 25); that is, ignorant, and reluctant to admit unwelcome truth. "This people's heart is waxed gross, lest they should understand with their heart" (Matt. xiii. 15); their heart is through sin become incapable of understanding spiritual things—they resist the light, and are proof against all impressions of truth. "The prophets prophesy out of their own heart" (Ezek. xiii. 2); that is, according to their own imagination, without any warrant from God. To walk in the ways of one's heart, is to prefer pleasures to God. Eccles. xi. 9.

The heart of man is naturally depraved and inclined to evil. Jer. xvii. 9. A divine power is requisite for its renovation. Deut. xxx. 6; Jer. xxxi.

33, xxxii. 38-40; Ezek. xviii. 31; John iii. 1-10. When thus renewed, the effects will be seen in the temper, conversation, and conduct at large.

We must distinguish, however, between that hardness of heart which even a good man complains of, and that of a judicial nature. (1.) Judicial hardness is very seldom perceived, and never lamented; a broken and contrite heart is the last thing such desire; but it is otherwise with believers, for the hardness they feel is always a matter of grief to them. Rom. vii. 24. (2.) Judicial hardness is perpetual; or, if ever there be any remorse or relenting, it is only at such times when the sinner is under some outward afflictions, or filled with the dread of the wrath of God (Exod. ix. 27); but as this wears off, or abates, his stupidity returns as much as or more than ever; but true believers, when no adverse dispensations trouble them, are often distressed because their hearts are no more affected in holy duties, or inflamed with love to God. Rom. vii. 15. (3.) Judicial hardness is attended with a total neglect of duties, especially those that are secret; but that hardness of heart which a believer complains of, though it occasions his going uncomfortably in duty, yet does not keep him from it. Job xxiii. 2, 3. (4.) When a person is judicially hardened, he makes use of indirect and unwarrantable methods to maintain that false peace which he thinks himself happy in the enjoyment of; but a believer when complaining of the hardness of his heart, cannot be satisfied with anything short of Christ. Ps. ci. 2. (5.) Judicial hardness generally opposes the interest of truth and godliness; but a good man considers this as a cause nearest his heart, and although he has often to lament his lukewarmness, yet he constantly desires to promote it. Ps. lxxii. 19. See BLINDNESS—HARDNESS OF HEART.

Keeping the heart is a duty enjoined in the Sacred Scriptures. It consists, says Mr. Flavel, in the diligent and constant use and improvement of all holy means and duties to preserve the soul from sin, and maintain communion with God; and this, he properly observes, supposes a previous work of sanctification, which hath set the heart right by giving it a new bent and inclination. (1.) It includes frequent observation of the frame of the heart. Ps. lxxvii. 6. (2.) Deep humiliation for heart evils and disorders. 2 Chron. xxxii. 26. (3.) Earnest supplication for heart purifying and rectifying grace. Ps. xix. 12. (4.) A constant holy jealousy over our hearts. Prov. iv. 23. (5.) It includes the realizing of God's presence with us, and setting him before us. Ps. xvi. 8; Gen. xvii. 1.

This is—(1.) The hardest work; heart work is hard work indeed. (2.) Constant work. Exod. xvii. 12. (3.) The most important work. Prov. xxiii. 26.

This is a duty which should be attended to, if we consider it in connection with—(1.) The honour of God. Isa. lxvi. 3. (2.) The sincerity of our profession. 2 Kings x. 31; Ezek. xxxiii. 31, 32. (3.) The beauty of our conversation. Prov. xii. 26; Ps. xlv. 1. (4.) The comfort of our souls. 2 Cor. xiii. 5. (5.) The improvement of our graces. Ps. lxxiii. 5, 6. (6.) The stability of our souls in the hour of temptation. 1 Cor. xvi. 13.

The seasons in which we should more particularly keep our hearts are—(1.) The time of prosperity. Deut. vi. 10-12. (2.) Under afflictions. Heb. xii. 5, 6. (3.) The time of Zion's troubles. Ps. xlv. 1-4. (4.) In the time of great and threatening dangers. Isa. xxvi. 20, 21. (5.) Under great wants. Phil. iv. 6, 7. (6.) In the time of duty. Lev. x. 3. (7.) Under injuries received. Rom. xii. 17, &c. (8.) In the critical hour of temptation. Matt. xxvi. 41. (9.) Under dark and doubting seasons. Heb. xii. 5, 6; Isa. l. 10. (10.) In time of opposition and suffering. 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13. (11.) The time of sickness and death. Jer. xlix. 11.

The means to be made use of to keep our hearts are—(1.) Watchfulness. Mark xiii. 37. (2.) Self-examination. 2 Cor. xiii. 5. (3.) Prayer. Luke xviii. 1. (4.) Reading God's Word. John v. 39. (5.) Dependence on divine grace. Ps. lxxxvi. 11.

HEARTH. See BAKE—BREAD.

HEATH, Jer. xvii. 6. Taylor and Parkhurst render it "a blasted tree stripped of its foliage." If it be a particular tree, the tamarisk is as likely as any. Celsius thinks it to be the juniper; but from the mention of it as growing in a salt land, in parched places, the author of "Scripture Illustrated" is disposed to seek it among the lichens, a species of plants which are the last production of vegetation under the frozen zone, and under the glowing heat of equatorial deserts; so that it seems best qualified to endure parched places and a salt land. Hasselquist mentions several kinds seen by him in Egypt, Arabia, and Syria. The Septuagint translators render it, in Jer. xlviii. 6, onosagrios (wild ass); and as this seems best to agree with the flight recommended in the passage, it is to be preferred. See ASS, WILD.

HEATHEN (from heath, barren, uncultivated), Pagans who worship false gods, and are not acquainted either with the doctrines of the Old Testament or the Christian dispensation.

For many ages before Christ, the nations at large were destitute of the true religion, and gave themselves up to the grossest ignorance, the most absurd idolatry, and the greatest crimes. Even the most learned men among the Heathens were in general inconsistent, and complied with, or promoted, the vain customs they found among their countrymen. It was, however, divinely foretold, that in Abraham's seed all nations should be blessed; that the Heathen should be gathered to the Saviour, and become his people. Gen. xxii. 18, xlix. 10; Ps. ii. 8, lxxii., Isa. xlii. 6, 7; lx. In order that these promises might be accomplished, vast numbers of the Jews, after the Chaldean captivity, were left scattered among the Heathen; the Old Testament was translated into Greek, the most common language of the Heathen; and a rumour of the Saviour's appearance in the flesh was spread far and wide among them. When Christ came, he preached chiefly in Galilee, where there were multitudes of Gentiles. He assured the Jews that vast numbers of the Heathen should be brought into the Church. Matt. viii. 11, 12; xxi. 43.

For seventeen hundred years past the Jews have been generally rejected, and the Church of God has been composed of the Gentiles. Upwards of four hundred and eighty millions (nearly half the globe), however, are supposed to be yet in Pagan darkness. Considerable attempts have been made of late years for the enlightening of the Heathen; and there is every reason to believe immense good has been done. From the aspect of Scripture prophecy, we are led to expect that the kingdoms of the Heathen at large shall be brought to the light of the Gospel. Matt. xxiv. 14; Isa. lx., Ps. ii. 7, 8, xxii. 28, 29.

HEAVEN, the centre and metropolis of the universe, in which the omnipresent Deity affords a nearer and more immediate view of his perfections, and a more sensible manifestation of his glory, than in the other parts of the divine kingdom. 1 Kings viii. 27; Isa. lxiii. 15, lxvi. 1; Matt. vi. 9.

The Jews enumerated three heavens. The first was the region of the air, where the birds fly, and which are therefore called "the fowls of heaven." Job xxxv. 11. It is in this sense also that we read of the dew of heaven, the clouds of heaven, and the wind of heaven. The second is that part of space in which are fixed the heavenly luminaries, the sun, moon, and stars, and which Moses was instructed to call "the firmament" or expanse of heaven. Gen. i. 8. The third heaven, of which the Jewish holy of holies was the interesting type, is the seat of God and of the holy angels—the place into which Christ ascended after his resurrection, and into which Paul was caught up, though it is not, like the other heavens, perceptible to mortal view. John iii. 12, 13; Heb. viii. 1, ix. 24.

That there is a state of future happiness, both reason and Scripture indicate; a general notion of happiness after death has obtained among the wiser sort of Heathens, who have only had the light of nature to guide them. If we examine the human mind, it is also evident that there is a natural desire after happiness in all men, and, which is equally evident, is not attained in this life. It is no less observable that in the present state there is an unequal distribution of things, which makes the providences of God very intricate, and which cannot be solved without supposing a future state. Revelation, however, puts it beyond all doubt. The Divine Being hath promised it (1 John ii. 25; v. 11; James i. 12), hath given us some intimation of its glory (1 Pet. iii. 22; Rev. iii. 4), declares Christ hath taken possession of it for us (John xiv. 2, 3), and informs us of some already there, both as to their bodies and souls (Gen. v. 24; 2 Kings ii. 1–11).

Heaven is to be considered as a place as well as a state. It is expressly so termed in Scripture (John xiv. 2, 3); and the existence of the body of Christ, and those of Enoch and Elijah, is a further proof of it. For if it be not a place, where can these bodies be? and where will the bodies of the saints exist after the resurrection? Where this place is, however, cannot be determined. Suppositions are more curious than edifying, and it becomes us to be silent where divine revelation is so.

Heaven, however, we are assured, is a place of inexpressible felicity. The names given to it are proofs of this. It is called "paradise" (Luke xxiii. 43), "light" (Rev. xxi. 23), "a building and mansion of God" (2 Cor. v. 1; John xiv. 2), "a city" (Heb. xi. 10, 16), "a better country" (Heb. xi. 16), "an inheritance" (Acts xx. 32), "a kingdom" (Matt. xxv. 34), "a crown" (2 Tim. iv. 8), "glory" (Ps. lxxxiv. 11; 2 Cor. iv. 17), "peace, rest, and joy of the Lord." Isa. lvii. 2; Heb. iv. 9; Matt. xxv. 21, 23. The felicity of heaven will consist in freedom from all evil, both of soul and body (Rev. vii. 17); in the enjoyment of God as the chief good; in the company of angels and saints; in perfect holiness, and extensive knowledge. 1 Cor. xiii. 10–12.

However inadequate may be our conceptions as to some circumstances, this we may be assured of, that the happiness of heaven will be perfect and eternal. That it will be progressive, and that the saints shall always be increasing in their knowledge, joy, &c., is almost equally clear. Some, indeed, have supposed that this indicates an imperfection in the felicity of the saints for any addition to be made; but when we reflect that it is perfectly analogous to the dealings of God with us here, we must admit it.

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE. This Epistle has given rise to much controversy among the learned. It has been disputed who the Hebrews were to whom it was addressed. Mr Horne gives the following summary of the opinions maintained upon this subject: "Sir Isaac Newton was of opinion that by 'the Hebrews' in this Epistle we are to understand those Jewish believers who had left Jerusalem a short time before its destruction, and were now dispersed throughout Asia Minor; but of this we have no authentic record. Others again have imagined that it was addressed to the Hebrew Christians in Spain, Galatia, Macedonia, or at Rome, or to those who resided in Palestine. Clement of Alexandria, Jerome, Eusebius, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and other fathers, were of opinion that the Epistle to the Hebrews was sent to the converted Jews living in Judea; who in the apostles' days were called Hebrews, to distinguish them from the Jews in the Gentile countries, who were called Hellenists or Grecians. Acts vi. 1, ix. 29, xi. 20. The opinion of these learned fathers is adopted by Beza, Louis Cappel, Carpzov, Drs Lightfoot, Whitby, Mill, Lardner, and Macknight, Bishops Pearson and Tomline, Hallet, Rosenmüller, Scott, and others. Michaelis considers it as written for the use of the Jewish Christians at Jerusalem and in Palestine; and observes that it is a question of little or no moment, whether it was sent to Jerusalem alone, or to other cities in Palestine; because an epistle intended for the use of Jewish converts at Jerusalem must equally have concerned the other Jewish converts in that country. The very ancient opinion last stated is corroborated by the contents of the Epistle itself, in which we meet with many things peculiarly suitable to the believers in Judea."

The authorship of the Epistle has also been disputed, some ascribing it to Barnabas, others to Clement of Rome, others to Luke, and the Christian Church generally to the Apostle Paul. Without noticing the arguments adduced for and against the first three opinions, we shall simply state some of the principal grounds for attributing the Epistle to Paul. 1. Peter refers to it as written by Paul in 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16. 2. The testimony of the ancient Church decidedly favours the opinion that Paul was the author. 3. Paul's warm love to his countrymen rendered it very probable that he would address a letter to them. 4. The mode in which the author of the Epistle handles his subject, and the manner of his reasoning, strikingly resemble those of Paul. 5. Several of the exhortations, and even the style, and some of the phrases, are identical with those of Paul. To this strong body of evidence, the only objections urged against Paul as its author are the omission of the writer's name, and the alleged superior elegance of the style in which it is written.

HEBRON, a very ancient city of Canaan, which, according to Numbers xiii. 22, was "built seven years before Zoan in Egypt." It is situated on an eminence about twenty miles south from Jerusalem. This city was assigned to Caleb for an inheritance; it was also a Levitical city, and a city of refuge. The ancient name of Hebron was Kirjath-arba, probably from the circumstance that it was founded by Arba, father of Anak, from whom the Anakim were descended. Here Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob dwelt; and here they, along with Sarah, were buried. After the death of Saul, David fixed his residence at Hebron. It was further celebrated as being the birthplace of John the Baptist. Its name was probably derived from Hebron, grandson of Levi. Imbedded amongst a cluster of hills, in a deep and narrow valley, Hebron still retains many of its ancient features. Mr Stephen describes it as now a small Arab town. The present inhabitants are the wildest, most lawless and desperate people in the Holy Land; and it is a singular fact, that they sustain now the same mutinous character with the rebels of ancient days, who armed with David against Saul, and with Absalom against David. In the late desperate revolution against Mohammed Ali, they were foremost in the strife.

HECATOMB (hekaton bous, a hundred oxen), the sacrifice of a hundred oxen, or, in a large sense, of a hundred animals of any sort. Such sacrifices were offered by the ancient heathen on extraordinary occasions.

HEDGE. Eastern gardens were sometimes open plantations, at other times they were enclosed with walls or hedges. The hedges were composed of thorny plants of different kinds, such as rose bushes, wild pomegranate trees, &c. Hence we find in Prov. xv. 19: "The way of the slothful man is as an hedge of thorns: but the way of the righteous is made plain." And Hos. ii. 6: "Therefore, behold, I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall, that she shall not find her paths." And in the days of Micah the magistrates of Judah are thus described: "The best of them is a brier; the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge."

HEEL. To have the heels bare, denotes shame, contempt, captivity, or distress. Jer. xiii. 22. To lift up the heel, or kick, is to render evil for good to a superior, as a beast when it strikes its master. So Judas acted in betraying our Lord. Ps. xli. 9; John xiii. 18. Men are taken by the heels in a snare, when they suddenly fall into some calamity, from which they cannot free themselves. Job xviii. 9. Satan is said, in Gen. iii. 15, to bruise Christ's heel, as being the least vital part in man, and where a bruise or injury would be attended with the most trifling consequences. The phrase in Scripture, "sitting before the Lord," is probably to be explained by a reference to the humble posture which Orientals often assume, resting the body upon the heels—an attitude by which they show respect for a superior.

HEGIRA, an Arabic word signifying flight, and used to denote the day on which Mohammed fled from Mecca to Medina, viz., the 16th of July, 622 A.D. From this date the Mohammedans are wont to calculate in reckoning time.

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM. This celebrated compend of Christian truth was published in 1563, at the instigation of Frederick III., elector of the Palatinate. It was chiefly compiled by Ursinus, professor of divinity at Heidelberg, and Olevianus, a minister in the same town.

HEIFER, a young cow used in sacrifice at the temple. A very remarkable typical ceremony connected with the sacrifice and sprinkling of blood of a red heifer is thus described in Numb. xix. 1-10: "And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, This is the ordinance of the law which the Lord hath commanded, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring thee a red heifer without spot, wherein is no blemish, and upon which never came yoke: and ye shall give her unto Eleazar the priest, that he may bring her forth without the camp, and one shall slay her before his face. And Eleazar the priest shall take of her blood with his finger, and sprinkle of her blood directly before the tabernacle of the congregation seven times. And one shall burn the heifer in his sight; her skin, and her flesh, and her blood, with her dung, shall he burn. And the priest shall take cedar wood, and hyssop, and scarlet, and cast it into the midst of the burning of the heifer. Then the priest shall wash his clothes, and he shall bathe his flesh in water, and afterward he shall come into the camp, and the priest shall be unclean until the even. And he that burneth her shall wash his clothes in water, and bathe his flesh in water, and shall be unclean until the even. And a man that is clean shall gather up the ashes of the heifer, and lay them up without the camp in a clean place; and it shall be kept for the congregation of the children of Israel for a water of separation: it is a purification for sin. And he that gathereth the ashes of the heifer shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: and it shall be unto the children of Israel, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among them, for a statute for ever." To this important type a direct allusion is made in Heb. ix. 13, 14. It may be noticed in connection with the colour of the heifer in this ceremony, that in the East idols are almost universally painted with a red colour.

HEIR, one who is entitled to succeed to property of any kind. From the most ancient times it has been the practice for childless persons to adopt a favourite slave as their heir, to whom they bequeath a large portion of their wealth. This custom throws light upon the declaration of the patriarch, Gen. xv. 3: "And Abram said, Behold, to me thou hast given no seed: and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir." In the East children often enter upon their inheritance even while their parents are yet alive. Hence we find the prodigal son represented as asking and obtaining from his father the portion of goods to which he was entitled. Believers are called in Scripture children of God; and, "if children," it is argued, "then are they heirs, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ." For them there is provided an eternal inheritance in the heavens.

HELAM, a place mentioned in 2 Sam. x. 16, and celebrated as the scene of a victory gained by David over the forces of Hadarezer.

HELBAN, a city belonging to the tribe of Asher (Judg. i. 31); the inhabitants of which were allowed to remain.

HELBON, a city of Syria, famous for its wines (Ezek. xxvii. 18); and supposed to be the present Haleb, or, as called in Europe, Aleppo. It is situated, according to Russell, who has given a very full description of it, in latitude 36° 11' 25" north, longitude, 37° 9' east, about one hundred and eighty miles north of Damascus, and about eighty inland from the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. In 1822, Aleppo was visited by a dreadful earthquake, by which it was almost entirely destroyed.

HELEPH, a town on the borders of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33.

HELIOPOLIS. See ON.

HELKATH, a city belonging to the tribe of Asher, and assigned to the Levites of the family of Gershon. Josh. xix. 25.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM (the field of strong men, as the word implies), a place near Gibeon, celebrated as the scene of the contest of twelve men of Ishbosheth's army and twelve men of David's army 2 Sam. ii. 16.

HELL. Four distinct words in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, Sheol, Hades, Tartaros, and Gehenna, are in our common version translated hell. The first two signify, like the Hindu Padalon, or Patala, the Egyptian Amenti, and the Latin Pluto, Orcus, and Infernus, the world of departed souls in general; without any distinction, in ordinary cases, between the good and the bad, the happy and the miserable. (See HADES.) But the last two are more specific in their character, and strictly signify (as our English word hell does now, in the language of theology,) the place of final punishment after death. As all religions have supposed a future state of existence after this life, so all have their hell, or place of torment, in which the wicked are to be punished. Ancient and modern Heathens, the Jews, and the Mohammedans, we find, believe in a future state of retribution; it is not, therefore, a sentiment peculiar to Christianity.

We have already shown, under the word HADES, that neither Sheol nor Hades usually denotes hell in the strict sense, but the regions of the dead in general, including both Paradise and Gehenna—the world of bliss, and the world of woe. To denote this latter, the New Testament writers make use of the Greek word Gehenna, which is compounded of two Hebrew words, Ge Hinnom; that is, "The Valley of Hinnom," a place near Jerusalem, in which children were cruelly sacrificed by fire to Moloch, the idol of the Ammonites. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6. This place was also called Tophet (2 Kings xxiii. 10); alluding, as is supposed, to the noise of drums (toph signifying a drum) there raised to drown the cries of helpless infants. (See GEHENNA.) As in process of time this place came to be considered an emblem of hell, or the place of torment reserved for the punishment of the wicked in a future state, the name Tophet came gradually to be used in this sense, and at length to be confined to it. In this sense, also, the word Gehenna, a synonymous term, is always to be understood in the New Testament, where it occurs twelve times; always in addressing Jews, to whom the analogical sense was easily intelligible. Matt. v. 22, 29, 30, x. 28, xviii. 9, xxiii. 15, 33; Mark ix. 43, 45, 47; Luke xii. 5; James iii. 6.

There have been many curious and useless conjectures respecting the location of hell. But, as Dr Doddridge observes, we must here confess our ignorance; and shall be much better employed in studying how we may avoid this place of horror, than in labouring to discover where it is.

Of the nature of this punishment we may form some idea from the expressions made use of in Scripture. It is called a place of torment (Luke xvi. 23), the bottomless pit (Rev. xx. 3), a prison (1 Pet. iii. 19), darkness (Matt. viii. 12; Jude 13), fire (Matt. xiii. 42, 50), the worm that never dies (Mark ix. 44, 48), the second death (Rev. xxi. 8), the wrath of God (Rom. ii. 5).

HELL, CHRIST'S DESCENT INTO. That Christ locally descended into hell, is a doctrine believed not only by the Papists, but by many among the Reformed. The text chiefly brought forward in support of this doctrine, is 1 Pet. iii. 19: "By which he went and preached to the spirits in prison." But it evidently appears,—1. That the "Spirit" there mentioned was not Christ's human soul, but the Holy Spirit (by which he was quickened, and raised from the dead); and by the inspiration of which, granted to Noah, he preached to those notorious sinners who are now in the prison of hell for their disobedience. See a similar form of expression in Eph. ii. 17: "And came and preached peace," &c., where it is certain that the personal presence of Christ is not intended. 2. Christ, when on the cross, promised the penitent thief his presence that day in paradise; and accordingly, when he died, he committed his soul into his heavenly Father's hand: in heaven, therefore, and not in hell, we are to seek the separate spirit of our Redeemer at this period. Luke xxiii. 43, 46. That his soul was in Hades, or the unseen world, is, however, admitted; for this state includes both heaven and hell. 3. Had our Lord descended to preach to the damned, there is no supposable reason why the unbelievers in Noah's time only should be mentioned rather than those of Sodom, and others who died in sin. Ps. xvi. 10; Acts ii. 31. See HADES.

HELLENISTS, a term occurring in the Greek text of the New Testament, and which, in the English version, is rendered Grecians. Acts vi. 1. The authors of the Vulgate version render it, like ours, Græci; but the Port Royal writers more accurately, Juifs Grecs, Greek or Grecian Jews, it being the Jews who spoke Greek that are here treated of, and are hereby distinguished from the Jews called Hebreus; that is, who spoke the Hebrew tongue of that time.

The Hellenists, or Grecian Jews, were those who lived in Egypt and other parts where the Greek tongue prevailed. These Hellenists first settled in Egypt about six hundred years before Christ. Their number was increased by the numerous colonies of Jews planted there by Alexander the Great B.C. 336, and still later by Ptolemy Lagus. Under the reign of Augustus, they amounted to nearly a million. The mixture of the Jewish and Egyptian national characters, and the influence of the Greek language and philosophy, which were adopted by these Jews, laid the foundation of a new epoch of Græco-Jewish literature, which, from its prevailing character, received the name of the Hellenistic. The systems of Pythagoras and Plato were strangely combined with those Oriental phantasies which had been reduced to a system in Egypt, and with which the mystical doctrines of the Gnostics were imbued. The most noted of the Jewish Hellenistic philosophers was Philo of Alexandria; and the principal of the learned labours of the Alexandrian Jews was the Greek translation of the Old Testament. The Hellenists (Acts vi. 1, ix. 29, xi. 20) are properly distinguished from the Hellenes, or Greeks, mentioned John xii. 20, who were Greeks by birth and nation, and yet proselytes to the Jewish religion.

Commentators are by no means agreed as to the meaning of the word Hellenists, in Acts vi. 1. Erasmus, Drusius, Heinsius, Scaliger, Lightfoot, Hammond, Le Clerc, Schoettgen, Bengel, Rosenmüller, and others, are of opinion that they were foreign Jews who spoke Greek. On the contrary, Camerarius, Beza, Salmasius, Wolf, Merus, Zeigler, and others, regard them as proselytes, men in origin and religion Gentiles, but afterwards made Jews by circumcision, and now finally converted to Christianity. Wetstein, Heumann, Kuinöl, and Heinrichs, maintain that they were foreign Jewish proselytes who spoke Greek.

The term Hellenists is also given to those who maintained the classical purity of the New Testament Greek. Their opponents were called Hebraists.

HELM, the rudder of a ship, a word occurring only in James iii. 4.

HELMET, a piece of defensive armour, designed to protect the head. It has been used from the remotest ages by almost all warlike nations. Both Goliath and Saul wore helmets of brass. At first it appears to have been only an ordinary cap, lined with a thick padding of wool. Among the Greeks the skins of beasts, overlaid with plates of brass, composed the helmets which they used. The Jews, however, seem to have worn helmets of brass or iron. The precise form of the Jewish helmet is not known. There are various allusions in Scripture to this piece of armour. Thus Isaiah represents Christ as having put on "a helmet of salvation," and Paul exhorts the believer to put on "for an helmet the hope of salvation." See ARMS, MILITARY—ARMOUR.

HELP-MEET. In Gen. ii. 18, it is said, "And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone: I will make him an help meet for him." The meaning of the word seems to be a help, or companion suitable for him. In the original the expression is "an help as before him," one corresponding to him, one adapted to him, a counterpart of himself, always present before him, to aid, sympathize with, and comfort him; in a word, a second self. According to Eastern customs and manners, the expression "as before him" gives a proper view of her condition; for she literally has to "stand before" her husband, to serve him on all occasions, and especially when he takes his food, she being then his servant.

HEMAN, a prophet or seer of the tribe of Levi, who was appointed by David to be one of the chiefs of the sacred singers.

HEMERO-BAPTISTS, a sect among the ancient Jews, thus called from their washing and bathing every day, in all seasons; and performing this custom with the greatest solemnity, as a religious rite necessary to salvation. Epiphanius, who mentions this as the fourth heresy among the Jews, observes, that in other points these heretics had much the same opinion as the scribes and Pharisees; only that they denied the resurrection of the dead, in common with the Sadducees, and retained a few other of the proprieties of these last.

HEMLOCK (rosh and rash), Deut. xxix. 18, xxxii. 32; Ps. lxi. 21; Jer. viii. 14, ix. 15, xxiii. 15; Lam. iii. 5, 19; Hos. x. 4; Amos vi. 12. In the two latter places our translators have rendered the word hemlock, in the others gall. Hiller supposes it to be the centaureum, described by Pliny; but Celsius shows it to be the hemlock. Michaelis supposes it to be the hyoscyamus or henbane, which is also a poisonous plant, and resembles hemlock in its effects.

HEN, a well-known domestic fowl, mentioned in Matt. xxiii. 37, and Luke xiii. 34. It is particularly remarkable for its strong affection to its brood, which, when any danger threatens, it gathers under its wings. In allusion to this our Saviour exclaims, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" "It does not appear," says Michaelis, in his Commentaries on the Laws of Moses, "that the Israelites were accustomed to the breeding of poultry; for in the history of the patriarchs, where so much is said on rural economy, not a word do we find concerning poultry, not even in the laws relating to offerings. Nay, great as is the number of other animals mentioned in it, the Hebrew Bible does not so much as furnish a name for them; unless perhaps in a work written about the commencement of the Babylonish captivity (the Books of Esdras); and even there, through the mistakes of transcribers, it is rendered almost undiscoverable."

HENA, the name of a town in Mesopotamia, translated by the Septuagint Ara, and mentioned in connection with idolatry in 2 Kings xviii. 34. It also occurs in Isa. xxxvii. 13. Sennacherib, king of Assyria boasted of overthrowing it.

HERACLEONITES, a sect of Christians, the followers of Heracleon, who refined upon the Gnostic divinity, and maintained that the world was not the immediate production of the Son of God, but that he was only the occasion or cause of its being created by the demiurgus. The Heracleonites denied the authority of the prophecies of the Old Testament; maintained that they were mere random sounds in the air; and that John the Baptist was the only true voice that directed to the Messiah.

HERALD. This word is found only in Dan. iii. 4. The decrees of kings were publicly proclaimed by criers who were called heralds, as indeed they still are both in Eastern and Western countries. The heralds usually made their proclamations at the gates of cities, as being the most public places, and at Jerusalem in the temple.

HERBS. This word, which occurs in various passages, includes vegetables of every description. See GARDENS—AGRICULTURE.

HERBS, BITTER. See BITTER HERBS.

HERD. See CATTLE.

HERDMAN, a person appointed to take charge of a herd of cattle; and the same name was applied to one who possessed cattle. An occupation of this kind, in a pastoral country like Palestine, was accounted highly honourable; and we find the Prophet Amos (vii. 14) designating himself a herdsman. Where large herds of cattle abounded, and much pasture was required, contentions sometimes arose, as between the herdsmen of Abraham and those of Lot. Wells of water also, in those warm countries, sometimes formed the subject of quarrel, as in the case of Abimelech's herdsmen and those of Isaac.

HERES, the name of a mount near Aijalon. Judg. i. 35.

HERESIARCH, one who introduces or founds any particular heresy; a leader of any body of heretics.

HERESY. The original Greek word from which the English term is derived means simply choice, and appears to have been chiefly applied to the choice of one opinion in preference to another. The word afterwards came to denote a sect or class of men adhering to some particular tenets. Hence Josephus speaks of the three heresies of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. Luke makes use of the word in this sense in Acts v. 17, xv. 5, and applies it to the Christians, xxiv. 5, 14. The word has undergone considerable modification in its meaning in modern times. Accordingly Dr Johnson defines it in his Dictionary, "An opinion of private men different from that of the catholic or orthodox church." The following remarks of Buck, however, may be quoted as giving a succinct account of heresy as it is viewed in modern times and in our own country:—"According to the laws of this kingdom, heresy consists in a denial of some of the essential doctrines of Christianity, publicly and obstinately avowed. It must be acknowledged, however, that particular modes of belief or unbelief not tending to overturn Christianity, or to sap the foundations of morality, are by no means the object of coercion by the civil magistrate. What doctrines shall therefore be adjudged heresy was left by our old constitution to the determination of the ecclesiastical judge, who had herein a most arbitrary latitude allowed him; for the general definition of an heretic, given by Lyndewode, extends to the smallest deviation from the doctrines of the holy church, as the statute, 2 Hen. IV. cap. 15, expresses it, 'teachers of erroneous opinions, contrary to the faith and blessed determinations of the holy church.' Very contrary this to the usage of the first general councils, which defined all heretical doctrines with the utmost precision and exactness; and, what ought to have alleviated the punishment, the uncertainty of the crime seems to have enhanced it in those days of blind zeal and pious cruelty." "By stat. 1 Eliz., cap. 1, all former statutes relating to heresy are repealed; which leaves the jurisdiction of heresy as it stood at common law, viz. as to the infliction of common censures in the ecclesiastical courts; and in case of burning the heretic, in the provincial synod only. Sir Matthew Hale is, indeed, of a different opinion, and holds that such power resided in the diocesan also; though he agrees that in either case the writ de hæretico comburendo was not demandable of common right, but grantable or otherwise merely at the king's discretion. But the principal point now gained was, that by this statute a boundary was for the first time set to what should be accounted heresy; nothing for the future being to be so determined, but only such tenets which have been heretofore so declared,—1. by the words of the canonical Scriptures; 2. by the first four general councils, or such others as have only used the words of the Holy Scriptures; or, 3. which shall hereafter be so declared by the parliament, with the assent of the clergy in convocation. Thus was heresy reduced to a greater certainty than before, though it might not have been the worse to have defined it in terms still more precise and particular, as a man continued still liable to be burnt for what, perhaps, he did not understand to be heresy, till the ecclesiastical judge so interpreted the words of the canonical Scriptures; for the writ de hæretico comburendo remained still in force, till it was totally abolished, and heresy again subjected only to ecclesiastical correction, pro salute animæ, by stat. 29 Car. II. cap. 9, when, in one and the same reign, our lands were delivered from the slavery of military tenures, our bodies from arbitrary imprisonment by the habeas corpus act, and our minds from the tyranny of superstitious bigotry, by demolishing this last badge of persecution in the English law. Every thing is now less exceptionable, with respect to the spiritual cognizance and spiritual punishment of heresy; unless, perhaps, that the crime ought to be more strictly defined, and no prosecution permitted, even in the ecclesiastical courts, till the tenets in question are by proper authority previously declared to be heretical. Under these restrictions, some think it necessary, for the support of the national religion, that the officers of the Church should have power to censure heretics; yet not to harass them with temporal penalties, much less to exterminate or destroy them. The legislature has, indeed, thought it proper that the civil magistrate should interpose with regard to one species of heresy, very prevalent in modern times; for by stat. 9 and 10 Will. III., cap. 32, if any person, educated in the Christian religion, or professing the same, shall, by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, deny any one of the persons in the Holy Trinity to be God, or maintain that there are more Gods than one, he shall undergo the same penalties and incapacities which were inflicted on apostasy by the same statute."

HERETIC, a general name for all such persons under any religion, but especially the Christian, as profess or teach opinions contrary to the established faith, or to what is made the standard of orthodoxy.

HERMAS, a disciple mentioned in Rom. xvi. 14, was, according to several of the ancients, and many learned modern interpreters, the same as Hermas whose works are said to be still extant; but this is doubtful.

HERMENEUTICS. See BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.

HERMOGENES, one who for a time was the companion of Paul, but afterwards deserted him 2 Tim. i. 15.

HERMOGENIANS, a sect of ancient heretics, denominated from their leader Hermogenes, who lived towards the close of the second century. Hermogenes established matter as his first principle; and regarding matter as the fountain of all evil, he maintained that the world, and everything contained in it, as also the souls of men and other spirits, were formed by the Deity from an uncreated and eternal mass of corrupt matter. The opinions of Hermogenes, with regard to the origin of the world and the nature of the soul, were warmly opposed by Tertullian. See GNOSTICS.

HERMON, a celebrated mountain, or range of mountains, in the Holy Land, often spoken of in Scripture. It is in the northern boundary of the country, beyond Jordan, and in the territories which originally were ruled over by Og, king of Bashan. It has two conspicuous summits, on account of which Dr Wilson thinks it is probably spoken of in Scripture as the hill of the Hermonites. The top of the mountain, which rises between nine and ten thousand Paris feet above the level of the sea, is never entirely free from snow. This mountain, also, is remarkable for the quantity of dew which falls upon it. The Psalmist alludes to this in Ps. cxxxiii. 3. In the Scriptures Tabor and Hermon are sometimes combined together, as in Ps. lxxxix. 12. Hermon forms properly the highest part of Anti-libanus, and by the Sidonians it was called Sirion, while by the Amorites it was called Shenir, Dent. iii. 9. The Mount Hermon of the Scriptures is the Djebel-esh-Shiekh of the Arabs. It is, in fact, a part of the chain of Anti-libanus, and is situated at the point where the chain divides to send off the two southern branches which run on either side of the Jordan. Its great height—for it is thought the highest peak in Syria—and the perpetual snows of its summit, render it a well marked object from almost every part of Samaria and Galilee, and from the plains of the Hauran on the east. It is still, as formerly, haunted by beasts of prey. Solomon alludes to this characteristic. Cant. iv. 8. The range of country stretching along for about thirty miles, and forming the eastern boundary of the ancient territory of Manasseh, formed probably the "land of the Hermonites," the scene of the beautiful elegy (Ps. xlii.) which David composed when the revolt of Absalom compelled him to flee from Jerusalem: "Therefore will I remember thee," says the royal bard, "from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermonites, and from the hill Mizar." It is probably to little Hermon, not far from Mount Tabor and west of the Jordan, that David alludes when he says: "The north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name." Ps. lxxxix. 12. "It is as if the Psalmist had said," write Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne, "north, south, and all that is between; or, in other words, the whole land from north to south, to its very centre, and throughout its very marrow, shall rejoice in thy name."

HEROD, a king of the Jews, an Idumean by birth, in whose reign our blessed Redeemer was born. This monarch is usually denominated the Great. When he had reached mature years, he was appointed governor of Galilee, and signalised himself by suppressing a band of robbers. In the civil wars, having joined the party of Cassius, he received the appointment of governor of Cœlo-Syria, and afterwards he became tetrarch of Judea, but was compelled to flee from Jerusalem, first to Idumea, then to Egypt. Afterwards he repaired to Rome, and unexpectedly obtained the sovereignty of Judea, on which he returned thither, and putting Antigonus to death, he took quiet possession of the kingdom, and to secure his authority over the Jews, he married Mariamne, the granddaughter of Hyrcanus. Herod was marked by the most atrocious acts of cruelty, having caused his brother-in-law Aristobulus to be killed, and afterwards his wife Mariamne. Conscious that his hands were stained with blood, the inhuman monster was at intervals, down to his dying hour, visited with the most painful remorse. The reign of Herod, however, was not altogether unattended with advantage to the country over which he ruled. Besides building Sebaste and Cæsarea and many other fortresses, he repaired and almost rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem, which continued to receive additional improvements for more than forty years. The natural ferocity of Herod's temper was not a little aggravated by the conspiracies which were formed against him even by his own nearest relatives. His own sons were convicted and executed for plotting against the person and government of their father. It was in the thirty-third year of this cruel tyrant's reign that Jesus Christ the Saviour of the world was born; and no sooner had this important event happened, than Herod sought the young child's life. The proud, profligate monarch trembled before the babe of Bethlehem. The hoary-headed sovereign, whose reign had been one unbroken series of deeds of oppression and murder and every hateful vice, had at last found a rival whose very name struck terror to his heart, and that rival a helpless infant! But Herod was imagining a vain thing. He was plotting against the Lord's Anointed One. Well had it been for Herod if he had accompanied the Eastern magi to the inn at Bethlehem, and done homage to the King of kings. But seventy long years spent in sin had blinded his eyes and hardened his heart, and he coolly and deliberately arranged his plans for the murder of the Son of God. To accomplish this unholy purpose, he slew all the male children at Bethlehem, from two years old and under. His plans, however, in the providence of God, were defeated, and the young child's life was saved. The massacre of the infants of Bethlehem was one of the last acts of Herod's reign; and it would appear that from that moment he had no rest, no peace. At length the Lord afflicted him with a disease disgusting to all that approached him. He was smitten with ulcers, and putrefying sores covered his whole body, out of which issued swarms of loathsome vermin. But though thus laid low, a humbling spectacle to all his attendants, his madness knew no bounds. Only five days before his death, he ordered Antipater, his son and the heir of his throne, to be cruelly murdered; and feeling that his own end was approaching, and convinced that his decease would be a cause of joy, not of mourning, throughout his dominions, he summoned together the heads of the first families in Judea, and imprisoned them, with an order that as soon as he died they should be murdered; thus hoping to ensure mourners at his death. The king of terrors now held him in his grasp. So loathsome did his disease become, that his firmest adherents fled from his couch. Foaming with rage, the bloody tyrant expired, and, like Judas, passed to his own place.

HERODIANS, a sect among the Jews, at the time of our Saviour. Matt. xxii. 16; Mark iii. 6. The critics and commentators are very much divided with regard to the Herodians. Jerome, in his dialogue against the Luciferians, takes the name to have been given to such as owned Herod for the Messiah; and Tertullian and Epiphanius are of the same opinion. But the same Jerome, in his comment on Matthew, treats this opinion as ridiculous; and maintains that the Pharisees gave this appellation, by way of ridicule, to Herod's soldiers, who paid tribute to the Romans; agreeably to which the Syrian interpreters render the word by the domestics of Herod; that is, "his courtiers." M. Simon, in his notes on Matt. xxii., advances a more probable opinion: The name Herodian he imagines to have been given to such as adhered to Herod's party and interest, and were for preserving the government in his family, about which there were great divisions among the Jews. F. Hardouin will have the Herodians and Sadducees to have been the same. Dr. Prideaux is of opinion that they derived their name from Herod the Great; and that they were distinguished from the other Jews by their concurrence with Herod's scheme for subjecting himself and his dominions to the Romans, and likewise by complying with many of their heathen usages and customs. This symbolizing with idolatry, upon views of interest and worldly policy, was probably that leaven of Herod against which our Saviour cautioned his disciples. It is further probable that they were chiefly of the sect of the Sadducees: because the leaven of Herod is also denominated the leaven of the Sadducees.

It is most probable that the Herodians did not form a distinct religious sect, but were rather a political party, composed of the courtiers, ministers, domestics, partisans, and adherents generally of Herod. Herod, however, neither favoured the domination of Cæsar nor the liberty of the Jews. Hence, whether Christ sided with him or with them, he would equally offend the Herodians. Herod aimed at a supreme and independent government, not accountable to others.

HERODIAS, the grand-daughter of Herod the Great, and daughter of Aristobulus and Berenice. She had married at a former period her uncle Philip; but the abandoned woman had left him, and while he was yet alive, she had married his brother Herod, tetrarch of Galilee. Herodias dreaded the influence of John the Baptist over the mind of Herod, lest, perhaps, the king should be led to repent of his sin, and to banish her from his palace. Eagerly, therefore, did she long for an opportunity of cutting short the life of the hated preacher of the truth. Such an opportunity at length occurred. On Herod's birthday, when many guests were assembled to celebrate the festive occasion, Herodias, in prosecution of her secret plans, sent in Salome, her daughter by her former husband, to dance before the king. Herod was delighted with the dancing of Salome, and in the enthusiasm of the moment, he rashly promised with an oath that he would give her whatsoever she asked. Salome gladly embracing the opportunity of accomplishing her mother's long-cherished purpose, lost no time in naming her demand, "Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger." Herod was sorry, but for the oath's sake, and through a false sense of honour, he granted the request. Herodias, ambitious of a crown, persuaded her husband to visit Rome, for the purpose of asking from the emperor permission to exchange the title of tetrarch for that of king. Instead of obtaining, however, the wished-for honour, he was banished to Lyons in Gaul. Herodias accompanied him into exile, where it is probable, as we have no further information concerning her, she died.

HERON (anaph—Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18). This word has been variously understood. Some have rendered it the kite, others the woodcock, others the curlew, some the peacock, others the parrot, and others the crane. The root, anap, signifies to breathe short through the nostrils—to snuff, as in anger; hence to be angry; and it is supposed that the word is sufficiently descriptive of the heron, from its very irritable disposition. Bochart, however, thinks it the mountain falcon—the same that the Greeks call anapaia, mentioned by Homer; and this bears a strong resemblance to the Hebrew name.

HESHBON, a celebrated city of the Ammonites, twenty miles east of Jordan. Josh. xiii. 17. It was given to Reuben; but was afterwards transferred to Gad, and then to the Levites. It had been conquered from the Moabites, by Sihon, and was taken by the Israelites a little before the death of Moses. After the ten tribes had settled in the country beyond Jordan, the Moabites recovered it. Pliny and Jerome assign it to Arabia, under the name of Esbus. Solomon speaks of the pools of Heshbon. Cant. vii. 4. The town still subsists under its ancient name, and is situated, according to Burckhardt, on a hill.

HETERODOX (thinking otherwise), something contrary to the faith or doctrine established in what has been accounted the true Church. See ORTHODOX.

HETEROOUSIANS (of other essence), a sect or branch of Arians, the followers of Aëtius, and from him denominated Aëtians. (See AETIANS.) They were called the Heteroousii, because they held, not that the Son of God was of a substance like, or similar to, that of the Father, which was the doctrine of another branch of Arians, thence called Homoousians, Homoousii; but that he was of another substance different from that of the Father.

HETH, father of the Hittites, was eldest son of Canaan, and dwelt in the south of the promised land, at or near Hebron. Ephron, or Hebron, was of the race of Heth; and the city so called was peopled by the children of Heth. Some think there was a city called Heth; but we find no traces of it in Scripture.

HETHLON, a place mentioned by Ezekiel (xlvi. 15, xlviii. 1), as limiting the land of promise on the north. It is supposed to have been situated somewhere between Tyre and Damascus.

HEWING IN PIECES. This cruel mode of death seems to have been inflicted sometimes upon criminals in ancient times. Thus we are told, 1 Sam. xv. 33, "And Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal." Bruce tells us that this mode of punishment was common in Abyssinia.

HEWING OF WOOD. This laborious service among the Jews appears to have been imposed chiefly upon slaves and aliens. The Gibeonites were doomed to this menial employment by Joshua, for the service of the sanctuary. In 1 Kings v. 15, we read that Solomon "had fourscore thousand hewers in the mountains."

HEXAPLA, a Bible disposed in six columns, containing the text, and divers versions thereof, compiled and published by Origen, with a view to secure the sacred text from future corruptions, and to correct those that had been already introduced. This celebrated work, which Montfaucon imagines consisted of sixty large volumes, perished long ago; probably with the Library at Cesarea, where it was preserved in the year 653; though several of the ancient writers have preserved pieces thereof, particularly Chrysostom on the Psalms, Philoponus in his Hexameron, &c. Some modern writers have earnestly endeavoured to collect fragments of the Hexapla, particularly Flaminius, Nobilius, Drusius, and F. Montfaucon, in two folio volumes, printed at Paris in 1713. An edition was also published by Bahrtdt, in two volumes octavo, which is convenient for reference.

HEZEKIAH, one of the kings of Judah, distinguished for his public and private excellencies. He was the son of Ahaz, but his whole character was a perfect contrast to that of his father. He succeeded his father in the government at the age of twenty-five, and no sooner did he ascend the throne, than he commenced the work of national reformation, by throwing down the idolatrous altars, establishing the worship of the true God, and introducing many public works. It was during the reign of this virtuous prince that the Assyrian power in Judea was overthrown. He experienced in his own person a miraculous recovery from disease. The latter part of his life was spent in the utmost tranquillity, and at his death, A.M. 3306, he was succeeded by Manasseh, who was as remarkable for his wickedness as Hezekiah was for his goodness.

HIDDEKEL, one of the four rivers which watered the garden of Eden. (See EDEN.) It is supposed to be the Tigris.

HIDE, (1.) To cover, to keep secret: so God hides his commandments, when he shows not their meaning. Ps. cxix. 19. To hide his righteousness in our heart, is sinfully to neglect the due publishing and declaring of it. Ps. xl. 10. (2.) To lay up; so saints hide God's Word in their heart, when they lay it up in their memories, judgments, consciences, and affections, that it may influence and regulate their whole exercise in heart and life. Ps. cxix. 11. (3.) To protect. God hides his people in his pavilion, in the secret of his presence, and under the shadow of his wings; and is their hiding-place, when, in the exercise of his perfections, he gives them the most safe and refreshing protection from danger and hurt. Ps. xxvii. 5, xxxii. 7. Jesus Christ is a hiding-place; under the covert of his righteousness are we secured from the vengeance of God: and by his providence, power, and love, are we secured from the danger of sin, and Satan, and the world. Isa. xxxii. 2. God hides himself, hides his face, when he forbears kindly to show his favour in his Word, ordinances, and providence. Ps. lxxxix. 46. Whatever is secret, hard to be known or found, is called hid or hidden. Saints are God's hidden ones. Their state and happy privileges are unknown to the world, and they are protected of God. Ps. lxxxiii. 3. The Gospel and Christ are a hidden treasure, and hidden wisdom, unknown to natural men. Matt. xiii. 44; 1 Cor. ii. 7.

HIEL, a person belonging to Bethel, who rebuilt Jericho, notwithstanding the predictive curse of Joshua against the person who should attempt it, and of which he experienced the effects, by losing his eldest son, Abiram, while laying the foundation, and his youngest son, Segub, when hanging up the gates. See ABIRAM—JERICHO.

HIERACITES, heretics in the third century, so called from their leader, Hierax, a philosopher of Egypt, who taught that Melchizedek was the Holy Ghost, denied the resurrection, and condemned marriage.

HIERAPOLIS, a city of Phrygia, not far from Colosse and Laodicea. Col. iv. 13. The following account of this place is given by Mr. Smith, a traveller in the end of the seventeenth century: "Hierapolis (now called by the Turks Pambuck-Kulasi, or the Cotton Tower, by reason of the white cliffs lying thereabouts), a city of the greater Phrygia, lies under a high hill to the north, having to the southward of it a fair and large plain about five miles over, almost directly opposite to Laodicea, the River Lycus running between, but nearer the latter; now utterly forsaken and desolate, but whose ruins are so glorious and magnificent, that they strike one with horror at the first view of them, and with admiration too; such walls, and arches, and pillars of so vast a height, and so curiously wrought, being still to be found there, that one may well judge, that when it stood, it was one of the most glorious cities not only in the East, but of the world. The numerousness of the temples there erected in the times of idolatry with so much art and cost, might sufficiently confirm the title of the holy city, which it at first derived from the hot waters flowing from several springs, to which they ascribed a divine healing virtue, and which made the city so famous; and for this cause Apollo, whom both Greeks and Romans adored as the god of medicine, had his votaries and altars here, and was very probably their chief deity. Several tombs still remain; some of them almost entire, very stately and glorious, as if it had been accounted a kind of sacrilege to injure the dead, and upon that account they had abstained from defacing their monuments. Entire tombs of a great length and height are still to be seen, some covered with stone shaped into the form of a cube, others ridge-wise."

HIERARCHY, an ecclesiastical establishment, or Church, in which a government of priests—hence the name—is maintained, with various gradations of authority and honour. (See EPISCOPACY.) It appears from Scripture, that all pastors were originally bound by the same obligations to "take care of the Church of God." 1 Tim. iii. 5. In the New Testament, which is our divine statute-book, we search in vain for any thing like a recognition of a hierarchy. Whence, then, did a hierarchy, or different orders of clergy, arise? It appears that so early as the second century, the pastors or bishops of large towns came to occupy a somewhat higher position than the country bishops. The consequence was, that the city bishops gradually acquired an undue influence in ecclesiastical assemblies or synods, and in the fourth century we find a continued effort to supplant the rural pastors. They were first deprived of the power of ordination, that duty being limited to the bishop of a city or large town. Thus diocesan Episcopacy was systematically and gradually established. The council of Laodicea, held A.D. 360, enacted that "bishops might not be appointed in villages or rural districts, and that those already appointed do nothing without the sanction of the city bishop." As parochial Episcopacy was abolished, the prelates themselves began to take precedence according to the rank of the cities in which they were located. At this period, the word bishop, which, in the New Testament, is the designation of an ordinary minister, became the title of a prelate. In the second century a bishop's charge was called his parish, but in the fourth it was styled his diocese. The bishops, in their turn, became subject to a still higher order, termed patriarchs, and thus a complete hierarchy was formed, which continues in the Greek Church till this day; but in the Latin Church, it was speedily transformed into a monarchy, centring in the person of the Pope. "At the era of the Reformation," says Dr M'Crie, "Episcopacy was not considered by any of the reformers as a part of divine institution, but as a mere human appendage. On this ground it was abolished and rejected by most of the Protestant Churches. In England it was retained, from political and prudential considerations. The English reformers, including Archbishop Cranmer and his colleagues, were unanimously of opinion, and did not scruple to express their opinion, that bishops and presbyters were all one at the beginning of Christianity." Bishop, pastor, elder, are convertible terms, used in the New Testament to denote those who rule in the Church of God, all of them having a parity among themselves, and only entitled to exercise authority over the flock or the members of the Church. The word hierarchy is sometimes used to denote that dominion of the Church over the State which is asserted by Roman Catholic writers.

HIGGAION. This word occurs in an unconnected form, standing alone in Ps. ix. 16. It means meditation, and probably indicates that a pause was to be made in the music, in order to make room for profound thought on the character or government of God. The Septuagint renders it "an interlude." In Ps. xcii. 3, the higgaion is generally supposed to be a musical instrument of some kind or other. It seems to mean "a musical instrument with a murmuring sound."

HIGH PLACES. This expression frequently occurs in the Old Testament as applied to places of religious worship, both before and after the building of the temple. It does not appear that high places were forbidden until the temple was erected, provided the worship of God was maintained there, and not of idols; but after that period it was unlawful to offer sacrifices elsewhere. Idolatry, however, was generally practised in high places. Hence the frequency with which the Israelites were commanded to destroy utterly all the places where the heathen served their gods upon the high mountains and upon the hills. And even the Israelites themselves were charged with imitating the heathen, by burning incense in all high places, and thus working wickedness to provoke the Lord. 2 Kings xvii. 9–13. Only a few princes in Scripture receive commendation for the destruction of high places. Hezekiah and Josiah were particularly distinguished for their zeal in this respect. Dr

Prideaux thinks that the proseuchæ or open courts, used as places of prayer and where prayer-meetings were often held, and referred to in the New Testament, corresponded to the high places of the Old Testament.

HIGH PRIEST. See PRIEST, HIGH.

HILLEL, surnamed Hassaken, a famous Jewish rabbi, who lived a little before the time of Christ. He was born at Babylon, B.C. 112, and was the disciple of Shammai. At the age of forty he went to Jerusalem, where he applied himself to the study of the law; and, at the age of fourscore, was made head of the sanhedrim. Of all their ancient doctors, he is unanimously regarded as the most learned in the Jewish laws and traditions. Differing in opinion from his master, Shammai, their disciples engaged in the quarrel, and several persons were killed on both sides. By the Jews Hillel is extolled to the skies, and is said to have educated upwards of a thousand pupils in the knowledge of the law; among whom were thirty who were worthy that the Spirit of God should have rested on them, as he did on Moses; thirty who, like Joshua, were worthy to stop the sun in his course; and twenty little inferior to the first and superior to the second. Rabbi Hillel was one of the compilers of the Talmud, and was the grandfather of Gamaliel, Paul's teacher.

HIN, a Hebrew measure, containing half a seah or the sixth part of a bath: one gallon and two pints. The hin was a liquid measure; as of oil (Exod. xxx. 24; Ezek. xlv. 24), or of wine. Exod. xxix. 40; Lev. xxiii. 13.

HIND (ailch—Gen xlix. 21; 2 Sam. xxii. 34; Job xxxix. 1; Ps. xviii. 33, xxix. 9; Prov. v. 19; Cant. ii. 7, iii. 5; Jer. xiv. 5; Hab. iii. 19), the mate or female of the stag. It is a lovely creature, and of an elegant shape. It is noted for its swiftness and the sureness of its step as it jumps among the rocks. David and Habakkuk both allude to this character of the hind: "The Lord maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and causeth me to stand on the high places." Ps. xviii. 33; Hab. iii. 19. The circumstance of their standing on the high places or mountains is applied to these animals by Xenophon.

HINDUISM, or BRAHMANISM. "The Hindu religion, in one form or other (says Mr. Ward, the missionary), it is highly probable, is professed by more than half the human race: the doctrines of the Veda, it is well known, are acknowledged all over India; the religion of Budh, a Hindu incarnation, prevails throughout the Burman Empire, Siam, Ceylon, &c. Lamaism, spread throughout Tartary, may also be traced to a Hindu origin; and if, as is conjectured, the Fo of the Chinese be the Budh of India, then it will be evident, that far more than half the population of the world remain under the influence of the superstitions taught in the Veda." See BUDHISTS—Fo, &c.

Mr. Maurice, in his elaborate work, entitled "A History of the Antiquities of India," traced the origin of the Hindu nation, and developed their religious system. He supposes that the first migration of mankind took place before the confusion of tongues at Babel, from the region of Ararat, where the ark rested. By the time the earth became sufficiently dry, either Noah himself, or some descendant of Shem, gradually led on the first journey to the western frontiers of India; that this increasing colony flourished for a long succession of ages in primitive happiness and innocence, practising the purest rites of the patriarchal religion, without images and temples; till at length the descendants of Ham invaded and conquered India, and corrupted their ancient religion.

According to the Hindu theology, Brahm, the great Being, is the supreme, eternal, uncreated God. Brahmā, the first created being, by whom he made and governs the world, is the prince of the beneficent spirits. He is assisted by Vishnu, the great preserver of men, who, nine several times, appeared upon earth, and under a human form, for the most beneficent purposes. Vishnu is often styled Krishna, the Indian Apollo, and in his character greatly resembles the Mithra of Persia. This prince of benevolent dewtas (or demons), has for a coadjutor Mahadeo, or Siva, the destroying power of God. And this threefold divinity, armed with the terrors of almighty power, pursues through the whole extent of creation the rebellious dewtas, headed by Mahasoor, the great malignant spirit who seduced them, and darts upon their flying bands the fiery shafts of divine vengeance.

According to Sir William Jones, the supreme god Brahm, in his triple form, is the only self-existent divinity acknowledged by the philosophical Hindus. When they consider the divine power as exerted in giving existence to that which existed not before, they call the deity Brahm. When they view him in the light of destroyer, or rather changer of forms, he is called Mahadeo, Siva, and by various other names. When they consider him as the preserver of created things, they give him the name of Vishnu; for since the power of preserving creation by a superintending providence belongs eminently to the godhead, they hold that power to exist transcendently in the preserving member of the triad, whom they suppose to be always everywhere, not in substance, but in spirit and energy.

Following the leading ideas of Sir William Jones, Mr. Maurice asserts, that there is a perpetual recurrence of the sacred triad in the Asiatic mythology; that the doctrine of a trinity was promulgated in India, in the Gita, fifteen hundred years before the birth of Plato; for of that remote date is the Indian history of Mahabharat, in which a triad of deity is alluded to and designated. Hence he supposes that the doctrine of a trinity was delivered from the ancient patriarchs, and diffused over the East during the migration and dispersion of their Hebrew posterity.

But to return to Hinduism, we are told the nine incarnations of Vishnu represent the deity descending in a human shape to accomplish certain awful and important events, as in the instance of the three first; to confound blaspheming vice, to subvert gigantic tyranny, and to avenge oppressed innocence, as in the five following; or finally, as in the ninth, to abolish human sacrifices.

The Hindu system teaches the existence of good and evil genii, or, in the language of Hindostan, debtas, dewtas, or devitas. These are represented as eternally conflicting together; and the incessant conflict which subsisted between them filled creation with uproar, and all its subordinate classes with dismay.

The doctrine of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, is universally believed in India, in which country it is supposed to have originated many centuries before the birth of Plato, and was first promulgated in the Gita of Uyasa, the Plato of India. This doctrine teaches that degenerate spirits, fallen from their original rectitude, migrate through various spheres, in the bodies of different animals.

The Hindu supposes that there are fourteen bobuns, or spheres—seven below, and seven above the earth. The spheres above the earth are gradually ascending. The highest is the residence of Brama and his particular favourites. After the soul transmigrates through various animal mansions, it ascends the great sidereal ladder of seven gates, and through the revolving spheres, which are called in India the bobuns of purification.

“Our own earth,” remarks Dr. Duff, “the first of the ascending series of worlds, is declared to be ‘circular or flat, like the flower of the water-lily, in which the petals project beyond each other.’ Its habitable portion consists of seven circular islands or continents, each surrounded by a different ocean. The central or metropolitan island, destined to be the abode of man, is named Jamba Dwip, around which rolls the sea of salt water; next follows the second circular island, and around it the sea of sugar-cane juice; then the third, and around it the sea of spirituous liquors; then the fourth, and around it the sea of clarified butter; then the fifth, and around it the sea of sour curds; then the sixth, and around it the sea of milk; then the seventh and last, and around it, the sea of sweet water. Beyond this last ocean is an uninhabited country of pure gold, so prodigious in extent that it equals all the islands with their accompanying oceans in magnitude. It is begirt with a bounding wall of stupendous mountains, which enclose, within their bosom, realms of everlasting darkness.

“The central island, the destined habitation of the human race, is several hundred thousand miles in diameter; and the sea that surrounds it is of the same breadth. The second island is double the diameter of the first, and so is the sea that surrounds it. And each of the remaining islands and seas in succession is double the breadth of its immediate predecessor. So that the diameter of the whole earth amounts to several hundred thousand millions of miles—occupying a portion of space of manifold larger dimensions than that which actually intervenes between the earth and the sun! Yea, if our imagination could take the wings of the morning and dilate itself into a capacity for grasping what approximates the infinite; and if it could enable us to form the conception of a circular mass of solid matter, whose diameter exceeded that of the orbit of Herschell, the most distant planet in our solar system, such a mass would not equal in magnitude the earth of the Hindu mythologists!”

It is the invariable belief of the Brahmans, that man is a fallen creature. Their doctrine of the transmigration of the soul is built upon this foundation. The professed design of the metempsychosis was to restore the fallen soul to its pristine state of perfection and blessedness. The Hindus represent the Deity as punishing only to reform his creatures. Nature itself exhibits one vast field of purgatory for the classes of existence. Their sacred writings represent the whole universe as an ample and august theatre for the probationary exertion of millions of beings, who are supposed to be so many spirits degraded from the high honours of angelical distinction, and condemned to ascend, through various gradations of toil and suffering, to that exalted sphere of perfection and happiness which they enjoyed before their defection.

It is supposed that Pythagoras derived his doctrine of transmigration from the Indian Brahmans; for in the Institutes of Menu, said to be compiled many centuries before Pythagoras was born, there is a long chapter on transmigration and beatitude. It is there asserted, that so far as vital souls, addicted to sensuality, indulge themselves in forbidden pleasures, even to the same degree shall the acuteness of their senses be raised in their future bodies, that they may suffer analogous pain.

This doctrine, so universally prevalent in Asia, that man is a fallen creature, gave birth to the persuasion, that by severe sufferings, and a long series of probationary discipline, the soul might be restored to its primitive purity. Hence, oblations the most costly, and sacrifices the most sanguinary, in the hope of propitiating the angry powers, for ever loaded the altars of the Pagan deities. They had even sacrifices denominated those of regeneration, and those sacrifices were always profusely stained with blood.

The Hindus suppose that the vicious are consigned to continued punishment in the animation of successive animal forms, till, at the stated period, another renovation of the four grand astronomical periods shall commence, upon the dissolution of the present. Then they are called to begin anew the probationary journey of souls, and all will be finally happy.

The destruction of the existing world by fire is another tenet of the Brahmans.

Besides their various and frequent ablutions, and the daily offerings of rice, fruits, and ghee, at the pagodas, the Hindus have a grand annual sacrifice, not very unlike that of the scape-goat among the Hebrews, only that it is a horse, and not a goat, which they offer with great ceremony.

The temples, or pagodas, for divine worship in India, are magnificent; and their religious rites are pompous and splendid. Since the Hindus admit that the Deity occasionally assumes an elementary form, without defiling his purity, they make various idols to assist their imaginations, when they offer up their prayers to the invisible Deity.

From the same conviction of human depravity, and the necessity of atonement, arises the practice of voluntary torture which they inflict upon themselves.

We have already mentioned, under the term CASTES, the various tribes into which the nation is divided. As to the number of their gods, it is stated by Mr. Ward at three hundred and thirty millions; and their representative idols are diversified into almost every form the imagination could suggest: some highly ridiculous, as the monkey gods, and others grossly obscene, as the Lingu, the Phallus of Hindostan. This is worshipped by the women, to promote fruitfulness.

Kartikeya, the god of war, is represented as riding on a peacock, with six faces and twelve arms, and presents a singular specimen of the curious manner in which the Hindus portray their deities.

Their sects are numerously diversified, but the following three are stated as the principal:—

1. The worshippers of Shiva, who is represented as a white man, with five faces and four arms, riding on a bull. In one hand he holds an axe, to destroy the wicked; in a second, a deer, alluding to one said to have fled from sacrifice, and taken refuge under his protection, &c. He resembles the Greek Bacchus, both in his form and the obscenity of his rites.

2. The worshippers of Vishnu, who is drawn as a black man with four arms, sitting on a monster called Gurooru. He bears in his hands the sacred shell, the chukru, the lotus, and a club. Vishnu is called the preserver, and though without temples, has the greatest number of worshippers.

3. The worshippers of Durga, the wife of Shiva, who is represented as a yellow female, with arms (holding weapons), and sitting on a bier. She is the Minerva of India, and her festivals are numerous attended. The Brahmans are chiefly worshippers of Shiva and Durga.

Beside these, there are two other sects of some celebrity. 1. The Sourus, or worshippers of Sooryu, or the sun; and, 2. The Ganuputyus, or worshippers of Guneshu, a fat, short, red man, with four arms and an elephant's head, sitting on a rat—a very popular and common idol.

But these are merely images to amuse the vulgar. The Brahmans have a secret doctrine, as well as the Greek philosophers; and that doctrine, according to Mr. Ward, is a specious atheism.

The following remarks of Dr. Duff, afford us a striking contrast between Hinduism and Christianity: "Of all the systems of false religion ever fabricated by the perverse ingenuity of fallen man, Hinduism is surely the most stupendous—whether we consider the boundless extent of its range, or the boundless multiplicity of its component parts. Of all systems of false religion it is that which seems to embody the largest amount and variety of semblances and counterfeits of divinely revealed facts and doctrines. In this respect it appears to hold the same relation to the primitive patriarchal faith, that Roman Catholicism does to the primitive apostolic faith. It is, in fact, the Popery of primitive patriarchal Christianity. All the terms and names expressive of the sublimest truths, originally revealed from heaven, it still retains; and under these it contrives to inculcate diametrically opposite and contradictory errors. Its account of the creation and destruction of the universe—of the floods and conflagrations to which it is alternately subjected—of the divine origin, present sinfulness, and final destiny of the soul—together with many cognate and subsidiary statements, must be regarded as embodying, under the corruptions of tradition and the exaggerations of fancy, some of the grandest truths ever communicated by the Almighty to man, whether before or after the fall. Its nomenclature on the subject of the unity and spirituality of the one great, supreme, self-existent Lord, is most copious; but, when analyzed, it presents us with nothing better than an infinite negation. Its vocabulary, descriptive of the natural attributes of the Great Spirit, superabounds to overflowing; but it evacuates every one of them of absolute perfection. There is unchangeableness; though constantly subject, at the confluence of certain cycles of time, not merely to alteration of plans and purposes, but to change of essence. There is omnipotence; but bereft of creative energy, it is limited to the power of eduction and fabrication. There is omniscience; but it is restricted to the brief period of wakefulness, at the time of manifesting the universe. And so of other natural attributes. Instead of possessing moral attributes, the Supreme Spirit is represented as assuming, when he awakes, certain generalized active qualities, which admit of being predicated of fire, or air, or water, or any other material substance, as well as spirit! What a contrast to all this do the statements of the Bible exhibit! Here we find the supreme, eternal, self-existent Spirit—Jehovah—distinguished by all the marks and characteristics of inherent independent personality, and arrayed in all the glory and grandeur of attributes infinitely perfect. His unchangeableness is absolute; being that of unalterable rectitude of will—innumerable purity and excellence of nature and essence. His omnipotence is absolute; being the power which baffles all finite conception—the power of summoning everything into being out of nothing. His omniscience is absolute—extending not merely to the actual knowledge of all things that now are, or shall be, but to a perfect knowledge of all the countless possibilities of things; and that, too, throughout every moment of a never-ending eternity. And if the notices of Jehovah's natural attributes roll along the sacred pages with a sublimity of conception, a majesty of expression, a variety of beautiful illustration—all their own—what shall we say of the Bible portraiture of His moral attributes? Transcendently glorious though the former be, they seem almost eclipsed by reason of the glory of that which excelleth. They are the latter, which, in the Bible, may be said to occupy the foreground. His goodness, ever delighting to communicate without being exhausted; His mercy, or disposition to forgive, unallied with weakness; His pity, and compassion, and loving-kindness, unsullied by any tincture of frailty—all are set forth and illustrated in terms of inimitable tenderness. His awful holiness, or consuming hatred of all sin, and burning love of all rectitude; His inflexible justice, and unspotted righteousness; His unerring truth, and unchanging faithfulness;—all are portrayed with a vigour, variety, and sublimity of language, that absorb, ravish, and overpower the faculties. And when the moral are viewed in their inseparable association with the natural attributes, the whole constitutes an absolute, unbounded plenitude of perfection, in the eternal possession of which Jehovah shines forth under an aspect of ineffable glory, majesty, and loveliness—unapproached and unapproachable by the most seraphic spirit in his highest flight of meditative and adoring wonder."

This gigantic system of error, however, is daily losing ground in India. Its power over the mind of the natives is evidently becoming weaker, and the symptoms of decay are obvious. On this point we may quote the testimony of one well qualified to judge—the Rev. Dr. Wilson of Bombay. "We have seen enough," says he, "to compel us to observe the fact, that Hinduism itself has been subjected to constant change. The elemental worship of the Vedas has grown old. Their animal sacrifices have been abolished by authority. Their gods have been displaced from their spheres and stations; and other gods, unknown to them by name or description, have taken their place. Private tabernacles have become public temples. The site of the fire-altar is occupied by images, the work of men's hands. Legendary lore has been substituted for prayer. Primitive equality, modified by the respect given to influence, attainments, and occupation, has been destroyed by the establishment of caste. Laws, regulations, precepts and ceremonies, have been multiplied to infinity. Tradition has been supplanted by discussion, and discussion by imaginative invention. The customs of society have been nearly completely altered. The Hindus of the present day would not share the privileges of religion with their ancestors, were they to revive. There has been a gradual, but sure process of deterioration; and farther and farther have the Hindus wandered from the paths of truth. But it will not be so always. Their dominion has passed away; and the benevolence of England now rules in their land. A voice calls them to return; and it will wax louder and louder, till they for ever forsake the mountains of error and destruction. The page of true inspiration is beginning to open to their view; and they may read, not in an obsolete and dead language, but in their own living tongues, the wonderful works of God. The gift is presented to all, without distinction of station, and by those who are the ministers, and not the lords, of the people. Truthful science, delighting to call herself the handmaid of religion, is displacing the prostitute 'philosophy, falsely so called.' Veritable history, recording the ways of God to man, engages the attention of those who have been perplexed by 'endless genealogies.' The light of the Sun of Righteousness begins to dawn on the eastern horizon; and it will continue to grow till the perfect day. The gods that have not made these heavens and this earth shall perish, and Jehovah shall be acknowledged to be the Most High. Meek and enlightened devotion will be substituted for formal and frivolous ceremony. The drink-offerings and oblations of blood will cease; and in the cross of Christ will be seen the great and only atonement. The muddy waves of the Ganges will be forsaken for that Fountain which has been opened for sin and for uncleanness. The shouts of those who are mad on their idols will grow faint; and there will be heard, as it were, 'the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth!'"

HINGE. This word is to be found only in 1 Kings vii. 50, where we are informed the hinges of the doors of Solomon's temple were made of gold; and in Prov. xxvi. 14, which runs thus: "As the door turneth upon his hinges, so doth the slothful upon his bed." There is here a slowness of motion evidently pointed at, which shows us that there must have been some difficulty in the motion of the doors; and this is actually the case in the East, from the circumstance that the doors move on pivots, and not on such hinges as we are accustomed to, and as the weight of the door rests on the lower pivot, it soon wears, and the movement of the door is retarded to some extent.

HINNOM, VALLEY OF, called also Tophet, and by the Greeks (or rather Grecian Jews) Gehenna; a small valley on the south-east of Jerusalem, at the foot of Mount Zion, where the Canaanites, and afterwards the Israelites, sacrificed their children to the idol Moloch, by making them "pass through the fire," or burning them. (See GEHENNA—HELL.) Its present appearance is thus described by Professor Robinson: "Its bottom is rock, covered with a thin sprinkling of earth washed down from the higher ground. Both its sides are cut down perpendicularly, as if it had served for a quarry to the ancient city. Its breadth is about fifty yards, and its depth perhaps twenty, measuring from the bottom to the highest part of Mount Zion. Nothing is known of the person who has given his name to the valley. A winter torrent runs through its bed, and falls into the brook Kidron."

HIRAM, a king of Tyre, who is spoken of in profane authors as remarkable for his wealth and splendour. From his vicinity to Lebanon, which abounded in cedar, he seems to have supplied the Jewish kings with precious building materials, which were carried along the coasts on floats to Joppa or some other convenient port, from which they were easily conveyed overland to Jerusalem. Thus a sovereign of this name built a palace for David, on his accession to the throne of Judah; and the same person, or more probably his son, sent ambassadors to Solomon, on his accession to the throne, and furnished him with timber and stones, and even workmen, to build the temple of Jerusalem. The name of Hiram is also applied to a skilful workman who was sent for by Solomon out of Tyre. 1 Kings vii. 13.

HIRELING, a man that works for hire. Moses requires that the hireling should be paid as soon as his work is over: "The wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night unto the morning." Lev. xix. 13. An hireling's days, or year, is a kind of proverb, signifying a full year, without abating anything of it: "His days are like the days of an hireling" (Job vii. 1); the days of man are like those of an hireling; as nothing is deducted from them, so nothing, likewise, is added to them. And again: "Till he shall accomplish as an hireling his day" (Job xiv. 6); to the time of death, which he waits for as an hireling for the end of the day. The following passage from Morier's Travels in Persia, illustrates our Lord's parable of the labourers in the vineyard: "The most conspicuous building in Hamadan is the Mesjid Jumah, a large mosque now falling into decay, and before it a maidan or square, which serves as a market-place. Here we observed, every morning before the sun rose, that a numerous band of peasants were collected with spades in their hands, waiting, as they informed us, to be hired for the day to work in the surrounding fields. This custom, which I have never seen in any other part of Asia, forcibly struck me as a most happy illustration of our Saviour's parable of the labourers in the vineyard, in Matt. xx.; particularly when passing by the same place late in the day, we still found others standing idle, and remembered his words, 'Why stand ye here all the day idle?' as most applicable to their situation; for, on putting the very same question to them, they answered us, 'Because no man hath hired us.'" The wages of an hireling for a day appears, from the parable now referred to, to have been at that time in Judea, a Roman denarius or penny, equal to sevenpence three farthings of our money.

HISS usually expresses insult and contempt: "All they who shall see the destruction of this temple, shall be astonished, and shall hiss, and say, How comes it that the Lord hath thus treated this city?" 1 Kings ix. 8; Job xxvii. 23; Jer. xix. 8, xlix. 17, 1. 13; Lam. ii. 15, 16; Ezek. xxvii. 36; Zeph. ii. 15. To call any one with hissing, is a mark of power and authority. Isa. v. 26, vii. 18.

HISTORY, ECCLESIASTICAL. See ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

HITTITES. The descendants of Heth, the second family of Canaan mentioned by Moses, were planted in the southern division of Palestine. The principal settlements of the Hittites were in the mountainous part of the country; for the Hittites are mentioned with the Jebusites as dwelling in the mountains. See HETH.

HIVITES, a people descended from Canaan. Gen. x. 15-17. The inhabitants of Shechem, and the Gibeonites, were Hivites. Josh. xi. 19; Gen. xxxiv. 2. They were conquered by the Philistines. The name in Hebrew implies a serpent, and hence Bryant supposes them to be Ophites or serpent-worshippers. They occupied the northern parts of Canaan, for we find them thus spoken of in Judges iii. 3: "Namely, five lords of the Philistines, and all the Canaanites, and the Sidonians, and the Hivites that dwelt in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baalhermon unto the entering in of Hamath."

HOBAB, the son of Jethro, and the brother-in-law of Moses. At the earnest solicitation of the Jewish lawgiver, he was induced to accompany the Israelites throughout a part of their journey to Canaan. Numb. x. 29. In Judges i. 16, Hobab is called a Kenite; and hence the idea has been entertained by some, that the Kenites, who inhabited a district south of Judah, were descended from Hobab.

HOBAB, a place said in Gen. xiv. 15 to be "on the left hand of Damascus." Calmet supposes it to correspond with Abila; and Taylor, the continuator of Calmet, regards it as the same with the present Habaya.

HOLD. To take hold of God and his covenant, is to embrace him as given in the Gospel, and by faith to plead his promises. Isa. lxiv. 7, lvi. 4. Christians hold forth the word of life; they, by practising it in their lives, give light and instruction to others. Phil. ii. 16. Not holding Christ the head, is neglecting to draw gracious influence from him, and to yield due subjection to him, and admitting saints and angels as mediators in his stead. Col. ii. 19.

HOLINESS, devotedness to the great end of being and doing good; hence, freedom from sin, or the conformity of the heart to God. It does not consist in knowledge, talents, nor outward ceremonies of religion, but hath its seat in the heart, and is the effect of the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit. Eph. ii. 8–10; John iii. 5; Rom. v. 5, vi. 22. It is the essence of happiness, and the basis of true dignity. Prov. iii. 17, iv. 8. It will manifest itself by the propriety of our conversation, regularity of our temper, and uniformity of our lives. It is a principle progressive in its operation (Prov. iv. 18), and absolutely essential to the enjoyment of God here and hereafter. Heb. xii. 14. See SANCTIFICATION—WORKS.

HOLINESS OF GOD is the purity and rectitude of his character, or the consecration of all his high attributes to promote the highest good of the universe. It is an essential attribute of God, and the glory, lustre, and harmony of all his other perfections. Exodus xv. 11. He could not be God without it. Deut. xxxii. 4. It is infinite and unbounded—it cannot be increased or diminished; immutable and invariable. Mal. iii. 6. God is originally holy; he is so of and in himself, and the author and promoter of all holiness among his creatures. The holiness of God is visible by his works; he made all things holy. Gen. i. 31. By his providences, all which are to promote holiness in the end. Heb. xii. 10. By his grace, which influences the subjects of it to be holy. Tit. ii. 10–12. By his word, which commands it. 1 Pet. i. 15. By his ordinances, which he hath appointed for that end. Jer. xlv. 4, 5. By the punishment of sin in the death of Christ (Isa. liii.), and by the eternal punishment of it in wicked men. Matt. xxv. 46. See ATTRIBUTES.

HOLOCAUST, (formed from holos, "whole," and kaiō, "I consume with fire;") a kind of sacrifice, wherein the whole offering was burned or consumed by fire, as an acknowledgment that God, the Creator, Preserver, and Lord of all, was worthy of all honour and worship, and as a token of men's giving themselves entirely up to him. It is called in Scripture a BURNT-OFFERING (which see). Sacrifices of this sort are often mentioned by the Heathens as well as Jews. They appear to have been in use long before the institution of the other Jewish sacrifices by the law of Moses. Job i. 5, xlii. 8; Gen. xxii. 13, viii. 20. On this account, the Jews, who would not allow the Gentiles to offer on their altars any other sacrifices peculiarly enjoined by the law of Moses, permitted them by the Jewish priests to offer holocausts, because these were a sort of sacrifices prior to the law, and common to all nations. During their subjection to the Romans, it was no uncommon thing for those Gentiles to offer sacrifices to the God of Israel at Jerusalem. Holocausts were deemed by the Jews the most excellent of all their sacrifices. See SACRIFICE.

HOLON, a city of refuge in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 51, xxi. 15.

HOLY, set apart from a common to a special use; devoted to God. See HOLINESS.

HOLY DAY, a day set apart, in Romish and Anglican Churches, for the commemoration of some saint, or some remarkable particular in the life of Christ. It has been a question agitated by divines, whether it be proper to appoint or keep any holy days, the Sabbath excepted. The advocates for holy days suppose that they have a tendency to impress the minds of the people with a greater sense of religion; that if the acquisitions and victories of men be celebrated with the highest joy, how much more those events which relate to the salvation of man, such as the birth, death, and resurrection of Christ. On the other side, it is observed, that if holy days had been necessary under the present dispensation, Jesus Christ would have ordained something respecting them, whereas he was silent about them; that it is bringing us again into that bondage to ceremonial laws from which Christ freed us; that it is a tacit reflection on the Head of the Church in not appointing them; that it is a species of will-worship, for which there is no Scripture authority; that such days, on the whole, are more pernicious than useful to society, as they open a door for indolence and profaneness; yea, that Scripture speaks against such days. Gal. iv. 9–11.

HOLY GHOST, the third person in the Trinity, the Comforter of the Church of Christ. See PROCESSION.

I. The Holy Ghost is a real and distinct person in the Godhead. (1.) Personal powers of rational understanding and will are ascribed to him. 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11, xii. 11; Eph. iv. 3. (2.) He is joined with the other two divine persons, as the object of divine worship and fountain of blessings. Matt. xxviii. 19; 2 Cor. xiii. 14. (3.) In the Greek, a masculine article often is joined to his name, Pneuma, which is naturally of the neuter gender. John xiv. 26, xv. 26, xvi. 13; Eph. i. 13. (4.) He appeared under the emblem of a dove, and of cloven tongues of fire. Matt. iii. 16; Acts ii. 1–4. (5.) Personal offices of an intercessor belong to him. Rom. viii. 26. (6.) He is represented as performing a multitude of personal acts, as teaching, speaking, witnessing, &c. Mark xiii. 11; Acts xx. 23; Rom. viii. 15, 16; 1 Cor. vi. 19; Acts xv. 28, xvi. 6, 7, &c.

II. It is no less evident that the Holy Ghost is a divine person, equal in power and glory with the Father and Son. (1.) Names proper only to the Most High God are ascribed to him; as Jehovah (Acts xxviii. 25, with Isa. vi. 9; and Heb. iii. 7–9, with Exod. xvii. 7; Jer. xxxi. 31–34, Heb. x. 15–17); God (Acts v. 3, 4); Lord (2 Cor. iii. 17, 18); "The Lord, the Spirit." (2.) Attributes proper only to the Most High God are ascribed to him; as omniscience (1 Cor.

ii. 10, 11; Isa. xl. 13, 14), omnipresence (Ps. cxxxix. 7; Eph. ii. 17, 18; Rom. viii. 26, 27), omnipotence (Luke i. 35), eternity (Heb. ix. 14). (3.) Divine works are evidently ascribed to him. Gen. i. 2; Job xxvi. 13; Ps. xxxiii. 6, civ. 30. (4.) Worship, proper only to God, is required and ascribed to him. Isa. vi. 3; with Acts xxviii. 25; Rom. ix. 1; Rev. i. 4; 2 Cor. xiii. 14; Matt. xxviii. 19.

III. The agency or work of the Holy Ghost is divided by some into extraordinary and ordinary. The former, by immediate inspiration, making men prophets; the latter, by his regenerating and sanctifying influences, making men saints. It is only the latter which is now to be expected. This is more particularly displayed in—(1.) Conviction of sin. John xvi. 8, 9. (2.) Conversion. 1 Cor. xii. ii. 10, 12; Eph. i. 17, 18; John iii. 5, 6. (3.) Sanctification. 2 Thess. ii. 13; 1 Cor. vi. 11; Rom. xv. 16. (4.) Consolation. John xiv. 16, 26. (5.) Direction. John xiv. 17, 26; Rom. viii. 14. (6.) Confirmation. Rom. viii. 16, 26; 1 John ii. 24; Eph. i. 13, 14.

HOLY WATER. On entering a Romish church, the first thing that strikes you as peculiar is the stone or marble basin of holy water placed near the door, in which the more ignorant and devout dip their fingers, and then, with their wet fingers, make upon themselves the sign of the cross. Holy water is a thing of universal use, and to which is ascribed wonderful potency in the Romish system.

The following account of the ceremony by which holy water is made has been given by Dr Murray, as he witnessed it at Rome:—

“The bishop read a little, then all sang and chanted. Thrice, at intervals, the bishop, with his hand, made the sign of the cross in the water, making quite a ruffle on its surface as he drew his hand through it; thrice, at intervals, he breathed into the water, commanding it at each time to receive the Holy Ghost. Then, from a vessel like a coffee-pot, he poured oil into it in the form of a cross; and from another similar vessel, at a brief interval, he poured some other liquid into the tub, again in the figure of a cross. At another interval he took both vessels by the handles in his right hand, and bringing their spouts near together, he poured into the tub a little stream in the form of a cross, formed by the liquids from both vessels uniting. A powder, something like fine salt, was also cast into it. Then, after mixing up all together, he washed his hands in the compound, which were most reverently wiped by his attendants. Before putting them in the water, his hands were divested of their gloves and rings, and were most devoutly kissed, as was his crook when taken by his attendants. It was thus I saw holy water made in Rome.

“It is sprinkled upon candles—upon palms on Palm-Sunday—upon the garments of the living—upon the coffins of the dead,—upon dogs, sheep, asses, mules, beds, houses, meat, bells, and cannons.”

HOMER, the same as the Cor, a Hebrew measure of ten baths, or thirty-two pecks and one pint of English corn measure. Isa. v. 10. It is about seventy-six gallons. See COR.

HOMILY (Gr. homilia), a sermon or discourse upon some point of religion, delivered in a plain manner, so as to be easily understood by the common people. The Greek word, says M. Fleury, signifies a familiar discourse, like the Latin sermo; and discourses delivered in the church took these denominations, to intimate that they were not harangues, or matters of ostentation and flourish, like those of profane orators, but familiar and useful discourses, as of a master to his disciples, or a father to his children. All the homilies of the Greek and Latin fathers are composed by bishops.

“Homilies of the Church of England,” are those which were composed at the Reformation, to be read in churches, in order to supply the defects of sermons.

HONEY was formerly very plentiful in Palestine; and hence frequent expressions of Scripture, which import that that country was a land flowing with milk and honey. Moses says, that the Lord brought his people into a land whose rocks drop oil, and whose stones produce honey. Deut. xxxii. 13; see also Ps. lxxxii. 16. The Heathen were accustomed to offer honey in their sacrifices; and hence probably it was forbidden to the Jews (Lev. ii. 11), although they were enjoined to present the first-fruits for the use of the priests. The Jewish doctors observe that the word rendered honey in 2 Chron. xxxi. 5, signifies properly dates. Gesenius thinks that the honey mentioned in Gen. xliii. 11 is the syrup of grapes; that is, must boiled to the thickness of a syrup, which is still frequently exported from Palestine, especially from the neighbourhood of Hebron, to Egypt. Honey occupies a prominent place among the delicacies of the East. So agreeable was this food, that they seem to have sometimes indulged in it to excess. Hence the warning of Solomon: “Hast thou found honey? eat so much as is sufficient for thee, lest thou be filled therewith, and vomit it.” Prov. xxv. 16. And again: “It is not good to eat much honey: so for men to search their own glory is not glory.” Verse 27. The superior flavour of honey in the comb is frequently alluded to in the Sacred Writings. Thus: “More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.” Ps. xix. 10. We find what appears to us a strange combination of fish and honey in Luke xxiv. 42: “And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honeycomb.” Such a meal, however, is sometimes used in the East at this day.

HONOUR, a testimony of esteem or submission, expressed by words and outward behaviour, by which we make known the veneration and respect we entertain for any one, on account of his dignity or merit. The word is also used in general for the esteem due to virtue, glory, reputation, and probity; as also, for an exactness in performing whatever we have promised; and in this last sense we use the term, a man of honour. It is also applied to two different kinds of virtue; bravery in men, and chastity in women.

HOOD. It seems to be another name for a turban, and occurs in Isa. iii. 23. It was composed of folds of shawls loosely thrown around the head, and falling down the back, so that the corners were neatly brought round to cover the bosom. See HEAD-DRESS.

HOOK. This word is found in 2 Kings xix. 28. It denotes a ring either of iron or wood, which was passed through the nostrils of wild or intractable beasts, and attached to a rope which, when pulled by the hand of the driver, gave him so complete a command over them, that he could turn them at will in any direction. An allusion to this custom occurs in Job xli. 2, and Isa. xxxvii. 29. Hooks were sometimes used as instruments of torture in the East. The criminals were thrown upon hooks, which were fastened in the wall, where they frequently hung in the most exquisite torture thirty or forty hours before they expired. Perhaps the bodies of Saul and his sons were fixed to such hooks; for it is said, "They fastened his body and the bodies of his sons to the wall of Beth-shan." 1 Sam. xxxi. 10.

HOPE is the desire of some good, attended with the possibility, at least, of obtaining it; and is enlivened with joy, greater or less, according to the probability there is of possessing the object of our hope. The hope of the Christian is an expectation of all necessary good, both in time and eternity, founded on the promises, relations, and perfections of God, and on the offices, righteousness, and intercession of Christ. It is a compound of desire, expectation, patience, and joy. Rom. viii. 24, 25. It may be considered—1. As pure (1 John iii. 2, 3), as it is resident in that heart which is cleansed from sin. 2. As good (2 Thess. ii. 16, in distinction from the hope of the hypocrite), as deriving its origin from God, and centring in him. 3. It is called lively (1 Pet. i. 3), as it proceeds from spiritual life, and renders one active and lively in good works. 4. It is courageous (Rom. v. 5; 1 Thess. v. 8), because it excites fortitude in all the troubles of life, and yields support in the hour of death. Prov. xiv. 32. 5. Sure (Heb. vi. 19), because it will not disappoint us, and is fixed on a sure foundation. 6. Joyful (Rom. v. 2), as it produces the greatest felicity in the anticipation of complete deliverance from all evil.

HOPHNI and PHINEHAS, sons of Eli, the high priest, were sons of Belial; that is, wicked and dissolute persons. 1 Sam. ii. 12. They knew not the Lord, nor performed the functions of their ministry as they ought, but disgraced their office by the most odious rapacity and impurity. The Lord threatened them and their father by the young prophet Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 11, 12), and soon afterwards Hophni and Phinehas were slain in battle by the Philistines, together with thirty thousand men of Israel. See ELI.

HOPKINSIANS, so called from the Rev. Samuel Hopkins, an American divine, who, in his sermons and tracts, has made several additions to the sentiments first advanced by the celebrated Jonathan Edwards, late president of New Jersey College. His doctrinal views are contained in his "System of Divinity," published in a second edition at Boston, in 1811, in two volumes, 8vo.

The following is a summary of the distinguishing tenets of the Hopkinsians. That all true virtue, or real holiness, consists in disinterested benevolence. That all sin consists in selfishness. That there are no promises of regenerating grace made to the ungodly or unregenerate. That the impotency of sinners, with respect to believing in Christ, is not natural, but moral. That, in order to faith in Christ, a sinner must approve in his heart of the divine conduct, even though God should cast him off for ever; which, however, neither implies love of misery, nor hatred of happiness. That the infinitely wise and holy God has exerted his omnipotent power in such a manner as he purposed should be followed with the existence and entrance of moral evil into the system. That the introduction of sin is, upon the whole, for the general good. That repentance is before faith in Christ. That though men became sinners by Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have and are accountable for no sins but personal. That though believers are justified through Christ's righteousness, yet his righteousness is not transferred to them.

The Hopkinsians warmly contend for the doctrine of the divine decrees, that of particular election, total depravity, the special influences of the Spirit of God in regeneration, justification by faith alone, the final perseverance of the saints, and the consistency between entire freedom and absolute dependence; and therefore claim it as their just due, since the world will make distinctions, to be called Hopkinsian Calvinists.

HOR, a mountain in Arabia Petraea, on the confines of Idumea, and probably the same with Mount Seir. One particular mountain of this tract, however, seems to be specially intended in Scripture. Here Aaron died and was buried, in the fortieth year after the departure from Egypt. Deut. xxxii. 50; Numb. xx. 25, 26, xxvii. 13. A small building is shown in Mount Hor, which is said to be the tomb of Aaron. It is a white building, surmounted by a cupola, and having a descent of several steps into a chamber excavated in a rock. Moses, in describing the promised land, says: "And this shall be your north border: from the great sea ye shall point out for you Mount Hor: from Mount Hor ye shall point out your border unto the entrance of Hamath; and the goings forth of the border shall be to Zedad." Numb. xxxiv. 7, 8. Joshua, again, speaking of the lands which remained to be possessed, says: "And the land of the Gileites, and all Lebanon, toward the sun-rising, from Baal-gad under Mount Hermon unto the entering into Hamath." Josh. xiii. 5. By comparing these two passages, it seems probable that the Mount Hor, or Hor-ha-hor, as it is in the Hebrew, to which Moses refers, is the same with Mount Hermon, or, at all events, includes it.

HOREB, a mountain in Arabia, so close upon Sinai, that it may be regarded as a ridge of the same mountain. It lies to the west of Sinai, and is often confounded with it. At this mountain Moses was feeding the flocks of Jethro, when the Lord appeared to him in the burning bush, and commissioned him to be the deliverer of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage. It was at the foot of this mountain that the water gushed forth from the smitten rock. Elijah retired to Horeb to avoid the persecution of Jezebel. In Exod. xix. the law is said to have been proclaimed from Sinai; but in Deut. v. it is said to have been published from Horeb. The height of Horeb is from twelve to fifteen hundred feet high, according to Dr Wilson.

HOREM, a town belonging to the tribe of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 38.

HOR-HAGIDGAD, the name of an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness. Numb. xxxiii. 32.

HORITES, an ancient people, who dwelt in the mountains of Seir. Gen. xiv. 6. They had princes, and were powerful before Esau conquered their country. The Horites and the Edomites seem afterwards to have composed but one people. Deut. ii. 1, xxxiii. 2; Judg. v. 4. Mount Hor, in the course of ages, exchanged its original name for Seir, the name of a distinguished Horite, whose descendants Moses enumerates in Gen. xxxvi. 20. The Horites seem to have inhabited the country as far as the wilderness of Paran.

HORMAH, originally called Zephath, the ancient capital of Arad. It was at first assigned to Judah, and was afterwards ceded to the Simeonites. It was called Hormah, or accursed, because the Israelites, by a solemn vow, doomed the city of King Arad to extermination. To the elders of this city David despatched part of the booty taken from the Amalekites.

HORN, an eminence or projection. We read in the Old Testament of the horns of the altar, Exod. xxvii. 2; xxx. 2; which appear to have been nothing more than risings or projections at each corner of the altar. The use of them may be gathered from the expression used in Ps. cxviii. 27: "God is the Lord, which hath shewed us light: bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar,"—thus these horns were designed for the purpose of fastening the victim to the altar before it was slain. Professor Bush denies the probability of this explanation, and inclines to the idea that these horns were symbols of sovereignty, power, and majesty; and in support of this opinion, he refers to Hab. iii. 4: "And his brightness was as the light; he had horns coming out of his hand: and there was the hiding of his power." There can be no doubt that frequently in Scripture the horn is used as an emblem of power. David, for example, often speaks of God exalting the horn of his people; and breaking the horn of the wicked. Kingdoms are also described under the symbol of horns. Thus in Dan. vii. 8: "I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things." Frequent allusions to the horn in Scripture may be illustrated by reference to a peculiar species of head-dress worn in some places in the East, but especially by females among the Maronites and Druses in Syria. It is thus described by Pliny Fisk: "The women in these parts wear an ornament of a different kind from anything I ever saw elsewhere. It is of a conical form, and worn on the forehead. They call it tantoor. The tantoor is generally of silver, though sometimes of wood or leather. Each tantoor is about a foot long, and three or four inches in diameter at the base, and half that at the top. The silver ones descend from generation to generation, and are highly esteemed. They are sometimes worn by females whose dress and employments indicate great poverty. The tantoor is usually covered with a veil nearly as large as a sheet, which covers almost the whole body. This is drawn over the face, or removed from it at pleasure." In some places the horn points backwards, and in others, forwards. An unmarried woman is known by the horn being placed on the crown of her head, whereas a married woman wears it on the right side, a widow on the left, and those who have children raise it from its oblique direction a few inches higher, inclining towards the perpendicular. The horn, however, was not confined to women. Mr. Bruce tells us, that in Abyssinia the governors of provinces wear, in token of their dignity, a conical piece of gilt silver bound upon the forehead, and projecting about four inches. This is called a horn, and only worn on special occasions. There are many references in Scripture to this peculiarity in Oriental dress. Ps. lxxv. 10, lxxxix. 17, xcii. 10; Lam. ii. 3. The horn is also mentioned in Josh. vi. 5, as a musical instrument. At first it was made of the horns of oxen. Afterwards, as in the time of Joshua, it was made of rams' horns. Gesenius says that it was made of horn, or at least in the form of a horn. It was used in the field of battle, on solemn occasions, and when the different anathemas were denounced at the feast of trumpets.

HORNET, a kind of large wasp, which has a powerful sting. The Lord drove out the Canaanites before Israel by means of this insect. Deut. vii. 20; Josh. xxiv. 12. (See FLY.) A few thousands of them would be sufficient to throw the best disciplined army into confusion. Two kings of the Amorites were driven from their land by these hornets.

HORONAIM, a city of the Moabites, where Sennacherib, a ruler of that country, resided. It occurs in Isa. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 3, 5.

HORROR, a passion excited by an object which causes a high degree of fear and detestation. It is a compound of wonder and fear. Sometimes it has a mixture of pleasure, from which, if predominant, it is denominated a pleasing horror. Such a horror seizes us at the view of vast and hanging precipices, a tempestuous ocean, or wild and solitary places. This passion is the original of superstition, as a wise and well tempered awe is of religion. Horror and terror seem almost to be synonymous; but the former refers more to what disgusts—the latter to that which alarms us.

HORSE (sus). Horses were very rare among the Hebrews in the early ages. The patriarchs had none; and after the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, God expressly forbade their ruler to procure them: "He shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses; forasmuch as the Lord hath said, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way." Dent. xvii. 16. As horses appear to have been generally furnished by Egypt, God prohibits these—1. Lest there should be such commerce with Egypt as might lead to idolatry. 2. Lest the people might depend on a well-appointed cavalry as a means of security, and so cease from trusting in the promised aid and protection of Jehovah. 3. That they might not be tempted to extend their dominion by means of cavalry, and so get scattered among the surrounding idolatrous nations, and thus cease, in process of time, to be that distinct and separate people which God intended they should be, and without which the prophecies relative to the Messiah could not be known to have their due and full accomplishment.

In the time of the judges we find horses and war-chariots among the Canaanites, but still the Israelites had none; and hence they were generally too timid to venture down into the plains, confining their conquests to the mountainous parts of the country. David's enemies brought against him a strong force of cavalry into the field; and in the Book of Psalms the horse commonly appears only on the side of the enemies of the people of God. 2 Sam. viii. 4. Solomon, having married a daughter of Pharaoh, procured a breed of horses from Egypt; and so greatly did he multiply them, that he had four hundred stables, forty thousand stalls, and twelve thousand horsemen. 1 Kings iv. 26; 2 Chron. ix. 25. It seems that the Egyptian horses were in high repute, and were much used in war. When the Israelites were disposed to place too implicit confidence in the assistance of cavalry, the prophet remonstrated in these terms: "The Egyptians are men, and not God; and their horses are flesh, and not spirit." Isa. xxxi. 3.

Josiah took away the horses which the kings of Judah, his predecessors, had consecrated to the sun. 2 Kings xxiii. 11. This luminary was worshipped over all the East, and was represented as riding in a chariot, drawn by the most beautiful and swiftest horses in the world, and performing every day his journey from east to west, to enlighten the earth. In Persia, and among the Massagetæ, horses were sacrificed to the sun. It is thought that those which Josiah removed from the court of the temple were appointed for a similar purpose.

HORSE-LEECH (olukeh, from a root which signifies to adhere, stick close, or hang fast. Prov. xxx. 15), a sort of worm that lives in the water, of a black or brown colour, which fastens upon the flesh, and does not quit it till it is entirely full of blood. Solomon says, "The horse-leech hath two daughters, Give, give." This is so apt an emblem of an insatiable rapacity and avarice, that it has been generally used by different writers to express it.

HOSANNA, "Save, I beseech thee," or, "Give salvation," a well-known Jewish form of blessing, used at the FEAST of TABERNACLES (which see). Matt. xxi. 9, 15; Mark xi. 9, 10; John xii. 13.

HOSEA. Concerning the family of Hosea, we have no certain information, except what is furnished to us by the first verse of his prophecy, which states that he was the son of Beeri, whom some Jewish commentators confound with Beerah, a prince of the Reubenites, who was carried into captivity with the ten tribes, by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria. He prophesied during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, and Ahaz, and in the third year of Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and during the reign of Jeroboam II., king of Israel; and it is most probable that he was an Israelite, and lived in the kingdom of Samaria or of the ten tribes, as his predictions are chiefly directed against their wickedness and idolatry. But, with the severest denunciations of vengeance, he blends promises of mercy; and the transitions from the one to the other are frequently sudden and unexpected. Rosenmüller and Jahn, after Calmet, are of opinion that the title of this book is a subsequent addition, and that Hosea did not prophesy longer than from forty to sixty years, and that he died, or at least wrote his predictions, before the year 725, before the Christian era. His writings unquestionably were originally in a metrical form, although that arrangement is now, perhaps, irrecoverably lost.

Bishop Lowth thus speaks of the writings of this prophet. "The style of Hosea exhibits the appearance of very remote antiquity; it is pointed, energetic, and concise. It bears a distinguished mark of poetical composition in that pristine brevity and condensation which is observable in the sentences, and which later writers have in some measure neglected. This peculiarity has not escaped the observation of Jerome, who observes that this prophet is altogether laconic and sententious. But this very circumstance, which anciently was supposed to impart uncommon force and elegance, in the present state of Hebrew literature is productive of so much obscurity, that although the general subject of this writer is sufficiently obvious, he is the most difficult and perplexed of all the prophets." Hosea was also the name of the last king of Israel. It was in the reign of this monarch that Shalmaneser, king of the Assyrians, invaded Israel, and removed the Israelites beyond the river Euphrates.

HOSHEA, the name of Joshua, the successor of Moses, before he returned from spying the land of Canaan, when his name was changed to Jehoshua or Joshua.

HOSEN. This word occurs only once in the Sacred Writings. Dan. iii. 21. Gesenius regards it designed to denote the wide drawers or trousers which even at this day form a part of the Persian's dress.

HOSPITALITY, kindness exercised in the entertainment of strangers. This virtue, we find, is explicitly commanded by, and makes a part of the morality of, the New Testament. Thus we are expressly exhorted by an apostle, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares," referring, no doubt, to Abraham and Lot, who in the exercise of this virtue were surprised by the visits of angels.

The obligations to this duty arise from the fitness and reasonableness of it. It brings its own reward. Acts xx. 35. It is expressly commanded by God. Lev. xxv. 35, 38; Luke xvi. 9, xiv. 13, 14; Rom. xii.; Heb. xiii. 1, 2; 1 Pet. iv. 9. We have many striking examples of hospitality on divine record: Abraham (Gen. xviii. 1-8), Lot (Gen. xix. 1-3; Job xxxi. 17-22), the Shunammite (2 Kings iv. 8-10), the hospitable man mentioned in Judges (xix. 16-21), David (2 Sam. vi. 19), Obadiah (1 Kings xviii. 4), Nehemiah (Neh. v. 17, 18), Martha (Luke x. 38), Mary (Matt. xxvi. 6, 13), the primitive Christians (Acts ii. 45, 46), Priscilla and Aquila (Acts xviii. 26), Lydia (Acts xvi. 15), &c. Lastly, what should have a powerful effect on our minds, is the consideration of divine hospitality. God is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works. His sun shines and his rain falls on the evil as well as the good. His very enemies share of his bounty. He gives liberally to all men, and upbraids not; but especially we should remember the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus. Let us lay all these considerations together, and then ask ourselves whether we can find it in our hearts to be selfish, parsimonious, and inhospitable.

HOST (from the Latin hostia, in the Church of Rome, a victim or sacrifice), a name given to the elements used in the eucharist, or rather to the consecrated wafer, which they pretend to offer up every day, as a new host or sacrifice for the sins of mankind. They pay adoration to the host, upon a false presumption that the elements are no longer bread and wine, but transubstantiated into the real body and blood of Christ. (See TRANSUBSTANTIATION.) Pope Gregory IX. first decreed a bell to be rung, as a signal for the people to betake themselves to the adoration of the host. The vessel wherein the hosts are kept is called the cibory, being a large kind of covered chalice.—The word host is very frequently used in the Bible to denote a large multitude, an army. It occurs in Luke x. 35, to denote the keeper of a house of public entertainment. See INN.

HOSTAGE, a person delivered into the hands of another as the security for the performance of some engagement. Conquered kings or nations often gave hostages for the payment of their tribute, or continuance of subjection. 2 Kings xiv. 14.

HOUR. The subdivision of the day into twenty-four parts or hours has undoubtedly prevailed since the remotest ages; but the earliest mention of the hour in Scripture is to be found in Dan. iii. 6. It is probable, therefore, that, as indeed Herodotus says, the Chaldeans were the first inventors of this division of time, and that the Jews learned it from them. The Jews computed the hours of their civil day from six in the morning till six in the evening; so that their third hour, or time of morning sacrifice, corresponded with our nine o'clock; their sixth hour with our twelve; and their ninth hour, or time of evening sacrifice, with our three o'clock in the afternoon. The night, again, from six in the evening till six in the morning, was divided into watches. (See WATCH.) In after times, as appears from John xi. 9, the Jews divided the natural day into twelve portions or hours, which varied in their length with the seasons, being shorter in the winter, and longer in the summer. See DAY.

HOUSE, a place of residence. The purpose of a house being for dwelling, and that of tents being the same, they are called by one name (beth) in the Hebrew. On the same principle, the tabernacle of God, though only a tent, is sometimes called the temple; that is, the residence of God.

The Jews, after their settlement in Canaan, being chiefly employed in husbandry, dwelt generally in houses. Their houses, however, were very different, in several respects, from ours; and to understand some passages of the Bible, we must be acquainted with this difference. The same general plan of building seems to have continued from the earliest times to the present day in the eastern countries. Let us attend, then, to the account which travellers have given us of a house, as it is common there, taking for an example one of the largest and more respectable sort.

"The outside of the house presents a square figure, with a flat top and dull appearance, having only a single door in the front side, and one latticed window looking from the upper part. On opening this door, we enter into a square room of moderate size, which is called the Porch. On one side of it is fixed a seat for the accommodation of strangers, few persons being allowed to get any farther into the house, except on great festival occasions. Going straight forward through the porch, we open a second door, which brings us into a large open square, right in the centre of the building, called the Court. When we raise our eyes upward in this place, we find that there is nothing over our heads but the sky itself; the only covering which it ever has is a large veil or curtain, sometimes drawn over it by cords, from one side to the other, to keep off the sun, when a large company is to be received. When it rains, the water falls upon the pavement below, which is made of marble or some other solid material, and is carried out by a pipe or trough through the building. It is considered a great ornament and luxury to have a fountain in the middle of this pavement, constantly pouring forth its refreshing stream. Around the court, on its four sides, are seen large windows and handsome doors opening into it from all the rooms of the house. When you come out of these rooms, however, you do not generally step at once upon the pavement, but upon a covered walk, or porch with pillars, (such as we often see in front of our houses), which goes along each side of the square. If the house has more than one storey, the doors of the upper chambers open out upon a gallery or balcony that runs round above this porch, and has in front of it, toward the centre of the court, a balustrade, or some kind of railing, to keep people from falling down upon the hard pavement below. A person in going from one room to another must always come out of the first room and go into the second by the doors that open into the court, for there is no door or passage leading directly from one to the other in the inside. On great occasions, such as a marriage, company is always received in the court.

"From the square room, called the Porch, into which, as we have seen, the front door on the outside opens, a flight of stairs rises to the upper storey, and so on to the roof of the house. The roof is flat, covered over with solid earth, or a kind of plaster, made of coals, ashes, stones, and other substances, well pounded together. It is surrounded on the outside with a low wall, and on the inside, round the court, with a breastwork or railing, like the balustrade of the balcony, to prevent persons from falling either way. Deut. xxii. 8. On such roofs, a little grass will sometimes spring up; but it soon withers under the heat of the sun. Ps. cxxix. 6-8. The roof has always been much used as a place of agreeable retirement. There it is common to walk in the evening, to enjoy the cool breeze; and there in summer persons often sleep under the broad arch of heaven. On such a roof Rahab concealed the spies with stalks of flax (Josh. ii. 6); Samuel talked with Saul (1 Sam. ix. 25); David walked at eventide (2 Sam. xi. 2); and Peter employed himself in meditation and prayer (Acts x. 9.) In cities the roof of one house is joined to another, so that a person may pass along a whole street sometimes without coming down. When, therefore, our Saviour said, 'Let him that is on the house-top not go down into the house, neither enter therein, to take any thing out of his house' (Mark xiii. 15), he might mean that he should pass right along the roofs of the houses, and get to the end of the street, and so out of the city, by the shortest possible way. More probably, however, he meant that he should go directly down the stairs into the Porch, and so out by the street-door, without turning backward through the Court to any of the chambers, lest even so small a delay should cost him his life. It seems to have been by taking advantage of this close connection of several roofs, that the friends of the man who was sick with the palsy brought him into the presence of Jesus. Mark ii. 3, 4. While the Redeemer was preaching in the court of a certain house in Capernaum, they came, carrying the sufferer upon a bed; but the crowd was so great in the house, and about the door, that they found it impossible to come near him. They then took the man up, through some neighbouring house, to the top, and thus brought him along till they stood by the inner breastwork of the roof, just over the place where our Saviour was. There they uncovered the roof,—that is, took away the covering of cloth that was spread over the court to keep off the sun, and broke up, or tore away, some part of the balustrade; and so, with cords, let down the bed, whereon the sick man lay, into the midst, right before Him who was able to heal. Luke v. 19.

"The rich sometimes have two houses; one for summer, and another for winter. Amos iii. 15. The former faces the north, to be cool; the latter opens toward the south, to be warm. The rooms are generally large, those in the upper storey being fitted up with more elegance than those below. The back part of the house is occupied by the women. An Upper Chamber, just over the porch, in the front part of the building, was generally, among the Jews, set apart to lodge strangers. 1 Kings xvii. 19. When the house had only one storey, this room seems to have been raised above it, to the height of a second, with a door opening out upon the roof. 2 Kings iv. 10. When fire was used, the smoke had no chimney to carry it away; it went out by a hole in the wall, though it is called a chimney in one place. Hos. xiii. 3. Windows had no glass, but merely lattice-work.

"Houses, in earlier times, seem to have been commonly only one storey high in Palestine; but long before the time of Christ many of them were much higher, and very splendid, ceiled with cedar, painted with vermilion, and richly adorned with ivory, gold, and precious gems. Jer. xxii. 14; 1 Kings xxii. 39. Stone was used for building before the time of Moses (Lev. xiv. 40), and always continued common. Timber, too, was much employed. Isa. ix. 10. The bricks mentioned in several places were square pieces of clay, hardened merely by the heat of the sun. The walls of many houses of the more common sort were made of this material, which could seldom last longer than the life of one man. As it was comparatively soft, it was not hard to dig a hole right through it. Matt. vi. 19; Ezek. xii. 5. Serpents, also, would occasionally find a hiding-place in it. Amos v. 19. Heavy rains injure such walls very much; and if they were not well secured about the foundation, sometimes swept them utterly away. To such a house our Saviour seems to refer: 'The rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it.' Matt. vii. 27. Such frail houses are still common in the East. So many of them are in the city of Damascus, that when a violent rain falls, the streets become like a quagmire with the clay that is washed from the walls." These illustrations are quoted from the "Biblical Antiquities" of Dr Nevius.

HUKOK, a Levitical city of the tribe of Asher, and also a city of refuge. 1 Chron. vi. 75.

HULDAH, a prophetess, the wife of Shallum, who is mentioned in 2 Kings xxii. 14, as having been consulted by King Josiah concerning the book of the Law, which was found in the treasury of the temple.

HUMANITARIANS, those who believe in the simple humanity of Christ, or that he was nothing more than a mere man, born according to the usual course of nature, and who lived and died according to the ordinary circumstances of mankind. See SOCINIANS.

HUMANITY OF CHRIST. This expression is used by divines to denote that our blessed Lord took upon himself a true body and a reasonable soul. In the primitive times of the Christian Church this was denied by various sects, called DOCETÆ (which see), who held that Christ had not a real, but a mere shadowy body; while others in later times affirmed that Christ had a body, but not a soul. But the Scriptures declare explicitly, that "the Word was made flesh;" that "God sent forth his Son, made of a woman;" and that "forasmuch as the children were made partakers of flesh and blood, he himself likewise took part of the same." His apostles, who were admitted to familiar converse with him, were certain that it was not a mere phantom that they beheld, but a real body. "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of Life." 1 John i. 1. That Christ had a human soul is equally unquestionable. He "increased in wisdom and stature"—the one in respect of his body, the other in respect of his soul. In his agony he said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death;" and on the cross he committed it to his Father, saying, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit."

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST, is that state of meanness and distress to which he voluntarily descended for the purpose of executing his mediatorial work. This appears—1. In his birth. He was born of a woman—a sinful woman, though he was without sin, Gal. iv. 4; a poor woman, Luke ii. 7, 24; in a poor country village, John i. 46; in a stable—an abject place; of a nature subject to infirmities (Heb. ii. 9), hunger, thirst, weariness, pain, &c. 2. In his circumstances. Laid in a manger when he was born; lived in obscurity for a long time; probably worked at the trade of a carpenter; had not a place where to lay his head; and was oppressed with poverty while he went about preaching the Gospel. 3. It appeared in his reputation. He was loaded with the most abusive railing and calumny (Isa. liii.); the most false accusations (Matt. xxvi. 59); and the most ignominious ridicule. Ps. xxii. 6; Matt. xxvii. 27–31; John xix. 2, 3. 4. In his soul he was often tempted (Matt. iv. 1–11; Heb. ii. 17, 18, iv. 15); grieved with the reproaches cast on himself, and with the sins and miseries of others (Heb. xii. 3; Matt. xi. 19; John xi. 35); was burdened with the hidings of his Father's face, and the fears and impressions of his wrath. Ps. xxii. 1; Luke xxii. 43; Heb. v. 7. 5. In his death. Scourged, crowned with thorns, received gall and vinegar to drink, and was crucified between two thieves. Luke xxiii., John xix., Mark xv. 6. In his burial. Not only was he born in another man's house, but he was buried in another man's tomb; for he had no tomb of his own, or family vault to be interred in. Isa. liii. 9; Matt. xxvii. 57–60. The humiliation of Christ was necessary—(1.) To execute the purpose of God, and covenant engagements of Christ. Acts ii. 23, 24; Ps. xl. 6–8. (2.) To fulfil the manifold types and predictions of the Old Testament. (3.) To satisfy the broken law of God, and procure eternal redemption for us. Isa. liii., Heb. ix. 12–15. (4.) To leave us an unspotted pattern of holiness and patience under suffering.

HUMILITY, a lovely disposition of mind, wherein a person has a low opinion of himself in comparison with God and good men. It is a branch of internal worship, or of experimental religion and godliness. It is the effect of divine grace operating on the soul, and always characterizes the true Christian. The heathen philosophers were so little acquainted with this virtue, that they had no name for it: what they meant by the word we use, was meanness and baseness of mind.

To obtain this excellent spirit, we should remember (1.) The example of Christ. Phil. ii. 5–8. (2.) That heaven is a place of humility. Rev. v. 8. (3.) That our sins are numerous, and deserve the greatest punishment. Lam. iii. 39. (4.) That humility is the way to honour. Prov. xvi. 18. (5.) That the greatest promises of good are made to the humble. Isa. lvii. 15; 1 Pet. v. 5, 6; Ps. cxlvii. 6; Matt. v. 5.

HUNGER. Spiritual desire after Jesus and his righteousness is called hunger. How it pains men till the blessings desired are obtained! Matt. v. 6; Luke i. 53. Such as feed on Christ never hunger nor thirst; finding enough in him, they never desire any thing else as the chief portion of their soul. John vi. 35. A man's strength is hunger bitten when it decays for want of food. Job xviii. 12.

HUPHAMITES, a family of the tribe of Benjamin, so called from Hupham, a descendant of Benjamin.

HUR, the son of Caleb, and, as appears from various passages, a special favourite of Moses. Josephus affirms, but on what foundation we know not, that he was the husband of Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron. Hur was privileged, along with Aaron, to hold up the hands of Moses when praying on a mountain for the success of Israel against their enemies the Amalekites.

HUSBAND. See MARRIAGE.

HUSBANDMAN, a cultivator of the ground. It was the first employment in which man was engaged, for we are informed that Adam was put into the garden of Eden to dress it and keep it; and Cain, the elder son of Adam, was a tiller of the ground. See AGRICULTURE.

HUSHAI, the Archite, a friend of David, who signalled himself particularly by defeating the counsel of Ahithophel. 2 Sam. xvi. 16-19.

HUSKS (keratia—siliquæ), shells, as of peas or beans. The prodigal son, oppressed by want, and pinched by hunger, desired to feed on the husks given to the hogs. Luke xv. 16. In Numb. vi. 4, the word rendered in our version "husk," is generally considered to denote the skin of a grape. In 2 Kings iv. 42, a different word is translated "husk," in reference to corn; but Gesenius says it means a bag, sack, or pocket, and that the passage would read more correctly, "a bag of pounded or ground corn." It seems now generally agreed among critics and commentators that the word "husk," in Luke xv. 16, refers to the ceratonia siliqua. Sir Thomas Brown seems to have been the first who discovered what sort of vegetable is here meant.

HUSS, JOHN, a celebrated reformer, born in Bohemia in 1376. Through the blessing of God upon his perusal of the writings of Wickliffe, he was brought to a saving knowledge of divine truth, and set himself to the active diffusion of Protestant principles, both by his sermons and by his writings. He speedily attracted a number of followers, who renounced Popery, and brought down upon them the vengeance of the Church of Rome. Huss was imprisoned for a long time, and refusing to abjure his works and recant, he was sentenced to be degraded from the priesthood, that his books should be publicly burned, and himself delivered to the secular power. This sentence he heard without emotion. He immediately prayed for the pardon of his enemies. The bishops appointed by the council stripped him of his priestly garments, and put a mitre of paper on his head, on which devils were painted, with this inscription, "A ringleader of heretics!" The bishops delivered him to the emperor, and he delivered him to the Duke of Bavaria. His books were burned at the gate of the church, and he was led to the suburbs to be burned alive. Before his execution, he made a public and solemn appeal to God from the judgment of the Pope and council. He was then led to the stake, and expired amid the flames, praising God for the privilege of suffering for his sake. Huss was an upright man, and a real Christian. Gentle and condescending to the opinions of others, this amiable pattern of virtue was strict only in his principles. His great contest was with vice. His piety was calm, rational, and manly; his fortitude was undaunted.

HUTCHINSONIANS. The philosophic system of the Hutchinsonians is derived from their views of the Hebrew Scriptures. It rests on these suppositions:—1. That the Hebrew language was formed under divine inspiration, either all at once, or at different times, as occasion required; and that the Divine Being had a view, in constructing it, to the various revelations which he in all succeeding times should make in that language; consequently, that its words must be the most proper and determinate to convey such truths as the Deity, during the Old Testament dispensation, thought fit to make known to the sons of men. Further than this: that the inspired penmen of those ages at least were under the guidance of Heaven in the choice of words for recording what was revealed to them; therefore, that the Old Testament, if the language be rightly understood, is the most determinate in its meaning of any book under heaven. 2. That whatever is recorded in the Old Testament is strictly and literally true, allowing only for a few common figures of rhetoric; that nothing contrary to truth is accommodated to vulgar apprehensions.

HYACINTH, a precious stone which formed the eleventh in the series of stones in the foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem. Rev. xxi. 20. The word is translated in our version "Jacinth." This is supposed to be the same with the stone called a Ligure, mentioned in Exod. xxviii. 19, as one of the stones in the high priest's pectoral. The colour of it is a red strongly tinged with orange-yellow.

HYMENÆUS, an individual probably belonging to Ephesus, who appears to have owed his conversion to the Apostle Paul. For some time he adhered faithfully to the truth, but at length lapsed into heresy in company with Philetus, another convert to the Christian faith. The point on which these two men erred was the resurrection of the body, which, they alleged, was past already. There has been some doubt as to the precise nature of the heresy alluded to by the apostle: "And their word will eat as doth a canker; of whom is Hymenæus and Philetus; who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some." 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. The most probable opinion is that of Augustine, who alleged that the heretics in question confounded the resurrection of the body with that of the soul, or regeneration, in which the soul rises from the death of sin to a life of holiness. Hymenæus, remaining obstinate in his error, was excommunicated by Paul, or, as it is described, "given over to Satan." The same individual is classed with another person called Alexander, in 1 Tim. i. 20. Nothing further is known of Hymenæus.

HYMN, a religious song or ode. We are told that our blessed Lord and his disciples after supper sung a hymn; and it is generally supposed that on that occasion they sung the Hallel, or Hallelujah Psalms, which the Jews were wont to sing at the close of the paschal feast. From the exhortation which Paul gives to Christians to "edify one another by psalms and hymns and spiritual songs," it is plain that the early Christians made use of hymns. Pliny mentions, in a letter to the Roman emperor, that such a custom prevailed among the Christians. The Jews accompanied their singing of hymns with instrumental music.

HYPOCRISY is a seeming or professing to be what in truth and reality we are not. It consists in assuming a character which we are conscious does not belong to us, and by which we intentionally impose upon the judgment and opinion of mankind concerning us. The name is borrowed from the Greek tongue, in which it primarily signifies the profession of a stage-player, which is to express in speech, habit, and action, not his own person and manners, but his whom he undertakes to represent.

HYPOSTASIS, a term literally signifying substance or subsistence, or that which is put and stands under another thing, and supports it, being its base, ground, or foundation. Thus faith is the substantial foundation of things hoped for. Heb. xi. 1. The word is Greek, hupostasis, compounded of hupo, under, and istēmi, I stand, I exist; q.d. subsistentia. It hence likewise signifies confidence, stability, firmness. 2 Cor. ix. 4. It is also used for person. Heb. i. 3. Thus we hold that there is one nature or essence in God, but three hypostases or persons. This word occasioned great dissensions in the ancient Church, first among the Greeks, and afterwards among the Latins; but an end was put to them by a synod held at Alexandria, about the year 362, at which Athanasius assisted; from which time the Latins made no great scruple of saying three hypostases, nor the Greeks three persons. The hypostatical union is the union of the human nature of Christ with the divine; constituting two natures in one person, and not two persons in one nature, as the Nestorians believe. See JESUS CHRIST.

HYPSISTARIL, the same as COELICOLÆ, which see.

HYSSOP, a plant supposed by some to belong to the family of the Chenopodeæ, and to be the Phytolacca decandra, which, from the length and straightness of the stem, corresponds with the circumstance related by John (xix. 29): "Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar: and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth." It is spoken of in the ancient Jewish ritual as employed in ceremonial sprinkling and purifications. A bunch of it was taken and dipped in the blood of the paschal lamb, after which it was used to sprinkle the lintels and the two doorposts. From 1 Kings iv. 33, it would appear as if the hyssop were a very small herb, seemingly a kind of moss which grows on the walls of decayed houses. Hasselquist supposes it, therefore, to be the Gymnostomum fasciculare. Professor Sibthorpe, who likewise visited that part of Asia, thinks it more probably a little plant still called hyssopo, growing on rocks in the Holy Land. Sprengel supposes it to have been the Thymbra spicata. The truth is that the greatest diversity of opinion exists among naturalists as to the plant called hyssop in the Bible, Celsius reckoning up no fewer than eighteen different plants identified with it.

I.

I, is often used emphatically in Scripture. When it relates to God, it is expressive of his dignity (Ps. lxxxi. 14); his power (Gen. xvii. 1); his self-existence and unchangeableness (Exod. iii. 14), or the certainty of his promises and threatenings (Exod. vi. 2; Numb. xiv. 35). When used with reference to men, it expresses their pride (Isa. xlvii. 8), or the certainty of what they say (Gal. v. 2; Phil. iii. 18), and their readiness to perform their duty (Mic. iii. 8; Matt. xxi. 30).

IBERIANS, a denomination of Eastern Christians, who derive their name from Iberia, a province of Asia, now called Georgia; hence they are also called Georgians. Their tenets are nearly the same with those of the GREEK CHURCH (which see).

IBEX, a wild goat. See GOAT.

IBIS, a bird peculiar to Egypt, and, in early ages, held there in the utmost veneration, so that it was deemed a capital crime to kill one. Polyæneus states that Cambyzes, king of Persia, who was not unacquainted with this superstition, placed some of these birds before his army while he besieged Damietta. The Egyptians, not daring to shoot against them, nor consequently against the enemy, suffered the town to be taken, which was the key of Egypt. The ibis feeds upon serpents and destroys their eggs, and also devours destructive reptiles and insects, and is thus very serviceable to the inhabitants. This, probably, is the reason for the grateful estimation in which the bird was formerly held. The ibis was by some naturalists considered to be extinct; but it has been identified by Cuvier with the abouhaunes, a species of curlew, frequently seen by Bruce on the banks of the Nile. See EGYPT.

IBZAN, the tenth judge of Israel, who is mentioned as having belonged to Bethlehem, and to have had thirty sons and thirty daughters, all of them married. The opinion of some that Ibzan was the same with Boaz is not at all likely. He judged Israel seven years.

ICHABOD, son of Phinehas, and grandson of Eli, the high priest. He was born at the moment when his mother heard the fatal news of the ark being taken; whence he obtained his name—"Where is the glory?" 1 Sam. iv. 19-21.

ICONIUM, the chief of the fourteen cities of Lycaonia in Asia Minor. It is mentioned by Xenophon, and also by Cicero and Strabo. When Paul and Barnabas were driven from Antioch they went to Iconium, where they preached the gospel with no small measure of success. Here a church was planted about A.D. 45, and visited by Paul a second time, about A.D. 51. The city, however, never rose to any eminence, until the capture of Nice by the crusaders in 1097, when Iconium became the capital of one of the Turkish sultanies. A very minute and interesting account of the city is given by Captain Kinneir. It is now called Konieh, and is situated at the foot of Mount Taurus. The chief ornaments of the city are its mosques, of which twelve are large and upwards of a hundred small. The city wall has eighty gates of a square form, each known by a separate name, and, as well as most of the towers, embellished with Arabic inscriptions. Iconium was formerly a great city, and even yet it is of considerable importance, being the capital of the large province of Carmania. It is the place of chief strength and importance in the central parts of Asiatic Turkey, being surrounded by a strong wall of four miles in circumference; but, as is the case with most Eastern cities, much of the enclosed space is waste. "The modern city has an imposing appearance, from the number and size of its mosques, colleges, and other public buildings; but these stately edifices are crumbling into ruins, whilst the houses of the inhabitants consist of a mixture of small huts built of sun-dried bricks, and wretched hovels thatched with reeds. The city contains about thirty thousand inhabitants, principally Turks, with only a small proportion of Christians."

IDALAH, a city belonging to the tribe of Zebulun, mentioned in Josh. xix. 15.

IDDO, a prophet of Judah, who wrote the history of Rehoboam and Abijah. It seems, by 2 Chron. xiii. 22, that he had entitled his work Midrash, or Inquiries. It appears he also wrote prophecies against Jeroboam, son of Nebat. 2 Chron. ix. 29. Josephus and others are of opinion, that he was sent to Jeroboam, at Bethel, and that it was he who was killed by a lion. 1 Kings xiii.

IDOLATRY (Gr. eidōlon, an idol, and latría, worship), the worship of idols, or the act of ascribing to things and persons properties which are peculiar to God alone. The principal source of idolatry seems to be the extravagant veneration for creatures from which benefits accrue to men.

The first objects of idolatrous worship are thought to have been the sun, moon, and stars. Others think that angels were first worshipped. Soon after the flood, we find idolatry greatly prevailing in the world. Abraham's father's family served other gods beyond the River Euphrates; and Laban had idols which Rachel brought along with her. In process of time, noted patriots or kings deceased, animals of various kinds, plants, stones, and, in fine, whatever people took a fancy to, they idolized. The Egyptians, though high pretenders to wisdom, worshipped pied bulls, snipes, leeks, onions, &c. The Greeks had about thirty thousand gods. The Gomerians deified their ancient kings; nor were the Chaldeans, Romans, and other heathens, a whit less absurd. Some violated the most natural affections by murdering multitudes of their neighbours and children, under pretence of sacrificing them to their god. Some nations of Germany, Scandinavia, and Tartary, imagined that violent death in war, or by self-murder, was the proper method of access to the future enjoyment of their gods. In far later times, even sixty-four thousand and eighty persons were sacrificed at the dedication of one idolatrous temple in the space of four days in America. The Hebrews never had any idols of their own, but they adopted those of the nations around.

The veneration which the Papists pay to the Virgin Mary, and other saints and angels, and to the bread in the sacrament, the cross, relics, and images, lays a foundation for the Protestants to charge them with idolatry, though they deny the charge. It is evident that they worship them, and they justify the worship, but deny the idolatry of it, by distinguishing subordinate from supreme worship—the one they call latría, the other dulia; but this distinction is vain, futile, and nugatory.

Idolatry has been divided into metaphorical and proper. By metaphorical idolatry is meant that inordinate love of riches, honours, and bodily pleasures, whereby the passions and appetites of men are made superior to the will of God; man, by so doing, making a god of himself and his sensual temper. Proper idolatry, is yielding divine honour to another. The objects or idols of that honour which is given, are either personal—that is, the idolaters themselves, who become their own idols; or internal, such as fancying God to be a light, flame, matter, &c., or, which is perhaps more common, entertaining and admiring false ideas of his moral character; or external, as worshipping angels, the sun, moon, stars, animals, &c., instead of God.

IDUMEA, or EDOM. See EDOM.

IGNATIUS. It is unknown of what parentage this illustrious man was descended, or to what country he originally belonged. Some have supposed him to be the little child whom our Lord took and placed in the midst of his disciples, when he declared to them, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." But whether Ignatius be here referred to or not, it is generally admitted that he enjoyed the benefit of the instructions of the Apostle John.

Little has come down to us in regard to the early years of this distinguished Christian father. That his character must have been held in the highest estimation, however, is obvious from the fact, that he was invested by the apostles with the office of bishop or pastor of the Church of Antioch—an office which he filled for forty years with great honour and usefulness. During this long period, Ignatius discharged his ministerial duties with such fidelity, that, amid the fiery trial through which the Christian Church passed in the reign of the Roman Emperor Domitian, many were encouraged to hold fast their profession, by his godly example and exhortations. Persecution raged around him, but he remained unmoved, longing for, rather than dreading, a martyr's crown. And though the accession of Nerva to the throne was followed by a state of temporary peace, the holy man ardently coveted the honour of dying for the sake of Christ. "I eagerly wish the lions to be prepared for me," says he, "and pray that they may be found ready against me; them also I shall encourage, that they may quickly devour me, not as sometimes, when they have left the faithful untouched. But should they not be inclined when I am willing, I shall even assault them with violence." These sentiments, though they may sufficiently display the holy ardour by which the soul of Ignatius was animated, are by no means accordant with that submissive spirit which dictated the language of the apostle: "I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better. Nevertheless, to abide in the flesh is more needful for you; and having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all, for your furtherance and joy of faith."

The wish of Ignatius to seal his testimony with his blood was at length gratified in the reign of Trajan, about the year 107. The emperor, marching in all the pride of conquest towards Armenia and Parthia, stopped at Antioch; and, incensed against the Christians because of their resistance to idolatrous practices of every kind, he resolved to punish them. The venerable Bishop of Antioch, anxious to deliver his people from the vengeance of Trajan, boldly presented himself before the haughty tyrant. Trajan then pronounced the following sentence against him: "Since Ignatius confesses that he carries within himself that which was crucified, we command that he be carried to great Rome, there to be thrown to the wild beasts, for the entertainment of the people." This barbarous sentence, far from intimidating the martyr, filled his soul with joy. "I thank thee, O Lord," he exclaimed, "that thou hast vouchsafed to honour me with a perfect love towards thee, and hast made me to put on iron bonds with the Apostle Paul."

The sentence pronounced upon this holy man was what he had long coveted, and, accordingly, with thanksgiving to God, he voluntarily surrendered himself into the hands of the guards who were appointed to convey him to Rome. After conducting the aged saint on foot to Seleucia, his persecutors put him on board a vessel which was to coast the southern and western parts of Asia Minor. On arriving at Smyrna, his soul was refreshed by meeting with the venerable Polycarp, who encouraged him to maintain his confidence stedfast unto the end. Deputies from various Churches in Asia flocked to console him in the prospect of his approaching martyrdom. His soul, however, far from needing consolation, was filled with holy joy and triumph; and in such a spirit he penned, while at Smyrna, epistles to the Churches of Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles, and Rome. From Smyrna Ignatius sailed to Troas, and thence by Neapolis to Philippi, where he was received with the utmost kindness by the brethren. He was now led on foot through Macedonia and Epirus, when he embarked for Italy. On reaching Puteoli, he expressed a wish to be permitted to proceed by land to Rome, that he might tread in the footsteps of the Apostle Paul. This, however, was denied him, and he was conducted by sea to Ostia, only sixteen miles from Rome. As soon as the Christians heard of his approach, many of them came from the city to meet him. The first impulse of their minds was to condole with him on the awful prospect which awaited him; but, with heroic courage, he commanded them to be silent, reminding them to what exalted honour that man is called who is privileged to suffer for Christ.

With firm and unfaltering step Ignatius entered Rome, when he was immediately conducted to the house of the prefect. The day of his execution was appointed, and although the streets of the city had often resounded with the cry, "The Christians to the lions!" it was intended that the punishment of the venerable Ignatius should be as striking as possible. Accordingly, the most solemn of the Roman festivals was selected as the fittest period to effect their murderous designs. Meanwhile the brethren urged upon the aged prisoner to effect his escape. No entreaties, however, could prevail. He looked forward with joy to the day of his execution, and when it did arrive, he calmly prepared for death. Kneeling down with his friends, he prayed earnestly for the Church, that the Almighty would interpose in its behalf, and put a stop to the persecution. Then rising from his knees, he was led into the amphitheatre, where, amid assembled multitudes, on a signal being given, the wild beasts were let loose upon him, and speedily no remains of the aged saint were to be seen save a few bones, which his friends carefully gathered up and conveyed to Antioch.

Thus died, about the commencement of the second century, one who, throughout a long life, had served the Lord faithfully, and who counted it his highest ambition to suffer for Christ, resting in the firm conviction that, at length, he and his beloved Master would be glorified together.

IGNATIUS DE LOYOLA, the founder of the order of the Jesuits, was born in 1491, of a noble family, possessed of influence in Spain. In 1521, he was severely wounded at the siege of Pampluna. The result of his meditations on a bed of pain was, sorrow for his past debauched life, and a determination to devote himself to works of piety. He began by a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; after which he studied at Alcalá, Salamanca, and Paris, and began to preach and to make disciples. At first he was opposed, and even imprisoned; but at length the pope, in 1540, gave his sanction to the new order which Loyola had established, and appointed him its first general. He died in 1556, and was canonized in 1622. See JESUITS.

IGNORANCE, the want of knowledge or instruction. Mr. Locke observes, that the causes of ignorance are chiefly three:—1. Want of ideas. 2. Want of a discoverable connection between the ideas we have. 3. Want of tracing and examining our ideas. As it respects religion, ignorance has been distinguished into three sorts:—1. An invincible ignorance, in which the will has no part. It is an insult upon justice to suppose men will be punished because they were ignorant of things which they were physically incapable of knowing. 2. There is a wilful and obstinate ignorance; such an ignorance, far from exculpating, aggravates a man's crimes. 3. A sort of voluntary ignorance, which is neither entirely wilful nor entirely invincible; as when a man has the means of knowledge, and does not use them. See KNOWLEDGE—SIN.

IJE-ABARIM, one of the encampments of the Israelites in the wilderness, no doubt, as the word implies, meaning the heaps or heights of ABARIM (which see).

IJON, one of the cities which Benhadad, king of Syria, destroyed, when he invaded the kingdom of Israel, about 958 B.C. 1 Kings xv. 20.

ILLUMINATI, a term anciently applied to such as had received baptism. The name was occasioned by a ceremony in the baptism of adults, which consisted in putting a lighted taper in the hand of the person baptized, as a symbol of the faith and grace he had received in the sacrament. This was unknown in primitive times.

ILLUMINATI was also the name of a sect which appeared in Spain about the year 1575. They were charged with maintaining that mental prayer and contemplation had so intimately united them to God, that they were arrived at such a state of perfection as to stand in no need of good works or the sacraments of the Church, and that they might commit the grossest crimes without sin.

ILLUMINATI, a name assumed by a secret society, founded on the 1st of May, 1776, by Dr. Adam Weishaupt, professor of canon law in the university of Ingolstadt. The avowed object of this order was, "to diffuse from secret societies, as from so many centres, the light of science over the world; to propagate the purest principles of virtue, and to re-instate mankind in the happiness which they enjoyed during the golden age fabled by the poets." Such a philanthropic object was doubtless well adapted to make a deep impression on the minds of young men; and to such alone did Dr. Weishaupt at first address himself. But "the real object," we are assured by Professor Robison and Abbe Barruel, "was, by clandestine arts, to overturn every government and every religion; to bring the customs of civil life into contempt; and to reduce mankind to that imaginary state of nature, when they lived independent of each other on the spontaneous productions of the earth." Freemasonry being in high reputation all over Europe when Weishaupt first formed the plan of his society, he availed himself of its secrecy to introduce his new order; of which he constituted himself general, after initiating some of his pupils, whom he styled areopagites, into its mysteries. And when report spread the news throughout Germany of the institution of, the order of the Illuminati, it was generally considered as a mere college lodge, which could interest the students no longer than during the period of their studies. Weishaupt's character, too, which at this time was respectable for morality as well as erudition, prevented all suspicion of his harbouring any such dark designs as have since come to light. Professor Robison informs us, that the order of the Illuminati was abolished in 1786 by the Elector of Bavaria, but revived immediately after, under another name, and in a different form, all over Germany. It was again detected, and seemingly broken up; but it had by this time taken so deep a root, that it still subsists in some degree in different countries of Europe.

ILLYRICUM, a province lying to the north and north-west of Macedonia along the eastern coast of the Adriatic Sea, or Gulf of Venice. It was distinguished into two parts: Liburnia to the north, where is now Croatia; and Dalmatia to the south, which still retains the same name, and to which, as Paul informs Timothy, Titus went. 2 Tim. iv. 10. Paul says, that he preached the Gospel from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum. Rom. xv. 19.

IMAGE, in a religious sense, is an artificial representation of some person or thing, used as an object of adoration; in which sense it is used synonymously with idol.

The use and adoration of images have been long controverted. It is plain, from the practice of the primitive Church, recorded by the earlier fathers, that Christians during the first three centuries, and the greater part of the fourth, neither worshipped images, nor used them in their worship. However, the generality of the Popish divines maintain that the use and worship of images are as ancient as the Christian religion itself. To prove this, they allege a decree, said to have been made in a council held by the apostles at Antioch, commanding the faithful, that they may not err about the object of their worship, to make images of Christ and worship them. So says Baronius. But no notice is taken of this decree till seven hundred years after the apostolic times, after the dispute about images had commenced. The first instance that occurs, in any credible author, of images among Christians, is that recorded by Tertullian in the second century, of certain cups, or chalices, as Bellarmine pretends, on which was represented the parable of the good shepherd carrying the lost sheep on his shoulders; but this instance only proves that the Church, at that time, did not think emblematical figures unlawful ornaments of chalices. The primitive Christians abstained from the worship of images, not, as the Papists pretend, from tenderness to heathen idolaters, but because they thought it unlawful in itself to make any images of the Deity. Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Origen, were of opinion that, by the second commandment, painting and engraving were unlawful to a Christian, styling them evil and wicked arts. Such opinions, extravagant though they may appear to us, effectually secured against image-worship. The use of images in churches, as ornaments, was first introduced by some Christians in Spain, in the beginning of the fourth century; but the practice was condemned as a dangerous innovation, in a council held at Eliberis in 305. Epiphanius may be considered as one of the first iconoclasts. The custom of admitting pictures of saints and martyrs into churches (for this was the first source of image worship) was rare in the end of the fourth century, but became common in the fifth. But they were still considered only as ornaments, and even in this view they met with very considerable opposition. In the following century the custom of thus adorning churches became almost universal, both in the East and West. It is not to be wondered at that such a practice should have gradually led to the introduction of image-worship. However, it continued to be the doctrine of the Church in the sixth, and in the beginning of the seventh century, that images were to be used only as helps to devotion, and not as objects of worship. The worship of them was condemned in the strongest terms by Gregory the Great, as appears by two of his letters written in 601. From this time to the beginning of the eighth century, there occurs no instance of any worship given, or allowed to be given to images, by any council or assembly of bishops whatever. But they were commonly worshipped by the monks and populace in the beginning of the eighth century, insomuch that in 726, when Leo published his famous edict, image-worship had already spread into all the provinces subject to the empire. The Lutherans condemn the Calvinists for breaking the images in the churches of the Romanists, looking on it as a kind of sacrilege; and yet they condemn the Romanists (who are professed image-worshippers) as idolaters: nor can these last keep pace with the Greeks, who go far beyond them in this point, which has occasioned abundance of disputes among them. The Jews absolutely condemn all images, and do not so much as suffer any statues or figures in their houses, much less in their synagogues or places of worship. The Mahometans have an equal aversion to images, which led them to destroy most of the beautiful monuments of antiquity, both sacred and profane, at Constantinople.

IMAGERY, CHAMBERS OF. The idolatry of the house of Judah, borrowed from their heathen neighbours, is thus described by Ezekiel (viii. 7-10) in his well-known vision: "And he brought me to the door of the court; and, when I looked, behold a hole in the wall. Then said he unto me, Son of man, dig now in the wall: and when I had digged in the wall, behold a door. And he said unto me, Go in, and behold the wicked abominations that they do here. So I went in and saw; and, behold, every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel, portrayed upon the wall round about." This scene reminds us of Egyptian worship, and on this subject we quote the following very ingenious remarks of the Rev. Doctor Jamieson: "In order to show the reader how exactly this inner chamber that Ezekiel saw was constructed after the Egyptian fashion, we subjoin an extract from the work of another traveller, descriptive of the great temple of Edfoo, one of the admired relics of antiquity, from which it will be seen that the degenerate priests of Jerusalem had borrowed the whole style of the edifice in which they were celebrating their hidden rites—its form—its entrance, as well as its pictorial ornaments on the walls, from their idolatrous neighbours of Egypt. 'Considerably below the surface of the adjoining buildings,' says he, 'my conductor pointed out to me a chink in an old wall, which, he told me, I should creep through on my hands and feet—the aperture was not two feet and a half high, and scarcely three feet and a-half broad. My companion had the courage to go first, thrusting in a lamp before him; I followed. The passage was so narrow that my mouth and nose were almost buried in the dust, and I was nearly suffocated. After proceeding about ten yards in utter darkness, the heat became excessive—the breathing was laborious—the perspiration poured down my face, and I would have given the world to have got out; but my companion whose person I could not distinguish, though his voice was audible, called out to me to crawl a few feet farther, and that I should find plenty of room. I joined him at length, and had the inexpressible satisfaction of standing once more upon my feet. We found ourselves in a splendid apartment of great magnitude, adorned with an incredible profusion of sacred paintings and hieroglyphics.' In the dark recesses of such a chamber as this, which they entered, like the traveller, through a hole in the outer wall, and in which was painted to the eye the grotesque and motley group of Egyptian divinities, were the chief men at Jerusalem actually employed when Ezekiel saw them. With minds highly excited by the dazzling splendour and the clouds of fragrant smoke that filled the apartment, the performers of those clandestine rites seem to have surpassed even the enthusiastic zeal of their ancestors in the days of Moses, when, crowding around the pedestal of the golden calf, they rent the air with cries of 'These be thy gods, O Israel!' Beneath a calmer exterior, the actors pointed out to Ezekiel concealed a stronger and more intense passion for idolatry. Every form of animal life, from the noblest quadruped to the most loathsome reptile that spawned in Egypt, received a share of their insane homage; and the most extraordinary feature of the scene was, that the individual who appeared to be the director of those foul mysteries, the master of ceremonies, was Jaazaniah, a descendant of that zealous scribe who had gained so much renown as the principal adviser of the good King Josiah, and whose family had for generations been regarded as the most illustrious for piety in the land. The presence of such a scion of this venerated house in such a den of impurity, struck the prophet as an electric shock, and showed, better than all the other painful spectacles this chamber exhibited, to what a fearful extent idolatry had inundated the land.

"We might have supposed it impossible for men to have sunk to a lower depth of superstition than that of imitating the Egyptians in worshipping the monsters of the Nile, or the vegetable produce of their fields and gardens, had we not been informed that the prophet was directed to turn him yet again, and he would see greater abominations than they did. 'Then he brought me to the gate of the Lord's house, which was toward the north: and, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz.' This, the principal deity of the Phœnicians, and who was often called also by that people Adoni—that is, "my Lord"—became afterwards famous in the Grecian mythology under the well-known name of Adonis; and the circumstance of his being selected for the subject of their most beautiful fictions by so many of the classic poets, is a sufficient proof of the great popular interest his name and ritual excited among the idolaters of the ancient world. It is said to have originated in a tragic adventure which befell an intrepid and beautiful prince of Phœnicia, who was killed while hunting a wild boar by which that land was infested, and whose untimely death in the cause of his country was bewailed in an annual festival, held to commemorate the disastrous event. During the seven days that the festival lasted, the Phœnicians appeared to be a nation of mourners; and in every town and village a fictitious representation of Tammuz was got up for the occasion, and the whole population assembled to pour forth their unbounded sorrow for his hapless fate; more especially at Byblos, in Syria, where a temple was erected to the honour of this national deity. A strange imposture was practised, to inflame the public lamentations. There was in this temple a gigantic statue of the god, the eyes of which were filled with lead; which, on fire being applied within, of course melted, and fell in big drops to the ground—a signal for the loud wailings of the bystanders, whose eyes, in sympathetic imitation, were dissolved in tears. Conspicuous among the crowd on such occasions, a band of mercenary females directed the orgies, and, in conformity with an ancient custom of bewailing the dead on anniversaries at the doors of houses, these took their station at the gate, with their faces directed northward—as the sun was said to have been in that quarter of the heavens at the time when the death of Tammuz occurred. These violent efforts in mourning were always followed by scenes of the most licentious and revolting revelry, which, though not mentioned, are manifestly implied among the 'greater abominations' that degraded this third group of idolaters.

"Besides the hieroglyphics of Egypt and the orgies of Tammuz, there was another form of superstition still, which in Jerusalem, then almost wholly given to idolatry, had its distinguished patrons. 'Turn ye, yet again,' said his celestial guide to the prophet, 'and thou shalt see greater abominations than these.' And he brought him 'into the inner court of the Lord's house, and behold, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five-and-twenty men with their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and their faces towards the east; and they worshipped the sun towards the east.' Perhaps, of all the varieties of superstition which had crept in among the Hebrews in that period of general decline, none displayed such flagrant dishonour to God as this; for as the most holy place was situated at the west end of the sanctuary, it was impossible for these twenty-five men to pay their homage to the rising sun without turning their backs directly on God, and the consecrated place of his residence; and accordingly, this fourth circle is introduced last, as if their employment formed the climax of abominations—the worst and most awful signs of the times."

IMAGE OF GOD in the soul, is distinguished into natural and moral. By natural is meant the understanding, reason, will, and other intellectual faculties. By the moral image, the right use of those faculties, or what we term holiness. See ADAM.

IMAGE OF NEBUCHADNEZZAR. See BABEL.

IMAN, a Mohammedan priest, or minister, who superintends the service and concerns of the mosques, reads prayers, and instructs the people. The term is also given, by way of eminence, to the chiefs or founders of the principal sects among the Mohammedans.

dans; and this dignity, or what is commonly called the Imanate, is hereditary, and possessed by the chief members of particular families in succession.

IMMANUEL. See EMMANUEL.

IMMENSITY, unbounded or incomprehensible greatness; an unlimited extension, which no finite and determinate space, repeated ever so often, can equal. See INFINITY OF GOD.

IMMORALITY, a system of action inconsistent with our duty towards men, and consequently contrary to the law of God, who hath commanded us to do justly and love mercy. See MORALITY.

IMMORTALITY, a state which has no end, the impossibility of dying. It is applied to God, who is absolutely immortal, or incorruptible (1 Tim. i. 17), and the human soul, which is only immortal by the will of God; as God, who at first gave it, could, if he please, deprive us of existence. Matt. x. 28. See SOUL—INTERMEDIATE STATE.

IMMUTABILITY OF GOD, is his unchangeableness. He is immutable in his essence (James i. 17), in his attributes (Ps. cii. 27), in his purposes (Isa. xxv. 1; Ps. xxxiii. 11), in his promises (Mal. iii. 6; 2 Tim. ii. 13), and in his threatenings (Matt. xxv. 41).

The contemplation of this divine perfection should raise in our minds admiration; should teach us to imitate, as far as our frailty will permit, that constancy and steadfastness which we adore (2 Cor. iii. 18); and, lastly, should excite trust and confidence in the Divine Being, amidst all the revolutions of this uncertain world.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS. See ORDINATION.

IMPRECATION. In early times, when a person made a voluntary oath, he elevated his right hand. To this we find an allusion, though the words of the imprecation are not recorded, in Gen. xiv. 22. There is a form of imprecation mentioned in 1 Kings xx. 10: "And Ben-hadad sent unto him, and said, The gods do so unto me, and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that follow me."

IMPRISONMENT. This mode of punishment seems to have been early in use among the Egyptians, from the reference to it in Gen. xxxix. 20-23. At a later period we find it employed by the Jews. Thus Asa committed the Prophet Hanani to prison for reproving him. 2 Chron. xvi. 10. Ahab committed Micaiah (1 Kings xxii. 27), as Zedekiah did the Prophet Jeremiah, for the same offence. Jer. xxxvii. 21. John the Baptist was imprisoned by Herod (Matt. iv. 12), and Peter by Herod Agrippa. Acts xii. 4. Debtors and murderers were also committed to prison. Matt. xviii. 30; Luke xxiii. 19.

IMPURITY, want of that regard to decency, chastity, or holiness, which our duty requires. Impurity, in the law of Moses, is any legal defilement. Of these there were several sorts. Some were voluntary, as the touching a dead body, or any animal that died of itself, or any creature that was esteemed unclean; or touching things holy by one who was not clean, or was not a priest; the touching one who had a leprosy, or who was polluted by a dead carcass, &c. Sometimes these impurities were involuntary; as when any one inadvertently touched bones, or a sepulchre, or anything polluted; or fell into such diseases as pollute, as the leprosy, &c.

The beds, clothes, and movables, which had touched anything unclean, contracted also a kind of impurity, and in some cases communicated it to others.

These legal pollutions were generally removed by bathing, and lasted no longer than till the evening. The person polluted plunged over head in the water, and either had his clothes on when he did so, or washed himself and his clothes separately. Other pollutions continued seven days; as that which was contracted by touching a dead body. Some impurities lasted forty or fifty days; as that of women who were lately delivered, who were unclean forty days after the birth of a boy, and fifty after the birth of a girl. Others, again, lasted till the person was cured.

Many of these pollutions were expiated by sacrifices, and others by the unclean being sprinkled with the ashes of a red heifer, sacrificed on the great day of expiation. When the leper was cured, he went to the temple, and offered a sacrifice of two birds—one of which was killed, and the other set at liberty. He who had touched a dead body, or had been present at a funeral, was to be purified with the water of expiation, and this upon pain of death. The woman who had been delivered, offered a turtle-dove and a lamb for her expiation; or if she were poor, two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.

These impurities, which the law of Moses has expressed with the greatest accuracy and care, were only figures of other more important impurities, such as the sins and iniquities committed against God, or faults committed against our neighbour. The saints and prophets of the Old Testament were sensible of this; and our Saviour, in the Gospel, has strongly inculcated, that they are not outward and corporeal pollutions which render us unacceptable to God, but such inward pollutions as infect the soul, and are violations of justice, truth, and charity.

IMPUTATION is the attributing of any matter, quality, or character, whether good or evil, to any person as his own, or the treating of him according to the character which he thus sustains. It may refer to what was originally his, antecedently to such imputation; or to what was not antecedently his, but becomes so by virtue of such imputation only. 2 Sam. xix. 19; Ps. cvi. 31.

The imputation that respects our justification before God is of the latter kind, and may be defined thus: It is God's gracious reckoning of the righteousness of Christ to believers, and his acceptance of their persons as righteous on the account thereof. Their sins being imputed to him, and his obedience being imputed to them, they are, in virtue hereof, both acquitted from guilt and accepted as righteous before God. Rom. iv. 6, 7, v. 18, 19; 2 Cor. v. 21.

When we speak of sin as being imputed to Christ, it is not meant that Christ actually and in person became a sinner, but that the condition or state which was actually ours, became by imputation judicially his. And thus, in law, Christ became fitted to be a sacrifice or sin-offering for us. Had he not been our substitute by the imputation of sin, he could never have become our substitute in the endurance of the penalty consequent upon sin. The two are necessarily and inseparably connected. In the very same sense in which Christ was made sin are we made the righteousness of God in him. He was made sin, not actually and personally, but by imputation; and we are made righteousness, not actually and personally, but by imputation. The imputation of our sins to Christ was necessary in order to the satisfaction on his part, as our substitute, of the demands of divine justice; and the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us is necessary in order to the satisfaction, on our part, of the demands of the holy law of God. Thus it is declared in 2 Cor. v. 21: "He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."

IMPUTED RIGHTEOUSNESS. See JUSTIFICATION.

IN. The accurate consideration of the sense of this preposition in, is often of great use to lead to the true meaning of many texts in Scripture. God is in Christ—is one with him as God—has the closest connection, is well pleased with, and reconciled to, men in him; and Christ is in him; has the same nature as his Father. John xiv. 10; 2 Cor. v. 19. The truth is in Christ; he is the substance and exemplification of it; by his death it is ratified; and in beholding and receiving of him, its light and glory are perceived, and its power felt. Eph. iv. 21; 2 Cor. i. 21. The law of the Spirit of life is in Christ; the new covenant is established with him; he is the great agent in it, and the means of its operation. The Holy Ghost, as the Spirit of Christ, operates in us, by uniting us to, and maintaining our fellowship with, Christ. Rom. viii. 2. We are blessed, chosen, called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and obtain an inheritance, in Christ; our whole salvation was concerted with him as our Surety, purchased by him as our Ransomer, is lodged in him as our Treasury, and in a state of union to him we share of it; and the enjoyment of him as the Lord our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, is the sum of it. Eph. i. 3, 4, 6, &c. We are in Christ, and he in us. He dwells in our hearts by faith, and we are closely united to him as our Surety, our Head, Husband, and root of spiritual influence. John xvii. 26; Rom. xvi. 7. But persons are said to be in Christ, if they are members of his visible Church, and in outward profession joined to him. John xv. 6. To believe or trust in Christ, or in God, or in his name, is, in a way of receiving Christ, and God in him, as the Husband and Saviour of our souls, offered in the promises, to expect from his perfections, relations, and work, whatever is good and necessary for us. John xiv. 1. To be strong in the Lord, faithful in the Lord, to labour in the Lord, and salute others in the Lord, is, in a state of union to Christ's person, and exercise of daily receiving out of his fulness, to study faithfulness and diligence in the work of preaching the Gospel, or practising holiness, and to salute others from love to the Lord, and on account of their bearing his image. Eph. vi. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 17; Rom. xvi. 1-16, 22.

INABILITY, want of power sufficient for the performance of any particular action or design. It has been divided into natural and moral. We are said to be naturally unable to do a thing when we cannot do it if we wish, because of some impeding defect or obstacle that is extrinsic to the will, either in the understanding, constitution of the body, or external objects. Moral inability consists not in any of these things, but either in the want of inclination, or the strength of a contrary inclination, or the want of sufficient motives in view to induce and excite the act of the will, or the strength of apparent motives to the contrary.

It must not be forgotten that moral inability or disinclination forms no valid excuse for our omission of duty, though want of natural faculties or necessary means would. That God may command, though man has not a present moral ability to perform, is evident, if we consider, 1. That man once had a power to do whatsoever God would command him, he had a power to cleave to God in his primitive state of purity. 2. That God did not deprive him of this ability, he voluntarily, and of his own free will, sinned against God. 3. Therefore God's right of commanding, and man's obligation of returning and cleaving to God, remain firm and unbroken.

INCARNATION, the act whereby the Son of God assumed the human nature; or the mystery by which the Eternal Word was made man, in order to accomplish the work of our salvation. See HUMANITY OF CHRIST.

INCENSE. The practice of offering incense in sacred worship belonged to the Levitical dispensation. Sweet incense was commanded to be offered morning and evening continually. As the daily sacrifice represented the perpetual efficacy of the atonement of Christ, so the burning of incense morning and evening typified his continual intercession for us. This offered incense was called a "perpetual incense," because it was regularly offered at the appointed time without cessation. The composition of the incense is minutely laid down in Exod. xxx. 34-36, and all incense of a different composition from that prescribed is called "strange incense," and is strictly forbidden. "And the Lord said unto Moses, Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte, and onycha, and galbanum; these sweet spices with frankincense: of each shall there be a like weight: and thou shalt make it a perfume, a confection after the art of the apothecary, tempered together, pure and holy: and thou shalt beat some of it very small, and put of it before the testimony in the tabernacle of the congregation, where I will meet with thee: it shall be unto you most holy." Exod. xxx. 34-36. To the oblation of incense by the high priest, more especially on the great day of atonement, David obviously alludes in Psalm cxli. 2: "Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense, and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice." Incense is used in Scripture as a symbol of the prayers of the saints. Hence it is said of the prayers of Cornelius, "And when he looked on him, he was afraid, and said, What is it, Lord? And he said unto him, Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God." Acts x. 4. The custom of offering incense prevailed among the Egyptians, who in all probability derived it from the Hebrews. Incense is used in the worship of the Roman Catholic Church, more especially in connection with the eucharist. Such a practice, however, dates no farther back than the time of Gregory the Great, and is obviously a confounding of the type with the antitype, of the Jewish with the Christian economy.

INCEST, the sin of criminal and unnatural commerce with kindred within the degrees forbidden by the law of God. In former times, incest was somewhat absurdly extended even to the seventh degree; but it is now restricted to the third or fourth.

Most nations look on incest with horror, Persia and Egypt excepted. In the history of the ancient kings of those countries we meet with instances of brothers marrying their own sisters, because they thought it too mean to join in alliance with their own subjects, and still more so to marry into any foreign family. Vortigern, king of South Britain, equalled, or rather exceeded them in wickedness, by marrying his own daughter. Such incestuous marriages with near relatives have sometimes occurred in modern times, more especially in Roman Catholic countries, a dispensation having been previously obtained from the Pope.

"In order," says Dr. Paley, "to preserve chastity in families, and between persons of different sexes brought up and living together in a state of unreserved intimacy, it is necessary, by every method possible, to inculcate an abhorrence of incestuous conjunctions; which abhorrence can only be upheld by the absolute reprobation of all commerce of the sexes between near relations. Upon this principle the marriage, as well as other cohabitation of brothers and sisters of lineal kindred, and of all who usually live in the same family, may be said to be forbidden by the law of nature. Restrictions which extend to remoter degrees of kindred than what this reason makes it necessary to prohibit from intermarriage, are founded in the authority of the positive law which ordains them, and can only be justified by their tendency to diffuse wealth, to connect families, or to promote some political advantage.

"The Levitical law, which is received in this country, and from which the rule of the Roman law differs very little, prohibits marriage between relations within three degrees of kindred; computing the generations not from, but through the common ancestor, and accounting affinity the same as consanguinity. The issue, however, of such marriages are not bastardized, unless the parents be divorced during their lifetime.

"The Egyptians are said to have allowed of the marriage of brothers and sisters. Amongst the Athenians, a very singular regulation prevailed: brothers and sisters of the half blood, if related by the father's side, might marry; if by the mother's side, they were prohibited from marrying. The same custom also probably obtained in Chaldea so early as the age in which Abraham left it; for he and Sarah his wife stood in this relation to each other: 'And yet indeed she is my sister: she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother; and she became my wife.' Gen. xx. 12."

In the view of Scripture incest is regarded as a peculiarly heinous and abominable crime. Paul refers to one species of this sin in these strong condemnatory words: "It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles, that one should have his father's wife." 1 Cor. v. 1. The natural feelings of the human heart are in complete accordance with the dictates of the Bible on this point. We instinctively recoil from atrocities of this kind, apart altogether from the moral character of such unions. Hence it happens that even in periods and places noted for profligacy of manners, incestuous marriages are usually rare and exceptional rather than common.

INCOMPREHENSIBILITY OF GOD. This is a relative term, and indicates a relation between an object and a faculty—between God and a created understanding; so that the meaning of it is this, that no created understanding can comprehend God; that is, have a perfect and exact knowledge of him, such a knowledge as is adequate to the perfection of the object. Job xi. 7; Isa. xl.

God is incomprehensible—1. As to the nature of his essence. 2. The excellency of his attributes. 3. The depth of his counsels. 4. The works of his providence. 5. The dispensation of his grace. Eph. iii. 8; Job xxxvii. 23; Rom. xi.

The incomprehensibility of God follows—1. From his being a Spirit endued with perfections much superior to our own. 2. There may be (for anything we certainly know) attributes and perfections in God of which we have not the least idea. 3. In those perfections of the divine nature of which we have some idea, there are many things to us inexplicable, and with which, the more deeply and attentively we think of them, the more we find our thoughts swallowed up; such as his self-existence, eternity, omnipresence, &c.

This should teach us, therefore—(1.) To admire and reverence the Divine Being. Zech. ix. 17; Neh. ix. 5. (2.) To be humble and modest. Ps. viii. 1-4; Eccles. v. 2, 3; Job xxxvii. 19. (3.) To be serious in our addresses, and sincere in our behaviour towards him.

INCONTINENCY, not abstaining from unlawful desires. See CONTINENCY.

INCORPOREALITY OF GOD, is his being without a body. That God is incorporeal is evident; for, (1.) Materiality is incompatible with self-existence; and God being self-existent, must be incorporeal. (2.) If God were corporeal, he could not be present in any part of the world where body is; yet his presence is necessary for the support and motion of body. (3.) A body cannot be in two places at the same time; yet he is everywhere, and fills heaven and earth. (4.) A body is to be seen and felt, but God is invisible and impalpable. John i. 18.

INDEED.—1. Truly, assuredly. Deut. ii. 15. 2. Eminently; in a very singular manner. So Christ makes free indeed, with a glorious liberty which can never be taken away. John viii. 35, 36. His flesh and blood are meat indeed, suited to every necessity, and quickening to the soul, secure everlasting life and strength, and are infinitely sweet and substantial. John vi. 55. And an Israelite indeed is one truly and eminently holy, and noted for wrestling with God. John i. 47. Widows indeed are such as behave gravely and piously, suitably to their condition, and are really poor and destitute. 1 Tim. v. 3, 5, 16.

INDEPENDENCE OF GOD, is his existence in and of himself, without depending on any other. "His being and perfections," as Dr. Ridgley observes, "are underived, and not communicated to him, as all finite perfections are by him to the creature. This attribute of independence belongs to all his perfections. (1.) He is independent as to his knowledge. He doth not receive ideas from any object out of himself, as intelligent creatures do. This is elegantly described by the prophet. Isa. lx. 13, 14. (2.) He is independent in power. As he receives strength from no one, so he doth not act dependently on the will of the creature. Job xxxvi. 23. (3.) He is independent as to his holiness, hating sin necessarily, and not barely depending on some reasons out of himself inducing him thereto; for it is essential to the divine nature to be infinitely opposite to sin, and therefore to be independently holy. (4.) He is independent as to his bounty and goodness. He communicates blessings, not by constraint, but according to his sovereign will. Thus he gave being to the world, and all things therein, which was the first instance of bounty and goodness; and this not by constraint, but by his free will.

INDEPENDENTS, a denomination of Protestant Christians, so called, because they hold that every particular congregation possesses in itself the power of self-government. See CONGREGATIONALISTS.

INDIA. The appellation of a vast region of Asia. The name is generally supposed to have been derived from the River Indus, which waters its western extremity, and which signifies the Blue or Black River.

Mr Conder thinks that the extensive application of the word renders it more probable that it was employed to denote the country of the Indi, or Asiatic Ethiops; answering to Persia or Hindustan, or the country of the Hindus. In support of the idea that there are several allusions to this country in the Old Testament, Mr Taylor has some remarks that are not without interest and weight.

It is said, in Esth. i. 1, that Ahasuerus reigned from India to Ethiopia. This fixes the extent of the Persian dominions eastward to the original station of the Hindus, at the head of the Indus. There is not, we believe, any memorial of the Persian power having permanently maintained itself east of the Indus, Alexander the Great only having ever thought of establishing a dominion in those countries. The Mohammedans, indeed, have so done; but then they have renounced the west. Nadir Shah penetrated to Delhi, but he returned to Persia, and did not attempt to retain both regions under his rule. The Hindus could not have adopted religious rites from the Romans, the Greeks, the Egyptians, or the Persians. Whoever has bestowed a moment's attention on this people, must know that it would be in utter violation of their most sacred tenets to do so; and whoever recollects that the sages of Greece travelled into India to learn wisdom, will be confirmed in the persuasion that others derived information from them, not they from others. In fact, all testimony brings letters, science, and the arts from the East.

INDIGNATION, a strong disapprobation of mind, excited by something flagitious in the conduct of another. It is produced by acts of treachery, abuse of confidence, base ingratitude, &c., which we cannot contemplate without being provoked to anger, and feeling a generous resentment.

INDUCTION, ECCLESIASTICAL, the act of giving a clergyman formal possession of his church, to which he has been appointed by institution. Induction, among Presbyterians, is the admission by the presbytery of a minister to the charge of the congregation among whom he is to minister. It is accompanied by the performance of divine service, when the minister is formally admitted or inducted into his charge in the presence of the people.

INDULGENCES, in the Romish Church, are a remission of the punishment due to sin, granted by the Church, and supposed to save the sinner from purgatory.

According to the doctrine of the Romish Church, all the good works of the saints, over and above those which were necessary towards their own justification, are deposited, together with the infinite merits of Jesus Christ, in one inexhaustible treasury. The keys of this were committed to Peter, and to his successors, the popes, who may open it at pleasure; and, by transferring a portion of this superabundant merit to any particular person for a sum of money, may convey to him either the pardon of his own sins, or a release for any one in whom he is interested, from the pains of purgatory. Such indulgences were first invented in the eleventh century, by Urban II., as a recompense for those who went in person upon the important enterprise of conquering the Holy Land. They were afterwards granted to those who hired a soldier for that purpose; and in process of time were bestowed on such as gave money for accomplishing any pious work enjoined by the pope. The power of granting indulgences has been greatly abused in the Church of Rome. Pope Leo X., in order to carry on the magnificent structure of St. Peter's at Rome, published indulgences and a plenary remission to all such as should contribute money towards it. Finding the project take, he granted to Albert, elector of Mentz, and archbishop of Magdeburg, the benefit of the indulgences of Saxony, and the neighbouring parts, and farmed out those of other countries to the highest bidders; who, to make the best of their bargain, procured the ablest preachers to cry up the value of the ware. The form of these indulgences was as follows: "May our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon thee, and absolve thee by the merits of his most holy passion. And I, by his authority, that of his blessed apostles Peter and Paul, and of the most holy pope, granted and committed to me in these parts, do absolve thee, first from all ecclesiastical censures, in whatever manner they may have been incurred; then from all thy sins, transgressions, and excesses, how enormous soever they may be; even from such as are reserved for the cognizance of the Holy See, and as far as the keys of the Holy Church extend. I remit to you all punishment which you deserve in purgatory on their account; and I restore to you the holy sacraments of the Church, to the unity of the faithful, and to that innocence and purity which you possessed at baptism; so that, when you die, the gates of punishment shall be shut, and the gates of the paradise of delights shall be opened; and if you shall not die at present, this grace shall remain in full force when you are at the point of death. In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost." It was the great abuse of indulgences that contributed not a little to the reformation of religion in Germany, where Martin Luther began first to declaim against the preachers of indulgences, and afterwards against indulgences themselves.

INDUSTRY, diligence, constant application of the mind, or exercise of the body. See DILIGENCE—IDLENESS.

INFALLIBILITY, the quality of not being able to be deceived or mistaken.

The infallibility of the Church of Rome has been one of the great controversies between the Protestants and Papists. By this infallibility, it is understood that she cannot at any time cease to be orthodox in her doctrine, or fall into any pernicious errors; but that she is constituted by divine authority the judge of all controversies in religion, and that all Christians are obliged to acquiesce in her decisions. This is the chain which keeps its members fast bound to its communion; the charm which retains them within its magic circle; the opiate which lays asleep all their doubts and difficulties: it is likewise the magnet which attracts the desultory and unstable in other persuasions within the sphere of Popery, the foundation of its whole superstructure, the cement of all its parts, and its fence and fortress against all inroads and attacks.

Under the idea of this infallibility, the Church of Rome claims—1. To determine what books are and what are not canonical, and to oblige all Christians to receive or reject them accordingly. 2. To communicate authority to the Scripture; or, in other words, that the Scripture, as to us, receives its authority from her. 3. To assign and fix the sense of Scripture, which all Christians are submissively to receive. 4. To decree as necessary to salvation whatever she judges so, although not contained in Scripture. 5. To decide all controversies respecting matters of faith. These are the claims to which the Church of Rome pretends, but which we shall not here attempt to refute, because any man with the Bible in his hand, and a little common sense, will easily see that they are all founded upon ignorance, superstition, and error.

INFANT BAPTISM. See BAPTISM.

INFIDELITY, absolute want of faith in God, or the disbelief of the truths of revelation, and the great principles of religion. If we inquire into the source of infidelity, we shall find it is not, in ordinary cases, the result of sober inquiry, close investigation, or full conviction; but it is rather, as one observes, "the slow production of a careless and irreligious life, operating together with prejudices and erroneous conceptions concerning the nature of the leading doctrines of Christianity. It may, therefore, be laid down as an axiom, that 'infidelity is, in general, a disease of the heart more than of the understanding;' for we always find that infidelity increases in proportion as the general morals decline."

If we consider the nature and effects of infidelity, we shall find that it subverts the whole foundation of morals; it tends directly to the destruction of a taste for moral excellence, and promotes the growth of those vices which are the most hostile to social happiness, especially vanity, ferocity, and unbridled sensuality. Facts might easily be brought forward illustrating its close and intimate connection with licentiousness. But it is destined to be banished from the earth. Its inconsistency with reason; its incongruity with the nature of man; its cloudy and obscure prospects; its unsatisfying nature; its opposition to the dictates of conscience; its pernicious tendency to efface every just principle from the breast of man, and to lead the way to every species of vice and immorality, show that it cannot flourish, but must finally fall.

INFINITY OF GOD. Infinity is taken in two senses entirely different; that is, in a positive and a negative one. Positive infinity is the quality of being perfect in itself, or capable of receiving no addition. Negative, is the quality of being boundless, unlimited, or endless. That God is infinite is evident; for, as Doddridge observes—1. If he be limited, it must either be by himself or by another; but no wise being would limit himself, and there could be no other being to limit God. 2. Infinity follows from self-existence; for a necessity that is not universal must depend on some external cause, which a self-existent being does not. 3. Creation is so great an act of power, that we can imagine nothing impossible to that Being who has performed it, but must therefore ascribe to him infinite power. 4. It is more honourable to the Divine Being to conceive of him as infinite than finite. 5. The Scriptures represent all his attributes as infinite. His understanding is infinite (Ps. cxlvii. 5); His knowledge and wisdom (Rom. xi. 33); His power (Rom. i. 20; Heb. xi. 3); His goodness (Ps. xvi. 2); His purity, holiness, and justice (Job iv. 17, 18; Isa. vi. 2, 3.) 6. His omnipotence and eternity prove his infinity; for were he not infinite, he would be bounded by space and by time, which he is not.

INFINITE, without bounds or limits. Many have objected to the common opinion that sin is an infinite evil, but without sufficient grounds, since every sin is committed against a God of infinite excellence, in violation of infinite obligations, and in its natural results leads to the perpetuation of innumerable, inconceivable, and interminable miseries. Objectors usually confound the finite act with the infinite evil—the metaphysical or physical quantity with the moral quality; which is an absurdity founded on a double sophism.

INFIRMITY, applied to the mind, denotes frailty, weakness. It has been a question what may properly be denominated sins of infirmity.

1. Nothing, it is said, can be excused under that name which at the time of its commission is known to be a sin. 2. Nothing can be called a sin of infirmity which is contrary to the express letter of any of the commandments. 3. Nothing will admit of a just and sufficient excuse upon the account of infirmity, which a man beforehand considers and deliberates with himself whether it be a sin or not. A sin of infirmity is, (1.) Such a failing as proceeds from excusable ignorance; (2.) Or unavoidable surprise; (3.) Or want of courage and strength. Rom. xv. 1.

By infirmity, also, we understand the corruptious that are still left in the heart (notwithstanding a person may be sanctified in part), and which sometimes break out. These may be permitted, to humble us, to animate our vigilance—perhaps that newly-convinced sinners might not be discouraged by a sight of such perfection as they might despair of ever attaining to; to keep us prayerful and dependent; to prevent those honours which some would be ready to give to human nature rather than to God; and lastly, to excite in us a continual desire for heaven. Let us be cautious and watchful, however, against sin in all its forms: for it argues a deplorable state of mind, when men love to practise sin, and then lay it upon constitution, the infirmity of nature, the decree of God, the influence of Satan, and thus attempt to excuse themselves by saying they could not avoid it.

INFLUENCE, DIVINE, a term made use of to denote the operations of the Divine Being upon the mind. This doctrine of divine influence has been much called in question of late; but we may ask—1. What doctrine can be more reasonable? "The operations which the power of God carries on in the natural world are no less mysterious than those which the Spirit performs in the moral world. If men, by their counsels and suggestions, can influence the minds of one another, must not divine suggestion produce a much greater effect? Surely the Father of spirits, by a thousand ways, has access to the spirits he has made, so as to give them what determination, or impart to them what assistance, he thinks proper, without injuring their frame, or disturbing their rational powers." We may observe, 2. Nothing can be more scriptural. Eminent men, from the patriarchal age down to John, the latest inspired writer, believed in this doctrine, and ascribed their religious feelings to this source. Our Lord repeatedly inculcated this truth; and that he did not mean miraculous, but moral influences of the Spirit, is evident from John iii. 3; Matt. vii. 22, 23; John vi. 44, 46; see also John xii. 32, 40; Rom. viii. 9; 1 Cor. ii. 14. And we may add, 3. Nothing can be more necessary, if we consider the natural depravity of the heart, and the insufficiency of all human means to render ourselves either holy or happy without a supernatural power.

INGATHERING, THE FEAST OF, after all the fruits of the fields and vineyards were gathered in, was the same with the FEAST OF TABERNACLES (which see). Exod. xxiii. 16. This was the festival of gratitude for the fruitage and vintage, commencing on the evening of the fourteenth day of the seventh month, or October, called "the end of the year." It continued seven whole days until the twenty-first, and then received the addition of the eighth day, which had probably in ancient times been the wine-press feast of the Israelites. During these eight days the Israelites dwelt in booths formed of green branches interwoven together, which, in the warm region of Palestine, answered extremely well, as in October the weather is usually dry. It was celebrated from the 15th to the 23d of the seventh month, Tisri, which was the first month of the civil year. A great number of public sacrifices were required to be offered during this festival, an account of which may be found in Numb. xxix. 12-38. There were also several private peace-offerings observed during this season. Under the second temple, certain peculiar ceremonies were introduced into the celebration of the feast of tabernacles in addition to those which originally belonged to it by divine appointment. "On the first day of the feast, every person provided himself with a small collection of branches of palm and willow and myrtle, and was seen carrying it about, wherever he went, all the day long. On the following days it was not thus constantly carried, but only when individuals went up to the temple: each day, however, all were required to visit the temple, with their branches in their right hands, and every one a citron in his left, and thus pass around the altar, crying aloud, Hosanna, (which means save now!) and repeating also the whole 25th verse of Psalm cxviii., while all the time the sacred trumpets were sounding without restraint. On the seventh day this ceremony was repeated seven times, in memory of the conquest of Jericho.

"Some have thought that the whole manner in which our Saviour was met the last time he came up to Jerusalem, was borrowed from the usage that has been noticed of carrying branches in the hand, and shouting Hosanna, in the temple, on the feast of tabernacles; and that the use of the ceremony, at this time, was designed to intimate, that what the prayer in Ps. cxviii. 25, then so much used, had respect to, viz., the coming of the Messiah, was now truly accomplished; and that Jesus of Nazareth was no other than this glorious personage, the son of David, the Redeemer of Israel, that should come into the world: whence it was cried, at the same time, in the language that begins the next verse of the same Psalm—"Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!" Matt. xxi. 8, 9, 15; John xii. 12, 13. The use of palm branches on this occasion, as well as all the show of honour that was made, seems rather to have been taken from the general ancient manner of celebrating triumphs, or public entries of kings into cities; but there can be no doubt, that the minds of the people were carried, at the same time, by natural association, to the usage so familiar to their great feast, and that their acclamations, accordingly, were really derived from that quarter. A reference to the ceremony of drawing and pouring out water also, is discovered in the Gospel history: our Lord, it seems evident, made allusion to it, when, on the last day of the feast, he stood in the temple, and cried, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.' It was in this way he was continually in the habit of taking advantage of earthly objects and circumstances around him to draw attention to spiritual truths, and to convey the most salutary instruction in a clear and impressive manner; in the case before us, we are told 'that he spake of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive.' John vii. 37-39."

INIQUITY. This word means not only sin, but, by a metonymy, the punishment of sin, and the expiation of it: "Aaron will bear the iniquities of the people;" he will atone for them. Exod. xxviii. 38. The Lord "visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children" (Exod. xx. 5); he sometimes causes visible effects of his wrath to fall on the children of criminal parents.

"To bear iniquity," is to endure the punishment of it—to be obliged to expiate it. The priests bear the iniquity of the people; that is, they are charged with the expiation of it. Exod. xxviii. 38; Lev. x. 17.

INJURIES, FORGIVENESS OF. See FORGIVENESS.

INJURY, a violation of the rights of another. Some, says Grove, distinguish between injustice and injury. Injustice is opposed to justice in general, whether negative or positive; an injury, to negative justice alone. (See JUSTICE.) An injury is, wilfully doing to another what ought not to be done. This is injustice, too, but not the whole idea of it; for it is injustice, also, to refuse or neglect doing what ought to be done. An injury must be wilfully committed; whereas it is enough to make a thing unjust, that it happens through a culpable negligence.

INJUSTICE. See INJURY.

INK. This word occurs only once in the Old Testament, viz., in Jer. xxxvi. 18: "Then Baruch answered them, He pronounced all these words unto me with his mouth, and I wrote them with ink in the book;" and once in the New Testament, 2 Cor. iii. 3: "Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshly tables of the heart." Both the Hebrews and the Egyptians appear in ancient times to have used ink of different colours, but from the word which Paul uses in the last-cited passage to denote ink, it must have been of a black colour, as it generally is at this day. From the nature of the writing referred to in Numb. v. 23, which was to be washed out with the bitter water, the ink used on that occasion must have resembled the ink still used in the East, which can be easily washed off with a wet sponge. In ancient times the ink was not so fluid as it is with us. Several tinctures were used for this purpose, and among others that obtained from the cuttle-fish.

INKHORN. The "writer's inkhorn" is referred to in Ezek. ix. 2. The expression seems to indicate that the individual there described could read and write. An Arab Kateb or scribe still wears his inkhorn as a mark of his office. The pens which are attached to these inkhorns are composed of reeds, with which those using them can write more quickly than with the iron pens or bodkins which engraved or scratched the writing. This facility in using the reed is referred to in Ps. xlv. 1: "My heart is inditing a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the king; my tongue is the pen of a ready writer." There were pens in some inkhorns found in Herculaneum, but they were merely pointed sticks, like skewers. John (Rev. vii. 2) saw an angel with the seal of the living God, and therewith multitudes were sealed in their foreheads; but, to understand what sort of mark was made there, you must have recourse to the inkhorn of Ezekiel. On the other hand, Ezekiel saw a person with an inkhorn, who was to mark the servants of God on their foreheads; that is, with ink; but how the ink was to be applied, is not expressed; nor was there any need that it should be, if in those times ink was applied with a seal—a seal being in one case plainly supposed—as in the Apocalypse the mention of a seal made it needless to take any notice of an inkhorn by his side. (See GIRDLE.) The inkhorn still in use in the East has a long shaft which holds the reeds, and is stuck into the girdle, while the place for the ink forms a head at the one end.

INN. The following minute and accurate account of the lodging-places for travellers in the East is extracted from Dr Jamieson's 'Eastern Manners':—

"The khans or caravansaries, which are stationed at great intervals upon the roads, and one of which, at least, is found in the suburbs of every town and village, are often nothing more than bare or roofless walls, erected at the side of a fountain as a resting-place for cattle; and even the best and largest of them are constructed only with the view of affording shade from the sun, and protection from the dews and plunderers of the night. Beyond this, no accommodation do they offer either for man or beast,—not an article of food or clothing can be procured for love or money,—not a vestige of furniture is to be seen in them, nor any flooring, save the bare ground,—and the keeper of this cheerless abode is satisfied with having done all that is expected, when he gives the traveller the key of his apartment, and leaves him to spread his own mattress, to open his stores, or to go to the neighbouring village in search of the provisions he requires, and cook them with the utensils and the fuel he can find.

"The extreme poverty and meanness of these inns is greatly increased by the style of their construction. Their principal feature is a large and open square court, along the sides of which is a range of sheds for cattle; and behind these, separated only by a thin partition, are the lodgings, or rather cells, for the reception of their masters, almost always situated on the ground floor; and as the sheds are all furnished with a niche or open window looking into the rooms, to enable every one to see and attend to his beasts at pleasure, the receptacles of the traveller are, from this state of constant exposure, liable to be defiled by all sorts of dust and vermin, and possess, indeed, little of the comfort and shelter of an inn but the name. From this description it will appear that, in point of accommodation, the transition is but slight from the chambers of the men to the resting-place of the beasts; and, indeed, we frequently meet, in the journals of travellers who have come to khans of a small size, or in a crowded state, with accounts of their being obliged to have recourse to the stables, and finding these fully as tolerable as the miserable apartments of which at first they regretted the want.

"The apertures already mentioned in the sides of the rooms, over against the head of every beast, are generally large,—so large, that Tavernier says three persons may conveniently lie in them; and immediately below these, inside of the shed, is a hole dug in the bare ground, unsupported by any vestige of stone or wood work, and serving as a receptacle for the provender of the cattle,—the only expedient which the poverty of Oriental art can contrive for a manger. The out-houses are in perfect keeping with the mean style of the lodgings of which they are a necessary appendage, for they are often nothing more than a walled enclosure, boasting neither doors, nor a roof, nor stalls. A single stake here and there is all that secures the beasts and keeps them from each other; and the stables themselves never experience the attention of a cleaner, save when some traveller prepares with his own hand a corner for the accommodation of his toil-worn quadruped."

INNOCENT, INNOCENCE. The signification of these words is well known. The Hebrews considered innocence as consisting chiefly in an exemption from external faults committed contrary to the law; hence they often join innocent with hands. "I will wash my hands in innocency." Gen. xxxvii. 22; Ps. xxiv. 4, xxvi. 6. And, "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency." Ps. lxxiii. 13. Josephus admits of no other sins than those actions which are put in execution. Sins in thought, in his account, are not punished by God. To be innocent, is used sometimes for being exempt from punishment: "I will not treat you as one innocent," Jer. xlv. 28; literally, "I will not make thee innocent."

INQUISITION, a word used to denote a tribunal, in several Roman Catholic countries, erected by the popes for the examination and punishment of heretics. Its first objects and victims were more especially the Waldenses. This court was founded in the twelfth century, under the patronage of Pope Innocent, who issued out orders to excite the Roman Catholic princes and people to extirpate heretics, to search into their number and quality, and to transmit a faithful account thereof to Rome. Hence they were called inquisitors, and gave birth to this formidable tribunal, called the Inquisition. That nothing might be wanting to render this spiritual court formidable and tremendous, the Roman pontiffs persuaded the European princes, and more especially the Emperor Frederick II. and Louis IX., king of France, not only to enact the most barbarous laws against heretics, and to commit to the flames, by the ministry of public justice, those who were pronounced such by the inquisitors, but also to maintain the inquisitors in their office, and grant them their protection in the most open and solemn manner. The edicts to this purpose issued out by Frederick II. are well known—edicts sufficient to have excited the greatest horror, and which rendered the most illustrious piety and virtue incapable of saving from the most cruel death such as had the misfortune to be disagreeable to the inquisitors. These abominable laws were not, however, sufficient to restrain the just indignation of the people against those inhuman judges, whose barbarity was accompanied with superstition and arrogance, with a spirit of suspicion and perfidy, nay, even with temerity and imprudence. Accordingly, they were insulted by the multitude in many places, were driven in an ignominious manner out of some cities, and were put to death in others; and Conrad of Marburg, the first German inquisitor who derived his commission from Gregory IX., was one of the many victims that were sacrificed on this occasion to the vengeance of the public, which his incredible barbarities had raised to a dreadful degree of vehemence and fury.

This diabolical tribunal takes cognizance of heresy, Judaism, Mohammedanism, sodomy, and polygamy; and the people stand in so much fear of it, that parents deliver up their children, husbands their wives, and masters their servants, to its officers, without daring in the least to murmur. The prisoners are kept for a long time, till they themselves turn their own accusers, and declare the cause of their imprisonment, although they are neither told their crime nor confronted with witnesses. As soon as they are imprisoned, their friends go into mourning, and speak of them as dead, not daring to solicit their pardon, lest they should be brought in as accomplices. When there is no shadow of proof against the pretended criminal, he is discharged, after suffering the most cruel tortures, a tedious and dreadful imprisonment, and the loss of the greatest part of his effects. The sentence against prisoners is pronounced publicly, and with extraordinary solemnity. In Portugal they erect a theatre capable of holding three thousand persons, in which they place a rich altar, and raise seats on each side, in the form of an amphitheatre. There the prisoners are placed, and over against them is a high chair, whither they are called one by one to hear their doom from one of the inquisitors. These unhappy persons know what they are to suffer by the clothes they wear that day. Those who appear in their own clothes are discharged on paying a fine; those who have a santo benito, or strait yellow coat without sleeves, charged with St. Andrew's cross, have their lives, but forfeit all their effects; those who have the resemblance of flames made of red serge sewed upon their santo benito, without any cross, are pardoned, but threatened to be burnt if ever they relapse; but those who, besides those flames, have on their santo benito their own picture surrounded with devils, are condemned to expire in the flames.

The Inquisition was put down by Napoleon in 1808; though restored at Rome over the clergy by Pius VII. In 1826, it condemned to death Casmir, a pupil of the Propaganda, who was appointed patriarch of Memphis, but not accepted by the viceroy of Egypt. His crime is unknown; but the pope commuted his punishment into imprisonment for life. Works on the Inquisition have been published by Baker, Limborch, Geddes, Lavalle, Llorente, and Puig-blanch. The Records of the Inquisition, from the original manuscripts taken from the inquisitorial palace at Barcelona, when it was stormed in 1819, were published at Boston, in North America, in 1828. In Spain alone nearly half a million have suffered as its victims.

INSPIRATION, divine dictation, the communication by the Holy Spirit of certain supernatural ideas and emotions to the human soul, or any supernatural influence of God upon the mind of a rational creature, whereby he is raised to a degree of information or excellence to which he could not, or would not, in fact, have attained in his present circumstances in a natural way. By the inspiration of the Scriptures we are to understand, that the sacred writers composed their works under so plenary and immediate an influence of the Holy Spirit, that God may be said to speak by those writers to men, and not merely that they spoke to men in the name of God, and by his authority. There is a considerable difference between the two propositions. Each supposes an authentic revelation from God; but the former secures the Scriptures from all error, both as to the subjects spoken and the manner of expressing them. This, too, is the doctrine taught in the Scriptures themselves. Heb. i. 1, iv. 12, 13; Acts iv. 24-28, xxviii. 25.

It is generally allowed that the Scriptures were written by divine inspiration. That they claim this, in every variety of form, implied and express, is certain. See, for example, 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17; John x. 35, v. 39, 46, xii. 47, 48, xvii. 17; Rom. iii. 1, 2; 2 Sam. xxiii. 2; Acts i. 16, iii. 21, xi. 14, xvii. 10, 11, xxvi. 22; Ps. cxix. 111; Luke x. 10-16, xii. 47, 48, xvi. 29-32; 1 Pet. i. 10-12; Rom. iii. 4; Prov. xxx. 5, 6; Rev. xxii. 18, 19; Rom. ii. 12; 1 Cor. ii. 10-16, iv. 3, 4; Phil. iii. 16; 1 John iv. 1-6; Isa. viii. 20; Gal. i. 11, 12; Eph. iii. 3-5; 1 Thess. ii. 13, iv. 8, v. 27. The celestial ideas in them; the spirituality and elevation of their design; the majesty and simplicity of their style; the candour, disinterestedness, and uprightness of the penmen; the harmonious agreement of their various parts; their wonderful efficacy on the consciences and character of mankind; their astonishing preservation; the multitude of miracles wrought in confirmation of the doctrines they contain, and the exact fulfilment of all their predictions up to this hour, sufficiently prove this.

The inspiration of the Old Testament Scriptures is so expressly attested by our Lord and his apostles, that among those who receive their authority the only question relates to the inspiration of the New Testament. It is true we do not find the claim to inspiration formally advanced in the Four Gospels. This omission has sometimes been stated by those superficial critics, whose prejudices serve to account for their haste, as an objection against the existence of inspiration. But if we attend to the reason of the omission, we shall perceive that it is only an instance of that delicate propriety which pervades all the New Testament. The Gospels are the records of the great facts which vouch the truth of Christianity. These facts are to be received upon the testimony of men who had been eye-witnesses of them. The foundation of Christian faith being laid in an assent to these facts, it would have been preposterous to have introduced in support of them that influence of the Spirit which preserved the minds of the apostles from error. For there can be no proof of the inspiration of the apostles unless the truth of the facts be previously admitted. The apostles, therefore, bring forward the evidence of Christianity in its natural order, when they speak in the Gospels as the companions and eye-witnesses of Jesus, claiming that credit which is due to honest men who had the best opportunities of knowing what they declared. But after the respect which their character and conduct procured to their testimony, and the visible confirmation which it received from Heaven by miracles, &c., had established the truth of the facts they testified, no room was left to doubt of their inspiration. Without it they were indeed credible witnesses of facts, but without it they were not qualified to execute the higher office of apostles. Luke xxiv. 49. And, therefore, whenever the circumstances of the Church required the execution of that office, we find the claim which had been conveyed to them by the promise of their Master (John xiv.-xvii.; Acts i, ii.), and which is implied in the apostolical character, asserted in their history and writings. They uniformly demanded from all who had received the faith of Christ, submission to the doctrines and commandments of his apostles, as the inspired messengers of Heaven. 1 John iv. 6; 1 Cor. xiv. 37; 1 Thess. iv. 8.

It has been disputed, however, whether this inspiration is, in the most absolute sense, plenary or entire. As this is a subject of importance, and ought to be carefully studied by every Christian, in order that he may render a reason of the hope that is in him, we shall here subjoin the remarks of an able writer, Mr. Robert Haldane, in whose views, as to the plenary verbal inspiration of the Word of God, we entirely coincide.
